On January 31 and April 4, 1896, he gave Peed two notes for £500 each. On February 6, 1897, the defendant received an account from Peed showing the amount due to Peed to be £3,500, and at his request the defendant gave him two more notes on February 8, one for £1,500 and the other for £2,000. The defendant did not ask for the return of the notes that he had previously given to Peed, and they were left in Peed's hands, together with the two fresh notes. All the notes were made payable on demand to Peed or order. In March, 1897, Peed called on the plaintiffs and told them that he required to raise £5,000, for which he had excellent security to offer—viz., five promissory notes of his client, Major de Freville, which he said would certainly be paid on June 30, when Major de Freville's eldest son would come of age and the property would be resettled. The plaintiffs, knowing something of the position of Major de Freville, gave Peed a cheque for £4,800. Peed endorsed the five above-mentioned notes generally and handed them to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs' cheque for £4,800 was endorsed by Peed and was duly met. On June 30, 1897, the amount advanced by the plaintiffs was not repaid, and they applied to Peed for payment, but Peed put them off with an excuse as to a difficulty in getting the signature of a trustee. In July, 1897, after the defendant's eldest son had come of age, the entail was barred, and a mortgage over the estate was created, and in that month and in August, 1897, two sums amounting to £22,000 were paid by the defendant to Peed for the purpose of discharging various liabilities, including a sum of £4,000 to meet the two notes for £2,000 and £1,500. The notes were not handed back by Peed to the defendant. The defendant did not then know that the notes had been negotiated with the plaintiffs, and he was justified in assuming that they were in Peed's possession. On September 28, 1897, at an interview between Peed and the plaintiffs, a sum of £5,581 was agreed upon as due upon the notes, this sum including principal and interest from June, 1897, and Peed gave the plaintiffs his cheque for £5,581, and the five notes were handed to Peed. Peed then sent the five notes by post to the defendant, who received them on September 29, and immediately burnt them. On the same day Peed absconded, and his cheque for £5,581 was dishonoured. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the defendant, suing on the notes, and at the trial it was agreed that the action should be treated as if there were an alternative claim for conversion of the notes. The Lord Chief Justice found that when Peed drew the cheque he knew that it would not be met, and that he was contemplating the perpetration of a fraud on the plaintiffs. He held that by virtue of section 61 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the notes had been discharged, the defendant having himself become the holder of them after maturity in his own right, and he therefore gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. Harry Dobb appeared for the defendant.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—In this case the plaintiffs, who are tailors and moneylenders, sue Major de Freville upon five promissory notes amounting in all to £5,300, payable on demand, of which notes the defendant was the maker and a solicitor named Peed was the payee. These notes at one time had been in the plaintiffs' possession, though they had been fraudulently induced by Peed to hand them back to him, and the notes then got back into the defendant's hands, as hereafter will appear.

There is also a count in trover. This case is complicated, as ordinarily is the case when fraud intervenes in the matter of negotiable instruments; but, having heard excellent arguments on each side, for the reasons I will now state I think the question in the cause is, Did the defendant, when he received the notes back into his possession from Peed, take them under such circumstances as to give him a better title to the notes than Peed had when he gave them back to the defendant? If the defendant took no better title than Peed had, then the plaintiffs, in my judgment, can succeed in this action, aliter if the defendant had. Peed was a solicitor who for years had carried on business at Cambridge, and down to September 29, 1897, when he absconded and afterwards became bankrupt, was a man of unimpeachable credit and above suspicion. Between the years 1885 and September, 1897, inclusive, Peed was the trusted solicitor of the defendant, and from time to time made advances of money to and disbursements for the defendant, and in January, 1895, the defendant owed him for so doing about £800. Peed then suggested that the defendant should give him a promissory note payable on demand by way of security for the debt. This the defendant did, and it was a note for £800 dated January 14, 1895, payable on demand in favour of Peed, and it was expressly agreed between the defendant and Peed that Peed should not negotiate or part with this note. For further advances and disbursements the defendant made two other notes payable on demand in favour of Peed, and handed them to him. The one was dated January 31, 1896, for £500, and the other was dated April 4, 1896, also for £500, and there was the like agreement about not negotiating or parting with these two notes. The reason for this agreement as to Peed not negotiating or parting with these notes was that the defendant did not then wish to be called upon to pay the amounts represented by them, it being anticipated, as turned out to be the case, that in the month of June, 1897, when the defendant's son would come of age, by means of barring an estate tail the defendant would be placed in funds. In the next year—namely, upon February 9, 1897—the defendant gave to Peed two notes, the one for £1,500 and the other for £2,000—i.e., for £3,500 in all, payable on demand and in favour of Peed. These two notes were given to and taken by Peed to pay off the first three notes for £1,800 and to cover further advances. These two notes were also by agreement between the defendant and Peed not to be parted with or negotiated by him. The defendant did not take back from Peed the first three notes thus paid by the defendant, but left them in Peed's possession, and this, as will be seen, was what enabled Peed to commit the fraud which he subsequently practised upon the plaintiffs as regards these three notes. In the month of March, 1897, Peed, without the knowledge of the defendant, broke faith with him and negotiated all five notes with the plaintiffs, they paying to him the sum of £4,800 and taking a bonus of £500 for so doing. These notes were endorsed by Peed, and he also deposited with the plaintiffs an insurance upon the life of the defendant's son. In June, 1897, the defendant's son came of age, the estate tail was barred, the defendant became possessed of funds, and a settlement of accounts was then come to between the defendant and Peed, and the only material fact as to this settlement is that the defendant then gave to Peed £4,000 wherewith to pay the two notes for £3,500 and interest. The defendant did not get back from Peed those two notes when he paid them, but left them in Peed's hands, as he had done when he paid the first three notes. By his doing so Peed was enabled to perpetrate the fraud he subsequently practised upon the plaintiffs as regards these two notes. It is not denied that the plaintiffs, when they discounted the five notes for Peed, became holders of them in due course and for value, and without notice of anything which would have impeached the plaintiffs' title to sue de Freville or Peed upon these notes. That the plaintiffs could have sued the defendant upon these five notes I have no doubt, and the defendant would have been undefended. It is true that up to this point the plaintiffs have no cause of complaint and were in no way prejudiced by the defendant not having taken back the notes from Peed as and when they were paid; and, on the contrary, the plaintiffs, by reason of the notes not having been returned by Peed to de Freville when they were paid, have been enabled to discount the notes for Peed at the rates they did, and were also enabled to enrich themselves by the sum of £500, being the bonus they took when they discounted them for Peed. But the prejudice to the plaintiffs comes in later on. The plaintiffs pressed Peed for payment of the notes, but could not get payment, and upon September 28, 1897, this took place. Peed, desiring to have the notes back, gave to the plaintiffs his cheque for £5,581 in exchange for the notes which they then held for £5,300, and also what the plaintiffs call a contango amounting to £26—whatever that may mean—they preferring, I suppose, Peed's cheque coupled with the contango of £26 to the signature of the defendant upon the notes with no contango. This, however, the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to do. The Lord Chief Justice finds, and I have no doubt correctly, "that the plaintiffs then voluntarily or intentionally parted with the notes, intending that Peed should take them, and intending that they should take and rely upon Peed's cheque which he had given in exchange for them"; and he also finds, and I think correctly, that "when Peed drew his cheque he knew that it would not be met, and he did not intend that it would be met, and in point of fact he was contemplating the perpetration of a fraud upon the plaintiffs." That Peed defrauded the plaintiffs is clear. What is the effect of this? Before I discuss this, I should state that Peed, when he thus got back the notes by means of his worthless cheque in exchange, at once placed them in an envelope and sent them to the defendant, who received them upon September 29, 1897, and knowing, as was the fact, that he had paid them long since to Peed, and not knowing that Peed had ever parted with them, put them into the fire and treated the matter as at an end. Upon October 1, 1897, Peed's cheque was returned to the plaintiffs marked "referred to drawer." The plaintiffs made no communication to the defendant upon the matter until some four months after the cheque was thus returned, and the question arises, in these circumstances, who has the better title to the notes, obtained as they were by fraud from the plaintiffs, who were the bona fide holders for value of the notes. Now, the notes having been obtained by Peed from the plaintiffs by fraud, although the property in the notes passed to Peed, the plaintiffs as against Peed were entitled to disaffirm the transaction on discovering the fraud, and, if, before the transaction with Peed was disaffirmed by the plaintiffs, the defendant had become holder in due course of the notes, it would then be too late in my judgment to disaffirm, so far as the defendant was concerned, and the plaintiffs could not then successfully sue the defendant either upon the notes or in trover; and the real question, therefore, as I have above stated, comes to this—Did the defendant, when he took the notes on September 29, 1897, from Peed, obtain a better title to them than Peed had? which means—Did he take them bona fide and for value and without notice of Peed's fraud and before they were due? For, if so, the defendant would in my judgment have taken a better title to the notes than Peed had, and a title which would prevail over that of the plaintiffs. That the defendant received back the notes bona fide and without notice of Peed's fraud is clear. The defendant, when he received the notes from Peed, knew nothing of Peed having ever parted with them, nor had he ever heard of the plaintiffs in the matter. That the defendant received back the notes before the fraud of Peed was discovered is clear, for he received them the day after the fraud was committed. But did he give value for the notes when he received them back, and did he take them from Peed before they were overdue? As to the question of value, what value did the defendant give for the notes when he took them back from Peed? He had given value for the first three notes, when, upon February 9, 1897, he gave the second two notes to Peed in order to pay off the first three notes, and he gave value for the second two notes when he paid the £4,000 in June, 1897, to Peed to pay them off; but this was months before the fraud was perpetrated by Peed upon the plaintiffs and before he got the notes back, which took place on September 29, 1897. When he got the notes back the defendant gave nothing for them. How can it be said then that he took back the notes for value? For he did not. If the case cited of "London and County Banking Company v. London and River Plate Bank" (21 Q.B.D., 535), were to be held to apply to this case, we should have to hold that the defendant gave real value for the notes and then a supposed value over again for the same notes, which cannot be. But supposing the defendant did give value for the notes when he took them back, which in my opinion he did not, did he take the notes after they were due? I cannot see how it can be held that the defendant, when he received back the notes in September, 1897, though payable on demand, did not take them when overdue; for he must have known they were overdue if he thought about it at all, inasmuch as he had himself paid them off, the first three notes in January, 1897, and the last two notes in June, 1897. How can the defendant now say that they were not overdue in September, 1897, when he received them back? It seems to me that as the defendant did not give value for the notes when he took them back, and as, even if he did, the notes were then overdue, the defendant did not take a better title to them than Peed had, and that the plaintiffs, having disaffirmed, as they were entitled to do, the transaction with Peed, can maintain trover for the notes and bring an action upon the notes against the defendant, who has no better title to set up than that of Peed. I must point out that the difficulty which the defendant unfortunately is in arises through his own default in not getting the notes back from Peed when he paid them, thereby giving Peed the opportunity of cheating the plaintiffs as he did. It is a well-known principle of law that whenever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third person, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it. See the well-known case of "Lickbarrow v. Mason," in Smith's Leading Cases. And there is a case of "Babcock v. Lawson" (4 Q.B.D., 394), which contains matters very apposite to the present case. In my opinion counsel for the plaintiffs are right in their construction of section 61 of the Bills of Exchange Act, which was so much relied upon by the defendant's counsel, and that section does not apply to the present case, and the words "in his own right" do not mean in contradistinction to a representative right as argued for the defendant. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed, and that judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs upon the notes with costs here and below.

WYMAN OR FERGUSON (PAUPER) V. PATERSON AND OTHERS.*

Scotland, Law of—Trustee—Breach of trust—Negligence—Leaving moneys in hands of law agent.

Trustees held liable (Lord Morris dissenting).

This appeal was twice argued. The first hearing was on December 7, 8, and 11 before a House constituted of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Macnaghten, and Lord Ludlow. The death of Lord Ludlow made a second hearing necessary, and arguments were heard before a House constituted as above on February 5 and 8 last when judgment was reserved. The decision of the House, by which liability has been attached for a breach of trust committed about a dozen years ago, is one of great importance to trustees, especially in Scotland, where, as Lord Macnaghten observes, though there is no difference apparently in the law, "an extraordinary laxity of practice" seems to have grown up, "which the learned Judges of the First Division reprobate and yet allow." The appeal was from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session in an action in which the appellant, Mrs. Ferguson, widow of James Maxwell Ferguson, suing both as an individual and as executrix dative of her late husband, was pursuer and the respondents defenders. The action was for the recovery of trust funds alleged to have been lost through the gross negligence of the trustees. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) on June 3, 1897, held that the claim had not been established, and the Judges of the First Division (the Lord President and Lords Adam and Kinnear) on March 4, 1898, affirmed this decision. The object of the action was to have the respondents ordained to make good to the trust estate the sum of £3,140 12s. 2d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from November 11, 1887. This sum was lost in January, 1888, by the misconduct of the then agent and factor of the trustees, the late Mr. John Clark Junner, W.S. Mr. Paterson and the late Mr. Lyon and Mr. Gordon were then the sole surviving and acting trustees of the trust. The testator, Mr. James Ferguson, was a pawnbroker, and died at Edinburgh on April 1, 1854, leaving a trust disposition and settlement, dated December 13, 1849, and four relative codicils, dated respectively December 31, 1849, August 15, 1850, March 28, 1851, and October 25, 1852, all recorded in the books of Council and Session, April 8, 1854. By these instruments the testator nominated a number of persons to act as his trustees, and disposed to them his whole estate, heritable and movable. By his second codicil, dated August 15, 1850, the testator, reciting that he was about to enter into a second marriage with Miss Joanna MacHardy, directed his trustees to give effect, as if it formed part of his trust settlement, to the antenuptial contract of marriage entered into between him and the said Joanna MacHardy. By the contract of marriage the testator bound himself and his heirs and successors whomsoever, to make payment to the said Joanna MacHardy, in case she should survive him, and while she remained his widow, yearly, during all the days of her life and widowhood after his decease, of a free liferent annuity of £130. By the fourth purpose of his trust disposition and settlement the testator directed his trustees, so soon as his youngest child attained majority, to make up a state of the trust estate, and to divide and convey over the same, equally, among his children. The testator had six children by his first marriage, of whom James Maxwell Ferguson, the pursuer in said action before the Lord Ordinary, and now deceased, was the third, and one daughter, who was born on January 7, 1852, by his second marriage. This daughter, now Mrs. Emma Ferguson, or Burnet, came of age on January 7, 1873, when, in terms of the trust disposition and settlement, the truster's estate became divisible, subject always to the retention of such a sum as was necessary to implement the truster's obligation in his contract of marriage to pay an annuity of £130 to his widow, who is still alive. When Mrs. Burnet came of age the trustees proceeded to realize the truster's estate, and to distribute it among his children, retaining, however, a sum of about £4,700 in their hands to meet the widow's annuity. As at March 31, 1887, the funds belonging to the trust estate, and still held by the trustees, amounted to £4,755 16s. 2½d. Of that sum £3,700 was lent on bond secured over the estate of Mr. C. H. Home Purves, of Purves, and a policy of assurance on his life. Mr. Purves died in February, 1887, and Mr. Junner, who was law agent and factor for the trustees and also, unknown to them, law agent for Mr. Purves, then informed the trustees that the bond was to be paid up at May, 1887. The money was, however, not paid until July, 1887. Mr. Junner was instructed by the trustees to look out for another investment for the money, but by Martinmas, 1887, Mr. Junner had only been able to find an investment for £800. At a meeting of the trustees, held at Mr. Junner's office on December 19, 1887, Mr. Junner reported that he had not yet been able to find an investment for the balance. Mr. Junner was at that time asked if the money was on deposit receipt, and he stated that it was; and he was then requested to exhibit the deposit receipt. He did not then do so, explaining that his cashier was out, and that he could not, therefore, get at the deposit receipt. He was then asked by the trustees to send the deposit receipt to them that they might see it. On December 20 or 21, 1887, Mr. Junner sent a clerk to show each of the trustees a deposit receipt. It was dated December 20, 1887, was for £3,000, and bore that the money was received from Messrs. Ferguson and Junner, W.S., for behoof of the trustees of the late James Ferguson. Mr. Paterson and the late Mr. Gordon objected to its terms, and told Mr. Junner's clerk that the deposit receipt must be altered so that the money should be deposited in the trustees' names. Two or three days afterwards the deposit receipt, in name of the trustees, not having been shown to them, the respondent, Mr. Paterson, and the late Mr. Lyon went to Messrs. Ferguson and Junner's office to inquire into the matter, and were then told that Mr. Junner had met with a very serious accident, and was totally unfit for business. Inquiries were repeatedly made, and a letter was sent to Mr. Junner requesting the alteration in the deposit receipt. On January 19, 1888, the trustees stated that they first heard that Mr. Junner was in embarrassed circumstances. They immediately employed a new agent who on the same day intimated to the British Linen Bank that Ferguson and Junner had ceased to act for the trustees, and that they were not authorized to uplift the sum on deposit receipt, and on the following morning (January 20) called to see the secretary of the bank on the subject. The secretary then explained that Mr. Junner had uplifted the deposit receipt on January 18, 1888, and had remitted the amount thereof by a draft to Mr. Barty, solicitor, Dunblane. Mr. Barty was country agent for another trust for which Mr. Junner was the town agent. Ferguson and Junner's estate was sequestrated, and the trustees received dividends amounting in all to £259 7s. 10d., leaving the total loss to the trust-estate, as at Martinmas, 1887, £3,140 12s. 2d., or thereby. This sum consisted of £2,900 received from Home Purves's estate, and uninvested, and of a small balance uninvested and in the hands of Mr. Junner. In February of 1888 the trustees sent a circular to the beneficiaries, informing them of the loss and how it had been sustained, and another circular was sent to the beneficiaries in March, 1890, detailing what the trustees had done to recover the money. By the truster's trust disposition and settlement it was provided:—"My said trustees shall not be liable for the intrusions of such factors, or for debtors or companies to whom or where said estate shall be lent or invested, further than their being habit and repute responsible at the time of such loan or investment; neither shall they be liable for any agent who, in transacting the business of this trust, shall receive any part of my said estate into his hands. And I do hereby declare that my said trustees, whether original or assumed, or tutors or curators after appointed, shall not be liable for omissions or neglect of management, or singuli in solidum, but each only for his own actual intrusions." For the respondents it was argued that the loss sustained was not due to any fault or negligence for which the respondents were responsible, but was sustained through the fraud or fault of the respondents' law agent and factor, for which they were not liable, and that the appellant was barred by mora, taciturnity, and delay from insisting on the claim in the present action.

Mr. A. Houston, Q.C. (of the Irish Bar) and Mr. J. C. Guy (of the Scotch Bar) for the appellant; the Dean of Faculty (Mr. Asher, Q.C.) and Mr. Henry Johnston, Q.C. (of the Scottish Bar), for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In my view it is not necessary to go earlier in the history of this case than to note that the £3,000 which has been lost through the fraud of the law agents and factors of the respondent, was paid to those law agents and factors in the month of July, 1887; but £3,000 of the money handed to the agents of the trustees at that time remained uninvested at Martinmas. The Lord Ordinary in terms says that in his opinion the trustees were quite entitled to entrust the money to the care of their law agent and factor pending an investment being found. This is a somewhat formidable proposition, and one to which I cannot assent. How long that may be done appears, according to the breadth of the proposition, to be simply till an investment is found, however long that operation may take. I am glad to see that the two learned Judges of the First Division take a totally different view of a trustee's duty. Lord Adam says:—"I see that evidence has been led to the effect that it is a common and recognized practice for agents and factors to deposit trust moneys in their own names, for behoof of their clients. I quite recognize that such moneys as may be necessary for carrying on the current business of the trust should be so deposited or lodged in bank as to be payable on the receipt of agents or factors. But the trust money in question was not at all in that position. It was simply deposited until a permanent investment should be obtained, which apparently there was no immediate prospect of obtaining. It is the duty of the trustees to see that the money entrusted to them is so invested or deposited as not to be exposed to any unnecessary risk. That money deposited in an agent or factor's name is not in that position the result of this case sufficiently demonstrates, and the only reason assigned for taking such receipts in the names of agents or factors—viz., the trouble of obtaining the signatures of the trustees when it is desired to uplift the money, appears to me to be perfectly trivial." And Lord Kinnear takes the same view. His Lordship says:—"The chief difficulty in the case arose from the argument which was maintained to us that trustees are justified in allowing factors or agents to mix the funds of the trust with their own. I am clearly of opinion with Lord Adam that this is contrary to their duty, and that the reasons which were given for following such a practice are quite inadequate." My Lords, I am not quite clear why, if these be the principles applicable to the conduct of a trustee, how both those learned Judges have come to the conclusion that they have, to assuage the defenders. I cannot understand upon what ground these defenders can escape from the consequences of their negligence, because they not only allowed the agent or factor to deal with the money, but took no pains to ascertain in what manner the money had been deposited. I observe the learned Judge further says that he would have taken a different view of their position had the trustees taken steps when they became aware that the money in question was not deposited in their own names. But why did they not? Whose duty was it to see, not in the month of December, 1887, when for the first time they asked to look at the receipt, but originally when the money was entrusted to the care of their agent or factor? What single act is proved to have been done by these trustees to see (in the words of Lord Kinnear) "that the funds of the trust were not mixed with the funds of the factors and agents"? I find in Mr. Paterson's evidence that he says:—"We were constantly inquiring about the reinvestment of the money. He says at an earlier period of his evidence that the trustees were informed by the agent that he had no investment that he could recommend. When asked whether it was not leaving the money with the agent to do what he liked with, he says:—"It might be so, but it would be reinvested by the agents. The agent told him in reply to his inquiries that he had found nothing suitable that he could recommend. Now, assuming that it was the duty of the trustees to see that the money was not left in the hands of the agent, what excuse is there that no inquiry was made in the period elapsing between July and December 19? My Lords, I am not prepared to say that I should not, upon the grounds mentioned by the learned Judges, have held the trustees liable on the facts as they stood on December 20. But the facts do not end at that date. On that date the trustees became aware that the money was deposited in the names of the agents and factors themselves. It is brought to their attention, therefore, that the money (in the language of Lord Adam) "was exposed to unnecessary risk," and I understand both the learned Judges, to whom I have referred, are of opinion that it was the duty of the trustees, when that fact was ascertained, to have taken steps to remove that risk, and to have the money invested in the names of the trustees themselves. The excuse for not doing so appears to me to be wholly inadequate. The fact that the agent had suffered an accident could not have prevented a proper communication to the bank. The only excuse given for not doing so—and the money was allowed to remain for a month in what has been described as an unnecessary risk—is that it might have injured the factors' credit with the bank if any such communication had been made. I cannot assent to the propriety of such an argument, even if an injury to the factors' credit had resulted; but I think nothing could have been easier, without any imputation on either the credit or honesty of the factor, to communicate with the bank and state, as the fact was assumed to be, that it was only an accident that prevented the money from being properly transferred into the names of the trustees; but they as trustees felt it their duty to insist upon its being secured from risk. Moreover, in the event of the factor's death it might have caused confusion and difficulty. These, to my mind, were ample reasons for a communication to the bank without in the least degree injuring the credit of the factors. This was not done, and in the result the agent was enabled to withdraw the whole sum of £3,000 and to use it for his own purposes. My Lords, I observe that neither of the learned Judges who have given judgment nor the Lord Ordinary rely upon the judgments they have pronounced on the immunity clause of the trust deed. But the Dean of Faculty has, in his very able argument before your Lordships, insisted on it that, granting a certain amount of negligence in the conduct of the trustees, it is only such an amount of negligence as is protected by the clause in question. I confess, for myself, I have great difficulty in weighing the exact amount of what is described as negligence. But I do not think the question of negligence properly arises upon the facts of this case. It seems to me there was a plain breach of duty, and I do not think that upon the principles laid down in "Seaton v. Dawson" (4 Dunlop) it is possible to rely on the immunity clause. There was no authority in the trustees to treat their agent and factor as a banker into whose account they might pay the money. If, while acting strictly within the character of factor and agent, there was something which he might have lawfully done but which he did fraudulently, it may well be that the liability of the trustees is cut down and qualified by the immunity clause. But in this case it was not as factor or agent in any sense that could be supposed to be covered by that character, but as guardian of the money without any control or check, that the trustees thought proper to allow the defaulting agent to remain in possession of the money. I am not certain that it is very important to show that the trustees did know what their duty was. People who undertake a duty are bound to know what their duty requires. But even if it were necessary to show knowledge, I am clear that in this case they did know. Their own conduct on December 18 exhibits their knowledge. Under these circumstances, apart from the original error which, in common with Lord Adam and Lord Kinnear, I think, was committed by the trustees, the interval between December 20 and the period when the money was finally lost appears to me to have exhibited on the part of the trustees very gross negligence, for which I think they must be held to be responsible. My Lords, under these circumstances I move your Lordships that the judgment of the First Division and that of the Lord Ordinary be reversed, and that judgment be entered for the pursuers, to replace the £3,000 with interest at 3 per cent.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I am of the same opinion, and I have only a very few words to add. If the gentlemen whose conduct is impugned had been English trustees acting in the execution of an English trust, the case against them would have been, I think, too clear for argument. And though there seems to have grown up in Scotland an extraordinary laxity of practice, which the learned Judges of the First Division reprobate and yet allow, it has not been suggested that there is any difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland as to the duties and liabilities of trustees in regard to the custody and investment of trust funds. Those gentlemen were trustees of a fund set apart to answer a life annuity and divisible on the death of the annuitant among the persons entitled in remainder. The sum of £3,700, part of this fund, was invested in a heritable bond. On July 15, 1887, the bond was paid off. The trustees allowed their law agent to receive the money and to retain it in his hands uninvested for rather over six months. At the end of that time the law agent became bankrupt and the greater part of the fund was lost. The surviving trustee and the representatives of the other two who are now dead contend that the trustees are not responsible for the loss. In my opinion the trustees were guilty of a plain and positive breach of trust, and are liable to replace the money lost by reason of their gross neglect. The learned counsel for the appellant said that he did not complain of the trustees allowing the money to be received by the law agent. He admitted that the receipt was proper. I think that the learned counsel was probably right in making that admission. But I think the admission ought to have been qualified. If the trustees were justified in allowing their law agent to receive the money on the score of convenience, or, what is much the same thing—because it is in accordance with the ordinary course of business in Scotland—they were not, in my opinion, justified in leaving the money in the law agent's hands for a longer time than might be reasonably required to enable him to pay it over to them. No Scottish authority was cited on this particular point. Nor is there much authority to be found in England. It is plain that it is no part of the duty of a solicitor as such to receive trust money. And there is a dictum attributed by Lord Chancellor Hart to Lord Eldon to the effect that if trustees permitted their solicitor to receive trust money and he became bankrupt next day they would be held responsible. That probably is an extreme view, and not in accordance with modern opinion. It is, however, unnecessary to pursue the point, because in this country it has been set at rest by the Legislature. The Trustee Act, 1888, authorizes trustees to appoint a solicitor to be their agent to receive trust money, but it attaches to the authority thus conferred the following proviso:—

“Nothing herein contained shall exempt a trustee from any liability which he would have incurred if this Act had not passed in case he permits such money . . . to remain in the hands of the solicitor . . . for a period longer than is reasonably necessary to enable such solicitor to pay or transfer the same to the trustee.” It seems to me that this enactment must be taken to be a statutory declaration of the law in this country, and although the Act does not extend to Scotland it appears to me that by analogy the law thus declared must be treated as applicable in the case of Scottish trustees. Tried by this standard it is obvious that the trustees in the present case committed a gross breach of trust in leaving the money in the hands of their law agent. The immunity clause does not, in my opinion, afford the trustees any protection. It has been determined in this House that such a clause affords no protection against a positive breach of trust. And although the trustees described the law agent as their factor, and desire that he should be regarded as such, it is obvious that it is no part of a factor's duty to retain in his hands the money of his employers and to act as their banker. The provision as to immunity in regard to the acts of factors cannot, I think, extend to what the factor is known by the trustee to be doing outside the scope of his employment as factor. There is only one other observation I desire to make. We are told that the delay was necessary or at any rate excusable because the trustees were directed to invest the trust money in heritable securities, and it was difficult to find an eligible security of that description. No doubt the law agent put the trustees off by an excuse of this sort; but the law agent must have known, and the trustees would have known if they had made any inquiry, that under the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1884, it was competent for them to invest the trust money in their hands in any one of the securities therein mentioned. The Act places a wide range of investments at the disposal of trustees, although the investment mentioned in the trust disposition may be of a very limited character. I think the appeal must be allowed.

LORD MORRIS dissented, and held that there had been no departure from established custom or breach of duty on the part of the trustees in leaving the money with the agent for so short a period. The trustees, in his opinion, had neither done nor omitted anything which a prudent man would have done or omitted. They had pressed Junner repeatedly to find an investment and did not purpose to leave the money indefinitely in his name. They had no reason to suspect Junner, who was a man of high reputation, and they could hardly, in the absence of suspicion, have practically intimated to the bank that Junner was an untrustworthy person. In his opinion a decision against the trustees would be a draconic decision and operate as an additional terror to any honest and solvent person who was asked to act as trustee.

LORD SHAND concurred in thinking the appeal should be allowed.

LORD DAVEY.—This appears to me a very plain case. The first duty of the trustees was to preserve the trust fund under their own control. Instead of doing so, they allowed it to remain under the sole control and in the sole disposition of their law agents for five months. They took it for granted that the money would be placed on deposit, but made no inquiry whether it was so; and, indeed, it appears from Mr. Paterson's evidence that he did not even suppose that the deposit would be in the names of the trustees, as it ought to have been. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that the trustees were quite entitled to entrust the money to their law agent and factor, pending an investment being found. Lords Adam and Kinnear were clearly of opinion that this was contrary to their duty, and that the reasons which were given for following such a practice were quite inadequate. I entirely agree with the learned Judges in the Inner House in that opinion. The trustees might properly employ their law agent to receive the money from the mortgagees, but it was their duty to see that the money, when received, was immediately reinvested or placed on deposit in their own names and under their own control. Where I differ from the learned Judges is in thinking that the ineffectual attempts made by the trustees to recover the money from the law agent did not absolve them from the consequences of their previous neglect of duty. It is, in my opinion, a clear breach of trust and culpa lata on the part of the trustees thus to abandon the performance of their primary duty, and the loss that has ensued was the direct consequence of their doing so. It was argued that the trustees are exempted from liability by the immunity clause to be found in the will. I think that this point is covered by the decision of the full Bench in “Seton v. Dawson” (4 D., 310), which has more than once been referred to with approval in this House. I agree with the opinion expressed by the Lord Justice Clerk in that case, that where trustees give a joint receipt for trust money, though it is, in fact, received by the hand of an agent, it is the intromission of the trustees themselves. I also think that the immunity from liability for the intromissions of a factor or agent extends only to the acts of a factor or agent properly appointed and acting within the legitimate scope of his agency. In the present case the law agent's duty was to receive the money and at once place it in safety under the control of the trustees, and they could not properly, and did not, in fact, authorize him to retain the money in his own control. If trustees think fit to delegate their duties to their law agents in a matter in which they cannot properly authorize him to act for them, they are not, in my opinion, protected by a clause of immunity from liability for the intromissions of factors or agents. The learned counsel for the respondents relied on some words used by Lord Watson in "Knox v. Mackinnon" (13 App. Cas., 763), but, if the whole passage in which these expressions occur is read, they do not appear to me to have any application to the present case. I am rather surprised to find it stated in the evidence in this case that it is the practice of Scotch solicitors to place trust funds in their own names for "behoof of the trustees," instead of placing them in the names of the trustees themselves. I am not aware that such a practice has ever been directly made the subject of judicial decision. If the case ever arises, it will have to be considered whether such a practice is consistent with the primary duties of trustees to retain the funds in safety under their own control. I agree that the order hereby appealed from should be reversed. A question was raised as to the rate of interest which should be allowed. There appears to be no settled rule on the subject in the Scottish Courts. I think the rate should be 3 per cent. An order should be made for payment by the surviving trustee and the representatives of the deceased trustees to the judicial factor of the sum of £3,140 12s. 2d., with interest at 3 per cent. from July 15, 1887.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD gave judgment to the same effect, and the appeal was allowed.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.
Collins, and Romer, L.J.J.) } March 13.
HICKMAN V. MAISEY—HICKMAN V. MATTHEWS.*

Highway — Trespass — Unreasonable user of highway.

The user of a highway by touts for the purpose of watching the trials of race-horses on adjoining downs held to be an unreasonable user, and such as to render them liable in an action of trespass to the owner of the soil.

These were two applications by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in two actions tried before Mr. Justice Day and a special jury at Devizes. The two actions raised the same question, and were tried together. The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of a farm in Wiltshire across which a public road ran. The land owned by the plaintiff included a quantity of down land, over which the plaintiff had granted to one William Thomas Robinson, who was a trainer of race-horses, a licence for value to exercise and train his race-horses. The defendants in the two actions were the owners of a newspaper in which they recorded the doings and trials of race-horses, and they went each day for about an hour and a half on the road and walked up and down it between two points 15 yards apart and watched with glasses the trial gallops of the race-horses and took notes thereof. It was admitted that the soil of the road belonged to the plaintiff. Notice was given to the defendants to discontinue the acts complained of, which they refused to do. The plaintiff then brought an action of trespass against each of them, and claimed an injunction to restrain them, their servants or agents, from any repetition of the acts complained of, alleging that the acts of the defendants were an annoyance and caused damage to the plaintiff and to Robinson, his licensee. It was admitted that the defendants, unless restrained by injunction, intended to continue doing as they had done. At the trial the learned Judge told the jury that the question was whether the defendants had used the road as wayfarers for the purpose of passing and repassing or for some other purpose, and that if the defendants had frequented the road, not for the purpose of travelling along it as wayfarers, but to stop on it in order to view the trial gallops and carry on their business there, it was a trespass; that the jury had to say whether the coming on the road and watching and standing about for an hour and a half was a user of the road by the defendants as wayfarers, that was to say, for the purpose for which it was dedicated to the public; and that if the defendants only used it as wayfarers the verdict would be for them; but if they exceeded their user of it as wayfarers and used it for the purpose of carrying on their business thereon, the verdict would be for the plaintiff. The jury found that the defendants did not use the road as ordinary wayfarers, and assessed the damages at 1s. Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff and an injunction was granted.

MR. DUKE, Q.C. (Mr. J. W. McCarthy and Mr. T. H. Parr with him) for the defendants contended that there was no trespass committed by the defendants upon the highway. A person could not be prevented from walking along or up and down a highway and looking at what was to be seen. If it was an annoyance to the plaintiff he ought to take measures to keep his land private and prevent people from seeing what was going on there. The jury were not properly directed as to what constituted a trespass upon a highway. Many people were accustomed to stand on a highway in order to see a race or a procession, and it could not be said that they were guilty of trespass. There must be some act of trespass subsequent to the original entry on the highway. There was no such act here. The intent with which a person went upon a highway was not material. "Harrison v. Duke of Rutland" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 142) was not in point, because in that case the plaintiff was substantially driving away the grouse on the defendants' land and was interfering with the lawful user by the defendant of his own land. There was no such act here. He also referred to "Dovaston v. Payne" (2 H. Bl., 527); "Reg. v. Pratt" (4 E. and B., 860); "Shorland v. Govett" (5 B. and C., 485); "Raugeley v. Midland Railway Co." (L.R., 3 Ch., 306, at p. 310).

MR. J. A. FOOTE, Q.C., and MR. F. R. Y. RADCLIFFE, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

THE COURT dismissed the applications.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the soil of the road belonged to the plaintiff, and the defendants, who were what had been called racing touts, had for a period of time, in spite of notice not to do so, used the road for the purpose of watching the trial gallops of the horses on the downs, and then published the information they thus obtained, the result being a detriment not only to the trainer, but also to the plaintiff. Thereupon this action of trespass was brought upon the ground that the defendants had broken into the plaintiff's close, that was, the soil of the road belonging to the plaintiff. The defendants justified the alleged trespass by stating that the locus in quo was a public highway and that they were lawfully using it. Therefore the question was whether it was made out that the defendants were using the highway for the purpose for which it was dedicated to the public, that was, for the purpose of passing and repassing along it. Unless the defendants showed that they were lawfully using the highway they had not proved their plea. The user for which a highway was dedicated was that of passing and repassing—"Dovaston v. Payne." His Lordship agreed with what fell from Lord Esher in "Harrison v. Duke of Rutland" upon that point. It seemed to him that the doctrine as to the user of the highway being simply for passing and repassing was somewhat broadened by the last decision. There were many acts which came within the ordinary and reasonable user of a highway. Could they say that the acts of the defendants, who used the road not for the purpose of passing and repassing but for the purpose of carrying on their business to the detriment of the owner of the soil of the road, constituted a reasonable user of the highway? In his opinion it was not a reasonable user. It was sufficient to say that the case of "Harrison v. Duke of Rutland" was directly in point, and covered the present case. Nor could he see that there was any misdirection. As regards one argument urged on behalf of the defendants he did not agree that what the defendants intended to do, and their purpose when going on the highway was not to be taken into account in determining whether or not they were using the highway for the purpose of passing and repassing. The applications must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. It was not easy to give an exact definition where the line should be drawn between a user of a highway as a highway, and a user beyond that conferred by the dedication. But, as in many other cases, it was not difficult to put instances which were well on one side or the other of the line. In the present case the user went well beyond the line which marked the proper user of the highway as a highway. It was contended on behalf of the defendants that when a person entered on a highway under the guise of a public right, if it was going to be questioned whether the entry was in exercise of that public right, there must be some act afterwards which amounted to a trespass so as to enable the Court to say that the original entry was a trespass. Accepting that proposition, in his opinion there was evidence to show a trespass by the defendants after their entry on the highway, because in the last resort the question must be whether what the defendants did was a reasonable user of the highway. Primarily a highway was dedicated for the purpose of the public passing and repassing along it. In modern times there was a legitimate extension of the doctrine that the reasonable user of a highway was limited to passing and repassing along it. "Dovaston v. Payne" was an illustration. In that case it was stated that cattle passing along a highway and grazing as they went would not be trespassers. That was only an illustration of the principle that the right of passing and repassing along a highway was subject to all reasonable and legitimate extensions recognized as necessary or customary owing to a change in the habits of people as districts became more populous and as times changed, considering the larger user to which a highway might become liable owing to the requirements of the public becoming more extended in a way not inconsistent with the paramount right of transit over it. That was the extended kind of user referred to by Lord Esher in "Harrison v. Duke of Rutland." It was then contended on behalf of the defendants that the Court could not inquire into the motive with which a person went on a highway. That contention was contrary to all the leading authorities, including "Dovaston v. Payne." It was said that there was nothing here to show the intent with which the defendants entered on the highway. That was not so, because the acts of the defendants on the highway could be looked at to see, as stated in the "Six Carpenters' Case" (8 Co., 146a) quo animo, or with what intent, they entered, and that intent was not for the proper user of the highway.

THE HARROWING STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V.
TOOHY.*

Ship—Transfer of shares—Registration—Fees—
Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act, 1898, sec. 3—Scale of fees.

This was an action brought to recover damages for the defendant's refusal to register transfers of shares in the plaintiffs' vessels. The question in the action was as to the amount of fees payable under the Merchant Shipping (Mercantile Marine Fund) Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict., c. 44), s. 3, upon the transfer of shares in ships where the transferee at one time registers the transfer of a number of shares transferred from several holders. The facts, which were agreed, were as follows:—The defendant was registrar of British ships at the port of Whitby. In July, 1899, the plaintiffs produced to the defendant 20 bills of sale for the transfer to the plaintiffs of 58 64th shares in the steamship Ethelburga, together with the declaration of transfer required by section 26 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and requested the defendant to enter their name as transferees in the register book as owners of the said shares. These bills of sale represented 2,015 gross tons out of a gross tonnage of 2,223 tons. The plaintiffs at the same time tendered £4 as the amount due for fees upon such registration. The sum of £4 was arrived at by charging one fee on the scale mentioned in the Act upon the 2,015 gross tons represented by the shares transferred and dealt with by the transfers. The defendant refused to register the plaintiffs' name without the payment of a separate fee upon the said scale on the tonnage transferred by each bill of sale. The amount payable on this principle in respect of the Ethelburga would be £14 15s. The point for the decision of the Court was whether the fees tendered by the plaintiffs were sufficient. If they were, it was agreed that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment and damages for a nominal amount with costs. The same question was raised in the action with reference to five other vessels.

Mr. Horridge appeared for the plaintiffs; the Solicitor-General and Mr. Rowlatt for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said that by the Act there had to be upon a transfer the payment of a fee according to the gross tonnage represented by the ships or shares of ships transferred. In the case in point the plaintiffs had transferred to them a number of shares from different persons. Those shares were transferred, not only by a number of separate documents, but by a number of separate transactions, and each of those transactions was a separate transfer. The Act imposed the payment of fees mentioned in the schedule in the case of a transfer, and as there had been a number of separate transfers that payment must be made in each case.

by the executors of the will of one John Hudson claiming to be paid the amount due to them for principal and interest under a mortgage on the barge Swiftsure, of Rochester. The mortgage was dated March 25, 1893, and was granted by the registered owner of the barge, one George Bartlett, to John Hudson to secure the repayment to Hudson of the sum of £200 with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. The defendant Bartlett alleged by his defence that the whole of the sums due under the mortgage had been paid by him. The plaintiffs by their reply pleaded that an agreement had been entered into between Hudson and Bartlett that, in consideration of Hudson paying for all the repairs, disbursements, and outgoings in connexion with the barge, Hudson should receive 50 per cent. of the gross earnings of the barge, and that all payments made by Bartlett to Hudson had been made under this agreement, and not in discharge of sums due under the mortgage. On February 16, the case came before Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, who referred it to the Registrar assisted by merchants to report upon. The Registrar, by his report, which was dated February 24, found that there was no evidence of any such agreement as was pleaded by the plaintiffs on their reply, except what might be gathered from the entries in Hudson's own account-book, and these he thought could not be used for that purpose. He found on the evidence of the defendant that all the payments made by the defendant to Hudson were made in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, which was extinguished by them. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. KILBURN, for the appellants, contended that the learned Registrar ought to have admitted Hudson's account-book in evidence, there being entries in it which were against Hudson's interests. He cited the cases of "Wilkinson v. Stern" (9, Mod. Rep., 427) ; "Taylor v. Witham" (3 Ch.D., 605) ; "Cockburn v. Edwards" (18 Ch.D., 449).

Mr. NELSON, for the respondent, argued that the account-book had been rightly rejected. He cited the cases of "Doe v. Bevis" (18 L.J., C.P., 128) and "Knight v. The Marquis of Waterford" (10 L.J., Exch., Eq., 57).

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that it was sought to be proved by the books of the deceased man Hudson that certain payments made by Bartlett to Hudson were not made as Bartlett now stated in discharge of a mortgage debt, but under an agreement to pay to Hudson half the gross earnings of the barge. The books were admittedly in the handwriting of Hudson, and he thought that prima facie they were admissible in evidence, as being books kept by Hudson in the ordinary course of business. He thought also that they were admissible on the ground that they contained entries of payments made to Hudson, and as such could be said to be against his interest. The cases cited by Mr. Kilburn were authority for this. What the effect of the evidence might be when admitted was another matter. The case must go back to the Registrar with an intimation that the books must be received in evidence, and proper inferences drawn from them. The costs of the appeal would be reserved.

DIXON V. WINCH.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Fraud—Purchase of land —Mortgage not disclosed to purchaser—Liability.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's raised the question, which of two innocent persons is to suffer by the fraud of a solicitor. On July 14, 1886, some land at Harlow, in Essex, was conveyed in fee to one Dent, a solicitor. On March 24, 1892, Dent conveyed part of the land to the defendant Winch, who is a builder. Winch built houses on this land, and on January 11, 1893, he mortgaged the land and houses to Dent to secure £350, with interest. On January 16, 1893, Dent transferred this mortgage to Miss Ellman, another defendant. The conveyance to Winch and the mortgage to Dent (on which the transfer to Miss Ellman was endorsed), were handed over to her, but she did not give notice to Winch of the transfer of the mortgage to her. Dent paid her interest on the mortgage debt until 1898, when he absconded. After his disappearance the following facts were discovered :—On September 15, 1893, a deed was executed, to which Dent, Winch, and the plaintiff, Mrs. Dixon, were parties. This deed contained an untrue recital that Dent, being seised for an unencumbered estate in fee simple in possession of some land (part of that comprised in the deed of March 24, 1892), had agreed to sell it to Winch for £100, but that no conveyance had been executed, and that Winch had erected houses on the land and had agreed to sell the land and houses to Mrs. Dixon for £685. And Dent and Winch, in consideration of £100 and £585 paid to them respectively by Mrs. Dixon, conveyed to her in fee the land and houses in question. Nothing was said in this deed about the mortgage to Dent. By another deed, dated April 25, 1894, made between the same parties and containing similar recitals—and a recital that the £100 had been already paid by Winch to Dent—the remainder of the land comprised in the deed of March 24, 1892, was, in consideration of £325 paid by Mrs. Dixon to Winch, conveyed by Dent and Winch to her. No investigation of title was made on her behalf, it being arranged that she was to have a free conveyance prepared by Dent and "to accept Winch's title" from him. She was, in fact, in complete ignorance of the mortgage. The purchase-money on the first purchase was paid to Dent, and he afterwards, by arrangement with Winch, retained out of it £451 10s., which was said to be made up of the £350 mortgage debt, some further advances by Dent to Winch, and interest. The plaintiff under these circumstances claimed to hold the property conveyed to her free from Miss Ellman's mortgage. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy held that the plaintiff took the property subject to Miss Ellman's mortgage. The plaintiff and the defendant Winch appealed.

Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Christopher James were for the plaintiff ; Mr. W. G. Hayter was for the defendant Winch ; Mr. Micklem, Q.C., and Mr. Harman were for Miss Ellman.

The COURT dismissed the appeals.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that it was unnecessary for him to deal with the authorities which had been cited, for there was one view of the case which seemed to him sufficient to dispose of it. The question was whether Mrs. Dixon, the purchaser of this property, was entitled to compel Miss Ellman, the transferee of the mortgage upon it, to give up her security. It was clear that Dent was an unmitigated scamp. It did not occur to Miss Ellman to give notice to Winch of the transfer of the mortgage to her. It was really the duty of Dent, both to her and to Winch, to give that notice, and not to leave Winch exposed to the risk of paying the mortgage debt to the wrong person. In the subsequent sale of the property to Mrs. Dixon, Winch left everything to Dent, and he inserted in the conveyance a deliberately false recital, suppressing both the mortgage and the transfer of it. The result was that a gross fraud was perpetrated on Mrs. Dixon, the property being subject to the mortgage of which she was ignorant. Winch was a tool of Dent in the transaction, but he could not derive any benefit from the fact that he did not know what was being done. Then Dent proceeded to cheat Winch in the payment of the mortgage debt. The plaintiff said that this payment enabled her to throw the loss upon Miss Ellman. She said that Miss Ellman had been paid by means of the payment to Dent. This was a refinement based on the equitable doctrine that a mortgagor was entitled to pay his original mortgagee so long as he had no notice of a transfer by him. But was this payment to Dent such a payment as would have entitled Winch to a reconveyance of the property from Miss Ellman? Considering the mode in which Winch placed himself entirely in the hands of Dent in these transactions, the knowledge which Dent had must be imputed to him. He was affected by notice of that which Dent knew, and could not avail himself of his own actual ignorance. He must be taken, therefore, to have had notice of the transfer of the mortgage to Miss Ellman, and could not be heard to say that she was paid off by the payment to Dent.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed, observing that there was no reason to attribute any fraudulent intention to Winch, though every act of Dent was tainted with fraud.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS had felt troubled about this case because it dealt with a matter his familiarity with which was of recent acquisition. He did not think he should be discharging his judicial duty if he differed from his brethren, unless he was perfectly satisfied that he should be right in so doing, or merely because he might, but for their view, have arrived at a different conclusion. But he thought he ought to state what his doubt was. That doubt arose from the difficulty he felt in treating the conveyance to the plaintiff and the subsequent payment of the mortgage debt to Dent as one transaction. They were, no doubt, closely connected, and, if you could arrive at the conclusion that there was a general agency of Dent for Winch, it might be right to impute the knowledge of Dent to Winch. On this point he adopted the judgment of his brethren. He only intended to point out the difficulty of treating all the transactions as one.

WATTS V. DRISCOLL.*

Partnership—Assignment of share by way of mortgage—Dissolution of partnership—Action by mortgagee for an account—Partnership Act, 1890, sec. 31.

This action raised a question as to the construction of section 31 of the Partnership Act, 1890.

Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. J. H. Boome appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. F. P. Onslow for the defendant Dennis Driscoll; the other defendant, William Seymour Watts, was not represented.

It appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff, James Watts, had been for some years on intimate terms with the defendant Driscoll, who carries on business as a fishmonger at 145, High Holborn. Towards the end of 1898 the plaintiff agreed with Driscoll to purchase from him for the benefit of his son, the defendant Watts, a half-share in the lease and goodwill of the said business for £1,500 and in certain trade fixtures and stock for £141, and to find £250 for working capital. Articles of partnership were accordingly drawn up and signed by the two defendants on January 9, 1899. The plaintiff alleged that Driscoll well knew that the defendant Watts had no capital and that the plaintiff was advancing to him all the moneys required to start him in business upon the terms that the defendant Watts should assign his interest in the business, assets, and share of profits to the plaintiff to secure his advance. By a deed dated March 23, 1899, the defendant Watts assigned to the plaintiff all his partnership interest in the business, assets, and share of profits by way of security for the moneys advanced by the plaintiff, of which deed the plaintiff alleged that the defendant Driscoll had full knowledge and notice. Shortly after the execution of the articles of partnership differences arose between the two defendants, and, ultimately, as the plaintiff alleged, Driscoll induced the defendant Watts to agree to a dissolution of the partnership upon the terms of Driscoll paying the defendant Watts £500 in satisfaction of his share and interest in the partnership, and on September 12, 1899, without the plaintiff's knowledge, a deed of dissolution to that effect was carried out. Prior to the execution of the deed a balance-sheet for the half-year from January 1 to June 30 had been prepared, in which the share of capital standing to the credit of the defendant Watts was £1,860 and the share of profits £161. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled to a charge upon the share of the defendant Watts in the partnership assets, and also claimed all proper and necessary accounts. The defendant Driscoll, who cannot read and can write only his name, denied that he ever had any notice of the plaintiff's charge upon the share of the defendant Watts in the partnership, and alleged that the defendant Watts was himself anxious to retire from the business.

After hearing the evidence, MR. JUSTICE FARWELL said that he found, as a fact, that the defendant Driscoll had knowledge and notice of the plaintiff's charge.

MR. HUGHES then submitted that on the proper construction of section 31 of the Partnership Act, 1890, the plaintiff was not entitled to an account. Subsection (1) was as follows:—"An assignment by any partner of his share in the partnership, either absolute or by way of mortgage or redeemable charge, does not, as against the other partners, entitle the assignee during the continuance of the partnership to interfere in the management or administration of the partnership business or affairs, or to require any accounts of the partnership transactions, or to inspect the partnership books, but entitles the assignee only to receive the share of profits to which the assigning partner would otherwise be entitled, and the assignee must accept the account of profits agreed to by the partners." He contended that the meaning of that subsection was that, in the absence of fraud, whatever was agreed on between the partners was binding on the assignee. Here the partners had agreed that Driscoll should purchase the share of the defendant Watts for £500, and consequently the plaintiff could not claim an account against Driscoll. The assignee could not interfere in the administration of the partnership, and had no rights whatever, beyond a share in the profits, against the other partners. Driscoll and the defendant Watts were entitled to come to any terms they pleased as to ending the partnership. This view was supported by subsection (2) of the section. There was no case directly in point, but "Whetham v. Davey" (30 Ch.D., 574) showed that the assignee was only entitled to an account as from the date of the dissolution. Moreover, an assignee took subject to all the equities subsisting between the partners—"Kelly v. Hutton" (3 Ch.App., 703)—and one of the equities was a right to settle the partnership affairs.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, without calling on Mr. Bramwell Davis to argue the point of law, said that he agreed with Mr. Hughes that an assignee took subject to all equities, among which was the partners' right to settle the affairs of the partnership among themselves. The section of the Act in question provided that the mortgagee could not interfere in the ordinary dealings of a going concern, but that, when it came to a dissolution, he was entitled to an account as from the dissolution. But it did not appear to him that the present case came within the section, as there had been a sale of a share in the partnership, and a sale was a matter outside an account of the assets after dissolution. The mortgagor had no power to sell his share without the consent of the mortgagee, and the present sale was not binding on the plaintiff. Driscoll had in fact bought from a mortgagor who had no title. He thought the plaintiff was entitled to an account as from June 30, 1899, the date of the last balance-sheet.

RUDD V. LASCELLES.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract—Sale of houses and land—Restrictive covenants unknown to the parties—Compensation.
Specific performance with compensation refused.

This was an action for specific performance of a contract to purchase certain houses and land in Harrogate for the sum of £3,500. After the conclusion of the alleged contract the plaintiff, Henry Rudd, discovered that the property was subject to certain restrictive covenants, the existence of which, as he alleged, depreciated the value of the property to the extent of £1,000. The plaintiff admitted that the defendant, Marian Elizabeth Lascelles, was also ignorant of the existence of the restrictive covenants at the date of entering upon the alleged contract, but he claimed specific performance with a due and proper allowance or abatement from the purchase money. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance, as the compensation which he claimed for the restrictive covenants was incapable of being assessed, and that specific performance with compensation would inflict great hardship upon her.

After hearing the correspondence which had passed between the parties and their respective solicitors MR. JUSTICE FARWELL held that it constituted a binding contract.

MR. BRAMWELL DAVIS, Q.C. (Mr. T. P. Perks with him), then submitted that the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance of the contract with adequate compensation for the depreciation produced by the restrictive covenants, and cited the following cases in support of his argument:—"Ramsden v. Hirst" (4 Jur., N.S., 200); "Powell v. Elliot" (10 Ch. App., 424); "Westmacott v. Robins" (4 De G., F. and J., 390); "Cato v. Thompson" (9 Q.B.D., 616); and "Hexter v. Pearce" ([1900] 1 Ch., 341). He also referred to Fry's Specific Performance, pars. 1,210, 1,257, 1,276, 1,278, and 1,279.

MR. HUGHES, Q.C. (Mr. A. L. Ellis with him), contended that to deprive the defendant of nearly a third of her purchase money would be to inflict great hardship on her, and, on the question of compensation, cited "Collier v. Jenkins" (1 Younge, 295); "Thomas v. Dering" (1 Keene, 729); "Durham v. Legard" (34 Beav., 611); "Barnes v. Wood" (8 Eq., 424).

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in delivering judgment, said that it was clear from the correspondence that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant really knew what the defendant's title, as vendor, was. Therefore there was no fraudulent misrepresentation or deceit on the part of the vendor, as there was in "Powell v. Elliot," nor even any direct representation on her part, which was sufficient to distinguish the present case from "Barnes v. Wood," although, as Mr. Bramwell Davis had said, that case went a long way. Moreover, the contract between the parties contained no express condition for payment of compensation in certain contingencies, and therefore "Ramsden v. Hirst," where there was such an express condition, had no bearing on the present facts. There was simply a bargain to sell, and if specific performance with compensation should be enforced, he would be making an entirely new contract for the parties. He entirely agreed with, and would be guided by, what Sir George Jessel had said in "Cato v. Thompson" at p. 618:—"It is almost impossible to assess compensation for covenants of this nature (i.e., restrictive covenants). I think that the cases of specific performance with compensation ought not to be extended. In many of them a bargain substantially different from that which the parties entered into has been substituted for it and enforced, which is not right." It was true that that was only a dictum, but a dictum of Sir George Jessel was entitled to the greatest respect. Were he to order specific performance with compensation in the present case, he would be enforcing a bargain "substantially different" from that which the parties entered into, as the purchaser himself had admitted in the correspondence. It would be almost impossible to assess compensation of the restrictive covenants which bound the property. He would have, in the first place, to find out whether the purchase-money was adequate, and the plaintiff had admitted that he had been offered £1,000 more for the property than he proposed to give for it. As to the question of hardship, he agreed with Mr. Hughes that to enforce specific performance would inflict great hardship on the defendant. If the plaintiff's estimate of depreciation was correct, the defendant would lose nearly one-third of the purchase-money, and that was a serious matter for a woman with a limited income. On all these grounds the plaintiff's action failed, and must be dismissed with costs.

BECKHUSEN AND GIBBS V. HAMBLET.*

Stock Exchange—Custom—Broker buying in his own name—Liability of client.

The Stock Exchange usage by which a broker, instructed by two or more different clients to purchase certain shares to be carried over from time to time, lumps the orders together, and purchases the shares in his own name from a jobber, does not create any contractual relationship between the jobber and his clients so as to enable the former to sue latter in the event of the broker's failure to meet his liabilities.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was tried on the 6th and 7th inst. The action was brought by a firm of jobbers on the Stock Exchange to recover damages from the defendant for the non-acceptance of certain shares. The defendant had dealt with a firm of brokers who had been declared defaulters on the Stock Exchange before the transaction was completed. The case raised questions of great importance as to the rights and liabilities of the jobbers and of the client in such circumstances. The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

*Reported by W. H. PORTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. G. A. H. Branson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. E. Morten for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY read the following judgment:—The plaintiffs in this case are a firm of jobbers on the London Stock Exchange. They claim from the defendant £186 7s. 6d. as damages for an alleged breach of contract in not taking delivery of 210 Louisville shares and paying the plaintiffs for the same on December 29, 1899. The history of the case, so far as it is material to my decision, appears to be this:—The defendant, who is not a member of the Stock Exchange but carries on business as an "outside broker," had for some time before December 12, 1899, been [employing Messrs. E. Preston and Co., who were members of the Stock Exchange, as his brokers in dealings on the Stock Exchange in Louisville shares. Messrs. Preston and Co. had 210 such shares open for him on December 12 and had instructions to "carry over" for him to the end of December account. What they did was this:—They bought [from] the plaintiffs for the end of December account 360 Louisvilles; of these they apportioned, or intended to appropriate, and so far as book entries are concerned they recorded in the usual way in their books their apportioning or their intention to appropriate to the fulfilment of the defendant's instructions, 210 out of the 360 shares, to the delivery of which, under their contract with the plaintiffs, they would become entitled on December 29. That "carrying over" so far as relates to the 210 shares was notified to the defendant in the usual manner. No writing passed between Preston and Co. and the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs knew no one in the making of the contract but Preston and Co. The defendant was not informed of the name of the firm with whom Preston and Co. were carrying over for him. The balance of the 360 shares beyond the defendant's 210 was carried over with the plaintiffs by Preston and Co. in fulfilment of the orders of a Mr. Brister. A further number of Louisvilles for the same account was carried over with another jobber of the name of Spyer, but these Preston and Co. intended to appropriate to the fulfilment of the instructions of a third client, a Mr. Gingold. On December 15, in consequence of the failure of certain clients (other than the defendant) to fulfil their obligations, Preston and Co. failed, and were declared defaulters on the Stock Exchange. Thereupon, in accordance with rule 177 of the Stock Exchange rules and regulations, and for the purpose of closing the transaction between the plaintiffs and Preston and Co., Mr. Richardson, the official assignee appointed by the committee of the Stock Exchange, fixed the price of the 360 Louisville shares at the price current in the market immediately before the declaration of the failure of Preston and Co. In the plaintiffs' ledger book the transaction in respect of the 360 Louisvilles is entered as closed between them and Preston and Co. by a buying back at the closing or "hammer" price, and a difference of £93 2s. 6d. appears in favour of the plaintiffs. On December 16 and 18 Mr. Leslie Gibbs, a member of the plaintiff firm, called at the office of Preston and Co. and ascertained, in respect of 210 out of the 360 Louisvilles for which they were under contract to Preston and Co., that they had been bought on the instructions of the defendant. Gibbs proceeded to see him. The defendant told Gibbs that his account with Preston and Co. was closed when that firm failed, refused to have anything to do with the plaintiffs in the matter, and referred Gibbs to his solicitors. On December 29 Gibbs tendered 210 Louisvilles to the defendant and was refused acceptance. Gibbs immediately sold on the Stock Exchange 210 Louisvilles to the firm of Leon Brothers for cash. It is for the difference—viz., £186 7s. 6d.—between the contract price and the selling price on December 29 that the plaintiffs sue the defendant in this action. The plaintiffs assert a right to sue the defendant as undisclosed principal of Preston and Co. upon the contract made by that firm with the plaintiffs on December 12 in respect of 210 out of the 360 Louisville shares which formed the subject of their contract. The defendant denies this right altogether, relying both on principles of law which are of general application and also upon the particular incidents of this transaction as a transaction which is affected by the printed rules and the unwritten usages of the London Stock Exchange. It is convenient therefore that, before I deal with the points raised by the respective parties at the trial, I should state concisely my view of the effect of the Stock Exchange rules and practice, so far as they can be held to be relevant to the issues raised for decision in the present case. The general scheme of the rules and regulations is plain enough. The Stock Exchange does not recognize in its dealings any other parties than its own members (See Rule 53). It forbids the institution of legal proceedings against the principals of a member or of a defaulter without the consent of such member, of the defaulter's creditors, or of the committee (Rule 54). In a Stock Exchange transaction such as that between Preston and Co. and the plaintiffs, if all goes regularly, the jobber, as I understand the procedure, throughout deals with the broker. It is only in the case of the failure of the broker, ordinarily, that any application is made by the jobber to the broker's client. In that event the jobber does put himself into communication either indirectly through the broker, or directly, as Gibbs did here, with the broker's client. But at this point, and before we consider the nature of this application, we have to look at the operation of Rule 177, which a broker's failure brings immediately into play. It is to the discussion of the effect, in practice and in law, of this Rule 177 that a large portion of the evidence and the argument at the trial of this action was devoted. As will appear in a later part of this judgment, my decision of this case is based upon a point which is independent of this branch of the case; but as it was agreed by counsel to be a matter of some importance and was very fully and carefully argued it is, I think, my duty to deal with it. Rule 177 runs thus:—"In every case of failure the official assignee shall publicly fix the prices current in the market immediately before the declaration, at which all persons having accounts open with the defaulter shall close their transactions by buying of or selling to him such stocks, shares, or other securities as he may have contracted to take or deliver, the differences arising from the defaulter's transactions being paid to or claimed from the official assignee. In the event of a dispute as to the prices named, they shall be fixed by two members of the committee." As to the purpose and the working of this rule, nothing that I have heard in the argument or in the evidence in the case had in any material respect shown a variance from the very lucid exposition of the meaning and operation of the rule (then numbered 168) which was set forth in the report of "In re Plumbly, ex parte Grant" (13 Ch.D., at pp. 673, 674) as part of an affidavit sworn in that case by some of the leading members of the Stock Exchange, or from the evidence of the official assignee given nine years later in "Hartas v. Ribbons" (22 Q.B.D., 254, at p. 255). The object of the proceeding under this rule of the Stock Exchange, as I understand it, is what may properly be termed a domestic object. The purpose is to adjust the accounts of the members of the Stock Exchange inter se, dropping the defaulter, by reason of his default, out of the bargains in which he has been one of the contracting parties. The method employed is the creation of a fund in the hands of the official assignee. This fund is formed by the payment to him by members of the Stock Exchange of the difference in value of the stocks or shares in which they have dealt with the defaulter as determined by the prices fixed by the official assignee at the time of the default, when the change in price of any of such stocks or shares is against such members, and out of the fund members are entitled to claim payment for any such differences when in their favour. The defaulter does not by reason of his default acquire any right or claim to differences or damages in respect of differences in his favour between the contract price and the closing price, nor can he make any claim for himself to the moneys which are paid in respect of such differences to the official assignee by the members from whom such differences are due. What is effected is an artificial settlement of the defaulter's dealings with his fellow-members, after which he and they are precluded inter se from claiming from each other the performance, or moneys in respect of the non-performance, of any contracts of purchase or sale which were existent and open at the time of the default. But the settlement is essentially a domestic settlement. According to the practice of the Stock Exchange the defaulting broker's client, if he is not himself in default to the broker, has the right either to have the transaction carried through between himself and the jobber with whom the broker has contracted in respect of shares in which he is interested, or to accept the assignee's closing, or to transfer the account in respect of his shares to another broker for the purpose of carrying out the bargain through him. If the client chooses to accept the closing price, then according to "Hartas v. Ribbons," but not otherwise ("Duncan v. Hill," L.R., 8 Ex., 242), he is bound to indemnify the defaulting broker in respect of the difference found, upon the official closing under Rule 177, to be against him and in favour of the jobber. If the client of the defaulting broker does complete the transaction which the jobber had open with the defaulter at the time of his default, and if upon completion the jobber receives any amount in excess of the price fixed by the official assignee at the time of the default for the stock which is the subject of the bargain, the jobber is bound to account for and pay over that excess to the official assignee. It goes into the fund out of which the indebtedness of the jobber as ascertained artificially by the official closing is liquidated by the official assignee. Upon the foregoing state of facts in regard to the history of the particular case and in regard to the rules and practice of the Stock Exchange, so far as they appear to me to be relevant, have the plaintiffs a right of action against the defendant? It appears to me that if privity of contract can be made out they have that right. If the contract between the plaintiffs and Preston and Co. was one by virtue of which the plaintiffs as the sellers and the defendant as the principal of the buying broker came under an enforceable liability to each other in respect of its performance, I am of opinion that there was a breach of the contract on December 29, whereby the plaintiffs suffered loss, and that, as the plaintiffs notwithstanding the defendant's repudiation on December 16 and 18 were entitled to wait till December 29, the date for the completion of the contract, the sum claimed by them as the damages ascertained on December 29 would represent the amount legally claimable for that loss. I am further of opinion—subject to the same proviso—that there is nothing in the application of the rules or the practice of the Stock Exchange which would, in case of a breach of contract, prevent the plaintiffs, after the broker's default, from suing the defendant in respect of it, or, if the refusal to complete had been upon the part of the plaintiffs, would have prevented the defendant from suing the plaintiffs. The defendant's contentions that, whatever might otherwise have been the plaintiffs' rights against the defendant, they ought not to be allowed to have recourse to those rights now, because they must be held to have chosen to give credit exclusively to the defaulting broker, and that, under the operation of Rule 177, there had been a conclusive election on their part to have recourse only to the defaulting broker are contentions which, in my judgment, ought not to prevail. If the contract between Preston and Co. and the plaintiffs did, as originally constituted, place the defendant in the position of an undisclosed principal, liable when disclosed to be sued by the plaintiffs upon the contract in case of breach as the broker's unnamed principal, I see no proof of credit being given by the plaintiffs to the apparent principal exclusively in such a way as to bar the right of recourse against the defendant; and as to the operation of Rule 177 it appears to me that the "closing" thereby rendered obligatory upon members of the Stock Exchange (and, therefore, I may point out, affording no evidence of "election" on the part of those who are affected by it) leaves the jobber, both according to the practice of the Stock Exchange and in point of law, liable, in respect of any contract open with the defaulting broker at the time of his declaration, to be called upon by the broker's principal to complete on the due date; and, if this be so, why may he not, pari ratione, claim completion from that principal? It was stated before me in the course of the evidence that in fact the jobber upon the broker's failure often does make such a claim and the claim is acceded to. Be that as it may, it appears to me to be clear in regard to these Stock Exchange proceedings that, to borrow the language of Lord Justice James in "In re Plumblly" (ubi supra at p. 679), "whatever the liabilities and the rights of the outside world may be, they remain unaffected." But the failure of these contentions on behalf of the defendant leaves standing, as it seems to me, that which, according to my view of the case, is a real and fatal obstacle to the plaintiffs' success in this action. It appears to me that no contractual liability of the defendant to the plaintiffs ever existed in respect of this transaction. The defendant's authority to the broker was to "carry over"—in substance and effect to buy for him for the end of December account—210 Louisville shares. What the broker did was to buy in his own name from the plaintiffs for that account 360 Louisville shares. He did that which is, I believe, a common thing, and often no doubt from the business point of view a very convenient thing. He lumped, if I might use the word, the orders of two clients in one contract of purchase in his own name. In so doing he acted, I doubt not, in perfectly good faith, allocating in his books a proper proportion of the total number of shares contracted for to his two clients respectively; but it appears to me that the contract he so made was his contract and not a contract of either of his clients. A very similar course had been taken by the broker, the plaintiff in the action, upon the London tallow market, in "Mollett v. Robinson" (L.R., 5 C.P., 646); (L.R., 7 C.P., 84); (L.R., 7 H.L., 802). The defendant there was in a position analogous to that of the defendant here, and Simpson and Co. in a position analogous to that of the plaintiffs here. Mr. Justice Blackburn, at p. 108 of his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, points out the necessary result:—"The defendant could not call upon Simpson and Co. to deliver him 50 tons of tallow under the contract of April 2, because Simpson and Co. had not engaged to deliver any smaller quantity than 150 tons. Nor could Simpson and Co., if willing to deliver the smaller quantity of 50 tons, compel the defendant to accept them, because if they had been unwilling sellers the defendant could not have forced them to deliver the smaller quantity . . . and I cannot think that the difficulty is cured by any equity entitling the now defendant to use the plaintiffs' name and sue upon the contract pro tanto for himself." Mr. Justice Brett, in the opinion delivered by him in the same case when in the House of Lords (L.R., 7 H.L., at p. 824), expressed his concurrence with Mr. Justice Blackburn in regard to the "supposed equity," and at p. 820 said:—"It is admitted on all hands that the contracts with W. W. Simpson and Co. on April 2, and with Rayner and Co. and Simpson and Co. on April 28"—who were the firms mentioned as standing in the same position with the defendant as the present plaintiffs do here—"were not contracts between any of those firms and the defendant. The difference between the quantity of tallow mentioned in them (the contracts) and in the orders of the defendant prevents them from being contracts with the defendant." The same point in regard to Stock Exchange transactions had been recently dwelt upon in the judgments of Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, and Lord Justice Rigby in the case of "May and Hart v. Angeli," of which, so far as I am aware, the only published report is to be found in 13 The Times L.R., 568. Counsel has furnished me with a copy of the shorthand note of the judgments in the Court of Appeal in the appendix to the printed case on the appeal to the House of Lords. The judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal was there reversed, but, as I understand the judgment of the Lord Chancellor (14 The Times L.R., 551), not on any ground of difference from the majority of the Court below upon this point, but upon a difference as to the view to be taken of the facts, because the Lord Chancellor held that the transaction was one the real nature of which was absolutely different from the ordinary case of a buying of shares through a broker. There is no usage of business on the Stock Exchange which can, as the counsel for the plaintiffs seemed to suggest, avail to help the plaintiffs through this difficulty. There is a usage, no doubt, that the stockbroker contracts in his own name. It by no means follows from this that he should lump the orders of several clients, and buy, not what a particular client has authorized, but a different and larger quantity. But let it be assumed that the usage exists in its most ample form. Let it be assumed that there is a usage on the Stock Exchange, legally valid and known to and binding upon a client such as the defendant, that a stockbroker employed in the purchase of shares for a client properly may, if he thinks it convenient, fulfil his duty to his client, although, instead of creating, as it is ordinarily a broker's duty to create, a contractual relation between his client and the seller, he lumps the client's order with other orders and in his own name contracts in a single transaction with the selling jobber for the purchase of a larger number of shares than the client has instructed him or authorized him to buy. What follows from this assumption? This only, as it appears to me—that, as the broker will have fulfilled his duty according to usage, the client cannot complain, and is bound to pay the broker his commission and indemnify him against such liabilities as the broker may necessarily or properly incur in the course and for the purpose of his employment. Surely the usage in no way assists the plaintiffs' case here. The plaintiffs' case is not a case of a broker suing his client for indemnity in respect of shares bought for the client in a way which is sanctioned by the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange, but it is the case of a seller seeking to have recourse against the principal of a broker who has contracted with the seller in his own name by a contract for the purchase of a larger number of shares than that which the client authorized and which included a number which were being obtained by the broker for a different client. The usage cannot operate, in my judgment, so as to make a man liable upon a contract which is not, in point of law, his contract; it cannot create contractual rights between parties where none exist according to legal principle. Indeed, the very meaning of the usage may, as it seems to me, be stated in language used by Mr. Justice Blackburn in his judgment in "Mollett v. Robinson" (L.R., 7 C.P., at p. 109) in regard to the custom which was under discussion in that case—it is "not to require the broker to take care that privity of contract is established between the broker's client and the person who makes the contract with the broker into which he enters in consequence of his client's order." In my opinion no such contractual relation has existed between the plaintiffs and the defendant as is necessary to support this action, and therefore I must give judgment for the defendant with costs.

A stay of execution was granted on the usual solicitor's undertaking.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.

ILLINGWORTH V. WALMSLEY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Amount of compensation.

The maximum amount of compensation allowed by Clause 1 (b) of Schedule 1 is not cut down by Clause 2.

This was an appeal from the award of Judge Coventry, sitting at the Blackpool County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. On December 20, 1898, the respondent was injured while in the employment of the appellant, three of his fingers being severely damaged by a circular saw at which he was working. His weekly wages before the accident were £1 13s. 8d. On December 22 the respondent sent to the appellant notice of the accident, and the appellant paid the respondent 16s. 10d. a week, being 50 per cent. of his weekly wages, from that time until May 27, 1899. The respondent then resumed work at the weekly wages of 15s., and continued at work at those wages until September 19, 1899, when he filed a request for arbitration to assess compensation under the Act for the injury sustained on December 20, 1898. The County Court Judge, on October 25, 1899, awarded the respondent a lump sum of £9 13s. 6d. and 15s. a week from October 25, 1899.

Mr. J. D. CRAWFORD, for the appellant, contended that "the claim for compensation" was not made within the six months required by section 2, subsection 1, of the Act.

Mr. F. H. MELLOR, for the respondent, contended that the point was not open to the appellant, because it was not taken in the answer to the particulars annexed to the request for arbitration, as required by rule 17 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, and the County Court Judge refused to allow the appellant to amend his answer.

The COURT said that, that being so, the point could not be raised now.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. CRAWFORD said that there was another point raised by the appeal. The respondent's weekly wages before the accident were £1 13s. 8d. He received half those weekly wages until May 27, 1899, when he resumed work at 15s. a week wages. The difference between his old wages and the wages he earned after May 27 was 18s. 8d. a week. Therefore his loss was that sum, and the County Court Judge could only award him 50 per cent. of that sum under Schedule 1, Clause 1 (b), and Clause 2, to the Act. By Clause 1 (b) the amount of compensation in the case of total or partial incapacity for work was not to exceed 50 per cent. of the workman's previous average weekly earnings; and by Clause 2, in fixing the amount of the weekly payment, "regard shall be had to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he is able to earn after the accident." Taking those two clauses together, the true meaning was that the workman could only receive one-half of the loss sustained by him—namely, one-half of 18s. 8d. a week; that was 9s. 4d. This was the highest weekly sum that the County Court Judge could give.

Mr. F. H. Mellor, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the maximum amount of compensation allowed by Clause 1 (b) of Schedule 1 was not cut down by Clause 2.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. There was the express provision in Clause 1 (b) of Schedule 1, and when Clause 2 was looked at different language was used, that clause saying "regard shall be had," &c. How regard was to be had, or what the effect was, it was not so easy to see. In his opinion Clause 2 did not intend to interfere with the maximum amount of compensation allowed by Clause 1 (b).

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. All that Clause 2 meant was that the County Court Judge must bear in mind and have regard to the average weekly wages earned by the workman before the accident. But, while bearing that in mind, there was a limit placed upon the amount of compensation payable, and the only absolute limit imposed was that in Clause 1 (b)—namely, half the amount of the average weekly wages earned before the accident. There was no point in the case at all. There was no evidence that the County Court Judge did not have regard to the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average amount which he was able to earn after the accident.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.
Collins, and Romer, L.J.J.) } March 16.

POWELL V. MAIN COLLIERY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The "claim for compensation" which is required by sec. 2, subs. 1, to be made within six months of the occurrence of the accident means the filing of the request for arbitration, and is not satisfied by a notice of claim being sent by the workman to his employer (Romer, L.J., dissenting).

This was an appeal from the award of the Glamorgan-shire County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent Powell was a workman in the employment of the appellants, the Main Colliery Company, and on December 21, 1898, he was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. On May 2, 1899, a notice claiming compensation was sent by the respondent to the appellants. It was admitted that this was a good claim for compensation if it was sufficient merely to send notice of a claim for compensation within six months after the date of the accident. The request for arbitration to assess compensation under the Act was filed on October 4, 1899. The County Court Judge awarded the respondent 13s. 11d. a week.

Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. A. Bertram appeared for the appellants; Mr. S. T. Evans appeared for the respondent.

The only point in this case was whether "the claim for compensation," which by section 2, subsection 1, must be made within six months from the accident, meant the filing of the request for arbitration, in the County Court, or was satisfied by a notice of claim for compensation being sent by the workman to his employers.

The COURT allowed [the appeal, LORD JUSTICE ROMER dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the point had given rise to a great difference of opinion among County Court Judges, but in a case in the Court of Session in Scotland ("Bennett v. Wordie and Co.," 1, Court Sess. Cas., Court of Justiciary, 5th Series, 855) two learned Judges expressed an opinion in favour of the view which he took, the two other Judges expressing no opinion, and the Court of Appeal in Ireland took a similar view in a case which had not yet been reported. It seemed to him that the Legislature, in fixing the time within which the claim for compensation had to be made, followed the Employers' Liability Act, 1880. The difficulty arose here because the Legislature could not adopt the same phraseology in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, as in the Act of 1880, as the procedure under the later Act was not by action, but by arbitration. By section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1897 proceedings for the recovery of compensation under the Act were not maintainable unless "the claim for compensation" was made within six months from the occurrence of the accident. Was "the claim for compensation" satisfied by a mere notice by the workman to the master that he claimed compensation? Or did it mean the initiation of proceedings which set in motion the procedure under which the workman recovered compensation? In his opinion it meant the latter. In section 1, subsection 3, the word "proceedings" meant, in his opinion, the taking of what he would call judicial proceedings. So in section 1, subsection 2 (h), it seemed to him that the words "taking proceedings" meant the initiation of proceedings before the representative committee, or before the arbitrator agreed upon by the parties, or before the County Court Judge. He saw no difficulty in stating what amounted to taking proceedings before a representative committee or before an arbitrator. The workman would send notice to the tribunal that he claimed compensation and would ask it to adjudicate upon his claim. "The claim for compensation" would be made when he required the tribunal to assess the compensation. So in the present case, which came before the County Court judge as arbitrator, "the claim for compensation" did not mean sending a letter making a claim. Section 1, subsection 4, spoke of "the time limited for taking proceedings." Those words meant the initiation of proceedings before the tribunal appointed to assess the compensation. In section 2, subsection 1, the words making "the claim for compensation" meant the bringing of the claim before the proper tribunal—the initiation of the proceedings. Upon any other view the claim might be hung up, and the master might be made liable to pay compensation after the lapse of years. He did not agree that, if notice of a claim was sent to the master, the latter could institute proceedings to have the compensation assessed, and thus prevent the claim from being hung over his head for years. The Act, and the rules and forms, were all drawn with the view of the claim being by the workman against the master. If it was intended that the master might institute proceedings one could have expected the Act to have said so in plain terms. In his opinion, therefore, the document sent to the appellants in the present case was not "the claim for compensation" within section 2, subsection 1, and therefore the proceedings were taken too late.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. The policy of the Legislature was to impose a limit of six months for taking proceedings under the Act. There was one clear indication what was meant by "the claim for compensation" in section 2, subsection 1, to be found in section 1, subsection 4. Those words did not merely mean the notice of an intention to invoke the aid of the proper tribunal to assess the compensation, but meant the invocation of the tribunal. It must be something which let in the jurisdiction of the tribunal.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER dissented. The only section of the Act which put a precise limit of time was section 2, subsection 1. Other sections might be referred to as throwing light upon that subsection, but section 2, subsection 1 must be referred to as the only enactment limiting proceedings of any kind. The words "the claim for compensation" were reasonably clear in themselves. There must be a specific claim for compensation, and it must be a claim under the Act. The section did not say "unless proceedings were taken for arbitration." He saw no reason for departing from the plain words of the Act. If a workman gave notice to his master that he claimed compensation, giving particulars so as to make it a clear claim for compensation under the Act, he (the Lord Justice) failed to see why that would not be a "claim for compensation" within section 2, subsection 1. Before going to arbitration there must be a difference in existence. To make a difference there must be a claim made and a denial of the claim. A claim for compensation by the workman was the essence of proceedings under the Act, and it was contemplated as itself a proceeding, and a most important proceeding. In his opinion light was thrown on the words "the time limited for taking proceedings" in section 1, subsection 4, referring to subsection 3, where the "proceedings" included something done before the arbitration began. In other words, the "proceedings" included the claim for compensation. It then became plain what was the meaning of "the time limited for taking proceedings" in subsection 4, if it was remembered that the word "proceedings" included the claim for compensation by the workman and the refusal of the claim by the master. In his opinion the County Court Judge was right.

The COURT stayed execution pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

Five other cases in the list followed the result of the above decision, and in all of them the appeals were allowed.

KNOWLES AND SONS (LIMITED) V. THE CORPORATION OF BOLTON.*

Arbitration—Award—Power to enlarge time for making award—Public Health Act, 1875—Arbitration to assess compensation.

Sec. 180 of the Public Health Act, 1875, does not restrict the power of the Court to enlarge the time for making an award.

"In re Mackenzie" (17 Q.B.D., 114) overruled.

"Warburton v. Haslingden Local Board" (48 L.J., Q.B., 451) approved.

This was an appeal from the refusal of Mr. Justice Kennedy to make an order to extend the time for making an award. The corporation of Bolton, having taken a sewer through premises belonging to Knowles and Sons (Limited), became liable to pay compensation, under section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875, for the damage done thereby. The parties, being unable to agree as to the amount of the compensation, proceeded to arbitration under the provisions contained in sections 179 and 180 of the Public Health Act. Each party appointed an arbitrator, the corporation appointing their arbitrator last—viz., on April 12, 1899. On May 25 the arbitrators appointed a Mr. Walker umpire, and on May 31 they gave him notice that they were unable to agree upon an award. Walker appointed July 19 for proceeding with the reference, and on that day he proceeded with it accordingly, the parties being represented by their arbitrators as advocates. The corporation's arbitrator required that the umpire should have a view of the locus in quo, and a view was had on August 12. On September 5 the umpire made an award in favour of Knowles and Sons (Limited) for £40. On September 26 the town clerk pointed out to Knowles and Sons that the award had been made out of time, and on November 24 the corporation finally refused to pay any compensation under the award. Knowles and Sons determined to take proceedings to enforce the award, and they applied at chambers, under section 9 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for an extension of time for making the award. The Master refused to enlarge the time on the authority of "In re Mackenzie and Ascot Gas Company" (17 Q.B.D., 114). Mr. Justice Kennedy affirmed the decision of the Master, but gave leave to appeal. Section 9 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, is as follows:—"The time for making an award may from time to time be enlarged by order of the Court or a Judge, whether the time for making the award has expired or not." By section 24 this Act shall apply to an arbitration under any other Act, except so far as this Act is inconsistent with such other Act. By section 180 of the Public Health Act, "with respect to arbitrations under this Act, the following regulations shall be observed:— . . . (8) If the arbitrators fail to make their award within 21 days after the day on which the last of them was appointed, or within such extended time (if any) as may have been duly appointed by them for that purpose, the matters referred shall be determined by the umpire; (9) the time for making an award by arbitrators under this Act shall not in any case be extended beyond the period of two months from the date of the submission, and the time for making an award by an umpire under this Act shall not in any case be extended beyond the period of two months from the date of the reference of the matters to him." Knowles and Sons appealed. In support of the appeal the following cases were cited:—"Lord v. Lee" (L.R., 3 Q.B., 404); "May v. Harcourt" (13 Q.B.D., 688); "Warburton v. Haslingden Local Board" (48 L.J., Q.B., 451); "Yeadon Local Board v. Yeadon Waterworks Company" (41 Ch.D., 52).

Mr. Danekwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge appeared for Knowles and Sons (Limited), in support of the appeal; Mr. C. A. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Buckmaster appeared for the corporation.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that before 1875 it was clear that the Court had jurisdiction to enlarge the time for making an award after the time for making it had elapsed or after an award had been made. The authorities showed that it might be done at any time. It was argued, however, that by section 180 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the Court was now fettered and had not that jurisdiction which it otherwise would have had. He did not see any reference whatever to the Court in subsection 9 of that section. Both subsection 8 and subsection 9 dealt with the powers of arbitrators and umpires, and did not affect the power of the Court at all. There was no case which bound them to hold that the Court's jurisdiction to enlarge the time had been taken away. The case of "Warburton v. Haslingden Local Board" was in favour of what he was saying. The case of "In re Mackenzie and Ascot Gas Company" was to the contrary, but he did not agree with that, and he did agree with the former case. He thought there was jurisdiction to enlarge the time, and that it was a proper case for exercising their jurisdiction.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed. He said the question now came up for decision before the Court of Appeal for the first time. He thought the case of "Warburton v. Haslingden Local Board" was to be preferred to that of "In re Mackenzie and Ascot Gas Company." Section 180 of the Public Health Act expressly consisted of "regulations" to be observed as to arbitrations. He thought that these were regulations as to the conduct and as to the powers of arbitrators and umpires and parties, and that they did not cut down the power of the Court at all. The connexion between subsection 9, which was said to cut down the power of the Court, and subsection 8 had been pointed out by the Court of Appeal in "Yeadon Local Board v. Yeadon Waterworks Company." The reasons given for the judgments in that case supported their present decision. He thought, therefore, that the Court had jurisdiction to enlarge the time beyond the two months mentioned in the subsection, and that in this case the time ought to be enlarged as asked.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,
L.JJ.) 1900.
March 19.

STOCK V. MEAKIN.*

Local Government—Streets—Private street—Improvements—Private Street Works Act, 1892.

The apportioned expenses of private street works executed under this Act become a charge on the premises thereby affected as from the date of the completion of the works.

Decision of Kekewich, J. ([1899] 2 Ch., 496), affirmed.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's ([1899] 2 Ch., 496) raised a question of some interest and importance under the Private Street Works Act of 1892 (55 and 56 Vict., c. 57)—viz., whether the sum finally apportioned as payable by the owner of premises fronting a street, in respect of works (such as sewers) executed in the street by the local authority, becomes a charge upon the premises as from the date of the completion of the works, or only as from the date of the final apportionment of the expenses of the works among the various owners of premises abutting on the street. The importance of this question in the present case arose from the circumstance that the land to which the action related, which is situate at West Ham and abuts on Queen's-road, had changed hands between the date of the completion of works executed under the Act by the council of the county borough of West Ham and the date of the final apportionment of the expenses among the property owners. The works were commenced on April 4, 1898, and were completed on July 26, 1898. On October 10, 1898, the defendant, who was the then owner of the piece of land in question, entered into an agreement to sell it to the plaintiff for £1,000. The purchase was to be completed on November 11 then next, and up to that day all "outgoings" were (if necessary) to be apportioned. On November 22, 1898, the defendant, "as beneficial owner," conveyed the land to the plaintiff. On November 29, 1898, the final apportionment of expenses was made by the council, and on December 29, 1898, they gave notice to the plaintiff that his premises were liable to be charged with the sum of £130 14s. as his proportion of the expenses of the works, and that, unless this sum was paid within one month, interest at 4 per cent. would be charged. The plaintiff called on the defendant to pay this amount, and on his declining to do so the plaintiff paid it himself, and this action was brought to enforce repayment by the defendant. Besides the question as to the date from which the charge was created by the Act, which depended on the construction of the various sections of the Act, there were the further questions whether this apportioned sum was an "outgoing" which the vendor was under his contract for sale bound to discharge; whether the amount was an "encumbrance" on the property, and, if so, whether it was an "encumbrance" which after conveyance came within the vendor's covenant against encumbrances, which is, under the Conveyancing Act of 1881, implied from the use of the words "as beneficial owner" in a conveyance. Mr. Justice Kekewich held upon the construction of the Act of 1892 (as distinguished from the Public Health Act, 1875) that the apportioned sum became a charge upon the land as from the date of the completion of the works, and that consequently it was an encumbrance existing at the date of the conveyance to the plaintiff, and that the defendant was, under his implied covenant against encumbrances, bound to discharge it. The defendant appealed. The material provisions of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and the Public Health Act, 1875, with which it is to be read, are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins were for the defendant; Mr. P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. P. F. Wheeler were for the plaintiff.

The appeal was heard on February 27 and March 5.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered the judgment of the Court, dismissing the appeal. He said:—The question in this case is whether the vendor of a piece of land at West Ham is liable to indemnify the purchaser against the sum of £130 14s. claimed by the urban sanitary authority as expenses of works executed by such authority under the Private Street Works Act, 1892. The agreement for sale and purchase was made on October 10, 1898. The day fixed for the completion of the purchase was November 11, 1898, and the purchase money was paid by the plaintiff (the purchaser) and the conveyance completed on November 22, 1898. The works in question were completed on July 26, 1898. The resolution authorizing the execution of the works was dated July 27, 1897, which was prior to the acquisition of the property by the defendant, the vendor. The defendant conveyed as beneficial owner; the conveyance recited that the defendant had agreed to sell to the plaintiff free from encumbrances ; and the conveyance was by a mortgagee at the request and the direction of the defendant as beneficial owner to hold the said land in fee simple freed and discharged from the claims of the said mortgagee. The notice of final apportionment was on December 29, 1898. If the charge had been a charge for expenses incurred by the local authority under the Public Health Act, 1875, there is no doubt but that such a charge would, having regard to the dates of the agreement to purchase and the conveyance on the one hand and the date of the execution of the works on the other, have been a charge against which the vendor would have had to indemnify the purchaser. The charge under the Public Health Act, 1875, however, is a charge which can only arise on failure of the owner of the land to comply with the notice of the urban authority and the execution by the urban authority of such works by reason of such default by the landowner, and is, moreover, a charge taking effect from the date of the completion of the works, whereas the charge under the " Private Street Works Act, 1892," certainly is not a charge arising on default of the landowner, and it is argued is not a charge from the date of the completion of the works. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider from what date the charge under the Act of 1892 takes effect, and whether the fact that the charge does not arise on default of the landowner makes any difference in the obligations of the vendor towards the purchaser, and this makes it necessary to consider the terms of the material sections of the Acts of 1875 and 1892. Under section 257 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the expenses incurred by the local authority, for the repayment whereof the owner of the premises for or in respect of which the same are incurred is made liable by that Act (i.e., by section 150), may be recovered from any person who is the owner of such premises when the works are completed for which such expenses have been incurred, and until recovery such expenses are made a charge on the premises in respect of which they were incurred, and it was held in "In re Betterworth and Richer" (37 Ch.D., 537) that the expenses became a charge upon the completion of the works, and that this was so notwithstanding the fact that the owner could not be compelled to pay until the cost had been made out and apportioned. In other words, the charge was held to be subsisting although it could not be enforced until the provision in the last paragraph but one of section 257 had been worked out—i.e., until the apportionment of the expenses had become binding by the lapse of three months after notice of apportionment without any written notice of dispute being given by the owner. This decision turned entirely on the words of sections 150 and 257, which plainly gave a charge so soon as the works had been completed and the expenses incurred by the local authority on the failure of the owner of the land to execute the works in compliance with a notice served in pursuance of the powers given by section 150. The charge which has to be considered in the present case is given by section 13 of the Private Street Act, 1892, and we have to determine if this charge, like the charge under the Public Health Act, 1875, takes effect from the time of the completion of the works. We think it does. The Act of 1892 is by section 1 to be read as one with the Public Health Acts, of which the Act of 1875 is the principal Act, and the charge created by section 13 of the Act of 1892 is to be a charge to the like extent and effect as under section 257 of the Act of 1875. It seems to us to follow, unless there is in section 13 or some other section of the Act of 1892 something clearly to the contrary, the charge under section 13 will take effect, like a charge under the Act of 1875, from the time of the completion of the works the expenses of which are charged ; but it is said that section 13 itself makes express provision to the contrary, because it says, " any premises included in the final apportionment, and all estates and interests from time to time therein, shall stand and remain charged . . . with the sum finally apportioned on them, or if objection has been made against the final apportionment with the sum determined to be due as from the date of the final apportionment, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum." It is said that the effect of these words is that there is no charge until the date of the final apportionment, and therefore not from the date of the completion of the works. We cannot agree to this contention. We think that the effect of these words is, first, to provide that the amount of the charge shall be that fixed by the final apportionment or in case of objection by the determination of the objection ; and, secondly, interest is to run on the sum ultimately fixed from the date of the final apportionment. In other words that the owner of the land is not by his objection to the final apportionment to escape interest on the sum finally fixed between the date of the final apportionment and the date of the final determination of the objection. We think, therefore, that there is nothing in section 13 to prevent the charge taking effect from the completion of the works, and when the whole Act of 1892 is considered we find a great deal to lead to the conclusion that the Act means that the charge shall date from the completion of the works, and not from the final apportionment. In the first place, there is the general consideration that it is not likely that the Legislature should have intended the charge to date from the final apportionment, because the final apportionment is an event the date of which can be fixed quite arbitrarily by the officers of the local authority. Moreover, to make the charge commence with the completion of the works is to make the charge coincide with the benefit. In the next place, the whole scheme of the Act points to a charge being intended prior to the final apportionment. First, there is the provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses on the premises liable to be charged. This, subject to objections to be made within a month, fixes the premises to be charged and the proportions to be borne. All this has to be done before the works are executed. Then section 12 provides :—" When any private street works have been completed, and the expenses thereof ascertained, the surveyor shall make a final apportionment by dividing the expenses in the same proportions in which the estimated expenses were divided in the original or amended provisional apportionment (as the case may be)." These words are, in our judgment, strong to show that on the completion of the works the expenses become a charge on ascertained premises in ascertained proportions. There is no appeal against this, and the final apportionment is a mere arithmetical process for the purpose of dividing these expenses in these proportions. The final apportionment is not a condition precedent to the obligation to bear these expenses in these proportions. The obligation exists before the final apportionment is made. The final apportionment merely works out the division of these expenses in these proportions amongst the premises charged. The objections which, by Clause 2 of section 12, can be taken after final apportionment are not objections to the proportions or to the inclusion or exclusion of particular premises amongst those charged (all those objections have to be made before the works are executed), but are either objections that the proportions have not been followed or are objections to the totals of the expenses to be divided. All this statutory machinery seems to us to point to the charge taking effect from the completion of the works. The charge takes effect under the Act of 1875 before the apportionment is made, and in our judgment it is intended that it shall be so under the Act of 1892. If this view is right, we have no doubt but that this charge is an outgoing which the vendor was bound by his contract to discharge. We also have no doubt but that the charge is an encumbrance claim or demand suffered by the vendor, notwithstanding the fact that the expenses were incurred without any default on his part, and that the time for payment had not arrived before the conveyance was executed; nor have we any doubt but that this charge is inconsistent with the express terms of the conveyance. We think, therefore, that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

L.JJ.) March 20.

THE VESTRY OF THE PARISH OF ST. MARY, ISLINGTON, V. THE HORNSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Metropolis—Management Acts—Metropolitan main drainage—Persons outside metropolitan area—Injunction.

Held, that the plaintiffs could not make a valid contract to admit buildings outside the metropolitan area in to their drainage system.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's (reported in The Times of May 10 last). The object of the action was, in substance, to compel the defendants to disconnect some sewers in their district from a sewer belonging to the plaintiffs in the Stroud-green-road, North London, and to restrain the defendants from permitting any future connexion of drains or sewers in their district with the said Stroud-green-road sewer. In 1865 the Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway Company, under their statutory powers and obligations, constructed the above-mentioned sewer under part of the six-foot way of their line of railway and along the Stroud-green-road, and this sewer was connected with, and discharged into, the metropolitan sewer known as the northern high-level sewer, vested in the London County Council. The Stroud-green-road formed part of the boundary between the parish of St. Mary, Islington, and the parish or district of Hornsey. In 1868 the owners of a piece of land in the Hornsey district proceeded to develop it as a building estate, and subsequently ten roads or rows of houses were constructed thereon, sewers being made under each of those roads and connected with the plaintiffs' Stroud-green-road sewer. The plaintiffs alleged that the result of this was that after heavy rains the discharge of the additional sewage and surface water from the sewers in these roads choked up the Stroud-green-road sewer and rendered it incapable of carrying off the sewage and surface water from that part of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, which, as the plaintiffs alleged, it was constructed to drain, so that serious floodings had been caused, endangering the health and property of the inhabitants and ratepayers of that parish. This led to the present action. The defendants denied that the sewer in question was constructed for the sole benefit of the parish of St. Mary, Islington, and asserted that it was constructed partly at the expense of the owners of property in the defendants' district abutting on the Stroud-green-road, and for the benefit of the owners and occupiers thereof; that the defendants had acquired a right by prescription to drain into the sewer; and that, although the sewers in the above-mentioned roads were vested in the defendants, under the Public Health Act, 1875, that vesting gave them no right to stop up the connexions with the Stroud-green-road sewer. Mr. Justice Kekewich dismissed the action. He said that he might assume, for the purposes of the case, that the Stroud-green-road sewer was an Islington sewer for the drainage of Islington land, and that it was constructed almost entirely on Islington land. And his Lordship thought that he ought also to assume that, if the Hornsey drainage were out of the way, the Islington drainage would be carried off by the sewer without serious inconvenience. Therefore, he held that the nuisance was caused by the addition of the Hornsey drainage to the Islington drainage. But were the Hornsey Council responsible for this? He would assume that to some extent they were. They were the owners of the sewers. But, unless they had sanctioned the use of them for the purpose of draining into the Islington sewer, the mere fact that the sewers were vested in them would not be conclusive against them. In any case, he did not see how he could compel the defendants to put an end to the connexion of their sewers with the Stroud-green-road sewer, and to do that which would be a public nuisance, by discharging the sewage on their own land. It was urged that the Court could prevent the defendants from permitting any fresh connexion of drains or sewers in their district with the Stroud-green-road sewer. No doubt the Court had jurisdiction to do that. But the evidence showed that the whole of the land under the jurisdiction of the Hornsey Council was covered with houses; the drains were completed and the connexions were made. Even if existing houses were enlarged, or small houses were pulled down and larger ones built in their place, there was no evidence that this would cause any serious increase in the amount of the drainage. He declined, therefore, to grant an injunction for this purpose. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Micklem, Q.C., were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. F. Low were for the defendants.

The appeal was heard on February 22, 23, 26, and 27. The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the considered judgment of the Court allowing the appeal. He said:—The appeal in this case raises two important questions—viz., whether the defendants are entitled to have the sewage from part of the parish of Hornsey pass down a sewer called Stroud-green sewer, some part of which, at all events, is in the parish of Islington and is vested in the plaintiffs; and secondly, whether, if this question is decided against the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction to prevent such passage, seeing that, if it were prevented, a very serious public nuisance would be the consequence. The learned Judge has dismissed the plaintiffs' action and they are the appellants. The material facts are as follows:—Islington and its sewers are within the metropolitan area. Hornsey adjoins Islington, and Hornsey and its sewers are without the metropolitan area. One part of Hornsey slopes down towards Islington; and the natural drainage of that part of Hornsey is towards the two parishes along which the Stroud-green sewer runs. This sewer runs ultimately into the metropolitan high level sewer. There is a dispute as to whether part of this Stroud-green sewer is in Hornsey or in Islington. The part claimed by both parishes is about 98 rods in length at the upper end—i.e., the north-west end of this sewer. The ownership of these 98 rods has been hotly contested and will have to be decided. A large portion of the costs of the action has been occasioned by this contest. The Stroud-green sewer was part of a longer sewer made by the Tottenham and Hampstead Railway

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Company, under the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed in 1862 and called the Tottenham and Hampstead Junction Railway Act, 1862 (see sec. 59). The whole of this longer sewer, with the exception of the 98 rods in dispute, is unquestionably in Islington. The railway company, in fact, made a longer sewer than they were bound to make. They did so at the request and partly at the expense of the Islington Vestry, with the approval of the Metropolitan Board of Works, for the purpose of more effectually draining Islington, and, so far as the evidence shows, without any reference to Hornsey at all, which was then a purely agricultural parish. The Stroud-green portion of the sewer was for some distance close to the boundary of the two parishes, and the boundary there is very hard to fix. His Lordship then discussed the evidence upon the question to which parish the disputed portion of the sewer belonged, and agreed with the learned Judge below that the whole of the Stroud-green sewer (including the 98 rods in dispute) was an Islington sewer in the parish of Islington and was vested in the plaintiffs, the Islington Vestry, and he continued as follows:—The sewer became vested in the plaintiffs by the joint operation of the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict., c. 120), section 68, and the Railway Act above mentioned, section 59. The Hornsey sewers are vested in the defendants by section 13 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the next question for consideration is what rights, if any, the defendants have to send the contents of their sewers into the Stroud-green sewer, which is vested in the plaintiffs. These rights, if any, must be conferred by statute or be based on some agreement. A careful examination of the statutes leads to the negative conclusion that there is nothing in them which confers any such right apart from agreement. The statutes which have to be considered are the Public Health Act, 1875, and the Metropolitan Management Acts, 1855 and 1862. These contain sections under which drains from private houses can be made into sewers, and under which arrangements can be made with the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works for connecting sewers in the metropolis with the main sewers, and under which arrangements can be made between several parishes all within the metropolitan area for connecting the sewers of such parishes. But we have looked in vain for any enactment which provides for or authorizes a parish beyond the metropolitan area to send its sewage into any sewer of any parish within those limits without the consent of such parish. We know as a matter of fact that in 1871 the Hornsey local authorities had to obtain a special Act of Parliament to enable them to get rid of their sewage from another part of their parish which slopes in another direction. If, then, the plaintiffs are bound to receive the sewage from Hornsey it must be by virtue of some agreement or consent which they cannot recall; and it is upon such an agreement or consent that the defendants mainly rely. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain what agreement or consent has been entered into and its legal effect. There is no formal agreement under seal nor any formal agreement to which the Metropolitan Board of Works were parties. But there is abundant evidence of arrangements between the plaintiffs and the defendants and persons in Hornsey by which the passage of some Hornsey sewage through the plaintiffs' Stroud-green sewer has been permitted for many years. These arrangements and the conduct of the plaintiffs are strongly relied upon by the defendants as disentitling the plaintiffs from any relief in this action, and Mr. Justice Keke-wich has decided against them mainly on this ground. The appellants' counsel did not deny the facts relied upon by the defendants, but he contended that, although the plaintiffs had permitted Hornsey sewage to pass down their sewer for many years, they had done nothing to preclude them from recalling their permission if and when the Hornsey sewage so increased in bulk as to create a nuisance in Islington. They also contended that the plaintiffs could not in point of law bind themselves and the parish of Islington to receive Hornsey sewage for ever, or, indeed, for any definite period, and that in effect all that the plaintiffs had done and all that they legally could do was to grant revocable licences to various persons now represented by the defendants to empty their sewers into the Stroud-green sewer. The inability of the plaintiffs to do more than this is said to be established by the statutory enactments and by the decision of Vice-Chancellor Hall in "Metropolitan Board of Works v. London and North-Western Railway Company" (14 Ch.D., 521), and affirmed on appeal (17 Ch.D., 246). The Vice-Chancellor certainly expressed a strong opinion that even the Metropolitan Board of Works could not make a valid contract to admit buildings outside the metropolitan area into their drainage system. The Court of Appeal expressed no opinion on this point, but affirmed the Vice-Chancellor's decision on the ground that no such contract had in fact been entered into. The point turns mainly on section 61 of the Metropolitan Management Act, 1862, which, however, has to be read in connexion with sections 135, 138, 140, and 250 of the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855. Having carefully studied these sections, we have come to the conclusion that the construction put upon them by Vice-Chancellor Hall is correct, and we adopt his reasoning on pages 527-9 in the report. What the Metropolitan Board of Works could not do the plaintiffs clearly cannot do. It follows that Mr. Danckwerts has, in our opinion, made good his contention that, whatever the plaintiffs may have submitted or even agreed to do, the legal effect of their conduct cannot be put higher than leave and licence to several persons to empty their sewers into the Stroud-green sewer. A grant of an easement or an enforceable agreement to grant an easement cannot be established in law even if proved in fact. A temporary permission is very different from a binding agreement or grant. This conclusion renders it necessary to examine very minutely what the plaintiffs have hitherto really assented to. The short result of the evidence is as follows:—When the Stroud-green sewer was formed Hornsey was a purely agricultural parish. A Mr. Lucas and a Mr. Wharmby and some others who owned land in Hornsey abutting on Stroud-green began to build in and after 1865, and they were allowed by the plaintiffs to make comparatively small sewers (mostly 12in. pipes) into the Stroud-green sewer on certain conditions and on making certain payments, involving in Lucas's case a payment of £670 to the railway company. In the years 1871-76 Lucas and others, who had paid various sums to the railway company with the consent of the plaintiffs towards defraying the cost of making the Stroud-green sewer and for liberty to run sewage into it, applied to the defendants to repay them these sums. The application was made on the ground that unless such repayment was made injustice would be inflicted upon the applicants by the Hornsey Drainage Act, 1871. Be the reason what it may, the defendants did in fact repay Lucas and others what they had paid for permission to connect their sewers with the Stroud-green sewer and this was done after consulting the plaintiffs and after obtaining from them an assurance that they had no objection to the acquisition by the defendants of the same rights of drainage as Lucas and the other owners had. It is plain, therefore, that whatever rights Lucas and the other landowners had acquired to send sewage into the Stroud-green sewer must be treated as transferred in equity to the defendants with the plaintiffs' consent.

In November, 1883, the defendants applied to the plaintiffs for, and obtained, leave to enlarge two of the small sewers opening into the Stroud-green sewer in consideration of the defendants' contributing to the expense of repairing the footpath on the Islington side of the Stroud-green-road. Under this arrangement two 18in. pipes were substituted for one 12in. and one 15in. pipe. These are the main facts relied upon by the defendants as precluding the plaintiffs from obtaining relief in this action. Before considering their legal bearing it is necessary to allude to the circumstances which have occasioned the present controversy. We do not understand that the plaintiffs would complain if the sewers sanctioned by them on the application of Lucas, Wharmby, and the other landowners were used for no other houses than were contemplated by them and the plaintiffs when that sanction was given. But building in Hornsey has gradually increased, and other sewers have from time to time been connected with those which the plaintiffs allowed to be made, and the quantity of sewage passing through them into the Stroud-green sewer has so increased that it can no longer carry off the sewage which comes into it. The consequence is that after a storm the sewage in it is forced back and rises through manholes and gullies and creates an intolerable nuisance in Islington. This is what the plaintiffs want to stop. This is not a question affecting the plaintiffs as private individuals. They are a public body, with public duties, and with rights and powers conferred upon them for the purpose of enabling them to discharge those duties. This must be borne in mind in considering the effect of their past conduct, when that is relied upon as estopping them from asserting a right to put an end to what they have permitted, and even encouraged and agreed to allow. If this were an information by the Attorney-General, instead of an action by the Islington Vestry, the defendants would, in our opinion, have no defence whatever to the claim for an injunction. Considering who the plaintiffs are, we cannot think that they are estopped at law or in equity from obtaining the relief they seek. In "Fairtitle v. Gilbert" (2 T.R., 169), some turnpike trustees who had power to mortgage their tolls but not toll houses mortgaged both by deed. They were, nevertheless, held entitled to recover the toll houses from their mortgagees, and the doctrine of estoppel was held inapplicable to the case, on the ground that the plaintiffs were a public body, with limited powers conferred by statute, and could not exceed those powers. Many other decisions to the same effect are to be found in the books, the most recent being "The Great North West Central Railway Company v. Charlebois" ([1889] A.C., 114), in the Privy Council, where a public company, who had entered into an agreement beyond its powers and had consented to a judgment against it in an action brought on that agreement, was nevertheless held entitled to impeach both the agreement and the judgment, and both were set aside. For similar reasons the plaintiffs cannot, in our opinion, be treated as precluded from obtaining relief on the ground of laches and acquiescence. This is not a case in which the Court can properly leave the plaintiffs to their legal remedies, for there are none which would be of any use to them. But, in considering the terms of the order which ought to be made, it is only right and proper to have regard to the fact that the plaintiffs have to some extent themselves brought about the present state of things. The fact that if an injunction were granted a nuisance would be a necessary consequence unless the defendants take steps to prevent it affords them no defence to the action even if it be true that they cannot prevent it without obtaining further statutory powers. It is the defendants' duty to keep the Hornsey sewage out of the plaintiffs' sewer, and the defendants cannot effectually urge their inability to perform their duty as a reason for the Court doing nothing. Upon this point "Attorney-General v. Council, &c., of Birmingham" (4 K. and G., 528), and "Attorney-General v. Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum" (L.R., 4 Ch., 146), are well-known authorities. At the same time, the difficulty in which an injunction may place public bodies, if compelled to close sewers under their control but in daily use, has induced the Court in many cases not to exert its jurisdiction to the utmost, where it is not absolutely essential to do so. "Attorney-General v. Acton Local Board" (22 Ch.D., 221), and other cases following it, and cited in the argument, are illustrations of this reluctance. Having regard to these decisions and to the conduct of the plaintiffs we think that all that the Court ought to do in this case at the present moment is to make a declaration establishing the plaintiffs' right to relief and to give the defendants reasonable time to do what is necessary to prevent the flow of the Hornsey sewage down the Stroud-green sewer to the injury of the plaintiffs, and to give the plaintiffs liberty to apply for an injunction at the end of that time. This will give the defendants time to make other arrangements, and we trust will induce the plaintiffs to assist them in their endeavours to do what is necessary to drain their own district without invading the plaintiffs' rights. Such an order will, we think, be more just than an injunction now with a stay of execution. Such an injunction, however carefully worded, might prove unnecessarily oppressive. The order of the Court, therefore, will be as follows:—Allow the appeal and reverse the judgment of the Court below, and order the defendants to pay the costs of the action and of the appeal. Declare that the Stroud-green sewer in the pleadings mentioned is throughout its whole length in the parish of Islington, and is vested in the plaintiffs, and that the defendants are not entitled to send sewage from any sewer in the parish of Hornsey into that sewer without the consent of the plaintiffs. And let the plaintiffs be at liberty to apply to the Judge to whose Court this action is attached at the end of 12 months from the date of this order for an injunction to enforce their rights as above declared.

DALY V. EDWARDES—F. WARR AND CO. V. EDWARDES.*
Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Construction—Covenant not to assign or part with estate or interest—Lessee of theatre—Grant of exclusive right to supply refreshments.

On February 8, 1894, the defendant, Mr. George Edwardes, being lessee from Lord Salisbury of certain premises in Cranbourne-street, granted an under-lease of the premises now known as Daly's Theatre to the plaintiff, Mr. Augustin Daly, for a term of 20 years from December 25, 1893, at a yearly rent of £5,500. Mr. Daly entered into a covenant with Mr. Edwardes not at any time during the term thereby granted to assign, demise, or otherwise part with the indenture, or any estate or interest therein, for all or any part of the said term, to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence of the lessor or his assigns first had and obtained in writing under his or their hand or hands for that purpose, but such consent should not be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible tenant, it being the intention that the lessee should be at liberty at all times to produce and perform by himself and company or his licensees any first-class comedy, drama, or opera without the necessity of applying to the lessor or his assigns for his consent in that behalf, but that such licensees should not be at liberty to assign, underlet, demise, or otherwise part with their term without the licence of the lessor first had and obtained. There was a provision for re-entry if the rent was in arrear for 21 days, or on any breach of any of the covenants by the under-lessee therein contained. At the date of the under-lease Messrs. Frank Warr and Co. had the exclusive right to supply refreshments in the theatre and the exclusive privilege of advertising. Mr. Daly subsequently by several agreements granted the free and exclusive right and right to use the refreshment-rooms, bars, and smoking-rooms in the theatre to Messrs. Warr and Co. for the purpose of supplying refreshments and advertising, and finally by an agreement dated April 15, 1898, which extended the licence to the termination of the under-lease. No leave was obtained from Mr. Edwardes, as required by the covenant. By an agreement made on May 15, 1894, between Mr. Daly of the one part and Mr. Edwardes of the other part, it was agreed that Mr. Edwardes should produce and mount the plays at the back of the house at his own expense, and Mr. Daly was to provide the theatre, pay the rent, and generally be responsible for the front of the house. Mr. Daly was to pay 65 per cent. of the gross takings to Mr. Edwardes, the remaining 35 per cent. being retained by Mr. Daly. The staff and officials supplied by each were to be under his sole control. Mr. Daly and Mr. Edwardes were to bear in certain shares the expenses of advertisement and of the orchestra. Mr. Daly alleged that Mr. Edwardes was aware of the contract with Messrs. Frank Warr and Co. On September 4, 1898, Mr. Edwardes took possession of the theatre and premises on the ground that the contract with Messrs. Warr and Co. was a breach of the covenant in the under-lease of February 8, 1894. On September 6, 1898, Mr. Daly issued his writ in this action and claimed a declaration that the re-entry by Mr. Edwardes was not authorized by the under-lease; that a partnership was subsisting; delivery up of possession; and an injunction. On September 14, 1898, Messrs. Frank Warr and Co. also brought an action against Mr. Daly and Mr. Edwardes, asking as to Mr. Edwardes for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to the exclusive right of supplying refreshments and advertising in the theatre; an injunction to restrain Edwardes from excluding them from the theatre; or, in the alternative, damages against Daly. On June 7, 1899, Mr. Augustin Daly died, and the actions were revived in the name of his administrator. After hearing evidence in both actions, and arguments in the first action, Mr. Justice Kekewich, on March 8 last, reserved judgment.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Eldon Bankes, Mr. L. S. Bristowe, and Mr. R. Newton Crane appeared for Mr. Daly; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., Mr. Cave, and Mr. Herman Cohen for Mr. George Edwardes; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. Brooke for Messrs. Warr and Co.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said,—This is a puzzle as difficult as any that it has fallen to my lot to solve. I am free to confess that in arriving at a conclusion I have not merely hesitated, but have more than once changed my mind. Notwithstanding some want of precision here and there and some conflict of evidence, there is no substantial question about the facts, and the difficulties arise on the construction of two instruments neither of which can be fairly said to be a good specimen of drafting. The two instruments are the lease by George Edwardes to Augustin Daly dated February 8, 1894, and the agreement between the said Augustin Daly and Frank Warr and Co. (Limited) of April 15, 1898. The first of these is a lease by Edwardes to Daly for a term of years of the building known as Daly's Theatre, and

but for Clause 10 it might be described as an ordinary instrument of that character. Clause 10, however, bristles with difficulties. It falls naturally into two divisions or sections, and although it is necessary to consider both in order properly to construe the first of them, on which the main question in this action turns, it is convenient to treat them separately, and the more so because the second section is in form a proviso on, or limitation of, the first, which runs as follows:—"Not at any time during the term hereby granted to assign, demise, or otherwise part with this indenture, or any estate or interest therein for all or any part of the said term to any person or persons whomsoever without the licence of the lessor or his assigns first had and obtained in writing under his or their hand or hands for that purpose, but such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible tenant." This is a covenant by the lessee, and the question is whether it has been broken so as to bring into operation the proviso for re-entry which is expressed to take effect "if and whenever there shall be a breach of any of the covenants by the lessee hereinbefore contained." There is no occasion to refer to authorities, though it would be easy to do so to show that, in order properly to construe such a covenant, one must regard not merely the language of the covenant itself, but the relative positions of the parties to the lease, and the nature of the contract entered into by them, as evidenced by all the different parts of the instrument. The one prominent feature of this lease and the one thing above all others to be borne in mind is that it was the lease of a theatre, and intended to be used by the lessee as a theatre and for no other purpose whatever. That consideration ought to assist me and does assist me largely in determining what was intended by the words above quoted, which are otherwise, to say the least of it, enigmatical. It is conceded on all hands that by the phrase "this indenture" is not meant the instrument itself, but that it may be properly understood to comprise the subject-matter of the instrument, or in other words the demised premises. Reading the covenant thus, the lessee is distinctly prohibited from assigning the theatre, and he has not done so. He is also distinctly prohibited from demising it as a whole, and that he has not done. Nor is it suggested that he has parted with the theatre as a whole, but it is argued that he has parted with some estate or interest therein, and, if he has done that at all, it is admitted that he has parted with such estate or interest for part of the term, and the question therefore is whether his agreement with F. Warr and Co. (Limited) can be thus described. What is the proper interpretation of the phrase "part with"? I take it that the man who parts with lands, buildings, or chattels does not retain them. Parting with and retaining are self-contradictory, and cannot co-exist. If, therefore, the legitimate and necessary effect of the agreement with F. Warr and Co. is that Mr. Daly, while retaining possession of the theatre as a whole, yielded to them possession as against himself of such parts as were used and occupied by them, so that he could not be said to have retained them, he has parted with a portion of the theatre, and it would follow, in my judgment, that he parted with an interest in the demised premises. If, on the other hand, he nevertheless retained possession of the whole theatre including the parts used and occupied by F. Warr and Co., it would be impossible, in my judgment, to say that he has parted with an interest in the theatre, although he has given F. Warr and Co. some rights over a portion thereof. In this connexion I was referred to numerous authorities which at the time struck me as all more or less cognate to the matter in hand, but on reflection I cannot find any guide among them, full though they are of instruction. My difficulty in getting any direct light from the authorities consists in this. Some deal with the exclusive possession and more with the technical phrase "rateable occupation." If I am right in the meaning put on the words "part with," we have in substance to consider what is exclusive occupation, and yet I shrink from relying on authorities which turn on the use of the word "exclusive." The other class of authorities is more dangerous and more likely to mislead. To determine what is rateable occupation one must embark on the technicalities of rating law, which notoriously has doctrines and rules of its own doubtful application to any other subject. An extreme case of that character is that in which the question arose whether a telephone company were in rateable occupation of land by reason of having a pole with wires attached erected on a house under an agreement with the householder, and really the others cited in the same connexion fall within the same category. Of these I may mention in passing "Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin-in-the-Fields" (3 Q.B., 204). It has special interest here because it was concerned with a private box in a theatre, but the decision turned on the proper construction of a rating Act of Parliament. Taking, therefore, only so much of Clause 10 as has already been quoted I have to determine whether, according to the true construction thereof, and without the assistance of any particular decision, Mr. Daly has parted with any interest in the theatre for all, or any part of, the term. But Clause 10 has a second sub-division or section. It runs thus:—"It being the intention that the lessee shall be at liberty at all times to produce and perform by himself and company, or by his licensees, any first-class comedy, drama, or opera without the necessity of applying to the lessor or his assigns for his consent in that behalf, but that such licensees shall not be at liberty to assign, underlet, demise, or otherwise part with their term without the licence of the lessor first had and obtained as aforesaid." The gist of this section was in the provision that he shall be at liberty to produce and perform by his licensees, who, however, were not to assign, underlet, demise, or otherwise part with their term. It would seem from this that the parties contemplated the licence taking the form of a demise, but that is of no great moment, the chief point for remark being that it was intended that the theatre should be used for the production and performance of first-class comedy, drama, or opera, and that so long as that was done the lessor cared not whether it was done by Mr. Daly or by others claiming under him in the first degree. If he had demised or licensed to others for this purpose, he would not thereby have broken his covenant even though he had parted with the theatre for the whole term. This is, to my mind, the clear effect of the proviso standing alone, and is also, I think, the clear effect of it construed with the preceding section, though the two are not well fitted together, and the second section might, with a little alteration of language, have been put first, so as to make what now stands first read as a proviso on or limitation of it. This second section, however, is useful as indicating the intention, which, indeed, is expressly declared, of the parties that the theatre shall be used for the performance and production of first-class comedy, drama, or opera, and that so long as that was secured Mr. Daly was to be under no personal obligation to do it. Before passing to the consideration of the other instrument it is convenient here to notice the agreement between Edwardes and Daly of May 15, 1894. Some argument turned on the partnership thereby constituted between the two. Engrossed with the main question I probably misunderstood Mr. Warrington's argument on this point, for I deemed him to be contending for a partnership in the theatre, which it then seemed to me, and still seems to me, was inconsistent with the facts. If he was contending, as I suppose he was, for a partnership in the particular business of producing a musical play, I have, as at present advised, nothing to say against it. I say no more because I checked the defendant's argument on this point, but to my thinking the point is altogether immaterial and need not be further debated. Some new complications were, of course, introduced by this agreement of May 15, 1894; but in substance and so far as the questions here in issue are concerned the obligations of the lease remained unaltered and the use of the demised premises as a theatre was maintained. By the agreement of April 15, 1898, Daly granted to F. Warr and Co. (Limited) an exclusive licence to supply refreshments in the theatre for a term at a rent and under certain conditions therein expressed. Much was made of the phrase "exclusive licence," but I am not disposed to attribute importance to it. The force of the word "exclusive" lies in the assurance to F. Warr and Co. (Limited) that they, and no other persons, or, in other words, to the exclusion of all other persons, shall have the privilege of supplying refreshments in the theatre. I do not think that it otherwise in any way controls the relations between Daly and F. Warr and Co. (Limited). I have stated that the former granted a licence to the latter, and that I think is the substance of the instrument. The word "grant" may properly be used in two methods. A man may grant to another land in fee or for a particular estate, and then the estate passes at once by force of the grant, or he may grant that another shall have such and such things, or shall be at liberty to do such and such things, in which event the grant may operate by way of covenant or licence. Where the former method is adopted it is difficult to give it merely the effect of the latter, but where the language leaves the question open to doubt there is no difficulty in so construing the instrument as to give effect to the real intention of the parties. The difficulty lies in ascertaining what that real intention is. Here Daly does not grant the theatre or any part of it, but grants the free and exclusive licence and right to use certain rooms, together with privileges which I do not read at length, but which are obviously all intended to enable F. Warr and Co. (Limited) to exercise their trade of refreshment contractors. The legal phrase "to hold the premises" is not technically apt to such a grant, but it is often, and one must be careful not to attribute overmuch weight to it used in such instruments. There is no reservation of rent, the payment of which is provided for merely by covenant on the part of the tenants, and here I may pause to observe that although they are throughout described as tenants, Mr. Daly being described as landlord, I do not think that this can properly make the instrument a demise if otherwise it ought not to be so construed. Undoubtedly in many other respects the language of the agreement contemplates a tenancy, and there is even a covenant by the landlord for quiet enjoyment in a form appropriate to a lease of a house or land. Nevertheless I cannot think that this was the intention of the parties. It has been assumed, and I am prepared to assume, that the supply of refreshments in suitable places is a necessary adjunct to a theatre; while, on the other hand, it would be the duty of the manager of a theatre to see that refreshments of proper quality are supplied in proper places. It might not be convenient for him to supply them himself. Is there any occasion to construe this agreement as doing more than what must have been in the purview of the parties to the lease—namely, enabling refreshments to be supplied without the manager undertaking the personal obligation to supply them? I think not. The agreement in substance is a contract by Daly that F. Warr and Co. (Limited) shall have the privilege of supplying refreshments in the theatre and a contract by them that they will supply them under Daly's supervision. I note as an illustration of this the provision in the tenth clause, which gives Daly full power to discharge any servant of the tenants who shall have misconducted himself or herself to the prejudice of the good conduct of the theatre. Here, again, I have dismissed, though not without consideration, many authorities cited, including some of the classes already mentioned, but including also some on the question what is required to constitute a demise. This is an instrument of a peculiar character, suited only to a small class of buildings, and especially theatres, and I have been unable to derive much guidance from cases in which there was a discussion whether a demise was constituted even by similar language under circumstances altogether different. It is necessary shortly to advert to the proved facts. The construction of the written instrument cannot be varied by the usage of the parties, but such usage may have operated as a breach of the covenant in the lease apart from the written instrument, and it was argued that it had in fact done this. Further, if the usage was according to the written instrument, it is not, I think, unfair to regard it as a test of the meaning—that is, to see from it whether what was intended operated in fact as a breach of the covenant. Subject to one remark, the proved facts seem to me to show clearly that Daly did not part with any portion of the theatre or any interest therein. It may be that he could not without breach of his agreement with F. Warr and Co. (Limited) have gone behind the bars when the theatre was open or in any other way interfered with the conduct of their business. But, except that they were at liberty to exercise the privileges conferred upon them and to carry on their business of refreshment contractors in the appointed places according to the terms of the agreement, I think that Daly retained possession of the whole theatre and full control over the same. He was responsible for it when the theatre was closed, and it was watched by his firemen, who superintended the lighting and warming throughout the building, and for that purpose necessarily had access to all parts of it. Those who came to the several bars during the performance owed their privilege of admission to payment to Daly and were under no obligation to F. Warr and Co. (Limited), who, on the other hand, could not exclude them from the bars. But it is said that when the theatre was closed the bars were locked and Daly's servant could not enter. I have no doubt on the evidence that this to some extent at least is true, and perhaps there was some carelessness in the management of the theatre in this respect, which fortunately had no ill-effects. It seems that F. Warr and Co. found that their stores were pilfered, and with the consent of Daly's manager they locked all or some of the doors. This was done for a special purpose, not to exclude Daly or his servants, but to protect F. Warr and Co. There apparently were hours in which the bars could not be entered except by force, but this was due to want of provision on the part of Daly's manager, who could have, I conclude, obtained means of entrance and entrusted them to a responsible servant. The precise reason why better precautions were not taken has not been explained, but I think it would be going too far to say that the neglect to take these precautions made Daly part with any estate or interest in the demised premises. Except for that and for the privileges granted to F. Warr and Co., which I have already held were consistent with his possession, I think that he retained possession of the whole theatre throughout. There is no occasion to discuss in detail the ten paragraphs in which the pleader has found it necessary to explain the relief claimed by the plaintiffs. I will make a declaration adverse to forfeiture conformable to my judgment, and add any consequential relief which the circumstances require, including, it may be assumed, an inquiry as to damages sustained by wrongful re-entry, with an order for payment, and the defendant will pay the plaintiffs' costs of action which will cover the costs of the inquiry.

The action of "F. Warr and Co. (Limited) v. Daly and Edwardes" stood over pending an appeal in the action of "Daly v. Edwardes."

RE BEDDINGTON—MICHOLLS V. SAMUEL.*

Will—Bequest—Ademption—Gift within 12 months of death—Estate duty.

A legatee who has to bring into hotchpot an advance by the testator, made within a year of his death, and therefore chargeable with estate duty, is entitled to deduct the duty from the amount brought into hotchpot.

This was an originating summons by the trustees and executors of the will of the late Maurice Beddington. The testator died within a year after making certain advances by way of gift for the benefit of some of his children, who were also residuary legatees under his will. The question was now raised whether a legatee who has to bring into hotchpot an advance by the testator and to pay estate duty on the same is entitled to deduct the amount of the estate duty from the advance in ascertaining the amount to be brought into hotchpot.

Mr. Norton, Q.C., and Mr. G. S. Alexander, appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. J. G. Fawcus for one of the defendants; Mr. Rowden, Q.C., and Mr. Wood Hill for the other defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, in giving judgment, said:—In this case a question arises by reason of the death of the donor of a certain gift within the year; the consequence of which is that the gift is chargeable with duty under the Finance Act. Now, the question arises by reason of the doctrine of ademption. I have held that the child who is benefited by the gift is bound to bring into account, before sharing, the value of the benefit received by reason of the gift. The question of ademption never arises until the death of the donor. Then if it be held that the gift is to be treated as an advance, you have to ascertain the amount or value of that advance which is to be brought in. When the gift was made there was a liability which would arise in the event of the donor dying within the year. When he did die within the year, you are not troubled with any question of actuarial valuation as to the probable amount of this contingent liability, but you say, What was the value of the gift which was given to the child? It appears to me that the advance was an advance of property, which was subject to be charged with duty in a certain event. That event having happened, the value of the property so advanced was less the amount which became a charge upon it in the event which happened, and therefore the amount to be brought in is the value, after deducting this, the estate duty, which became a charge upon the property so first given.

WILLIAMS V. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Decision of Divisional Court (15 The Times L.R., 409) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence) on a special case reported in 15 The Times L.R., 409; [1899] 2 Q.B., 197. The special case was stated by a magistrate for the city of Liverpool on the hearing of an information laid by the collector of rates on behalf of the Liverpool Corporation for the recovery from the London and North-Western Railway Company of the sum assessed on them in a rate made under the Liverpool Corporation Act, 1893, in respect of the Brunswick Docks Goods Station in Sefton-street. The premises in question consisted of a substantial erection comprising a covered shed open at one side. Inside the walls there were a number of railway lines comprising sidings and platforms which were used for the purpose of loading or unloading railway wagons with goods. There were also turntables, cranes, a weigh-bridge, and small offices. There was also in the enclosure some land used for carts and lorries for bringing goods to and taking them from the premises. The premises were situated a little over half a mile from the main line of the company. They were, however, connected with the main line of the company at the Wapping Goods Station and their several goods stations along the line of docks by permission having been given to the railway company by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to use their (the board's) dock railway, and also by the Liverpool Corporation having given permission to the railway company for a tramway to be laid across Sefton-street connecting the premises with the dock rails there. Goods were taken to the premises and brought from them to the main line of the company in railway wagons drawn by locomotives. The line of rails along Sefton-street was constructed by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board under section 72 of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, 1858, and was governed by that Act. The permission to lay the lines across Sefton-street was granted to the company by the corporation under section 100 of the Liverpool Improvement and Waterworks Act, 1871, and was revocable on a month's notice. There was no line of railway belonging to the railway company immediately outside the premises in question. There were eight parallel lines of rails in the shed, each being 40 yards in length, and at each end of these lines of rails there were turntables and a line of rails at right angles to the other lines, these two latter lines of rails connecting with the tramway across Sefton-street. All the lines of rails in the premises in question were used for the conveyance of any goods which the public sent by rail to or from the premises in question. The premises were constructed by the company upon land acquired by them under section 20 of the London and North-Western Railway Act, 1896, which empowered the railway company to take for the purpose of extending the stations, sidings, warehouses, coal wharves, depôts, and other accommodation of the company for mineral, goods, and cattle traffic, and for other purposes connected with their undertaking, the land thereafter described, and execute the works and exercise the powers thereafter mentioned. The rate in question in the case was made under the Liverpool Corporation Act, 1893, in section 36, subsection (ii.) of which there was a provision, very similar to that in section 211 (1) (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875, that certain classes of property, including land used as a railway made under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, should not be rated to such rates in any greater proportion than one-fourth part of the net annual value. The company were rated in respect of the premises above described on the full net annual value. They refused to pay the sum assessed on them, and the present proceedings were taken. Before the magistrate it was contended on behalf of the company that parts of the premises included in the rate, such, for instance, as the lines of rails, turntables, sidings, and platforms, together with the portion of the roof covering the same, were within the partial exemption created by section 36 of the Act of 1893, and that, as in the rate no exemption had been allowed, the information ought to be dismissed. It was contended for the corporation that the premises were not, nor were any parts thereof, within the terms of the partial exemption, and that the rate was duly levied and recoverable. The magistrate was of opinion that the premises were part of the railway system of the company, and that such portion thereof as consisted of railway lines, turntables, sidings, and platforms, together with the portion of the roof covering the same, came within the terms of the partial exemption as land used as a railway made under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance, and that the company should be rated in respect of such portions on one-fourth part of the net annual value thereof, and that as regards the remainder of the premises they should be assessed on the full annual value, and he dismissed the information, subject to the present case. The Divisional Court affirmed the decision of the magistrate. The corporation appealed.

Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., Mr. Honoratus Lloyd, and Mr. R. M. Montgomery appeared for the corporation; Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Page, Q.C., for the railway company.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether the lines of rails inside this shed or warehouse or goods station, whichever it might be called, were a "railway" within section 36, subsection (ii.), of the Liverpool Corporation Act, 1893. The land in question was acquired by the railway company under section 20 of their Act of 1896, and the shed or warehouse was built on it, and eight lines of rails, each 40 yards in length, were laid inside it, and each end of these lines of rails was bounded by a line of rails running at right angles thereto, with turntables upon them, thus connecting the rails in the shed with the tramway. The lines in the shed were connected with the line of the railway company at Wapping Station and their other goods stations along the line of docks by running over the dock railway belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and by a tramway across Sefton-street, which the railway company were allowed to make under a licence from the Corporation of Liverpool. This licence was revocable on one month's notice. The railway company had nothing but the licence of the corporation to enable them to have access for their wagons to and from the shed, a licence which could be terminated on one month's notice. Supposing there were no tramway, no one would say that the lines in the shed were a "railway." The connecting tramway was not a railway. The blot upon the company's case was that they had not got a line of railway at all, only bits of rails inside a shed. Section 36, subsection (ii.), of the Act of 1893 was not new legislation. It was taken in terms from section 211, subsection 1 (b), of the Public Health Act, 1875, which itself was a re-enactment of a similar provision in the Public Health Act, 1848. The words were "lands used as a railway made under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance." The word "railway" in that section meant a railway well-known as such, and not mere disjointed bits of lines in a shed with no access to the railway company's line of railway except over the tramway mentioned. In his Lordship's opinion it was not a "railway" at all. Upon that ground he based his decision. But if he was wrong in that, in his opinion the land was not used as a railway "made under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance." Section 20 of the company's Act of 1896 only gave the company power to take a piece of land, not to make a railway there for public conveyance. He preferred, however, to rest his decision upon the first point. The appeal would therefore be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS was of the same opinion. It was admitted that the rails connecting the station in question with the company's railway were not a "railway," but were merely a tramway. Therefore, the rails in the station were not physically connected by means of a railway line with the company's railway. Accordingly, it had to be contended on behalf of the railway company that the system of rails in the shed or station in question was a "railway." He (the Lord Justice) could not say that those lines of rails in an area 40 yards square were a "railway," much less a railway "made under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance." The company took no powers in their Act to charge for public conveyance over the lines in question, nor did the Act confer on the public any rights of public conveyance. Section 20 of the company's Act of 1896 simply gave power to the company to take the land as an accessory to the existing railway, and did not confer power to make a railway there. Therefore the works on this piece of land were not constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed; though he felt considerable doubt upon the point.

DRIVER V. LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railway—Ticket—Conditions—Unpunctuality of trains—Loss covered by the conditions.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the decision of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence) affirming the judgment of the Judge of the County Court of Bloomsbury, who gave judgment for the defendants. The case is reported in The Times of June 12. The plaintiff was the proprietor of a musical touring company, which was travelling in the North of England. They had finished an engagement at Prescott, and were intending to perform on February 23 at a place near Miller's Dale. To get from Prescott to Buxton, where they had to change, they had to travel by the defendants' line, and at Buxton they had to change to the Midland Railway. The stationmaster at Prescott arranged with the plaintiff that the company should be taken to Buxton in a special carriage, and on looking at the time tables the stationmaster said that the train would be in time to catch the train there. The plaintiff accordingly took tickets for himself and his company to Buxton on the defendants' line. They left Prescott next day at 9 30 in the morning, and were due to arrive at Warrington Station at 10 27. The train for Buxton was due to leave Warrington at 10 46. The train in which the plaintiff was travelling arrived at the high-level station at Warrington at 10 41, when the special carriage had to be shunted on to the low-level station, from which the Buxton train started. Before the carriage could be shunted the 10 46 train for Buxton had gone. There was no train after that for three hours. The carriage was then shunted to a siding, where it was left for three hours. The consequence was that they did not arrive at Buxton until 5 20, too late to catch the train to Miller's Dale in time to give a performance that night. The Judge of the County Court held that under the conditions in their time table the defendants were not liable. The condition in question, to which passengers were referred on the back of the tickets, was as follows:—"Time Bills.—The published train bills of this company are only intended to fix the time at which passengers may be certain to obtain their tickets for any journey from the various stations, it being understood that the trains shall not start before the appointed time. The directors give notice that the company do not undertake that the trains shall start or arrive at the time specified in the bills, nor will they be accountable for any loss or inconvenience or injury which may arise from delays or detention. The right to stop the trains at any station on the lines, although not marked as a stopping station, is reserved." The Divisional Court affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge, and gave leave to appeal.

Mr. F. Watt appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Montague Shearman appeared for the defendants.

"Le Blanche v. London and North-Western Railway Company" (1 C.P.D., 286); "Woodgate v. Great Western Railway Company" (51 L.T., N.S., 826); "McCarten v. North-Eastern Railway Company" (54 L.J., Q.B., 441) were referred to.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that when the train in which the plaintiff and his company were travelling arrived at Warrington there were only five minutes in which to uncouple the special carriage from the train and shunt it from the high-level to the low-level station in order to attach it to the Buxton train. Apparently there was no time to perform that operation. The consequence was that the plaintiff and his company were delayed and did not reach Buxton in time to catch a train from there on the Midland Railway to Miller's Dale so as to enable them to hold their performance that night. The plaintiff thereupon sued the defendants to recover damages, and the defendants in their defence set up the condition, which it was admitted was binding on the plaintiff. The defendants by the condition said that they would not undertake that the trains would arrive at the times stated in their time tables, nor would they be accountable for any loss or inconvenience or injury arising from delays or detention. The plaintiff's loss was undoubtedly caused by the delay in arriving at Warrington and the consequent detention there. The loss so caused was covered by the condition. Assuming, though he did not mean to decide it, that the condition did not cover negligence on the part of the defendants, there was here no evidence of negligence either in the late arrival of the train at Warrington or in not shunting the carriage there in time to catch the Buxton train. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

CALDER V. ALEXANDER.*

Land—Action for recovery of—Title by possession —Devisable interest—Ejectment.

This was an action of ejectment brought to recover possession of a freehold house in Berwick-upon-Tweed. The defence was that the defendant was in possession of the premises.

Mr. F. T. Duka appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. E. Pollock and Mr. Henn Collins for the defendant.

The plaintiff's case was that one Henry Calder took possession of the premises in 1863 on the death of his father, and remained in possession until his death in 1876. By his will and codicil he devised the property to his two sisters and his niece respectively for life, and after the death of the survivor to his nephew, Henry Calder. Henry Calder, the testator, in fact had no title to the premises, the property having been left by their father to his brother David. David, however, asserted no title to the property, since the house had been built with Henry's money, and allowed the testator and the persons claiming under his will to remain in possession. On the death of Henry, the testator, the first tenant for life proved his will, and she and her sister and niece lived in the premises until the death of the last survivor, which took place in 1898. It was admitted that the defendant, who was a step-son of one of the tenants for life, lived for part of the time with them, and had remained in possession of the premises until the present time. Henry Calder the nephew, who was entitled to the reversion in fee under the will of Henry Calder, the testator, died during the lifetime of the tenants for life, intestate and a bachelor, and his father took out administration of the estate, and as heir at law conveyed the premises to his son, David Calder, the younger, the plaintiff in this action.

Mr. DUKA, on behalf of the plaintiff, contended that a person in possession of property has a devisable interest in it, and that such devisable interest, with the addition of the necessary period of holding by the devisees under his will to make up 20 years, clothed these persons with a complete statutory title which was good against all the world; that Henry, having been in possession of the premises for 13 years, and the property having been held by the tenants for life under his will since the date of his death, therefore altogether they, with the plaintiff, had, since the commencement of the adverse possession, been in possession of the property for 20 years, and a complete statutory title had in consequence been acquired. He cited the cases of "Asher v. Whitlock" (L.R., 1 Q.B., 1) and "Board v. Board" (L.R., 9 Q.B., p. 48).

On behalf of the defendant, Mr. POLLOCK contended that the possession of all the people who had owned the property was adverse to each other and consequently none of them acquired a statutory title; that no one could turn the defendant out who could not show a superior title; and that neither Henry Calder nor any one claiming under him could acquire such a title because they knew that there was a superior title vested in the elder David under his father's will, and knowing that fact they could not have intended to recognize the devise under Henry's will, but must have meant to hold adversely.

His LORDSHIP held, on the authority of "Asher v. Whitlock," that the possession of Henry Calder, the testator, was adverse to his brother David, and that the interest was devisable by him by will; that he had exercised his power of devising it; that his sisters had taken possession under that will and had recognized it, and that therefore a statutory title had been acquired in Henry and his devisees; that the remainderman's title accrued on the death of the last tenant for life in 1898, and the plaintiff, having established his title to the remainderman's interest in the property, was entitled to recover possession of the premises with mesne profits; and he therefore gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

IN RE WOODD—EX PARTE KING.*

Bankruptcy—Stockbroker—Defaulter—Surplus in hands of official assignee of Stock Exchange —Differences due to and from customers—Title of trustee in bankruptcy.

These were two applications by the trustee in bankruptcy of one Basil Woodd, and raised important questions affecting the position of the official assignee of the Stock Exchange and the right of members of the Exchange, creditors of the bankrupt, to be paid in priority to the outside creditors of the bankrupt under these circumstances. On December 29, 1898, Basil Woodd, being then a broker on the Stock Exchange, absconded owing large outside liabilities. On December 30, 1898, he was officially declared a defaulter on the Exchange, and thereupon the official assignee of the Exchange, in accordance with the rules of the Exchange, closed all Basil Woodd's transactions on the Exchange that day (which happened to be pay day), and received and paid all sums due to or from Basil Woodd on that day, with the result that a surplus of about £650 remained in the hands of the official assignee. Amongst the sums so received by the official assignee was a sum of £1,262 15s. 2d. due by Messrs. Driver and Co., jobbers on the Exchange, to Basil Woodd; and a sum of £117 15s. 2d. representing cheques sent by outside clients of Basil Woodd to him on December 30 to pay for certain transactions on the Exchange. In January, 1899, Basil Woodd was adjudicated a bankrupt, and under the bankruptcy laws the title of his trustee in bankruptcy related back to the previous December 29. The trustee now claimed payment of the £117 15s. 2d. from the official assignee, and of the £1,262 15s. 2d. from the official assignee and also from Driver and Co., on the ground that these two sums were mere book debts of the bankrupt and vested in his trustee in bankruptcy for the benefit of the general body of his creditors. The official assignee was willing to hand over the surplus of £650, but resisted the payment of the two sums in question and relied on the rules and custom of the Stock Exchange. The other material facts are fully stated in the considered judgment of the Court given below.

Mr. H. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Williams appeared for the official assignee and also for Driver and Co.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT.—The bankrupt Woodd was a broker on the London Stock Exchange. He committed an act of bankruptcy on December 29, 1898, and on the following day he was declared a defaulter on the Exchange. A receiving order was made on January 3, 1899, on a creditor's petition founded on the act of bankruptcy of December 29. At the date of the act of bankruptcy certain outside clients of Woodd's owed to him, or through him to jobbers on the Exchange, certain moneys; and, on the other hand, other outside clients of his had become entitled to be paid other moneys by him, or through him by jobbers on the Exchange. On his becoming a defaulter the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, in accordance with the rules and practice of that institution, collected the moneys of both kinds for distribution in the Stock Exchange liquidation; and the question is whether upon bankruptcy supervening the bankrupt's trustee in bankruptcy has become entitled to both or either of those sums, or any and what portion of them. It is stated and not denied that the official assignee when he collected the moneys knew of the act of bankruptcy. I will take first the sum of £1,262 15s. 2d., which has been paid to the official assignee at his request by Messrs. Driver and Co., jobbers on the Stock Exchange, and in respect of which the bankrupt's trustee asks for orders against both the official assignee and Messrs. Driver and Co. Here these jobbers had differences to pay to or through the bankrupt. The first item in this account relates to transactions for one Hutton, an outside client of Woodd's, who on Hutton's instructions had bought for him certain quantities of stocks from Driver and Co. and had sold for him identical quantities of the same stocks to Driver and Co. or another jobber named Miles. One of these transactions was a purchase of 250 Denver stock from Driver and Co. and a sale of the same quantity of the same stock to Miles, with the result that a difference of £134 7s. 6d. became payable by Miles to the bankrupt for Hutton. Other similar transactions made up the total amount to be received for Hutton by Woodd to £286 8s. 9d. Upon Woodd's default the official assignee of the Stock Exchange made up accounts in the usual way between Driver and Co. and Woodd, and between Miles and Woodd. In the account so made up as between Driver and Co. and Woodd the provisional, or "making up," price, which is always adopted as the common denominator for convenience of brokers and jobbers in the circulation and adjustment of the "tickets," happened to be considerably higher than the actual prices at which Hutton bought or sold, and the effect of this was that, in the provisional account made up as between Driver and Co. and Woodd, Driver, and Co. had to account provisionally to Woodd for about £137 more than Woodd had to pay Hutton. This £137 would not, in the ordinary course of things, have belonged to Woodd at all as a consequence of these transactions. If he had received it he would have held it to be accounted for to the persons entitled according to the actual prices at which bargains had been made, who might be strangers to any contracts of Woodd's, or of Hutton's, or of Miles'. Pending the private settlements between all the parties to these or to the intermediate contracts, Woodd would have held the £137 provisionally, but only provisionally, for Miles. This sum seems to me to be a purely artificial fund temporarily created for a special and temporary purpose, and not shown to be in any sense the property of the bankrupt or of any of his clients, and the principle of the case of "In re Plumby" ([1880] 13 Ch.D., 667) seems to me to be applicable a fortiori, and the trustee's claim fails as to this. If it should turn out that the bankrupt was entitled to receive any portion of this amount from other jobbers on the settlement of his accounts with them respectively the trustee's claim will be against them. The remainder of the £1,262 15s. 2d. is partly made up of the £286 8s. 9d. due to Hutton. This amount the trustee has received under a judgment of Mr. Justice Phillimore's and no further order need be made as to it. There remains £818 15s. supposed to have become due to one Gunnis, an outside client of Woodd's, upon transactions similar to those in Hutton's case, but which has not yet been claimed by Gunnis from the official assignee or, as I understand, from Driver and Co. I am of opinion that this sum, if it had come to Woodd's hands, would not have been held by him in a fiduciary capacity for Gunnis or subject to any charge in favour of Gunnis. As between Woodd and Driver and Co., Woodd was a mere creditor of Driver and Co. for the balance of differences on a number of transactions which were not meant on either side to be carried out in any other way than by cancellation pro tanto of one bargain by another made with the same or a different jobber, and the ultimate payment by one or other of them of the difference only, as between themselves they are principals in fact as well as by the rules and practice of the Stock Exchange, and the money receivable by Woodd from a particular jobber would not in fact or by the rules of the Stock Exchange be appropriated by that jobber for the benefit of any particular client of Woodd's. As between Gunnis and Woodd, again, Gunnis never placed in Woodd's hands any shares so as to be entitled specifically to the proceeds of them, nor any money so as to be specifically entitled to any shares to be bought with it. He must be taken to have agreed that the differences should be settled in the way usual on the Stock Exchange on speculative transactions, and to have agreed to take payment, not out of a specific fund resulting from a particular transaction with a particular jobber for the sale of a particular parcel of stock, but out of a balance resulting from the aggregate of his transactions through Woodd with various jobbers for the end December account. He must be taken therefore to have authorized Woodd to receive and pay money for him, and to set off losses to one jobber against gains from another, and to have agreed to be merely a creditor of Woodd for the general balance, if any, in his own favour, and not even a creditor for the gain upon a particular bargain, if on the whole account the balance should be against him. This view of the transactions in fact and in law has already been taken by Phillimore, J., in relation to this very matter in "King v. Hutton" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 555); and it seems to me that in the case of "May and Hart v. Angeli" in the House of Lords, which was there decided in August, 1898, but is said not to be reported except in 14 The Times L.R., 551, a substantially similar view was adopted in similar transactions. Further, even if it could be held that the money due from Driver and Co. would, on reaching the bankrupt's hands, have been subject to a charge in favour of Gunnis, to the extent of his claim, it does not follow that the contention of the official assignee ought to prevail. In transactions of this kind, Driver and Co. could not have discharged themselves as against Woodd, nor discharged Woodd as against Gunnis, by paying to Gunnis a sum to which, as between Gunnis and Woodd, Gunnis might have no title and could not, by the course of business, have any title until the accounts were settled. The trustee therefore is entitled to the fund in the first instance, and it is he who must give effect to any charge which may be found to attach to it. The question remains against whom should the order be made for the repayment of the £818 15s. Driver and Co. no doubt failed to discharge themselves by paying the official assignee; but the trustee has claimed from the official assignee the money so paid, and has received part of it—namely, the £286 8s. 9d., and has, so far, adopted and approved the payment to the official assignee, and I think ought to look to him for the balance. At any rate, it is the practice of this Court to look in the first instance to the person into whose hands the fund is traced, unless he has paid it away in ignorance of the bankruptcy; and if the money can properly be got from the official assignee, Driver and Co. ought not to be made to pay it again. I think it can be recovered from the official assignee. Under section 50 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, the bankrupt's right to recover it from Driver and Co. is to be deemed to have been duly assigned to the trustee, who, by the same section, has the rights of a receiver appointed by the High Court, and the official assignee cannot as against the trustee hold the fund produced by the statutory assignment. Possibly also within the meaning of subsection (8) of the same section he might be treated as holding the money as agent for the bankrupt, and therefore for the trustee. I think there must be an order against the official assignee for the £818 15s. As regards Driver and Co., the application may stand over, with liberty to the trustee to apply further. I take now the claim to the £117 15s. 2d., which is made up of sums due to Woodd, or to jobbers, instead of from them. The largest of the items making up this amount is a sum of £82 14s. 2d., which was sent by cheque to Woodd's order on December 30, 1898, by one Chapman, as the result of the following transactions. Chapman was an outside client of Woodd's, and he instructed Woodd at the mid-December account to carry over for him certain stock, and Woodd accordingly, by a contract with a jobber named Brandauer, carried the stock over, and Chapman became liable to pay on December 30 £7,991 9s. 8d. On December 20 Chapman instructed Woodd to sell for him the same amount of the same stock, and Woodd accordingly sold to a jobber named Miles, and thereupon Chapman became entitled to receive from Miles on December 30 £7,849 19s., or £111 10s. 8d. less than he had to pay to Brandauer. The account sent to him by Woodd debited him with this loss, but credited him with £58 16s. 6d., the profit on a previous speculation, leaving the balance due from Chapman of £82 14s. 2d., for which the cheque was sent on December 30. On Woodd's default on that day the official assignee of the Stock Exchange obtained endorsement and delivery of the cheque from Woodd's authorized clerk, and asserts the right to treat it as money belonging to Brandauer and apply it under those rules in discharge of the claims of Brandauer and other members of the Stock Exchange. The other item in dispute is a sum of £29 10s., paid by Kirkland to Woodd for differences on bargains with a jobber named Foot. In these cases the same considerations are applicable as in the case of Gunnis. The £82 14s. 2d. was not paid by Chapman as part of £7,991 9s. 8d., but as a mere difference, not specifically for Brandauer, but for whoever might be found concerned on the settlement of accounts. Chapman could not in such a transaction have discharged himself as against Woodd by paying Brandauer, for the contract between Chapman and Woodd was that Chapman should be liable to Woodd for the balance of differences. Nor by the contract between Brandauer and Woodd could Brandauer be entitled to anything unless, upon the settlement as between them, the differences should be found to be in favour of Brandauer. Chapman and Kirkland discharged themselves by paying Woodd in the ordinary course of business and without notice of any act of bankruptcy, and the official assignee must hand over the proceeds of the cheques which he intercepted.

THOMSON V. LORD CLANMORRIS AND OTHERS.*
Limitations, Statute of—3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 42.

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Actions against directors under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, are not within the Statute of Limitations, 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 42.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (15 The Times L.R., 502), affirmed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich's (reported in The Times of July 28 last, and in 15 The Times L.R., p. 502). The case arose under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, which renders directors and promoters of a company liable for untrue statements in the prospectus. The action was brought by Mr. Joseph Thomson, a shareholder in the British Goldfields of West Africa (Limited), a company now in liquidation, against Lord Clanmorris, Colonel A. Bravo, and Messrs. B. C. Hargreaves, J. K. D. Mackenzie, and J. W. Wilson, the directors of the company, and Sir Alfred Kirby, its promoter, and it claimed compensation under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, and damages, on the ground of alleged misrepresentations in the prospectus. On August 22, 1895, the defendants issued a prospectus, with a map, inviting applications for shares. It stated, inter alia—(a) that the company had been formed to acquire and work valuable concessions for gold, timber, &c., in the district of Appolonia, in the Gold Coast Colony, of about 7,000 square miles in extent. This was the misstatement mainly relied upon and that on which Mr. Justice Kekewich, to a great extent, based his decision. The plaintiff said that on the faith of the statements he, on August 28, 1895, applied for 100 shares in the company and paid £12 10s., being 2s. 6d. per share, on application, in accordance with the terms of the prospectus, and that on August 29 100 shares were allotted to him, he paying the further sum of £37 10s. due on allotment. He eventually paid for his shares in full, his last call of £25 being paid to the liquidator in November, 1898. With regard to the statements in the prospectus, he alleged, as to (a), that the concessions were not valuable, that only a portion of them was in Appolonia, and that instead of being 7,000 square miles in extent they were only about 700. On January 12, 1898, an order was made to wind up the company. The plaintiff said that the alleged misrepresentations were made by the defendants recklessly and without knowing or caring whether the same were true or false, and that they had no reasonable ground for believing the statements to be true. On December 9, 1898, the plaintiff issued the writ in this action, claiming the relief above stated. The defendants, the directors, denied the plaintiff's allegations and submitted that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action against them, that it did not allege any fraud, and that in the absence of fraud the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief claimed. They also contended that in respect of each of the statements in the prospectus they had complied with the requirements of section 3 of the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, so as to absolve them from liability. They also insisted that the action had not been commenced within two years after the plaintiff's cause of action (if any) arose, and therefore the claim was barred by the statute 3 and 4 William IV., c. 42, section 3. Sir Alfred Kirby did not appear. Section 3 of the Act of William IV. provides (inter alia) that "all actions for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved by any statute now or hereafter to be in force shall be commenced and sued within the time and limitation hereinafter expressed and not after"—that is, "within two years after the cause of such actions or suits, but not after." By section 3 of the Act of 1890, "every person who is a director of the company at the time of the issue" of a prospectus inviting persons to subscribe for shares "shall be liable to pay compensation to all persons who shall subscribe for any shares . . . on the faith of such prospectus . . . for the loss or damage they may have sustained by reason of any untrue statement in the prospectus," unless it is proved (inter alia) "that he had reasonable ground to believe, and did up to the time of the allotment of the shares believe, that the statement was true." Mr. Justice Kekewich held that section 3 of the Act of William IV. did not apply to such an action, and that it was commenced in time. He also held that the statements in the prospectus were untrue in fact, and that the defendants had not reasonable ground for believing them to be true. His Lordship accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff for £100 with costs. The defendant Wilson appealed.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. T. Willes Chitty were for the appellant; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson were for the plaintiff.

The question as to the application of section 3 of the Act of William IV. was first argued.

The COURT dismissed the appeal on this point.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the point was a new one to all the members of the Court. But, in construing section 3 of the Act of William IV. (as in construing any other statute), regard must be had, not only to the words used, but to the reasons which led to the passing of the Act—the mischief which it was intended to cure. There were certain classes of action as to which there was then no defined period of limitation. Those actions were not within any of the then existing Statutes of Limitation. Among others were "actions for penalties, damages, or sums of money given to the party grieved by any statute now or hereafter to be in force"—i.e., sums of money payable by way of penalty or punishment, not by way of compensation to the person injured, punishment being the object. In other words, not actions for damages assessed with the view of compensating the person injured, but what were called "penal actions." Taking that as a guide, it was obvious that an action under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, did not come within section 3 of the Act of 3 and 4 William IV., though there might be some difficulty in the words of the section unless attention was paid to the history of the enactment. The Act of 1890 did not impose a penalty; it imposed on specified persons a liability to make compensation for a loss sustained. Whether you looked at the words of section 3 of the Act of William IV., or at its history, or at the good sense of the matter, an action under the Act of 1890 was not within that section. And if the two years' limitation was got rid of it was not necessary to decide what was the precise period of limitation. Whether it was six years or 20 years the writ in this action was issued in ample time. His Lordship's impression was that the period was six years. And as the Court had come to the conclusion that, whichever Statute of Limitations applied, the present case was not touched by it, it was not really necessary to deal with the question when the cause of action arose. But, in his Lordship's view, it arose when the shares were subscribed for. But the Court had only to decide whether this present action was barred, and in his Lordship's opinion it was not.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed that section 3 of the Act of William IV. did not apply to this action.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said that the Act of 1890 really gave a new "action on the case." It created a new negative duty. It imposed on those who prepared or issued a prospectus of a company a new statutory duty of accuracy—a duty to abstain from making untrue statements—and it gave a new action on the case to the persons who were injured by the breach of that statutory duty. The case was therefore provided for by the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. I., cap. 16, and the period of limitation was six years. His Lordship also agreed that the statute ran from the date of the subscription for the shares, not from the commission of the wrongful act. There could not be any cause of action until the plaintiffs had subscribed for shares, and it seemed to his Lordship that it would be untrue to say that the whole loss could not be assessed the moment the subscription had been made.

The appeal was then heard upon the merits.

Mr. WILLES CHITTY was heard on behalf of the appellant.

Mr. Renshaw and Mr. George Henderson, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question was whether Mr. Wilson had reasonable grounds for believing that the statement in the prospectus that the property was 7,000 square miles in extent was true. The evidence showed that his grounds of belief were at the best unsatisfactory. His Lordship was sorry for Mr. Wilson, but he had unfortunately made himself responsible for the prospectus, and his Lordship could not see that he had reasonable grounds for his belief.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said that he was very sorry for Mr. Wilson. There could be but one answer to the question whether he had reasonable grounds for his belief. But his Lordship could not help feeling sorry that he was obliged to decide against Mr. Wilson, because it involved the inclusion of a man who had been a victim and had been robbed with the robbers.

Mr. CHITTY then asked for a stay of proceedings under the judgment with a view to an appeal to the House of Lords.

The COURT granted a stay for a month to enable the defendant to consider whether he would appeal. If he should decide to appeal a further stay would be granted. The costs must be paid on the usual undertaking of the solicitor to refund in case the appeal should succeed.

WELLAND V. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, Rule 33, subsec. 3—Costs—Discretion of arbitrator.

This was a matter arising out of an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in which the applicant, a young man in the employment of the Great Western Railway Company, sought compensation for personal injury accidentally sustained by him in the course of his employment. The company admitted liability under the Act, and offered the applicant a weekly payment of 7s. 6d.; but this offer was not accepted. The case came on for hearing before the Judge of the County Court of Devonshire, who said that the applicant ought to have accepted the offer, and refused to make an award. The applicant thereupon appealed to the Court of Appeal, who made an order on February 5, remitting the case to the County Court Judge to further proceed thereon, and further ordering that the respondents should pay to the applicant his costs of the former hearing before the County Court Judge. On February 24 the County Court Judge made an award in favour of the applicant for a weekly payment of 7s. 6d., and he ordered the respondents to pay the applicant's costs, which he fixed at the sum of £5. On March 12 a further application was made to this Court on behalf of the applicant, on which the Court made an order calling upon the County Court Judge to show cause why he should not give directions for taxation of the costs between the applicant and the respondents in pursuance of the order of February 5, or make such award or give directions as might be necessary to give effect to the said order.

Mr. J. W. ST. L. LESLIE (Mr. Cripps, Q.C., with him) now appeared for the respondents, the railway company, and said that the registrar of the County Court was present to represent the County Court Judge. He contended that the County Court Judge had made an award in compliance with the order of this Court. He had acted within his discretion in fixing the costs at £5. By Rule 33, subsection 3, of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, "The Judge or arbitrator, in dealing with the question of costs, may take into consideration any offer of compensation proved to have been made on behalf of the employer." Here the costs had been unduly inflated, the applicant's solicitor having carried in a bill for £41. Further, the applicant had adopted a wrong course in taking these proceedings in this Court. This was really an application for an order in the nature of a mandamus, and it ought to have been made in the High Court. By section 131 of the County Courts Act, 1888, "No writ of mandamus shall issue to a Judge or an officer of the Court for refusing to do any act relating to the duties of his office, but any party requiring such act to be done may apply to the High Court, upon an affidavit of the facts, for an order or summons calling upon such Judge or officer of the Court, and also the party to be affected by such act, to show cause why such act should not be done."

Mr. LOOSEMORE appeared for the applicant, and contended that by section 6 of Schedule II. to the Act, the applicant was entitled to have his costs taxed in manner prescribed by the rules. Here the County Court Judge had not directed the costs to be taxed at all.

The COURT discharged the order to show cause.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said he thought the application ought to be dismissed on two grounds. The applicant was seeking an order in the nature of a mandamus to the County Court Judge to do his duty, and he ought to have gone to the High Court for that. In his opinion this Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the matter. Further, he thought the County Court Judge had done his duty. Rule 33, subsection 3, of the Workmen's Compensation Rules had not been called to the attention of the Court when this case was last before them. If it had been the Court would not have granted the rule to show cause.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

PAYNE V. HOGG.*

Prohibition—Jurisdiction—Inferior Court—Salford Hundred Court of Record Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., c. cxxx.), sec. 7—Construction.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Channell and Mr. Justice Bucknill) granting a writ of prohibition to the High Steward and Bailiff of the Salford Hundred Court of Record and to the plaintiff to restrain them from further proceeding on a judgment obtained in that Court. The action was brought in the Salford Hundred

Court of Record to recover £16 0s. 9d. as money due on a promissory note made by the defendant at Burton, outside the jurisdiction of the Court, and payable to the plaintiff at Manchester, within the jurisdiction of the Court. The defendant did not appear in the action, and judgment was signed upon default and execution was issued. The defendant thereupon applied for a writ of prohibition as above, which Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy, sitting as the vacation Judge at chambers, granted. The Divisional Court affirmed this order, upon the ground that section 7 of the Salford Hundred Court of Record Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict., c. cxxx.), only applied to cases where a defendant had delivered a defence and had not pleaded to the jurisdiction, and that therefore a defendant who had not appeared and had on that account not been in a position to plead to the jurisdiction was entitled to apply for a writ of prohibition on the ground of want of jurisdiction. The plaintiff appealed. Section 6 of the Salford Hundred Court of Record Act, 1868, gave the Court jurisdiction in certain cases—namely, where the claim or the value of the subject-matter in dispute did not exceed £50—and contained a proviso that if it should be made to appear upon oath that the claim exceeded the jurisdiction of the Court the Judge or the registrar should order all proceedings to be stayed. By section 7, "Save and except as aforesaid, no defendant shall be permitted to object to the jurisdiction of the Court otherwise than by special plea, and, if the want of jurisdiction be not so pleaded, the Court shall have jurisdiction for all purposes."

Mr. C. A. RUSSELL, Q.C., and Mr. WALTER R. WARREN, for the plaintiff, contended that the "cause of action" arose in the Salford Hundred Court. This point was not argued in the Divisional Court, as that Court was bound by the decision in "Whitehead v. Butt" (7 The Times L.R., 609), assuming to follow "Cooke v. Gill" (L.R., 8 C.P., 107), and "Read v. Brown" (22 Q.B.D., 128) to hold that the whole cause of action must arise within the jurisdiction. That decision was wrong. The words "cause of action" in the Act did not mean the whole cause of action. In section 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 and 16 Vict., c. 76), the words were "cause of action," and the Court had held them to mean the act on the part of the defendant which gave the plaintiff his cause of complaint—"Jackson v. Spittall" (L.R., 5 C.P., 542); "Vaughan v. Weldon" (L.R., 10 C.P., 47). That act in the present case was the non-payment of the note at Manchester. The whole cause of action, therefore, need not arise within the jurisdiction. Secondly, if that contention was wrong, section 7 of the Salford Hundred Court of Record Act, 1868, gave the Court jurisdiction where there was no plea to the jurisdiction, and prevented the defendant from applying for a writ of prohibition. A defendant, where the claim did not exceed £50, must always plead to the jurisdiction, and he could not be in any better position by not entering an appearance than if he had appeared and put in a defence on the merits. The last clause of section 7 gave the Court jurisdiction "for all purposes" if the want of jurisdiction was not pleaded. "Chadwick v. Ball" (14 Q.B.D., 855) was in favour of this view. They also contended that the Court had a discretion to refuse a prohibition, and that in the circumstances of the present case a writ of prohibition should be refused.

Mr. PICKFORD, Q.C., and Mr. LE RICHE, for the defendant, were not called upon on the first point. Upon the second point they contended that the meaning of section 7 of the Act of 1868 was that until the proper time for pleading arrived the Court had no jurisdiction. When the time for pleading arrived the omission to plead to the jurisdiction extended the jurisdiction of the Court and gave the Court jurisdiction. "Chadwick v. Ball" only decided that a defendant could not first take his chance in the Court and then, having lost, apply for a writ of prohibition. The decision of the Divisional Court was therefore right. The expense of objecting to the jurisdiction by plea was considerable, and if the objection was well founded the Court had no jurisdiction to give costs. This might be made an engine of oppression, as in a small case a defendant would prefer to pay rather than object to the jurisdiction. No reason had been shown why the Court in its discretion should refuse to grant a writ of prohibition.

The Court allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that upon the face of the writ of summons in the action there was an intimation that the defendant had to enter an appearance within eight days after service thereof, and that in default of appearance judgment might be signed in the defendant's absence. The defendant did not enter an appearance, and judgment was signed in default, and execution was issued on the judgment. The defendant then applied for a prohibition. On the face of the writ of summons everything appeared in order. The first point taken was as to the meaning of "the cause of action" in the Salford Hundred Court of Record Act, 1868. In his opinion it was clear that it meant all those matters which together made up the entire cause of action, and those matters must arise within the limited area of the jurisdiction of the Court. In the present case one essential element in the cause of action—namely, the signing of the promissory note, took place at Burton outside the jurisdiction of the Court. Therefore, apart from section 7 of the Salford Court Act, 1868, that Court had no jurisdiction to entertain this action. The next question was whether the defendant could now set up the objection to the jurisdiction of the Court. The Salford Court was a Court of limited jurisdiction. It was admitted that, if the Court proceeded to try a case dealing with a sum exceeding the amount as to which it had jurisdiction, prohibition would lie. Here the claim was for less than £50. By section 7 of the Salford Court Act, 1868, "no defendant shall be permitted to object to the jurisdiction of the Court otherwise than by special plea, and, if the want of jurisdiction be not so pleaded, the Court shall have jurisdiction for all purposes." The Divisional Court had by their decision added, after the words "by special plea," the words "when the time for pleading came." He (the Lord Justice) could see no reason for adding those words. If the defendant wanted in the present case to object to the jurisdiction, she ought to have appeared and pleaded it. The very point was decided in the Court of Appeal in "Chadwick v. Ball." In the absence of a special plea, the Court was to have jurisdiction for all purposes. It seemed to him that the section contained an absolute prohibition against raising the objection to the jurisdiction except by special plea. The words conferred jurisdiction on the Court unless a special plea was put in. Until the defendant came in and showed that the cause of action arose out of the jurisdiction of the Court, all being right on the face of the record, the Court could proceed and give judgment against her. With regard to the question of the exercise of discretion by the Court in granting a writ of prohibition, if it were necessary to consider that point, he would not be inclined to grant a writ of prohibition in the circumstances of this case. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. The words "the cause of action" meant the whole cause of action, as explained in "Cooke v. Gill," and did not bear the same meaning as the Court in "Jackson v. Spittall" placed upon the special words "a cause of action" in section 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852. With regard to the second point in the case—namely, the construction of section 7 of the Salford Court Act, 1868, he had felt some misgiving, but upon the whole he came to the conclusion that the case was covered by the decision of the Court of Appeal in "Chadwick v. Ball." There had been two alternative views—one was that section 7 was merely a rule of pleading in the Salford Court, and did not enlarge the jurisdiction of the Court, but merely defined the mode in which the objection to the jurisdiction could be taken in the Court itself. That was the view taken in "Oram v. Brearey" (2 Ex. D., 346). The other view was that it was a section enlarging the jurisdiction of the Court, and this view was adopted by the Court of Appeal in "Chadwick v. Ball." If they loyally accepted the decision of this Court in "Chadwick v. Ball" they must hold that section 7 conferred jurisdiction on the Salford Court. It was said that it was a curious kind of jurisdiction which depended upon a subsequent event—namely, whether a special plea to the jurisdiction was put on the record. He (the Lord Justice) could see no great difficulty in holding that the Salford Court had what the learned counsel for the plaintiff called a defeasible jurisdiction in cases where the claim or the value of the subject-matter in dispute did not exceed £50, a jurisdiction which could be ousted only by a special plea being put upon the record. Whether the Judges of the Court of Appeal in "Chadwick v. Ball" had before their minds all the consequences of their decision he did not know, and from what he knew of these local Courts he should have had some misgiving in holding that they had a practically unlimited territorial jurisdiction, leaving it to the defendant to set up the want of jurisdiction by plea. That, however, was a matter for the Legislature. The Court of Appeal had so decided, and he thought that their decision was in accordance with the natural meaning of the words of the section. He agreed also that if the Court had to exercise its discretion in this case the writ of prohibition should in the circumstances be refused.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

MANCHESTER BREWERY COMPANY (LIMITED) V. COOMBS.*
Landlord and Tenant—Lessee's covenants—
Brewery company—Covenant not to buy beer elsewhere—Assignees of landlord—Liability of tenant to observe covenant.

This action was before the Court on March 16 and 17. The plaintiffs sought an injunction to restrain the defendant, John William Gundry Coombs, from committing breaches of a certain covenant, and the case raised important questions as to the admissibility of evidence, the nature of the covenant, and the effect of an agreement for a lease which had not been executed by the lessor. At the conclusion of the hearing his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Carson, Q.C., Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Younger, Q.C., and Mr. G. Dodson for the defendant.

*Reported by W. H. PORTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently set out in the following judgment, which MR. JUSTICE FARWELL delivered:—The plaintiffs in this action seek for an injunction to restrain the defendant from committing any breach of a covenant to buy beer, &c., from them. The defence is (1) an allegation that the plaintiffs supply bad beer; (2) that the covenant in question is personal to the original landlord—i.e., that the tenant was only bound to take beer brewed in his brewery, either by him or his successors in the business; and (3) that the plaintiffs cannot maintain any action on the covenant in question, because the original landlord, through whom they claim as assigns, did not execute the agreement. I find the facts to be as follows:—On December 10, 1892, the defendant executed under seal an agreement with Broadbents (Limited), therein called the landlords, to take the Midland Hotel as tenant from year to year from December 25, 1892, at the yearly rent of £400, and covenanted with the landlords (inter alia) that he would at all times during the tenancy purchase of Broadbents (Limited), or their successors in business, all beer, ale, porter, stout, mineral waters, and cigars sold or consumed either on or off the premises, and would not at any time, directly or indirectly, sell and dispose of on the premises any beer, &c., other than such as should have been so bona fide purchased. This document was executed by the defendant alone, and he occupied the premises under that agreement as tenant to Broadbents until the latter sold the premises to the plaintiff company last year. There is nothing on the face of the agreement to show that Broadbents were brewers, nor are there any words extending the phrase “the landlords” to the successors and assigns of Broadbents. Broadbents were, in fact, brewers, and on March 29, 1899, they entered into an agreement to sell to the plaintiffs their brewery and the various tied houses, including the Midland Hotel, and the goodwill of their business, and “all other the property, assets, and effects (except money and securities for money) belonging to the vendors and used by them in connexion with the said business.” Neither the agreement nor the conveyance executed in pursuance thereof contained any reference to the defendant’s tenancy, but the purchase and sale were necessarily subject thereto. The agreement for sale also included the goodwill, trade name, and trade-marks of Broadbents. By two deeds, each dated June 24, 1899, the property comprised in the contract was conveyed to the plaintiffs, but there was no express conveyance of the goodwill, or of the benefit of any tied house covenants. On June 28, 1899, the plaintiffs sent by post a notice in writing to the defendant that they had taken over the business of Broadbents. This notice did not in fact reach the defendant until the end of July, when he acknowledges the receipt and says, “This is the first official notice I have received of the change in landlords.” At this time the defendant was indebted to Broadbents in a considerable sum for goods supplied and also for rent. Since June, 1899, Broadbents have not carried on business. The plaintiffs carried on the brewery formerly carried on by Broadbents until Christmas at Broadbents’ brewery, and since then at their own brewery situate about two miles off, and have collected Broadbents’ book debts for them. The defendant was pressed for money in August, 1899, and had various interviews with Mr. Smith, the plaintiffs’ manager, on the subject both of his account and of the rent due from him, and negotiations took place with a view to the defendant’s going out of the house. The defendant took from the plaintiffs on an average 20 barrels of beer a month. He continued to order as before and made some payments on account, but on October 9 the plaintiffs refused to send him any more goods until he made a good payment. On November 15 the plaintiffs put in a distress for rent, which was paid out shortly afterwards, as the defendant says, under protest. On November 13, the day on which the negotiations had come to a final end, the defendant for the first time complained of the quality of the beer supplied to him by the plaintiffs. There is a conflict of testimony as to this between Mr. Smith and the defendant. I do not desire to say more than is absolutely necessary about the defendant’s evidence, but I am bound to observe that he is, in my judgment, entirely untrustworthy, and I accept Mr. Smith’s evidence and reject the defendant’s. The complaint made in the letter of November 13 is this:—“I have compared with last year and the previous one, and find I have been losing £25 a week through the unsatisfactory character of your beers and the unsettled state of the business, as I cannot take full advantage of dinner parties, beds, and general orders, not knowing whether I can execute them or not.” The defendant in fact returned three barrels, and three barrels only, as bad. This was in October, but in an affidavit sworn by him in the Queen’s Bench Division for the purpose of getting leave to defend an action for his account he swore, “I find from my books that during the six months from July last to date (i.e., February 2, 1900) there has been thrown away as utterly unsaleable, sour, or undrinkable an average of upwards of 20 gallons of beer and porter per day. This has been thrown down the sink by my manageress, barmaids, cellarmen, and myself. I have personally served in the bar upon many occasions during that period, and I have on some days thrown away myself in one day as much as 60 gallons of beer.” The defendant was cross-examined as to this, and attempted to support it. He was driven to admit that he had no books which would show any beer thrown away, that the amount alleged to have been thrown away would amount to 17 barrels a month, and that he only took 20 barrels a month altogether. He attempted to make out his loss from his books as £59 a month in lieu of £25 mentioned in his letter already referred to, and the £25 to £30 mentioned in his affidavit sworn only last month, and the only books produced were of such a character as to be quite useless. The only other witnesses in support of the badness of the beer were the defendant’s nephew and niece and five customers. The nephew and niece were not satisfactory witnesses, and I certainly could not find in the defendant’s favour on their evidence, and of the five customers, four speak only to tasting the beer towards the end of July or beginning of August, and the last customer, who did try the beer on other occasions, went on drinking it from July to November. Mr. Younger admitted that it is by no means unusual for a brew to be a failure now and then, and it is no uncommon occurrence for beer to turn sour in hot or thundery weather. Such accidents as these do not amount to a default in supplying good beer sufficient to justify a total repudiation of a covenant to take beer from the brewers in question. It is idle to suppose that if a man was really throwing away 17-20ths of the beer supplied by his landlord and was suffering in the way that the defendant and his niece ask me to believe that they suffered, he would return three barrels only out of 100 or so, would make no complaint, would go on pressing to have more beer sent him, and would at last write a letter in the mild terms of that of November 13. I find that there has been no breach by the plaintiffs of their obligation to supply good beer. Two questions arose on the admissibility of part of the evidence tendered. The plaintiffs tendered evidence to show that they had supplied other tied houses on the same days as they supplied the defendant with beer from the same brew. Mr. Younger objected to its admissibility on the authority of “Holcombe v. Hewson” (2 Camp., 391, and 11

Rev. Rep., 746). If the plaintiffs had proved that the beer supplied was from the same brew, I should have held that the evidence was admissible. The evidence of those who drink the beer must, of course, be admitted to show that it was, in their opinion, bad or good; and I can see no reason why the evidence of the man who has to pay for and sell the beer should not also be admissible, if the identity of the liquor is established. But the plaintiffs failed to prove the identity of the brew, and the evidence, therefore, comes to nothing more than this—that the plaintiffs at the same time that they were supplying the defendant supplied good beer to other persons. In my opinion this is inadmissible for the reasons given in “Holcombe v. Hewson.” The second point was this. Mr. Carson objected to the question put to the defendant, “Have you received complaints from customers?” According to my recollection this question has always been allowed in actions of this nature, and I think for this reason. Counsel can certainly ask as to facts—Did the customer order beer? Did he taste it? Did he finish it? What did he do with it? If the matter is left there with the answer that he tasted and left it or threw it away, the Judge cannot avoid drawing an inference, and the cross-examining counsel is driven to ask for some explanation. It is simpler, therefore, to allow the statement of the customer of the reason for his conduct to be given in chief. But it comes to very little, and in the present case to nothing; for the defendant has called customers, and I give his advisers credit for having selected those who could testify most strongly in the defendant’s favour, and I have already disposed of their evidence. The defence on the facts having failed, the defendant relies on two points of law. He contends that the agreement is a personal contract and is confined to beer and ale brewed at the particular brewery either by Broadbents or their successors, and he relies on the fact that there are no words referring to assigns in the covenant. The covenant is to purchase from the landlords trading as Broadbents (Limited) and their successors in business all beer, ale, porter, stout, mineral waters, and cigars. True it is that Broadbents were brewers, but they were not manufacturers of mineral waters or cigars; there is nothing on the face of the agreement to show that they were brewers, and, even if there were, there is nothing to show that the beer, &c., to be taken by the defendant was beer to be brewed by them. In fact, part of the beer supplied to the defendant under the agreement at his request has been Bass. The question is one of construction—see “Clegg v. Hands” (44 Ch.D., 503, at p. 520) and “White v. The Southend Hotel Company” ([1897] 1 Ch., 767). In the case of “Doe v. Reid” (10 B. and C., 849; 34 Rev. Rep., 584), relied on by the defendant, the form of covenant showed that the beer to be taken was beer to be brewed by the covenantees—see p. 851—and the observation of Mr. Justice Bayley, at p. 857, must be taken propter subjectam materiam, and not as an enunciation of a general rule. “The Birmingham Brewery v. Jameson” (67 L.J., Ch. 403), the other case relied on by the defendant, is really in the plaintiffs’ favour, for the Master of the Rolls expressly says that the difficulty in that case was created by the severance of the business from the reversion, and that when the business and the reversion remain together there is no difficulty. In the case before me the plaintiffs are undoubtedly the successors in business of Broadbents (Limited), and as such are within the very words of the covenant. The defendant, in fact, contracted to deal with the persons who purchase the business from Broadbents, not from persons who brew beer at the same brewery as Broadbents. On this point, therefore, the defendant also fails. The last point taken by Mr. Younger rests on the fact that the agreement of December 10, 1892, was not executed by the landlord. Having regard to the construction that I have put on the covenant, it could not be contended that it is not of such a nature as to run with the land. But it is said that in order to arrive at the conclusion that it does run with the land, the Court must first find that an estate has been duly created at law in the land with which the covenant can run, or, in other words, that there must be privity of estate between lessor and lessee, and that such estate can only be created by deed duly executed by the lessor, and that this is borne out by the statute of Henry VIII., which applies only to leases by deed. This is undoubtedly sound—e.g., it has been held that a lease by mortgagor and mortgagee in which the covenants to repair were with the mortgagor and his assigns did not enable an assign of the mortgagee to maintain an action on the covenant. (“Webb v. Russell,” 3 Term Rep., 393; 1 Rev. Rep., 725.) Lord Kenyon says:—“It is not sufficient that a covenant is concerning the land, but in order to make it run with the land there must be a privity of estate between the covenanting parties. But here the mortgagor had no interest in the land of which a Court of law could take notice, though he had an equity of redemption, an interest of which a Court of equity could take notice.” And in “Standen v. Christmas” (10 Q.B., 135) it was held that the 32nd of Henry VIII. applied to leases by deed only, and that when the lease was not under seal the assignee of the reversion could not maintain assumpsit on the contract against the lessee for failure to repair. The reason is obvious. If the contract was regarded as personal, the right to sue on it was not assignable at law, and as it was not by deed there was no estate in which the right to sue could be inherent. The law is stated with great lucidity by Chief Justice Wilde in “Bickford v. Purvis” (5 C.B., at p. 929). [His Lordship read the passage.] If, therefore, the plaintiffs had been suing in covenant or in assumpsit on contract before the Judicature Acts, I think they would have failed. But it by no means follows that the plaintiffs would have failed in every form of action, even before the Judicature Acts; still less that they must fail now. Before the Judicature Acts, the plaintiffs might have succeeded if they had sued on the new contract implied from the conduct of the tenant and the assignee of the landlord, instead of suing on the original contract between the tenant and the landlord. I take the law as stated by Mr. Justice Willes in “Cornish v. Stubbs” (L.R., 5 C.P., at pp. 338-9). [His Lordship read the passage.] In this case the defendant on receiving the notice of June 28, 1899, writes on July 29:—“This is the first official notice I have received of the change in landlords”; from early in August the defendant carried on negotiations for three months or so with respect to the terms on which he should give up his tenancy; between August and November the plaintiffs’ manager applied to him repeatedly for rent; on November 18 the defendant writes, “If it is a question of your rent, you can have it when you want,” and when a distress for rent was put in on November 15 the defendant paid it out; and although he says it was under protest, this comes to nothing, for he was clearly liable, and he has recognized his liability by not bringing any action for illegal distress. I find, therefore, as a fact, that the defendant agreed that the plaintiffs should occupy the position of landlord to him in the same way that Broadbents had done. There is, however, another point which is fatal to the defendant. The defendant holds under an agreement for a lease from Broadbents, under which he has been in possession and paid rent for several years. The whole contract has been performed up to the present time, except that the legal estate has not been actually demised. The defendant would have no defence to an action for specific performance, the sole object of which would be to compel him to accept the legal estate. If Broadbents had not parted with the legal estate, I see no reason why they should not now execute the deed, in order to complete the transaction. The present plaintiffs are the assigns of the benefit of the agreement, both by implication from the conveyance of the land subject to the lease and by the express words of clause 26 of the agreement of March 29, 1899. The plaintiffs could, therefore, obtain specific performance in this Court of the contract so far as it is incomplete. In saying this I do not forget that this is a yearly tenancy only, and that Vice-Chancellor Wood in "Clayton v. Illingworth" (10 Hare, 451) refused to grant specific performance of a tenancy from year to year; but the reasons given by the Vice-Chancellor are inapplicable to the present case. He said there was nothing to show in that case that there was to be any lease under seal at all; here the tenant executes under seal. He said that equity interposes to grant specific performance in cases where the legal remedy is adequate, and that there was nothing in the case before him to show why the remedy at law would not be adequate. Here the defendant's whole contention rests on the ground that the plaintiffs have no legal remedy, and the grant of specific performance is necessary to give him his full rights. It is well settled that the assign of one of the parties to a contract can obtain specific performance of that contract against the other contracting party, and although it is usually necessary in such an action to make the assignor a party, I do not think that it is essential in a case like the present, where the sub-contract is no longer in fieri, and there are no equities between the parties to the original contract and no suggestion of any reason for making the original contractor a party. The managing director of Broadbents was called as a witness, and no question was put to him suggesting any reason for Broadbents being made parties. Holding, therefore, as I do, that the plaintiffs could obtain specific performance against the defendant, I find it laid down by the Court of Appeal that since the Judicature Act there are not in such a case as this two estates as there were formerly, one at common law by reason of the payment of the rent, and another in equity under the agreement. But the tenant holds under the same terms, and has the same rights and liabilities as if a lease had been granted—"Walsh v. Lonsdale" (21 Ch.D., 9), approved by Lord Justice Cotton in "Lowther v. Heaven" (41 Ch.D., at p. 264), and explained by Lord Esher in "Swain v. Ayres" (21 Q.B.D., 292-3), and "Foster v. Reeves" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 255). Although it has been suggested that the decision in "Walsh v. Lonsdale" takes away all difference between the legal and the equitable estate, it, of course, does nothing of the sort, and the limits of its applicability are really somewhat narrow. It applies only to cases where there is a contract to transfer a legal title, and an act has to be justified or an action maintained by force of the legal title to which such contract relates. It involves two questions:—(1) Is there a contract of which specific performance can be obtained? (2) If yes, will the title acquired by such specific performance justify at law the act complained of, or support at law the action in question? It is to be treated as though before the Judicature Act there had been, first, a suit in equity for specific performance, and then an action at law between the same parties, and the doctrine is applicable only in those cases where specific performance can be obtained between the same parties in the same Court, and at the same time as the subsequent legal question falls to be determined. Thus, in "Walsh v. Lonsdale" the landlord under an agreement for a lease for a term of seven years distrained. Distress is a legal remedy and depends on the existence at law of the relation of landlord and tenant, but the agreement between the same parties if specifically enforced created that relationship. It was clear that such an agreement would be enforced in the same Court and between the same parties; the act of distress was therefore held to be lawful. So in the present case I have already stated that specific performance can be granted between these parties in the suit. I must treat it, therefore, as granted, and I then find that the result justifies this action. It is not necessary to call in aid this doctrine in matters that are purely equitable. Its existence is due entirely to the divergence of legal and equitable rights between the same parties, nor does it affect the rights of third persons. Thus a contract by a landowner to sell the fee simple of land in possession to A would not enable A to maintain an action of ejectment or trespass against a third person, because such actions are purely legal actions, requiring the legal estate and possession respectively to support them, and the contract relied on is not made with the defendant. The case of "Friary Holroyd v. Singleton" ([1899] 1 Ch., 88, and 2 Ch., 261) turned on the construction of the word "assigns." In that case the plaintiffs had a contract to buy from the lessor a publichouse subject to a lease which contained a covenant to sell the freehold at a certain price, on six months' notice being given by the lessor, his executors, administrators, or assigns. The only notice given was given by the plaintiffs, and it was held that they were not assigns within the meaning of the clause. "Walsh v. Lonsdale" was cited, but Lord Justice Romer held that it had no application. The real point was that the notice was given by the wrong person, that such notice was a condition precedent, and the objection would have been just as fatal if the action had been brought in the name of the original landlord. The reversal in the Court of Appeal turned on a question of fact only. I hold, therefore, on this point that the plaintiffs, being clearly entitled in this Court against the defendant to a specific performance of the agreement under which the defendant has been for years and still is in possession of the land, can sue him on the covenants in the same manner as they could have done if Broadbents had actually executed the original lease. There are two other points to which I will refer, although I do not propose to rest my decision upon either of them. It is said that section 10 of the Conveyancing Act enables the plaintiffs to sue. Unless they can do so on the ground last stated (as to which I would refer to "Swain v. Ayres," 20 Q.B.D., at 292-3), I should feel some difficulty in so holding. The word "lease" in section 14 has been held not to include an agreement for a lease, and section 18, subsection 17, expressly contrasts lease and agreement for a lease. There are considerable difficulties in construing the section, and I express no final opinion upon it. The last point is this. The covenants in the original agreement by the defendant were personal contracts binding on him, on which he could have been sued at law in the name of Broadbents (Limited) after the assignment to the plaintiffs (see "Bickford v. Purvis," supra). Since the Judicature Act the right to sue on those covenants is a chose in action within section 25, subsection 6. The term "chose in action" in that section has been said in the Privy Council, "King v. Victoria Insurance Company" ([1896] A.C., at p. 254) to include all "rights the assignment of which a Court of law or equity would before the Act have considered lawful." I adopt this definition, and I hold that the benefit of these covenants could undoubtedly have been assigned in equity before the Act. The plaintiffs could, therefore, sue in respect of these covenants, if there had been an absolute assignment thereof to them in writing signed by the assignor, of which express notice in writing had been given to the defendant. I express no further opinion on this as it has not been argued and it may be that no sufficient notice has been given. The result is that I grant the injunction as asked, and order the defendant to pay the costs of the action.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith,) 1900.
Collins, and Romer, L.JJ.) March 28.

CAVANAGH V. GEORGE WHITECHURCH (LIMITED).
Company—Shares—Transfer of shares—Estoppel —Certificated transfers.

This was an application by the defendants for judgment for a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Bigham and a special jury, reported in The Times of December 11. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant company for refusing to register him as the holder of certain shares in that company, and also an injunction to restrain them from registering any one else as the holder thereof; and, alternatively, damages for misrepresenting that one Anthony Raymond was the registered holder of the shares in question. The plaintiff was a leather and hide merchant, carrying on his business at Havre and Paris. In the course of his business he had had relations with a firm of Lavington Evans, tanners, who had two establishments, one at Sittingbourne and the other at Longjumeau, near Paris. The result of these dealings was that Lavington Evans became indebted to the plaintiff in a sum of £13,748. On November 6, 1897, the business carried on by Lavington Evans in France was turned into a limited company called the Innox Tannery Company (Limited). One Anthony Raymond became the managing director of this company, having been largely connected in promoting its incorporation. This company assumed the liabilities of Lavington Evans, including the debt due to the plaintiff, and the payment of that debt was also guaranteed by Raymond. The business done formerly between the plaintiff and Lavington Evans was continued between the plaintiff and the Innox Tannery Company. The plaintiff sold raw hides to the Innox Company, who tanned the hides and consigned them to the defendants for sale on commission. The defendants on receipt of the goods used to make an advance of 80 per cent. of their value, the balance being remitted on sale of the goods. In April, 1899, the plaintiff began to press the Innox Company for payment, and an arrangement was made by which the plaintiff was to take bills of £500, accepted by the Innox Company and endorsed by Raymond, the first to fall due on May 11, 1899, and others at intervals of a week. The first bill was dishonoured, whereupon the plaintiff came to London and instructed his solicitors, Messrs. Smith and Hudson, to press for payment. The difficulties of the Innox Company concerned the defendants as well as the plaintiff, and, accordingly, an arrangement was proposed on May 19 by which the debt due to the plaintiff should be secured. The proposal was that Raymond, who had also been concerned in promoting the defendant company, should transfer to the plaintiff 1,100 preference and 9,250 ordinary shares standing in his name in the books of the defendant company, that the defendants, instead of paying to the Innox Company as heretofore 80 per cent. of the value of all goods consigned to them by that company, should pay 40 per cent. to the Innox Company and 40 per cent. to the plaintiff. If this was completed the plaintiff told Raymond he would be satisfied and would not proceed against the Innox Company. The plaintiff at the same time obtained from Raymond an order entitling him to receive back from the Innox Company a parcel of hides which he had sold to them but for which he had not received payment. On May 21, 1899, Whit Sunday, he went with his agent and his solicitor, Mr. Smith, to the factory of the Innox Company to claim these goods. On arriving there he learned that there had been a great pressure of work in tanning and loading hides since 5 o'clock that morning. Thinking that he had been tricked, he consulted lawyers in Paris and obtained from a Court of law an "opposition" and a "saisie" upon the goods and property of the Innox Company and the defendants. The effect of these proceedings was to place an embargo on the goods of the Innox Company, so that they could not deliver any goods to the defendants, and to put a stop order on any money in the hands of the defendants, preventing them from making any payments to the Innox Company. The Innox Company, the defendants, and Raymond were all anxious that the plaintiff should withdraw these proceedings, and on May 27, 1899, it was agreed that Raymond should send transfers with certificates for the shares above mentioned. The certificates and transfers were to be handed to the plaintiff by the 30th, upon receipt of which he was ready to sign an agreement providing for payment of the money due to him and for the withdrawal of the "opposition" and the "saisie." The certificates were not forthcoming, and the plaintiff, with his solicitor, went on the morning of the 30th to the offices of Messrs. Sewell and Maughan, Raymond's solicitors in Paris. Meantime a letter dated May 29 had come from Mr. Wells, the secretary of Whitechurch (Limited), in London, to Mr. George Whitechurch in Paris in these terms:—"Dear Whitechurch,—I have sent power of attorney to Sewell and Maughan, also certified transfers of preference and ordinary shares, which ought to make them quite safe. I had to get these from my family and intimate friends who held them. On receiving back the transfers signed by Cavanagh, I will have the fresh certificates prepared and sent for signature. I have had my work cut out to get these together. . . ." This letter was answered by a letter from Mr. George Whitechurch, expressing his surprise that Wells should have issued these certificated transfers, and directing him not to do so in future without giving notice to the directors in Paris. When the plaintiff and his solicitor arrived on the morning of May 30 at the offices of Messrs. Sewell and Maughan, Mr. Maughan there produced certificated transfers for 1,100 preference and 9,250 ordinary shares in the defendant company. These certificated transfers were transfers of shares from Raymond as transferor to the plaintiff as transferee in the ordinary form, except that in the left-hand margin of the transfer deed were written the words (taking one transfer for example) "Coupon"—that was, certificate—"for 1,100 preference shares in the company's office, by George Whitechurch (Limited), Richard G. Wells, secretary." The plaintiff, with his solicitor, on seeing the certificated transfers left Messrs. Sewell and Maughan, and then went on to the office of Mr. George Whitechurch, the chairman and managing director of the defendant company, and told him that Mr. Maughan had received certificated transfers, but not certificates of the shares. There was some conflict of evidence as to what Mr. Whitechurch said in reply. According to the plaintiff's evidence, Mr. Whitechurch said he was glad of the settlement; that if the certificated transfers were there he would sign the agreement, and the certificates of the shares would follow as a matter of course.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

According to the defendants' evidence, he said the certificated transfers were of no use unless the certificates themselves were lodged with the company. On the following day, May 31, the plaintiff, his solicitor, M. Petit, a French advocate, M. Le Fort, the plaintiff's agent, Mr. George Whitechurch, Mr. Maughan, and Mr. Hammersley, holding a power of attorney for Raymond and being himself manager of the Innox Company's factory at Longjumeau, met together at the office of M. Le Fort. Mr. Maughan produced the certificated transfers. Mr. George Whitechurch looked at them, and, according to the plaintiff's witnesses, said they were all in order, and they should be sent to London and new certificates would be sent in return; according to the defendants' witnesses, he repeated what he had said on the day before—namely, that the certificated transfers were of no use unless the certificates themselves were lodged at the office of the defendant company in London. It was common ground that an agreement in writing was then read by M. Petit and signed by Mr. George Whitechurch, "bon pour encaissement G. Whitechurch (Limited). George Whitechurch." It was also signed by Mr. Hammersley and subsequently also by Raymond. By clause 1 of this agreement the debt due to the plaintiff was agreed at £13,748; clause 2 contained a statement of goods to be supplied by the Innox Company to the defendants, for which goods the defendants were to pay 80 per cent. of the value, 40 per cent. to the plaintiff and 40 per cent. to the Innox Company. By clause 3 the balance of the plaintiff's debt was to be secured by handing to him certificates for 1,100 preference shares and 9,250 ordinary shares in the defendant company. On the signing of this agreement the plaintiff withdrew the "opposition" and "saisie," and the certificated transfers of the shares were sent to the secretary of the defendant company in London. Since this agreement a sum of £1,600 had been paid off the debt, and hides to the value of £2,500 had been returned to the plaintiff, but the certificates which he expected in return for the transfers never came. Wells, the secretary to the defendant company, was also clerk to Raymond. In May, 1899, Raymond had no shares standing in his name. It was agreed that the value of the shares at that date should be taken at 15s. each. The transfer file of the defendant company showed a large number of transfers certificated by Wells and others acting for him. The old certificates with new ones were regularly sent by Wells to Paris, where the seal of the company was affixed to the new certificates, the transfers themselves being kept by the secretary in London. The questions left to the jury and the answers thereto were as follows:—1. Did the defendant company represent to the plaintiff that they held the certificates relating to the shares numbered in the transfers, and did they represent that the certificates so held were in the name of Raymond? Answer.—Wells did so represent. Whitechurch allowed the plaintiff to think it was all right in order to induce the plaintiff to withdraw the "opposition." 2. Did Wells make the representation honestly though carelessly? Answer.—No. 3. Did he do it fraudulently? Answer.—Yes. 4. Was it done in the supposed interest of the defendant company for the benefit of both Raymond and the defendants? Was the representation made in order to induce the plaintiff to alter his position to his detriment? Answer.—Yes. 5. Did he in consequence alter his position to his detriment? Answer.—Yes. Mr. Justice Bigham, upon these findings, gave judgment for the plaintiff for £8,325 damages, the value of the shares being 15s. each.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. R. G. Glenn appeared for the defendants; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. L. Ryland appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith, who was absent through indisposition, would be read by Lord Justice Romer.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER then read an elaborate judgment written by Lord Justice A. L. Smith, in which he said that the application was to enter judgment for the defendants upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict for the plaintiff, and alternatively for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that the damages were excessive. The action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for refusing to place him upon the register of shareholders of the defendant company. His Lordship then stated the facts, and with reference to the interviews of May 30 and 31, 1899, between the plaintiff and Mr. George Whitechurch, the chairman and managing director of the defendant company, after the two certificated transfers of the shares had been produced to the plaintiff by Raymond's solicitor, he said that there were two separate and distinct estoppels set up by the plaintiff. He agreed with Mr. Justice Bigham that Mr. Whitechurch knew, when he made the representations alleged on May 30 and 31, that Raymond's shares were being given to the plaintiff to induce him, if possible, to take off the "opposition." Those two estoppels were founded upon the well-known rules as to estoppel laid down in "Carr v. London and North-Western Railway Company" (L.R., 10 C.P., at p. 317), which were as follows:—(a) "If a man, either in express terms or by conduct, makes a representation to another of the existence of a certain state of facts which he intends to be acted upon in a certain way, and it be acted upon in that way, in the belief of the existence of such a state of facts, to the damage of him who so believes and acts, the first is estopped from denying the existence of such a state of facts." (b) "If a man, whatever his real meaning may be, so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take his conduct to mean a certain representation of facts, and that it was a true representation, and that the latter was intended to act upon it in a particular way, and he with such belief does act in that way to his damage, the first is estopped from denying that the facts were as represented." Either of those rules was sufficient to support the plaintiff's first estoppel, which was founded upon an estoppel arising out of representations made by Mr. George Whitechurch, assuming that there was evidence to support the finding which the jury had come to thereon. As to the first estoppel, the learned Judge had left the questions clearly to the jury, and he also left to the jury questions upon the second cause of action—namely, that founded upon the representation made by the defendants' secretary by his endorsement upon the margin of the transfers. The Lord Justice then dealt elaborately with what passed at the interviews with Mr. George Whitechurch on May 30 and 31, in regard to which there was a conflict of evidence, and said that it was for the jury to say whether the plaintiff's or Mr. Whitechurch's evidence was correct upon this point. The jury adopted that of the plaintiff, for they found that Mr. Whitechurch allowed the plaintiff to think it was all right (that was, the certificated transfers) in order to induce the plaintiff to withdraw the "opposition," and that the plaintiff in consequence did alter his position to his detriment. There was ample evidence to justify the jury in finding as they did, and the case fell within either of the rules in "Carr v. London and North-Western Railway Company" above set forth. In his Lordship's opinion the plaintiff had made out a case, as the jury believed his evidence, that a representation was made by Mr. Whitechurch to him—stated shortly—that the certificated transfers were as good as transfers plus certificates, in order to induce the plaintiff to act thereon to his detriment, which he did. It was argued that Mr. Whitechurch had no authority to make the representation. In his Lordship's opinion Mr. Whitechurch, in getting the withdrawal of the "opposition" which brought the business of the company to a deadlock, was acting within the powers conferred upon him as managing director by the articles of association of the company. With regard to the damages, the plaintiff was entitled to have had the shares numbered in the two certificated transfers registered, and to be placed upon the register as the holder of those shares. They were worth 15s. each, which amounted to £8,325. In the circumstances of the case the damages were rightly given. It seemed to him that the estoppel proved against Mr. George Whitechurch was amply sufficient to support the plaintiff's case, and he did not propose to deal with the estoppel created by the untrue certificates given by the defendant company's secretary. It was sufficient to state that he agreed with the remarks of Lord Justice Collins upon this point. The application must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read a judgment to the same effect, in which he said that as regards the alleged estoppel based on the representation of Wells, the secretary of the defendant company, in certifying the transfers from Raymond to the plaintiff, the extent of the estoppel would depend upon what was in the circumstances the fair business inference to be drawn from the certification of the transfers. The jury had found that by certification the secretary represented that he held certificates relating to those specific shares and that those shares were in the name of Raymond. The defendants contended that nevertheless they were at liberty to assert that Raymond had no title to the shares which he purported to transfer, and that consequently they could not be made to pay damages for not registering the plaintiff. They relied upon "Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Company" (25 Q.B.D., 512). In his opinion that case did not support the contention. In the present case, if the fact which the defendants were estopped from denying was taken together with the facts as they were, a complete right to call for registration was established in the plaintiff. There was only one set of transfers in the case, and they were perfectly genuine and purported to transfer shares which the company had to admit were registered in the name of the transferor when the transfers were certified. Therefore the links in the chain of title were complete. In his opinion the same result was reached through what the jury had found to be the facts with regard to the representations made by Whitechurch himself. His Lordship had so far considered the case apart from fraud in Wells. But if the finding of the jury stood on this part of the case, it could not be contended that his fraud was such as to relieve the company from responsibility, either by estoppel or otherwise, for his representations. The jury had found that he made the representations fraudulently and in the supposed interest of the defendant company for the benefit of both Raymond and the defendant company. In his opinion there was evidence fit for the consideration of the jury upon this point.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said that he had read the judgments already delivered and he entirely agreed with them.

THE QUEEN V. GRAY.*

Contempt of Court—Newspaper article—"Scandalizing" the Court—Scurrilous abuse of a Judge at Assizes.

Judgment in this case was delivered.

The Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster, Q.C.) and Mr. H. Sutton appeared for the Public Prosecutor; and Mr. Hugo Young, Q.C., and Mr. Tangye for the defendant; Mr. Arthur A'Beckett held a watching brief for the committee of the London district of the Institute of Journalists.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said,—In this matter the Attorney-General, on Friday last, moved for a rule calling on Thomas Lancaster to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt of Court by reason of a certain article printed and published by him in a newspaper on March 16. It then appeared that Thomas Lancaster was the printer of the newspaper and the secretary and manager of a company who carried it on. Yesterday the Attorney-General informed the Court—and referred to an affidavit as evidence—that Thomas Lancaster was abroad when the article was published and it appears that he is still abroad. It was announced at the same time that Howard Alexander Gray was the editor of the newspaper and that he was the writer of the article and responsible for its publication. Howard Alexander Gray appears here in person and is represented by counsel and submits himself to the jurisdiction of the Court. The Court is therefore seized of the case against him. The facts are these:—A man named Wells was indicted for uttering and publishing indecent words and for publishing an indecent book. The case came before Mr. Justice Darling, sitting as a Court of oyer and terminer. The learned Judge thought fit to refer to the nature of the trial, and to the fact that the evidence was likely to be of an indecent character and unfit for publication. He thought fit to warn the Press against the publication of indecent details. In doing so, he took care not to prejudice the matter to be tried, for he pointed out that though necessarily indecent matter would be put in evidence it did not follow that the publication of it under the circumstances constituted a criminal offence. He proceeded to point out that there were means for punishing persons who did publish indecent matter. I do not think, for a moment, that the learned Judge intended to insult the Press. The warning may have been unnecessary. The learned Judge was probably unaware of the fact that no indecent matter was published in the reports of the proceedings which took place before the trial. I think he probably had in mind the popular impression—which is an erroneous impression—that newspapers enjoy the privilege of publishing with impunity anything which takes place in a law Court. On the evening of March 16 the article complained of was published. It was read by the Attorney-General (see The Times of March 31), and I will not now read it again. Of its character there can be no question. No one has described it in terms of stronger condemnation than Howard Alexander Gray himself, who in his affidavit admits that the terms of the article were "intemperate, improper, ungentlemanly, and void of respect due to his lordship's person and office." The article is in terms of scurrilous abuse of a Judge in his character as a Judge, scurrilous abuse in reference to the conduct of the Judge while sitting under the Queen's commission, scurrilous abuse published in a newspaper circulating in the town where the Judge was at the time sitting under the Queen's commission. It cannot be doubted that the article constitutes a contempt of Court, but as these applications are unusual, we think it right to explain more fully what does constitute a contempt of Court and to indicate the means of punishing the offence. The jurisdiction in contempt exists in the interest of the public as a safeguard of the due administration of justice. Any act done or writing published which is calculated to bring the Court or the Judge of a Court into contempt or to lower his authority is a contempt of Court. Further, any act done or writing published which is calculated to obstruct or interfere with the due course of justice or the lawful process of the Courts is a contempt of Court. The first is that which is referred to by Lord Hardwicke as "scandalizing" a Judge. These propositions are subject to the important qualification that Judges and Courts are open to criticism, and if reasonable arguments and expostulations are offered against any judicial act as being contrary to the law or the public good, no Court would or could treat that as a contempt of Court. But it must be remembered that in this matter the liberty of the Press is no greater than the liberty of every subject of the Queen. No one could say that the criticism contained in this article was justifiable or was not a contempt of Court, and we must therefore deal with it as such. The jurisdiction by virtue of which we are now acting is not a newfangled jurisdiction. It is a jurisdiction as old as the common law, of which it is a part. Its history and the purpose for which it exists is treated of by Chief Justice Wilmet, then Mr. Justice Wilmot, in his "Opinions and Judgments" at page 243. The jurisdiction is one that must be exercised with great care and only in cases where the contempt of Court is clear and beyond reasonable doubt. If this is not the case we ought to leave the Attorney-General to proceed by means of a criminal information. If it had not been for the conduct of Howard Alexander Gray since the publication of the article, and if it had not been for the affidavit made by him which is before the Court, we should have thought it necessary to send Howard Alexander Gray to prison for a not inconsiderable period. But he has frankly acknowledged his responsibility, and, more, he has expressed regret for what he has done. In his affidavit he refers to the fact that other newspapers have made comments upon the same incident. I will only say as to those comments that, so far as they have been adverted to at all, they were obviously comments of a very different character. The Attorney-General has not thought fit to take action with regard to them, and they are not before us. His Lordship, having read portions of the defendant's affidavit, concluded,—Howard Alexander Gray, the judgment of the Court is that you pay a fine of £100 and further that you pay £25 in respect of the costs of these proceedings, and that you be detained, if necessary, and, if necessary, lodged in Holloway gaol, until these sums are paid.

Mr. YOUNG.—Will your Lordship allow till 4 o'clock this afternoon for payment to be made?

Railway Company—Passenger's luggage—Liability—Holder of free pass—Conditions of carriage.

Judgment was given in this motion, which came before the Court by way of appeal from a decision of the Registrar's. The motion was heard on the 19th inst., when judgment was reserved. The case arose out of the loss of the Stella, which belonged to the London and South-Western Railway Company, and which, on March 30, 1899, whilst on a voyage from Southampton to Guernsey and Jersey with a small quantity of cargo and about 174 passengers, ran on to the Black Rock, near the Casquets, and sank. Her master, 18 of her crew, and 86 passengers were drowned. Many of the passengers who were saved suffered damage to themselves and to their property, and all the goods, merchandise, and other things on board were lost. Among the passengers were a Mr. Joshua Le Mare and his wife. Mr. Le Mare was an official in the employ of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and as such had obtained for himself and his wife from the London and South-Western Railway Company a free pass for the journey from London to Jersey. Mr. Le Mare was drowned in the wreck, and, though Mrs. Le Mare was saved, both her own and her husband's luggage was lost. On July 24, 1899, Mr. Justice Bucknill made a decree limiting the liability of the London and South-Western Railway Company in respect of all claims made or to be made against them arising out of damage or loss to goods and merchandise on board the Stella and also in respect of claims made by the legal personal representatives of the persons who lost their lives by reason of the loss of the said ship, and also in respect of claims arising out of any loss of life or personal injury occasioned thereby, upon payment into Court by the railway company of the sum of £15,404 8s., together with interest from March 30 until payment (such sum being £15 per ton for each ton of the gross tonnage of the Stella), under section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Mr. Justice Bucknill, by his judgment (which is reported in The Times for July 25, 1899), declared that the railway company were entitled to limit their liability in respect of all things whatsoever, which would include personal effects and luggage. A number of claims have been put forward against the fund in Court, and amongst the claims so put forward was one by Mrs. Joshua Le Mare and her four children, under Lord Campbell's Act, for the loss they had sustained by the death of Mr. Le Mare. Mrs. Le Mare also claimed in respect of the loss of her luggage, and, as legal personal representative of her husband, for the loss of his luggage. It appeared that on the face of the free pass under which Mr. Le Mare and his wife were travelling were the words, "For conditions see back," and on the back were the words:—"This free pass is granted on the following conditions:— . . . Condition 2.—That it shall be taken as evidence of an agreement that the company are relieved from all responsibility for any injury, delay, loss, or damage, however caused, that may be sustained by the person or persons using this pass." The claim on behalf of Mrs. Le Mare and her children, under Lord Campbell's Act, was disallowed by the Registrar, having regard to the wording of the second condition of the free pass set out above. From this decision the claimants appealed, and, by consent, the question as to Mrs. Le Mare's right to claim in respect of the loss of her own and her husband's luggage was also dealt with at the hearing.

Mr. H. TINDAL ATKINSON, for the appellants, contended, with regard to the claim under Lord Campbell's Act, that the conditions of the free pass were not binding on Mr. Le Mare at all, and certainly not with respect to the sea portion of the journey. As regards the claim for the lost luggage, he contended that the conditions of the free pass could not be allowed to exonerate the company from liability in respect of goods carried by them, having regard to the provisions of section 7 of the Carriers Act, 1854, as extended by section 16 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, and to section 31 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1863. He also contended that section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, applied to this contract, which was one of through-booking, and that under the last-mentioned section it was necessary, in order to exempt the company from liability, that the conditions of the contract must be published in a conspicuous manner in the office where the through-booking was effected, and be printed in a legible manner on the receipt or freight note given by the company for the goods, and that these requirements were not complied with. He cited the cases of "Henderson v. Stevenson" (2 H.L., Scotch Appeals, 470), "Watkins v. Rymill" (10 Q.B.D., 178), "Zunz v. the South-Eastern" (4 Q.B., 539), "Harris v. the Great Western" (1 Q.B.D., 515), "Cutler v. the North London" (19 Q.B.D., 64), "The Great Western v. Bunch" (13 App. Cas., 31), "Marshall v. the York and Newcastle" (11 C.B., 655), and "The Great Northern v. Shepherd" (8 Ex., 30).

Mr. R. B. D. ACLAND, for the railway company, argued, with respect to the claim under Lord Campbell's Act, that the conditions of the free pass were binding. Here there was no contract of carriage; there was merely a licence to Mr. Le Mare to be upon the company's premises and conveyances on certain conditions. With reference to the claim for lost luggage, the conditions of the free pass also applied. The Carriers Act extension to steamboats under section 16 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, had been repealed by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1888. He cited the case of "Bergheim v. the Great Eastern" (3 C.P.D., 221).

Mr. H. TINDAL ATKINSON, in reply, referred to the case of "Gallin v. the London and North-Western" (10 Q.B., 212).

At the conclusion of the arguments,

MR. JUSTICE GORRELL BARNES said he did not feel much doubt about the life claim, but with regard to the luggage he would like to consider the operation of the statutes. He therefore reserved judgment.

HIS LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, stated the facts and pointed out that Mr. Le Mare was a railway official, well cognisant of the form and nature of free passes. He thought that, whether the free pass was a contract or merely a licence, there was no doubt it was issued on certain conditions, and he came to the conclusion of fact that Mr. Le Mare was being carried on those conditions. He was not able to take the view that the conditions only applied to the land portion of the journey. The condition was general in its terms and applicable to the whole of the journey. That disposed of the claim under Lord Campbell's Act. With regard to the luggage, he thought that the condition was equally binding. The Carriers Act of 1854 did not apply, because its extension to steamboats under section 16 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868, had been repealed by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, and section 31 of the Railway Clauses Act, 1863, had not been incorporated with the special Acts of the London and South-Western Railway Company, which, indeed, were passed prior to that Act—viz., in 1848 and 1860 respectively. However, even if the Act of 1868 had been incorporated, he was doubtful how far it would apply in the case of free passes given without any consideration. With reference to the argument that this was a through-booking of goods and that the requirements of section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act ought to have been complied with, in order to exempt the railway company from liability, he was of opinion that that section only applied where a fare was paid, and there was nothing in that Act to prevent the company from making such a contract as in this case. The appeal would accordingly be dismissed, and the claims for lost luggage be disallowed. The railway company would be entitled to the costs of the appeal.

STREET V. STREET.*

Arbitration—Costs—"Costs of reference"— Reference by consent—Sum recovered less than £50—Discretion of arbitrator.

"Moore v. Watson" (L.R., 2 C.P., 314) doubted.

This was an appeal from the refusal of Mr. Justice Bigham to order a review of the taxation of certain costs. The action was brought to recover the sum of £90 alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff. On a summons taken out by the plaintiff the District Registrar of Manchester made an order directing that the matter in dispute, being merely a matter of account, should be referred to the award of a named arbitrator, the costs of the action to abide the event of the award, and the costs of the reference and award to be in the discretion of the arbitrator. The arbitrator made an award in favour of the plaintiff for £33, and he ordered the defendant to pay the plaintiff's taxed costs of the action and also the plaintiff's taxed costs of the reference and award. On the case coming before the District Registrar for taxation of costs, he made an order directing that, as the plaintiff had recovered a sum less than £50, the costs of the action should be taxed on the County Court scale, as provided by Order 65, rule 12, of the rules of the Supreme Court, but that the costs of the reference and award should be taxed on the High Court scale. The defendant appealed to the Judge at Chambers, and objected that the costs of the reference and award, as well as the costs of the action, ought to be taxed on the County Court scale. Mr. Justice Bigham affirmed the order of the District Registrar. The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the defendant; Mr. A. J. Ashton for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that the defendant relied on the case of "Moore v. Watson" (L.R., 2 C.P., 314), which was a case of compulsory reference, and in which it was held that in a compulsory reference the costs of the reference and award were to be treated as part of the costs of the cause, and that, as the plaintiff, having recovered less than £20, was deprived of his costs of the cause by virtue of section 11 of the County Court Act (13 and 14 Vict., c. 61), he was thereby deprived of his costs of the reference and award. The defendant contended that the present case was covered by "Moore v. Watson"; but that case had been criticized in the subsequent case of "Galatti v. Wakefield" (4 Ex.D., 249). There the arbitration was by consent, and it was urged that the principle of "Moore v. Watson" was applicable to arbitrations by consent. But Lord Justice Bramwell said:—"Reliance has been placed upon 'Moore v. Watson'; it seems to me that that case is quite distinguishable from that before us; but I desire to add that, as at present advised, I do not agree with the decision." Lord Justice Brett also refrained from approving of it. "Moore v. Watson" had been referred to again without being approved of in "Fergusson v. Davison" (8 Q.B.D., 470). Counsel for the plaintiff now called their attention to an earlier case of "Holland v. Vincent" (9 Exch., 274), in which it was distinctly held, under similar circumstances, that the costs of a reference and award were not part of the costs of the action. That case was not cited in "Moore v. Watson." There was the further authority of "Forshaw v. De Wette"

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(L.R., 6 Ex., 200), in which it was held that the costs of the reference were on a different footing from the costs of the cause, and that, though the plaintiff was debarred from recovering the costs of the cause, he was entitled to have his costs of the reference taxed on the High Court scale. These cases seemed to him to be inconsistent with the principle at the bottom of "Moore v. Watson." This was in a sense a compulsory reference, but it also had some of the elements of reference by consent, because the person named as arbitrator could only be named by consent; and he thought the order of reference was virtually a consent order. But whether that were so or not, he was of opinion that the authorities justified them in holding that, even if it were a compulsory reference, the order appealed from was right.

WATSON V. GRAY AND OTHERS.*

Damages—Remoteness—General loss of business.

This case, which was recently tried by his Lordship with a special jury, came on for further consideration. The plaintiff was a barge-builder at Gainsborough. The defendants carried on business as the West Hartlepool Steel and Iron Company. The action was brought to recover damages for the breach of two contracts for the sale by the defendants to the plaintiff of 400 tons of steel plates. The breach alleged was the non-delivery of the plates at the times specified in the contracts. The plates had been ordered by the plaintiff for the purpose of barges which he was then building. The damages claimed, in substance, fell under two heads. First, the plaintiff claimed the increased expenditure incurred in the building of the barges for which the plates were required by reason of the delay in delivery; secondly, the plaintiff claimed the loss of profit on other business which he alleged he would have been able to do if the plates had been delivered at the proper time and there had consequently been no delay in the completion of the barges. The defendants contended that the delay of delivery was due to causes within the meaning of a "strike" clause in the contracts, by which they were protected, and that the damages claimed were too remote; and they counter-claimed for the cost of the plates. The learned Judge left certain questions to the jury, in answer to which the jury found that there had been a breach of contract and that the plates could not have been obtained elsewhere, and after making allowance for stoppages, for which the defendants were not responsible, they awarded £633 damages under the first head. His Lordship was of opinion that the damages claimed under the second head were not recoverable in law, but, in order to avoid the possibility of a new trial, he asked the jury a further question as to the damages claimed for general loss of business. On this head the jury awarded £500 damages. The case then stood over for argument.

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., Mr. P. Rose Innes, and Mr. Hildenheimer, appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.

In the course of the arguments the following cases were cited:—"Gee v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company" (30 L.J., Ex., 11); "Smeed v. Poord" (1 E. and E., 602); "Waters v. Towers" (8 Exch., 401); "British Columbia Saw Mill Company v. Nettleship" (L.R., 3 C.P., 499).

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY, in giving judgment, said that he still held the same view as he had done when the case was before the jury. The claim arose out of a contract for the supply by the defendants to the plaintiff of steel plates which the defendants knew were wanted by the plaintiff for building certain barges which were then at such stages of construction that delivery of the plates in strict accordance with the provisions of the contracts was of the utmost importance to the plaintiff. There was, however, no evidence to show that the defendants had any knowledge of the size of the plaintiff's premises, or as to the state of his contract book, or whether he had any other contracts on hand. The jury had found that there had been a breach of contract by the defendants in not delivering the plates at the proper time, and that the plaintiff could not have got any similar plates elsewhere. With regard to the damages awarded by the jury for loss and expenditure occasioned in connexion with the barges for which, as the defendants knew, the plates were required, his Lordship was of opinion that these were matters which might be reasonably contemplated as resulting from a breach of the contract, and that it was within the competence of the jury to find the facts as they had done and to give damages in respect of these matters. But as to the claim for the loss of business generally his Lordship adhered to his opinion that that was far outside the region of damages as recognized by the law. The verdict of the jury on this head was an estimate of what the plaintiff's business ought to have produced during the time in question. That introduced all sorts of questions as to the way in which the business was carried on, the advantages or disadvantages of taking or not taking contracts at a particular time. Such a claim was purely speculative, and could not be said to have been within the contemplation of the parties, for the defendants had no knowledge as to what contracts the plaintiff had or could have had at the time in question. There would therefore be judgment for the plaintiff on the claim for £633, and for the defendants on the counterclaim for £149.

EDWARDS V. THE PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY (LIMITED)
—THE DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY (LIMITED)

Practice—Pleading—Statement of claim—Embarrassing pleading.

This was an appeal from an order made by Mr. Justice Lawrance at Chambers on a summons taken out by the defendants asking that the statement of claim in the action might be struck out as embarrassing and irrelevant. The statement of claim, which consisted of 18 paragraphs, alleged (inter alia) as follows:—"By an agreement made on April 18, 1893, between the plaintiff of the one part and the Pneumatic Tyre and Booth's Cycle Agency (Limited) of the other part, the plaintiff agreed to grant to the said company a licence to make, use, and vend certain patents for improvements in tires. The agreement provided that the company should pay to the plaintiff a royalty of 1s. for every tire manufactured and sold by them in accordance with the said patents, and that the licensees should use their utmost endeavour to promote the sale of such tires and advertise them in a conspicuous manner in all journals relating to bicycling in which they might advertise their business. The said company under their seal contracted in the said agreement for their successors and assigns. By divers agreements and assignments the whole of the interest of the said company had become vested in the defendants, the Dunlop Company, together with all obligations and liabilities belonging thereto. On November 14, 1893, the name of the said company was changed to "The Pneumatic Tyre Company (Limited)." In 1896 the whole of the business of the Pneumatic Tyre Company (Limited) was taken over by the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company (Limited), subject to all existing contracts entered into by the Pneumatic Tyre Company (Limited) and their predecessors. The defendant companies had not used their utmost, or in fact any, endeavour to promote the sale of the plaintiff's tires. Alternatively, in May, 1896, the Dunlop Company issued their prospectus to the public inviting a subscription of four millions sterling. The defendant Harvey Du Cros was the chairman and managing director of the Pneumatic Tyre Company and managing director of the Dunlop Company. The said prospectus stated that the Dunlop Company had been formed to acquire as a going concern the whole of the assets and undertaking known as the Pneumatic Tyre Company, and that the business would be taken over subject to all existing contracts. The plaintiff said that he was entitled to all the benefits of the contract of April 18, 1893, as against the defendant companies. The plaintiff, relying upon the statements in the prospectus of the Dunlop Company and upon the knowledge of Du Cros and the Pneumatic Tyre Company that the contract was an existing one, permitted the Pneumatic Company to transfer and assign all their business and assets to the Dunlop Company to his damage. If, as alleged, the Dunlop Company had not taken over the said contract, then the plaintiff had been damaged by reason of their statement that they were taking over all existing contracts. If the allegation of the Dunlop Company was as alleged, then the plaintiff said that, by reason of the fraud or gross negligence amounting to fraud of Du Cros and the Pneumatic Tyre Company in not procuring the Dunlop Company to take over the said contract, he had suffered damage. Mr. Justice Lawrence made an order that, as against the Pneumatic Tyre Company and Du Cros, the statement of claim should be struck out as embarrassing and irrelevant and disclosing no cause of action, and that the action should be dismissed. As against the Dunlop Company he ordered that the statement of claim should be struck out, and that, if the plaintiff did not deliver an amended statement of claim within seven days, the action should be dismissed. The plaintiff appealed.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Crispe appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. Allan for the Pneumatic Tyre Company; Mr. Shakespeare for the Dunlop Company; and Mr. T. W. Chitty for Du Cros.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that, in his opinion, the statement of claim as against all the defendants was embarrassing. As against the defendant Du Cros, he thought it disclosed no cause of action at all, and to that extent the Judge's order was perfectly right and must stand. As against the defendant companies, he thought the statement of claim, though embarrassing, might possibly be amended. The plaintiff therefore would have leave to amend, but this must be done at the plaintiff's expense, who must pay the costs of the proceedings below and of this appeal.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

FARMER V. WILSON AND OTHERS.*

Master and Servant—Intimidation—Besetting seamen—Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, sec. 7.

This was a special case stated by six justices of South Shields before whom an information laid by the appellant against the respondents under section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, was heard. The information charged the respondents for that they, with a view to compelling 37 persons, named in the information, to abstain from doing certain acts which the said persons had a legal right to do, to wit remaining on board the steamship Siren and fulfilling engagements made by them with the Shipping Federation (Limited), wrongfully and without legal authority beset a certain place where the said persons happened to be, to wit the said steamship Siren and the approach thereto. The facts were as follows:—At the time of the besetting charged the Siren was lying moored near Jarrow Slake in the Tyne and was occupied by the Shipping Federation as a depot ship for men intending to serve as seamen on board ships belonging to members of the federation, which is an association of shipowners. The 37 persons were at the time on board the Siren and had entered into engagements with the federation to remain on board of her until duly engaged to ship as seamen on board vessels belonging to members of the federation, receiving in the meantime daily wages and rations from the federation. The engagements between the 37 persons and the federation were made by the federation through its officials being bona fide the servants and in the constant employment of the federation. Neither those officials nor the federation had at any material time a licence from the Board of Trade under section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for the purpose of engaging or supplying seamen to be entered on board any ship in the United Kingdom, nor were the federation or its servants the owner, master, or mate of any ship, or bona fide the servant and in the constant employment of the owner, or a superintendent within that section. The 37 persons while so on board the Siren did not work or serve as seamen or otherwise. On the part of the respondents, it was contended that in entering into the engagements with the 37 persons the Shipping Federation had contravened the provisions of section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; that, therefore, remaining on board the Siren and fulfilling their engagements were not acts which the 37 persons, or any of them, had a legal right to do; that the relation of master and servant or employer and workman did not exist between the federation and any of the 37 persons; and that, therefore, section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act was not applicable to the case. On the part of the appellant, it was contended that the federation, in entering into the engagements in question, had not contravened section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; that remaining on board the Siren and fulfilling their engagements were acts which the 37 persons had a legal right to do, whether the federation had contravened the section or not; and that it was immaterial, for the purposes of section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, whether or not the relation of master and servant or employer and workman existed between the federation and the 37 persons. The justices found that there was a besetting in fact with a view to compel the 37 persons from remaining on board the Siren and fulfilling their engagements with the federation. They were, however, of opinion that the federation, in entering into the engagements with the 37 persons, had contravened section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that, therefore, none of the 37 persons were legally entitled to remain on board the Siren and fulfil their engagements with the federation for the purpose of being shipped on board vessels belonging to members of the federation; that the relation of master and servant or employer and workman did not exist between the federation and any of the 37 persons; and that, therefore, section 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, did not apply. They accordingly dismissed the information subject to the present case.

Mr. MARSHALL-HALL, Q.C., who, with Mr. Temperley, appeared for the appellant, stated that the Shipping Federation has now a licence under section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and that, in view of that circumstance, he would not argue the question whether there had been a breach of that section on their part, since even if there had, that would not prevent the sailors engaged by them from having a legal right to go on board the Siren and remain there, and would therefore, as he contended, afford the respondents no defence to the charge against them.

Mr. ROBSON, Q.C., who, with Mr. Pilcher, appeared for the respondents, contended that the effect of section 111 of the Merchant Shipping Act was to render the whole transaction between the federation and the sailors engaged by them illegal; that the sailors had, therefore, no legal right to be upon the Siren for the purpose of fulfilling their engagements with the federation; and that the respondents had accordingly not been guilty of the offence charged.

The COURT allowed the appeal, and remitted the case to the justices with directions to convict.

MR. JUSTICE DAY said he was clearly of opinion that the magistrates were wrong. The men engaged by the federation had been beset with a view to compel them to abstain from doing acts which they had a legal right to do. They had a legal right to be upon the ship, to stay there, and to receive their wages if they could get the money. There might have been a breach of the statute by the federation, but that would not prevent the men from having a legal right to be on the ship.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

IN RE GOY AND CO. (LIMITED)—FARMER V. GOY AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Company—Debentures—Transferee of debentures—Debt due to company from transferor—Conditions of debentures.

This was a debenture-holder's action. The question now before the Court was whether a Mr. Robey, who, since the judgment in the action, had become the transferee of certain debentures in the company, was entitled to receive anything in respect thereof until payment had been made of a sum which his transferor had been ordered to pay to the liquidator of the company. The debentures in question formed part of an issue of 60 debentures of £100 each made in October, 1897. By each debenture the company charged its undertaking and all its property, both present and future, including its uncalled capital. On May 12, 1898, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding up of the company, and a Mr. Doggett was appointed liquidator. Upon the passing of this resolution the principal sums secured by the debentures became payable. On June 9, 1898, Mr. Doggett was appointed receiver in the action, and on June 11, 1898, the usual judgment in a debenture-holder's action was pronounced. In August, 1898, J. H. Chandler, who was a debenture-holder and had been a director of the company, applied to Mr. Robey for an advance on his debentures. On September 1, 1898, Mr. Robey's solicitor wrote to Mr. Doggett, the liquidator and receiver, making inquiries about the debentures and asking whether there were any cross-claims by the company against Mr. Chandler. On September 2 Mr. Doggett sent a letter answering some of the inquiries, but taking no notice of that as to cross-claims. On September 14, 1898, Mr. Robey made an advance to Chandler on the security of a mortgage and transfer of the debentures. On September 22, 1898, Mr. Robey's solicitor sent the transfer to Mr. Doggett for registration. Mr. Doggett referred the matter to the solicitor acting in the proceedings, but that gentleman thought that, having regard to the judgment in the action, there was a difficulty as to registration, and after some correspondence Mr. Robey's solicitor gave Mr. Doggett formal notice requiring him to register the transfers. Ultimately the matter was brought before the Master, who directed that the receiver should enter a note of the transfers on the register, but should not enter the transferee's name thereon. In October, 1898, Mr. Doggett discovered that Mr. Chandler had been guilty of misfeasance in respect of a sum of £300, which had come to his hands as a director of the company, and on March 16, 1899, Chandler was ordered to pay that sum to the liquidator. Under these circumstances the above-mentioned question now came before the Court upon the further consideration of the action.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. C. T. Mitchell appeared for the receiver; and Mr. C. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. A. & B. Terrell for Mr. Robey.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that Mr. Robey had clearly become transferee for value and in good faith, and was fully entitled to whatever benefit might accrue from that position. If Chandler had remained the owner of the debentures he would, on the one hand, have been entitled to receive out of the property comprised in his debentures a dividend thereon, and on the other he would have been liable to contribute to that same property a sum of £300. It had been repeatedly held inequitable that a person entitled to a share of a fund should receive anything in respect of that share without paying what he might be bound to contribute to the same fund. Under such circumstances the Court said in effect to the person claiming to be paid, "You have in your own hands that which is applicable to the payment, pay yourself out of that." That had been done on the distribution of the residuary estate of a testator where a person entitled to a share was also indebted to the estate; "Willes v. Greenhill" (29 Beav., 376), "Re Akerman" ([1893] 1 Ch., 212), "Re Watson" ([1896] 1 Ch., 958). Where two companies were in liquidation and one held shares in the other, and was at the same time a creditor, it was held that the creditor could not take any dividend until all calls due on the shares were paid; "Re Auriferous Properties" ([1898] 2 Ch., 425), and "In re Milan Tramways Company" (L.R., 25 Ch.D., 587), where Lord Justice Cotton said that probably the principle was applicable to the distribution of a fund to which debenture-holders were entitled. In his Lordship's opinion it was applicable to the present case, so that Chandler could not have claimed payment of a dividend until he had paid the £300. Then was his transferee in a better position? As a general rule the transferee of a chose in action stood in no better position than his transferor. There was nothing, however, to prevent a debtor from contracting with his creditor that he would not avail himself against a transferee of any rights which he might possess against the creditor or any assignee of his. See "Re Agra and Masterman's Bank" (L.R., 2 Ch. App., 391) and "Re Blakeley Ordnance Company" (L.R., 3 Ch. App., 154). It was contended that such a contract existed in the present case. His Lordship then referred to the conditions of the debentures, which provided, inter alia (4), that every transfer must be delivered at the registered office of the company with a fee of 2s. 6d. and such evidence of identity or title as the company might reasonably require, and thereupon the transfer would be registered and a note of such registration would be endorsed thereon. Condition 6 provided that the principal and interest secured by the debentures would be paid without regard to any equities between the company and the original or any intermediate holder thereof. It seemed to his Lordship that condition 4 imposed an absolute obligation on the company to register a transfer upon the requirements of the condition being fulfilled. It was suggested that that only applied while the company was a going concern, but having regard to section 131 of the Companies Act, 1862, his Lordship thought that the right to transfer and to have the transfers registered was not affected by the winding up. It was said, however, that the equity which was set up was not that of the company but of the other debenture-holders; and that the right to transfer could not be insisted on after judgment had been given in a debenture-holder's action, at all events to their prejudice. The title of the debenture-holders to the £300 was derived from the fact that that sum was part of the property of the company. The debenture-holders all held their debentures under the same conditions, one of which was that the moneys secured by any debenture were to be paid without regard to any equities between the company and the original or any intermediate holder. That was a stipulation for the benefit of the debenture-holders, and was one to which debenture-holders attached great importance. The debenture-holders took this piece of property subject to the same obligations as the company, and they no less than the company were precluded by the conditions from asserting this equity against a transferee. His Lordship could not see that the judgment in the action affected the right to transfer, and he held that Mr. Robey was entitled to receive the dividend payable in respect of Mr. Chandler's debentures.

BEALE V. BOND.*

Principal and Agent—Commission—House agent —Finding a purchaser—Purchaser accepted—Liability of principal.

This was an appeal from the Deputy Judge of the City of London Court. The claim was for a deposit of £25 paid to the defendant, a house agent, as stakeholder on the purchase of certain houses in Howland-street, Fitzroy-square. The plaintiff was the owner of these houses and retained the services of the defendant to introduce a purchaser, giving him the following commission note:—"April 26, 1899, 48 and 50, Howland-street, Tottenham-court-road. I agree to accept a sum of £1,150 for the above property and you are to be at liberty to receive anything over and above that as a commission, it being understood that I am to receive the full sum of £1,150 without deduction, except of course apportionments of outgoings. Completion to be within a month and deposit of 10 per cent. to be paid over. Signed, C. W. BEALE. To Messrs. Henry Bond and Son." The time on which the purchase was to be completed was subsequently extended over July 19 by mutual consent. The defendant, having procured this commission note, made a contract dated July 9, on behalf of the plaintiff, with one David Rosenberg, for the purchase of the houses for £1,250, of which £25 was paid as deposit. The contract contained provisions fixing dates for delivery of the abstract of title, requisitions and answers thereto, date of completion, and other matters, and continued:—"If the purchaser shall fail to comply with any of the conditions herein contained the vendor may, without tendering any assignment, either enforce specific performance of this contract or, by notice in writing to be given to the purchaser, declare the said deposit money to be forfeited, and thereupon the said deposit money shall be forfeited to the vendor as liquidated damages and the contract shall be at an end." There was evidence that the plaintiff accepted Rosenberg as a purchaser and communications passed between them upon that footing. Rosenberg, however, did not complete the purchase, and the deposit of £25 became forfeited, and it being in the hands of the defendant the plaintiff claimed it from him. The defendant counterclaimed and pleaded as a set off that he was entitled (1) to £100 on the signing of the agreement between the plaintiff and Rosenberg or (2) to a quantum meruit for work done by him in finding a purchaser. The action was tried before a Deputy Judge and a jury, who found that the contract with Rosenberg was a bona fide contract and had been entered into on the defendant's introduction. They also found that, in case the defendant was not entitled to his commission, five guineas was a fair remuneration for the work done by him in finding a purchaser. The Deputy Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for £25 on the claim, and for the defendant for £5 5s. on the counterclaim. The defendant appealed.

Mr. ARTHUR POWELL, for the defendant, cited "Fisher v. Drewitt" (48 L.J., Q.B. 32) and "Passingham v. King" (14 The Times L.R., 392) in the Court of Appeal, and contended that the defendant had earned his commission when Rosenberg was accepted as a purchaser.

Mr. HOLLOWAY, for the plaintiff, argued that the contract was not an absolute contract to purchase the houses as it contained an alternative clause by which the vendor might either sue for specific performance or accept the deposit and rescind the agreement.

The COURT held that the commission of £100 became due when Rosenberg was accepted as a purchaser and that the case was covered by "Passingham v. King" (14 The Times L.R., 392), and gave judgment for the defendant on the claim and also on the counterclaim for £75, being the amount of his commission less the £25 deposit.

DISDISMEIM V. THE LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK (LIMITED).*

Lunatic—Person resident in Belgium—"Administrateur provisoire" in lunacy—Action to obtain securities from English bank.

*Reported by W. HURSEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of North, J. (15 The Times L.R., 457), dismissing the action on the ground that there was no legal finding of insanity, reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice North's, reported 15 The Times L.R., 457. The action, which was in the nature of a common law action for detinue, raised questions of private international law, relating to the right of a person who had been appointed by a Belgian Court "administrateur provisoire" in lunacy to have handed over to him securities deposited with the London and Westminster Bank amounting in value to between £300,000 and £400,000. The action related to property which, by the terms of a marriage contract between the late Benedict Leopold Goldschmidt and his wife, whose maiden name was Marie Woog, was held by husband and wife under the Swiss system of legal community. The documents held by the bank comprised certificates of shares and securities and bonds and scrip to bearer, representing investments in English, colonial, American, and foreign companies and Government securities which had been lodged by M. Goldschmidt in his lifetime. The income was collected by the bank and placed to the credit of a current account M. Goldschmidt kept at the bank. M. and Mme. Goldschmidt were married at Geneva in 1866, M. Goldschmidt being at the time a German merchant resident at Mayence, his wife being Swiss. Subsequently to the marriage they went to Brussels and resided there for some 25 years, down to the death of M. Goldschmidt in 1892. He made a will bequeathing one-fourth of the half of the common property to which he was entitled to his wife and giving her a life interest in another quarter. The other parts became distributable among their four children. Mme. Goldschmidt was appointed administrator of her husband's personal estate in England. She satisfied the shares of her three elder children, but the share of the youngest had not been handed over to him because he was under age. The bulk of the property in the custody of the bank was either left or re-deposited with them. Mme. Goldschmidt became of unsound mind and was placed under the care of a Dr. Hertz at Bonn, in Germany, where she still resided. Under the Belgian law two proceedings can be adopted in the case of a person of unsound mind, by "interdiction" or "administration." The former, it appears, is analogous to a formal finding by a jury in this country of lunacy, which results in the appointment of a committee of the estate of a lunatic; the latter a proceeding in which a mere receiver in lunacy is appointed. The family adopted the latter procedure, and M. Didisheim was appointed "administrateur provisoire" accordingly, his position being apparently similar to that of a receiver in lunacy in this country. The letters of administration of the estate of her husband, which had been granted to Mme. Goldschmidt, were impounded, and administration de bonis non granted to M. Didisheim. The bank considered that M. Didisheim could not give them a valid discharge and refused to part with the securities. This action was brought by M. Didisheim and by Mme. Goldschmidt, suing by him as her next friend. The youngest son—Robert, now of age—of Mme. Goldschmidt, who had not received his share of his father's estate, was made a defendant. Mr. Justice North held upon the authority of "In re Barlow" (36 Ch.D., 287) and "In re Brown" ([1895] 2 Ch., 666) that, as the lady had not been found lunatic by a foreign Court of competent jurisdiction, M. Didisheim could not compel the bank to hand him over the securities in this country. He therefore dismissed the action. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Henry Fellows were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Alfred Fellows was for the defendant Robert Goldschmidt in the same interest; Mr. Henry Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. McSwiney were for the bank.

The appeal was heard last month.

The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the considered judgment of the Court allowing the appeal. He said:—In consequence of the arguments addressed to us we will make a few prefatory observations on actions at law and suits in Chancery by persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition. If before the Judicature Acts an action at law had been brought in the name of such a person to enforce a purely legal demand—say an action on a covenant or an action of assumpsit or of debt detinue or trover, there would have been no defence to the action on the ground that the plaintiff on the record was of unsound mind. No plea in bar or in abatement applicable to such a case is to be found in the books. Such an action might, perhaps, have been stayed on an application showing that the action was an abuse of the process of the Court—i.e., was brought in the plaintiff's name without his authority (see "Waterhouse v. Worsnop," 59 L.T., N.S., 140, which, however, was since the Judicature Act). Such an action could certainly have been stayed by proceedings in lunacy and the appointment of a committee. Unless the action were stayed it would proceed to trial in the ordinary way, and on proof of the plaintiff's case judgment would have been entered for the plaintiff on the record and execution issued accordingly. (See "Dennis v. Dennis," 2 Wms. Saund., §34.) If the plaintiff had sued by attorney payment or delivery to him would have discharged the defendant or sheriff. If the plaintiff had sued in person a difficulty would obviously have arisen. An application to stay execution on payment into Court might, we apprehend, have been successfully made, or the Court could, as in "Gleddon v. Trebble" (9 C.B., N.S., 367), have ordered payment to his next friend, and so the necessity of instituting proceedings in lunacy would be avoided. (See generally 1 Coll. Lunacy, §39, &c.) In Chancery it had long been the settled practice to institute suits in the names of lunatics not so found by inquisition by a next friend. Applications to stay such suits were also frequently made with success. See generally on such suits "Jones v. Lloyd" (L.R., 18 Eq., 265); "Beall v. Smith" (L.R., 9 Ch., 85); "Farnham v. Milward" ([1895] 2 Ch., 730); "In re George Armstrong and Sons" ([1896] 1 Ch., 536). The alleged lunatic could make such application himself if he asserted his sanity, and any one willing to act as next friend could make it in the alleged lunatic's name, as in "Howell v. Lewis" (61 L.J., Ch., 89). Even the defendant might apply. See "Wartnaby v. Wartnaby" (Jac., 377); and "Porter v. Porter" (37 Ch.D., at p. 429), per Lord Justice Cotton. When a lunatic was so found by inquisition the Court of Chancery would stay a suit instituted in his name until the appointment of a committee. See "Hartley v. Gilbert" (13 Sim., 596). We are not aware of any case in which a foreign curator has been held to be an improper next friend of the person whose curator he is. Security for costs from such a next friend might be required if he was resident abroad; but no suit could be stayed simply because the next friend filled an official position in a foreign country. The notion that either at law or in equity an action or suit cannot be successfully maintained, if brought in the name of a lunatic not so found by inquisition without the sanction of the Crown, is not supported by authority or sound principle. If this notion were true, the orders for payment made in "In re Barlow" (36 Ch.D., 287) and other cases, which will be referred to presently, would have been clearly wrong. Such orders were not made in lunacy, but by the Court of Chancery, which had no lunacy jurisdiction. It is well settled that until the Crown interferes, or at all events until its interference is invoked by a petition for an inquisition or by an application for the appointment of a receiver, the prerogative of the Crown has no practical legal effect. In other words, no person can avail himself of that prerogative without taking the proper steps to induce the Crown to exercise it. This point was examined by this Court last summer, when Seager Hunt's case was before it. In the present case no lunacy proceedings have been taken in this country; nor was any attempt made to stay the action. Having made these preliminary remarks we pass to the question more immediately before the Court. This action is by M. Didisheim and by Mme. Goldschmidt, by him as her next friend. The object is to obtain a large sum of cash and also share stock and debenture certificates of great value from the defendants. The defendants are quite ready to pay and deliver them up provided they can safely do so. The bulk of the property sought to be recovered formed part of the assets of M. Goldschmidt, a deceased gentleman, domiciled and resident in Belgium. He died some time ago, and his widow, the plaintiff, Mme. Goldschmidt, obtained letters of administration with his will annexed. By her directions most of the property in the hands of the defendants has been placed in their books in her name. She is domiciled in Belgium and is resident abroad. She has become insane and is in a foreign lunatic asylum. M. Didisheim has been duly appointed her "administrateur provisoire," with power to collect and get in all her personal estate. He is also now the legal personal representative of M. Goldschmidt, having obtained letters of administration to his personal assets left unadministered by Mme. Goldschmidt. He and she together, therefore, are clearly entitled to all the property sought to be obtained from the defendants. They do not deny M. Didisheim's right as administrator to such assets of the deceased as have not become Mme. Goldschmidt's property; but they say that owing to what she did when some all his assets in their hands became hers, and they are now accountable to her alone for them. As to the cash and certificates, which are the property of Mme. Goldschmidt, the defendants say they cannot safely hand them over to M. Didisheim, as the ownership of them is still vested in her and has not been legally vested in M. Didisheim. Mr. Justice North has held that unless an order is made in lunacy requiring or authorising the defendants to deliver the property of Mme. Goldschmidt to M. Didisheim they cannot safely deliver such property to him. The relations and friends of Mme. Goldschmidt are particularly desirous of avoiding any formal adjudication of lunacy, and this appeal has been brought on purpose to avoid the necessity of such an adjudication. The demand of the plaintiffs, it will be observed, is a purely legal title; there is no trust in the case. Under the old practice one action could not have been maintained to enforce a claim by M. Didisheim as administrator and also a claim by Mme. Goldschmidt to recover her own property. Two separate actions of detinue or trover would have been necessary. Our modern practice, however, is less rigid, and the defendants have raised no objection to the two claims being joined in one action. The Court, therefore, can properly entertain the action and decide the real question raised by the defendants, which is whether in an action brought by M. Didisheim in his own name and in the name of Mme. Goldschmidt and as her next friend the High Court ought to make an order for the delivery to him of her property. The question may be put in another way, whether he is entitled in an action so framed to demand delivery of her property to him. We are of opinion that he is. In "Scott v. Bentley"

(1 K. and J., 281) a person resident in Scotland was entitled to an annuity charged on land in England and secured by a covenant entered into with himself. The annuitant became lunatic, and a curator bonis was appointed according to Scotch law. Whether he was judicially declared a lunatic does not distinctly appear. Nor does it appear that the ownership of his personal property was by Scotch law divested from him and vested in his curator. We rather infer that the curator merely had power to collect it and get it in. The annuity being in arrear the curator brought a suit in Chancery in his own name against the executrix and devisee in trust of the grantor of the annuity for payment of the arrears and for payment of the annuity in future. It is to be observed that the demand of the plaintiff was a purely legal demand. He sought to enforce the legal right of the annuitant under the covenant and grant. But the arrears seem to have been set apart as a trust fund, and this was held enough to give the Court of Chancery jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The Vice-Chancellor Wood made an order as prayed by the bill. This decision has been much questioned; but unless it be that the suit ought in strictness to have been in the name of the lunatic by his curator as next friend we see no ground for doubting the correctness of the decision. "Scott v. Bentley" has been questioned mainly because it proceeded to some extent on the supposed authority of a decision in the House of Lords on an appeal from Scotland ("In re Morison's Lunacy"). This case appears to have been to some extent misunderstood. The Vice-Chancellor refers to it as an unreported case cited in "Johnstone v. Beattie" (10 Cl. and Fin., 42) and in "Sill v. Worswick" (1 H. Bl. 677-8). In "Johnstone v. Beattie" (see 10 Cl. and Fin., p. 97) Lord Brougham refers to "Morison's case" as cited in the note to "Sill v. Worswick," and as an authority for the proposition that the legally appointed curator in one country was held entitled to act in another. This it is plain was also Vice-Chancellor Wood's view of "Morison's case," as is apparent from his remark on page 285 that in "Morison's case" the curator sued alone. But the reports of that case to which we have referred in 1 Paton, 454, and Mor. 4,595, show that the decision of the House of Lords in "Morison's case" did not go that length, and Lord Campbell was not satisfied that it did. (See 10 Cl. and Fin., 133.) We understand the decision as showing that a committee appointed in England of a Scotchman resident in England could not sue in Scotland simply in his own name and as committee for the recovery of the lunatic's personal estate; but that such committee could sue there in the name of the lunatic for the recovery of the lunatic's personal estate. "Morison's case," therefore, did not go so far as Vice-Chancellor Wood thought, but it goes a long way to show that the proceedings in this action are properly framed; for this action is brought, not only by M. Didisheim in his double capacity of administrator of Mme. Goldschmidt and curator of Mme. Goldschmidt, but also by her in her own name suing by M. Didisheim as her next friend. In "Scott v. Bentley" Vice-Chancellor Wood did not by any means base his judgment only on the supposed decision in "In re Morison," and after making every allowance for his misapprehension of that case, "Scott v. Bentley" was, in our opinion, well decided, although we cannot help thinking that if Vice-Chancellor Wood had known the form of the order made in "Morison's case" he would have directed the bill to be amended by making it in form a bill by the lunatic by his curator and next friend. In "Avilon v. Furnival" (1 C. M. and R., 277) Baron Parke, page 286, expressed a clear opinion to the effect that a foreign curator could sue here in his own name for goods and chattels of a person of unsound mind. "Scott v. Bentley" is consistent and is really supported by several other cases cited by Mr. Haldane, and of which "In re Tarratt" (51 L.T., N.S., 310); "In re de Linden" ([1897] 1 Ch., 453); and "Thiery v. Chalmers" ([1900] 1 Ch., 80) are the most recent and important. In "In re de Linden" an application was made on behalf of a Bavarian lunatic lady for payment out to two foreign gentlemen of some money in Court belonging to her. The application was by her in her own name by her next friend, who was a Bavarian Judge and one of two persons appointed by a Bavarian Court to take charge of her and her property. The order was made as asked—i.e., for payment, not to her, but to the two persons appointed as above mentioned. The lady had been judicially declared lunatic, but there was no judicial vesting of her property in the curators. "Thiery v. Chalmers" ([1900] 1 Ch., 80) was a similar case. The lunatic there was a French subject declared lunatic in France and whose property was placed under the care of a duly-appointed tuteur. An action was brought in this country by the lunatic by a next friend and by the tuteur as a co-plaintiff to recover money and securities in the hands of the lunatic's bankers. An order was made for the delivery of them to the tuteur. Mr. Justice Kekewich thought that the tuteur might have sued alone in his own name. He regarded the decision in "In re Brown" ([1895] 2 Ch., 666) as an authority for so holding, inasmuch as both in "In re Brown" and in "Thiery v. Chalmers" the lunatic had been formally so declared by the foreign Court. But "In re Brown" was not an action; it was an application to the Court in Lunacy under section 134 of the Lunacy Act, and we doubt whether the action of "Thiery v. Chalmers" would have been rightly framed if brought by the tuteur as sole plaintiff. An alteration in the status of a lunatic appears to be necessary in order to enable the Court in Lunacy to exercise the jurisdiction conferred upon it by section 134 of the Lunacy Regulation Act; but it by no means follows that persons whose status has not been altered by their being judicially declared lunatic cannot sue by themselves by a next friend for the recovery of their own property. "In re Knight" ([1898] 1 Ch., 257) turned on the discretion which the Court had under section 134 of the Lunacy Regulation Act, and throws no real light on this case. The only difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs is occasioned by "In re Barlow" (36 Ch.D., 287). In that case a colonial statute vested in a master in lunacy the care and custody of the property of lunatic patients—i.e., of persons confined in lunatic asylums but not judicially declared lunatic. A colonial lady, confined in a lunatic asylum in the colony, was entitled to some funds in the hands of trustees in this country, and the colonial Master in Lunacy claimed these funds. The trustees paid them into Court under the Trustee Relief Act. The colonial master and the lady by her next friend presented a petition for the transfer of the funds in Court to the colonial Master in Lunacy. The Court made an order for the payment out of capital of some past maintenance and for the payment of the income to the master whilst the lady continued in an asylum. But the Court would not order the rest of the corpus to be paid over to the master. It is to be observed that the general statutory authority given by the colonial Act to the master as an officer of the colonial Court was not supplemented by any order giving the master any express authority as the lunatic's attorney to get in any property not locally within the jurisdiction of the Court; and as we understand Lord Justice Cotton's judgment he was much influenced by the omission of any such order. If the master's authority derived from the colonial statute was unsatisfactory, it is obvious that such authority was not improved by his assumption of the right to use the lunatic's name. In that view of the case the fact that the lunatic petitioned in her own name by her next friend did not remove the difficulty. Having decided that the Master was not entitled as a matter of right to demand payment to himself, it became necessary for the Court, acting as trustees, to consider what it was the duty of trustees to do in such a case as that before them, and they considered that in such a case the trustees ought not to part with the trust fund without seeing to its application, and ought not to part with the fund to the Master further than they were satisfied that the interests of the lunatic rendered it necessary to do so. This was the view taken in "In re Garnier" (13 Eq., 532), where, however, the lunatic was a domiciled Englishman, and we see no reason to dissent from it where the authority of the foreign curator to get in the trust property is regarded by the Court as unsatisfactory. But where it is not the considerations which weighed with the Court in "In re Barlow" do not arise. A person absolutely entitled to trust money is entitled to have it paid to him or to any one duly appointed by him to receive it, and the trustees or the Court acting for them have no discretion to refuse payment. The same principle is, in our opinion, applicable to the case in which trust money belongs to a lunatic and a person is duly appointed by a competent authority to get in such money for the lunatic. If the title of the lunatic is clear, and the authority to act for him is equally clear, we fail to see what discretion the Court, acting for the trustees, has in the matter. The trustees may properly say that they cannot safely act without the sanction of the Court, but we fail to see what other discretion there is. Where the lunacy jurisdiction is being exercised, as it was in "In re Stark" (2 Mac. and G., 174), other considerations at once arise. If, as in "In re Garnier," the lunatic were an Englishman temporarily abroad, we should feel considerable difficulty in holding that the Courts of this country were bound to recognize the title of a foreign curator to sue in this country. But here we are dealing with an alien domiciled abroad and over whom the Courts of this country have no jurisdiction except such as is conferred by the fact that she has property here. All that the Court here has to do is to see that the person claiming it is entitled to have it. In this case the order of the Belgian Court of November 5, 1899, removes all doubt as to M. Didisheim's authority to take these proceedings and to obtain and give a good discharge for the property which he seeks to recover. On general principles of private international law, the Courts of this country are bound to recognize the authority conferred on him by the Belgian Courts, unless lunacy proceedings in this country prevent them from doing so. What ought to be done in lunacy has not to be considered, and we say nothing on that subject. In our opinion, the appeal should be allowed, and an order be made as asked by the claim. But the plaintiffs must pay all the costs; for the bank was perfectly justified in not complying with M. Didisheim's demands without an order of the High Court—i.e., without proving his title in such a way as to make it unreasonable for the bank to refuse to recognize it. Under the old practice an action of detinue or trover might have failed; for under the general issue the defendants could have given in evidence facts excusing delivery to a person rightfully entitled, but whose title was not such as the defendants could safely recognize. (See per Justice Blackburn in "Hollins v. Fowler," L.R., 7 H.L., 766, and the cases there cited.) But in practice if in such a case the plaintiff proved his title to the satisfaction of the Court and paid the defendant's costs, the plaintiff always obtained delivery. Under the modern practice, if this case had been tried by a jury there would be no difficulty, we apprehend, in ordering delivery to M. Didisheim, and in a proper case like this giving the defendants the costs of the action—i.e., there would be good cause for making the plaintiffs pay the costs, although they succeeded in establishing their title. (See “Gleddon v. Treble,” 9 C.B., N.S., 367.) If the action were tried without a jury, whether in the Chancery Division, as this was, or in the Queen’s Bench Division, the costs would be in the discretion of the Judge, and there would be no difficulty in ordering them to pay the costs. However tried, any other result would be very unjust. Mr. Terrell suggested that the order of the Court would not protect the bank if the lunatic were to recover and were to sue the bank for her money and property after the bank had paid and delivered it to M. Didisheim. We do not entertain any misgiving on this point. The High Court clearly had jurisdiction to entertain the action and to decide the questions raised in it and to make the order which this Court now declares it ought to have made; and this Court clearly has jurisdiction to entertain this appeal. This being clear, and the Belgian Court having had jurisdiction to make the order which it made, the bank would unquestionably have a perfectly good defence to any action which the lunatic could bring against it, either by another next friend or by another official curator, or by herself if she should recover.

THE BUXTON LIME FIRMS CO. (LIMITED) V.

Master and Servant—Disputes between employers and workmen—Truck Act, 1896—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.

This was a special case stated by justices of the peace of the Bakewell division of the county of Derby. The following facts were set out in the case:—On January 2, 1899, the respondent, James Howe, entered into the service of the appellants, and was employed by them under an agreement of that date signed by him, and by William Brierley on behalf of the company. By the terms of the agreement the respondent agreed to serve the company exclusively for 12 calendar months from January 1, 1899, until December 31, in the work of getting limestone and breaking it to the required size. The agreement contained a clause which said that the workman should be “subject to a fine, or penalty, or drawback of 2s. 6d. for each and every working day on which he was absent without leave, except in case of sickness.” The company agreed to pay the workman, on the usual fortnightly pay days, the sum of 7½d. for every 2,240lb. of limestone got and properly loaded into the company’s wagons, and the agreement concluded “in the event of the breach of any of the conditions of this agreement on the part of the workman then, and in every such case, it shall be lawful for the company to dismiss the workman without any notice or without being liable to make any payment by way of damages or otherwise for dismissal without notice, but all wages earned shall be paid up to the time of such dismissal, less any amount then due for fines, penalties, or drawbacks for absence as aforesaid, should the company insist thereon.” A notice setting out the terms of the contract as to absence without leave and the penalties therefor, was posted up in the cabin where the respondent had his meals. On September 13, 1899, the respondent applied for leave of absence from his work on the 14th, 15th, and 16th of September, and leave was granted for the first and refused for the other two days. On hearing that leave on the 15th and 16th was refused, the respondent said he should take French leave, and he absented himself without permission on the days in question. By reason of his absence the company sustained a greater loss than 2s. 6d. for each day he was absent. The respondent after this continued in the employment of the appellants, and received wages from them, but no demand was made upon him for any penalties under the agreement for absenting himself from his employment, or for damages consequent thereon, until he received the particulars of claim attached to the summons to appear before the magistrates. The company preferred their claim under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, and claimed 5s. as a fine or penalty, or alternatively by way of damages, from the respondent for having absented himself from his work on the 15th and 16th of September, 1899, being at the rate of 2s. 6d. a day. It was contended on behalf of the respondent before the magistrates that the agreement brought the case within the Truck Act, 1896. That Act provided, under section 1, subsection 2, clause (b), that the giving of particulars in writing was to be a condition precedent to the levying of a fine or penalty such as was claimed—that the appellants had their remedy for the respondent’s misconduct in their own hands by deducting the penalties from his wages as provided by the agreement; and that their only remedy was by so deducting the amount claimed after complying with the requirements of the Truck Act. For the appellants it was argued that the case was not governed by the Truck Act, but that if it were the service of the claim in the form of particulars attached to the justices’ summons was sufficient notice under the Act, and that the deduction from the respondent’s wages was not obligatory. The justices held that the appellants by their agreement with the respondent had the remedy for the offence in their own hands, and that their proper course was to have deducted the penalty from the next payment of wages as they had done in similar cases; that the agreement came within the Truck Act and that the proceedings to recover a penalty under it could only be brought after a strict compliance with the terms of that Act; that, in their opinion, section 1, subsection 2 (b), of the Truck Act, 1896, had not been complied with, and that the particulars of claim attached to the summons was not a compliance with the Act, and they, therefore, dismissed the summons. The question for the Court was whether the justices were right in dismissing the summons on those grounds; if they were wrong their order was to be quashed and the case was to be remitted to them.

Mr. Hextall appeared for the appellants; and Mr. H. Jacobs for the respondent.

The COURT reversed the decision of the justices.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in giving judgment, said he thought the justices were wrong in their decision. It was necessary to bear in mind the legislation on this matter. The Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, gave to a Court of summary jurisdiction the power to determine disputes between employers and workmen, and under that Act a summons was taken out in the present case. The Truck Act, 1896, contained certain provisions with regard to contracts made between employers and workmen which contained agreements under which deductions were to be made in the sum contracted to be paid as wages. That Act said that such contracts should not be made unless certain forms were complied with; the terms of the contract must be contained in a notice to be put in some place open to the workmen, and there were other conditions which had been complied with in the present case. The second subsection of the first section said that the employer was not to make any deductions unless they were made in accordance with the contract and unless particulars in writing were given to the workman. He thought that the justices had gone wrong in this way; they had supposed that because the Truck Act contained these provisions it ousted the jurisdiction of the magistrates to determine disputes between employers and workmen in all cases where the contract in question fell within the Truck Act. In other words that employers and workmen must make use of it in all contracts which provide for a deduction in wages, and if they did not comply with the provisions of the Truck Act the employers were without a remedy and could make no deduction. In order to read the Act in that way the word "receive" must have a wider construction than it bore in the subsection. It was never intended that the power given to the justices under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, should be interfered with in any way. If that had been intended they would have found provisions to that effect in the Truck Act, 1896. He was of opinion that the justices were wrong in finding as a fact that the agreement in the present case came within the Truck Act. It might be that the agreement came within the Act, but it did not follow that the proceedings to recover the penalty could be only taken when the contract complied with the requirements of the Act. The magistrates then went on to find that under section 1, subsection 2 (b), particulars had not been delivered, and, therefore, the claim could not be maintained. He thought that was an erroneous conclusion. It had been argued that damages could not be recovered because penalties were provided for in the agreement. He doubted if that was the proper construction of it, but he did not wish to make that a part of his decision. He thought the matter must be sent back to the magistrates for them to determine it under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.

MR. JUSTICE DABLING said he was of the same opinion. The case arose in this way. Section 1 of the Truck Act, 1896, said that no contract between an employer and a workman should be made except in accordance with the requirements of the Act. Here the employer and the workman entered into a contract for the payment of a fine or penalty, or for the making of a deduction, and therefore that contract would be bad in law if it did not comply with the provisions of the Truck Act, 1896. The workman did something which would have entitled the employer to subject him to a deduction, penalty, or drawback; the employer could have deducted half-a-crown from the wages of the workman because the contract into which they entered provided for that being done. The workman absented himself without leave, and thereupon the employer took out a summons, on which he proceeded before the magistrates, by virtue of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, to recover 5s., as a fine or penalty, or, alternatively, by way of damages for such abstinence. It had been argued that because that was a penalty under the Truck Act, it could not be recovered before the magistrates by means of that summons. What the Truck Act provided was that they shall not make a contract unless certain terms are complied with and those terms were complied with in the present case, so the contract was good. Section 1, subsection (2) of the Act said "that an employer shall not make any such deduction"—he did not here make any deduction so that does not apply—"or receive any such payment." It was argued that if he proceeded before the magistrates and got judgment in his favour and received the proceeds he was receiving a payment and must comply with subsection 2 of section 1, which prevented him from recovering "unless particulars in writing . . . are supplied to the workman." That argument was of no use to the appellants. The statute provided that the particulars are to be given when the payment is made, and therefore it would be sufficient if the particulars were given after the justices had given their decision awarding the sum claimed. It seemed to him that the magistrates were wrong on that ground. He would not say, also, that the master might not recover if he sued at law. The workman might have stayed away upon a day when the master owed him nothing and so would have no opportunity of deducting anything. He should be sorry to say that he could not sue on the contract for the penalty agreed on in the contract. But however that might be it would not conclude this case, because this was a summons to recover unliquidated damages, and it was said that because a penalty was agreed upon, unless proceedings were taken to recover the penalty, no right to recover damages remained. He could not accede to that. The Truck Act did not deal with damages, and he could not see that either by means of the Truck Act or the contract the master had given up his right to sue for any damages he might have sustained by reason of the workman having failed to do what he ought to have done. It seemed to him that the justices were misled by not understanding that the Truck Act applied to the making of a good contract, and he thought that if the parties had tried to make a contract and had made a bad one neither would have given up his rights under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.

BARNETT V. CORPORATION OF ECCLES.*

Local Government—Public health—Sanitary works—Damage sustained by reason of exercise of powers of Public Health Act, 1875—"Full compensation," what is—Costs.

This was an argument on a special case stated by an arbitrator acting under section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and raised the question whether the "full compensation" to which a person is entitled who is damaged by the exercise of the powers of the Act includes costs reasonably incurred as between solicitor and client in defending himself before the justices and appealing to quarter sessions upon a charge made against him by the local authority. The special case stated the following facts:—William Barnett was the owner of certain cottages in Ellesmere-street, in the borough of Eccles, the sanitary arrangements in which constituted a nuisance, for which it was alleged that Mr. Barnett was liable. Accordingly the Corporation of Eccles, under section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, caused a notice, dated May 6, 1897, to be served on Mr. Barnett requiring him to abate the nuisance and for that purpose to execute certain works. This notice not being complied with, a complaint was laid by the corporation under section 95 of the Public Health Act, alleging that the nuisance was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of Mr. Barnett. The complaint was heard and determined by a Court of summary jurisdiction in October, 1897, at which Mr. Barnett called several witnesses, and an order was made requiring him to comply with the requisitions of the notice of May 6, 1897. Nothing was said as to costs on that hearing. William Barnett appealed to quarter sessions, and in

* Reported by W. HUSKEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

January, 1898, the appeal was heard and dismissed, subject to a case stated for the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division, with the result that the order of the quarter sessions dismissing the appeal was quashed and judgment was entered for Mr. Barnett. The order of the justices was also quashed, and it was further ordered that the corporation should pay the costs of the appeal and (though this did not appear on the special case) the costs of the proceedings before the petty sessions, such costs to be taxed by the Master of the Crown Office, the Court at the same time holding that the nuisance arose from the default of the corporation themselves, and that there had been no default on the part of Mr. Barnett. The costs of the appeals to the Queen's Bench Division and to the quarter sessions were taxed at £62 5s. 6d. and £83 8s. 5d. respectively and paid to Mr. Barnett. The costs of defending himself before the justices in petty sessions were not paid. His actual expenses reasonably and properly incurred exceeded the costs which had been paid by £160 18s. By section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a person who is not in default is entitled to full compensation for any damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act. Clause 32 of the case was in these terms:—"If the Court should be of opinion that full compensation only includes the costs as taxed between party and party, and does not include the costs incurred by the said William Barnett in defending himself before the said justices, then I award that there is nothing due to the said William Barnett from the corporation." If otherwise, the arbitrator awarded the sum of £160 18s.

Mr. DANCKWERTS, Q.C., now moved, on behalf of the corporation, that judgment might be entered according to Clause 32 of the special case set out above, contending that only the fact of damage and the amount of compensation were within the jurisdiction of the arbitrator. He cited "Brierley-hill Local Board v. Pearsall" (9 App. Cas., 595), "Bater v. Mayor of Birkenhead" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 679; in the Court of Appeal [1893], 2 Q.B., 77). He argued that the law took no account of any expenses beyond taxed costs—"Purton v. Honnor" (1 B. and P., 205), "Grace v. Morgan" (2 Bing., N.C., 534), "Malden v. Fyson" (11 Q.B., 292), "Quartz-hill Company v. Eyre" (11 Q.B.D., 674)—and that the justices in petty sessions, having made no order as to costs, no further costs could be recovered. He also cited the Judicature Act, 1894, section 2, subsection 2; the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, section 31, subsection 5; "Cockburn v. Edwards" (18 Ch.D., 449), "In re Arbitration between Davies and Rhonda District Council" (80 L.T., 696), "Walshaw v. Brighthouse Corporation" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 286).

Mr. MARSHALL, Q.C., and Mr. CLARKE HALL, for Mr. Barnett, cited "Mayne on Damages" (Sixth Ed., 1899, pp. 88 and 90), "Andrews v. Barnes" (39 Ch.D., 133), "Slaughter v. Mayor of Sunderland" (55 J.P., 519), and contended that the expression "full compensation" meant something more than mere legal damage.

Mr. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that Mr. Barnett was not entitled to more than his taxed costs of the proceedings before the petty sessions, quarter sessions, and the Divisional Court. The law did not contemplate as a head of damage the difference between the sum awarded by law and that larger sum which in practice every litigant has to pay. Section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875, in his opinion made no difference. The case of "Bater v. Mayor of Birkenhead" was distinguishable, for there the plaintiff could not have recovered the cost of appearing before the justice under any order. He only recovered the sum claimed as the reasonable expenses to which he had been put through the act of the local authority. In "Walshaw v. Brighthouse Corporation" the justices had not been asked to adjudicate on the costs at all. Judgment must be entered in the terms of Clause 32 of the special case.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE concurred.

HAWKINS.*

Bill of Exchange—Promissory note—Joint note —Surety—Notice to creditor—Subsequent advances—Indemnity to surety.

This was an action brought by the Leicestershire Banking Company (Limited) against Mr. E. Hawkins, of Cheslyn-hall, near Walsall, to recover £452 18s., for principal and interest due on a joint and several promissory note, dated June 15, 1898, made by the defendant and one Lowe for the sum of £450, payable to the plaintiffs on demand, together with interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, from January 1 to February 16, 1900.

Mr. M. M. Macnaghten appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. E. H. Pollard for the defendant.

It appeared that in September, 1897, Mr. S. Lowe, the defendant's son-in-law, deposited with the plaintiffs the deeds of two houses by way of security for an overdraft of £200, and on October 19, 1897, signed the following memorandum of deposit:—

"To the Leicestershire Banking Company (Limited).
"I the undersigned, Sam Lowe, of 206, Station-street, Burton-on-Trent, in the county of Stafford, accountant, agree with the Leicestershire Banking Company (Limited) (hereinafter referred to as the said company), that I, my heirs, executors, or administrators, will, on demand, pay to the said company, their successors or assigns, all and every sum and sums of money now due or hereafter to become due from me, either solely or jointly with any other person or persons to the said company, their successors or assigns, either upon banking account or any other account, or in any manner whatsoever, including interest, commission, and all usual banking charges, in relation to discount and otherwise. And I further agree that the deeds and writings deposited by me with the said company and the property shortly referred to in the schedule hereto and other the property, if any, to which such deeds and writings relate shall be a security for and charged with the payment to the said company, their successors and assigns of all money hereby agreed to be paid. And I further agree that I, or my heirs, and all other necessary parties, if any, will, whenever thereunto required by or on behalf of the said company, their successors, or assigns, effectually assure the property hereinbefore referred to free from all charges and incumbrances unto the said company, their successors, or assigns by way of mortgage for securing payment of all money hereby agreed to be paid, and that in any such mortgage there shall be contained all usual clauses and covenants, including a covenant for payment and a power of sale. And I further agree that during the continuance of this security I, my heirs, executors, or administrators will keep insured, or cause to be kept insured, the buildings for the time being in and upon the said property from loss or damage by fire to the satisfaction of the said company, their successors, or assigns, and that on request the policies and receipts for the premiums shall be delivered to the said company, their successors, or assigns. And I further agree that I, my heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns shall not, without the previous consent in writing of the said company, their successors, or assigns, be entitled to exercise any power conferred on mortgagors by the 18th section of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. And, lastly, I agree that, notwithstanding this security, I and every person who is or may become liable for any money hereby secured shall remain liable for the same as if this security had not been given, and this security shall be only a collateral security and in addition and without prejudice to any other security or securities now or hereafter to be held by the said company, their successors, or assigns for any money hereby secured, and shall be a continuing security to the said company, their successors, and assigns, notwithstanding any settlement of account or other matter or thing whatsoever. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand the 19th day of October, 1897."

The schedule contained a short description of the two houses. On April 29, 1898, the first advance was cancelled, and Lowe obtained an advance of £900 on the deeds deposited in September, 1897, and on the deeds of two other houses. On August 5, 1898, he signed a similar memorandum of deposit in respect of these two houses. On June 15 Lowe obtained a further advance of £450 from the plaintiffs, and he and the defendant signed the promissory note now sued upon. At the time he signed the note the defendant was not aware of the previous securities given by Lowe to the plaintiffs. As between the plaintiffs and defendant, there was no contract of suretyship; but as between Lowe and the defendant, the defendant signed the note merely as surety, and the plaintiffs' manager had notice of that fact. In April, 1899, the plaintiffs made further advances to Lowe to the extent of £500 against the security already in their hands. Lowe subsequently became insolvent. The defendant did not dispute his liability upon the note, but contended that the further advances made by the plaintiffs after the date of the promissory note ought not to be repaid until he had been recouped the amount of the promissory note, and he claimed that on payment by him of the £450 and interest the plaintiffs should assign to him the securities held by them until he obtained repayment thereof of the amount so paid by him.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, said that the question of principle upon which he had to give his decision was whether the defendant had priority over the bank in respect of the subsequent advances made by them. It was agreed that there was no contract of suretyship between the plaintiffs and the defendant. But it was argued upon behalf of the defendant that no contract of suretyship was necessary. It was said that an equity arose from the plaintiffs' manager having notice that, as between the defendant and Lowe, Lowe was primarily responsible. It was said that that notice was sufficient to give rise to the defendant's claim, and "Pooley v. Harradine" (7 E. and B., 431), and "Davies v. Stainbank" (6 De G. M. and G., 679) were relied on. It was clear from "Forbes v. Jackson" (19 Ch.D., 615) that the obligation of the creditor was the same whether the surety knew of the existence of a security at the time he entered into the contract of suretyship or not. The surety was entitled to the benefit of any security existing at the time of the contract of suretyship or subsequently given, and the defendant had, therefore, priority over the advances the plaintiffs subsequently made to Lowe.

CANNAN V. EARL OF ABINGDON.*

Tolls—Bridge—Carriage with less than four wheels—Bicycle.

This was a special case stated for the opinion of the Court. The plaintiff was Mr. Edwin Cannan, who is a representative of the University of Oxford on the City Council and also a member of the committee of the Cyclists' Touring Club, and the defendant was the Earl of Abingdon. The special case stated that in pursuance of an Act passed in the 7th year of the reign of George III., intitled "An Act for building a bridge across the river Thames from Swynford, in the county of Berks, to Eynsham, in the county of Oxford," the Right Hon. Willoughby, Earl of Abingdon, the defendant's predecessor in title, erected the bridge known as Swainford bridge in the highway leading from Oxford to Cheltenham, in lieu of an ancient ferry across the river, of which he was the owner and proprietor. Amongst other things it was enacted that in consideration of the expense entailed upon the Earl of Abingdon and his successors in connexion with the building, repairing, and supporting the bridge, and also of the loss sustained owing to the ceasing of the tolls of the ferry, it should be lawful for the Earl of Abingdon and his successors at all times thereafter "to erect a gate or gates, turnpike or turnpikes, and also a toll-house or toll-houses at, near, or upon the said bridge, and there to ask, demand, receive, recover, and take, to and for his and their own proper use and behoof, in respect of his and their charges as aforesaid, before any passage over the said bridge shall be permitted, the several sums following, that is to say:—

"For every coach, chariot, berlin hearse, chaise, chair, calash, wagon, wain, dray, cart, car, or other carriage whatsoever, with four wheels, the sum of fourpence, and with less than four wheels the sum of twopence. . . ."

"For every foot passenger whatsoever the sum of one halfpenny."

There were also tolls of different amounts levied upon various kinds of animals, and a provision that no toll should be taken for the driver of any coach, cart, or other carriage drawn by horses or other cattle or for any person or persons riding in and bona fide belonging to the same, or for any one person riding upon a horse or other animal, with a proviso that if more than one person were riding on the same animal one person should be excused from the toll, and every person not bona fide belonging to a coach, cart, &c., should pay the same tolls as if they were passing on foot. The plaintiff, acting in the interests of the Cyclists' Touring Club, in December, 1898, on various occasions passed over a portion of the road and over the bridge in the following circumstances:—On the first occasion he rode a bicycle without any luggage or luggage-carrier; on the second occasion he rode a bicycle with a valise attached carrying luggage; on the third occasion he rode a tricycle without any luggage-carrier; on the fourth he rode a tradesman's tricycle having a box fitted to its frame for carrying goods; and on the fifth occasion he rode a tricycle known as a "bath-chair" tricycle having a wicker chair fitted to its frame in which another person was seated. On each occasion the defendant, by his servant the keeper of the toll-gate, refused to allow the plaintiff to pass over the bridge without paying a toll of twopence, and the plaintiff accordingly paid under protest. The plaintiff contended that the Act did not authorize the defendant to charge him any toll on the first three occasions mentioned, or alternatively that he should only have been charged one halfpenny, and that on the fourth and fifth occasions he should have been charged nothing, or alternatively only a halfpenny on the fourth and a penny on the fifth. The defendant contended that all the bicycles and tricycles were "chairs, cars, or carriages" within the meaning of the Act and were liable to the toll of two-pence. The questions for the opinion of the Court were what tolls, if any, was the defendant entitled to charge the plaintiff by virtue of the Act when riding over the bridge in the various ways stated above.

Mr. A. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. A. Glen appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. A. Shaw for the defendant.

Mr. GLEN, for the plaintiff, contended that under the Act it was not intended that everybody who went across the bridge should have to pay. For instance, the Act only applied to carriages with wheels, and consequently a sledge could pass without paying. All kinds of animals were also omitted from the list given. The case of a bicycle would be a casus omissus. If the plaintiff was riding a bicycle he did not come within the Act at all. If he came within the Act, then he ought only to be charged as a foot passenger.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM.—If it was down hill to the bridge, he might come with his feet in the air.

Mr. GLEN said that a foot passenger might jump and have his feet in the air. There were three cases on the question of tolls on carriages and as to what was a carriage for the purpose of paying tolls. All of these cases, including one with regard to a bicycle, had been decided on the ejusdem generis principle with the other vehicles mentioned in the list of tolls. In "Taylor v. Goodwin" (4 Q.B.D., 228) which was a case as to furious driving under the Highways Act, the Court held that a bicycle was a carriage, for the reason that it came within the mischief aimed at by the Act. "Williams v. Ellis" (5 Q.B.D., 175) decided that a bicycle was not a carriage within the words of the particular Toll Act involved in the case. The case also decided that in ascertaining whether a particular structure is a carriage you must look at the other carriages specified and see whether the one in question is ejusdem generis.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that "Williams v. Ellis" was no authority to prevent them from saying that the passenger in the present case was a foot passenger. All it laid down was that a bicycle was not a carriage within the meaning of the particular Act with which the Court was dealing.

On being asked for a definition of a foot passenger by his LORDSHIP, Mr. GLEN said that if the plaintiff was to come within the Act at all he should suggest that he was a foot passenger because he worked himself along the roads with his feet. After the two decisions which he had quoted had been given by the Court the Local Government Act, 1888, was passed, and section 85 of that Act, after repealing all power to make by-laws with reference to bicycles, tricycles, velocipedes, and other similar machines, declared that such machines should be carriages within the meaning of the Highway Acts. The Act undid the decision of "Williams v. Ellis," but it was careful not to make these machines carriages for purposes except under those Acts. The case of "Hatton v. Treby" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 452), which had to do with a bicycle, showed that the provision in the Local Government Act was a limited one.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM.—What is the case of a man on roller skates? Is he to pay toll for two four-wheeled carriages?

Mr. GLEN submitted that it would be absurd if he was to pay the same toll as two large wagons.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM.—I should say that a man on roller skates was a foot passenger with a particular kind of shoes, and I think that if the road was frozen over and a man skated on it, he would be a foot passenger. I think it would be better for you to argue that the plaintiff is a foot passenger than that he ought to go without paying at all.

After some further argument, Mr. GLEN submitted that bicycles did not come within the Act, or that if they did the plaintiff on the first three occasions ought to have been treated as a foot passenger.

Mr. SHAW, for the defendant, contended that nothing was intended to go across the bridge without paying toll. That had been held by the House of Lords in a similar case. Apart from the authorities, he submitted that the words in the present Tolls Act, "or other carriage whatsoever," were intended to include everything which by its function was a carriage. Where weight was borne upon wheels there was a carriage. By the Act, first of all carriages were taxed, then the horse drawing the vehicle, then foot passengers, then beasts. These were the only things which would pass over this country bridge, but they had taken the precaution to put in a clause including other vehicles. A bicycle was a carriage, whether it had a valise or not, because the person riding it was borne by the wheels in a way entirely different from if he was on his feet.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said there was a provision in the Act that when two people rode on one horse only one should pay toll, but he did not see why in the case of a double bicycle the young lady sitting behind should not pay; it could not be said that she "belonged to the same" within the meaning of the Act, though she might belong to the young man in front.

Mr. SHAW, continuing, said that a foot passenger was a person whose weight was borne on his own feet.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he should think that a man on a bicycle bore the whole weight of the bicycle on his feet, because he propelled it with his feet.

Without hearing further argument their Lordships gave judgment for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he thought the machines in question were carriages with less than four wheels within the meaning of the Act, and they were therefore liable to pay a toll of 2d. The framers of the Act possibly never contemplated the invention of any such things as bicycles; but the Legislature had, he thought, used words which would cover such things which had only come into existence since the Act had been passed. A bicycle was a thing that "carried"; it might carry a man as a horse or carriage did, or it might carry goods as a tradesman's tricycle did, and it must, therefore, pay toll as a carriage.*

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE said he was of the same opinion. He thought that in the case before them a bicycle was a vehicle or carriage. Any mechanical contrivance which carried people or weights over the ground, raising the weights, or taking the person off his feet, so that the feet of the person did not support him or the burden he might be bearing, was, he thought, a carriage, and he did not think it mattered that the person himself provided the propulsion for the carriage. Since he held that a bicycle was a carriage, the necessity for making certain nice distinctions which would have arisen was obviated. Even if he had held that a bicycle was not a carriage when being ridden by a man, he should have hesitated to say that it was not one if it was being used for carrying luggage.

There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendant. [Solicitors—Leslie J. Williams, for the plaintiff; Witham, Roskell, Munster, and Weld, for the defendant.]

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.B., } Jeune, P., Rigby, L.J.) } 1900.
 April 4.
 J. GOLDBERG AND SONS V. THE CORPORATION OF LIVER-POOL.*

Nuisance—What amounts to—Exercise of statutory powers—Bona fides.

This was an appeal by the Corporation of Liverpool against a judgment of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster. The corporation, purporting to act in the exercise of their powers under the Liverpool Corporation Tramways Act, 1897, have recently, for the purposes of an electric tramway, erected a pole and a fuse-box close to the principal entrance of the plaintiffs' premises, which are situate at the corner of Paradise-street and College-lane, Liverpool. The plaintiffs objected to this erection, and they brought this action to compel the defendants to remove the pole and fuse-box. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that there was no reasonable ground for selecting this particular position in front of the plaintiffs' premises, and that the conduct of the defendants' engineer had been perverse and vexatious; and the learned Judge made a peremptory order for the removal of the pole and the fuse-box.

Mr. Neville, Q.C., Mr. Macmorrison, Q.C., Mr. Maberly, and Mr. Rutherford were for the corporation; Mr. Mattinson, Q.C., and Mr. Rotch were for the plaintiffs.

On behalf of the corporation it was urged that their statutory powers authorized their placing the pole and the fuse-box where they had placed them; that the doing so was reasonably necessary for the working of the tramway, and that their engineer had acted bona fide, and in the honest exercise of his judgment in selecting the particular site. For the plaintiffs it was argued that the defendants' statutory powers only enabled them to place the pole and the fuse-box in the roadway of the street, as distinguished from the footway, and that if they had power to place them on the footway the onus was on them to show the necessity for so placing them. They had power to place them in that position, only if they could not otherwise efficiently construct their tramway. But they must act bona fide and without negligence, that is, they must not fail to do everything reasonable to prevent damage to the person who complained of their acts. The defendants had not shown that they had done this. And it was suggested that the engineer had placed the pole close to the entrance of the plaintiff's premises from a motive of hostility to the plaintiffs, because he was annoyed at their refusal to consent to a side wire being attached to the wall of their house by means of a rosette to support the central wire. The defendants, on the other hand, said that the erection of the pole was required, because of the plaintiffs' refusal to allow the rosette to be placed on their wall.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought that the view taken by the Vice-Chancellor was not correct in point of law. The questions were—(1) What were the statutory powers of the corporation; and (2) whether they had exercised their powers bona fide for the purposes for which they were conferred. As to (1), there was no doubt that the corporation had power to make an electric tramway along Paradise-street, and section 36 of the Act of 1897 empowered them to execute in any street all such works as might be "necessary or expedient" for the tramway. His Lordship could not accede to the argument that this power did not extend to College-lane, or to the pavement as distinguished from the roadway. Of course, the rails must be laid along the roadway. But the words of the section applied also to the pavement for the purpose of doing that which was necessary for making the tramway an electrical tramway. The Act gave an express power to do that which, but for that power, would be a nuisance at common law. This distinguished the present case from those on which Mr. Mattinson had relied, and in which the Court came to the conclusion that the Legislature had not conferred a power to commit a nuisance. As to (2), it was not now alleged that the corporation had not acted bona fide, but it was said their engineer had not done so. Upon the evidence his Lordship came to the conclusion that this view could not be maintained. He thought the plaintiffs had misunderstood what had been said by the defendants—viz., that, if the plaintiffs would not have a rosette, there must be a pole. This was not intended as a threat, though the plaintiffs seemed to have taken it as a threat. So far as his Lordship could discover, there was no malice on the part of the defendants' engineer. But for the Act no doubt the plaintiffs could have maintained an action for nuisance. But the Act authorized a nuisance, and, unless the plaintiffs could prove that the powers conferred by the Act had been abused, they had no remedy. They had failed to prove this. In his Lordship's opinion, the Vice-Chancellor had not attached sufficient weight to that which was the key to the whole case—viz., that an express power was given by the Act to do that which the defendants had done. There was no reason for going into the inquiry into which the learned Judge had gone as to what was the most suitable position for the pole. If the Court did that they would have to lay down the tramway themselves. The action must be dismissed.

The PRESIDENT of the PROBATE DIVISION concurred. He pointed out the distinction between such cases as "Metropolitan Asylum District Managers v. Hill" (6 App. Cas., 193), in which the Legislature had not conferred power to commit a nuisance, and the other class of cases such as "Stockton and Darlington Railway Company v. Brown" (9 H.L.C., 246), in which such a power had been expressly conferred, and said that the present case fell within the latter class. In such a case, the officers of the corporation, not the Court, were to be the judges whether what they were doing was necessary or expedient, provided that they acted bona fide. On the question of bona fides, his Lordship had felt considerable doubt during the argument. But, having regard to all the facts, he could not think it was proved that the engineer was actuated by any improper motive. Indeed, his Lordship thought he was absolved from having been actuated by mala fides in placing the pole where it had been placed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed with the reasons which had been given by the Master of the Rolls. The bona fides of the corporation was not called in question, and his Lordship had no doubt that the engineer was acting with perfect bona fides.

EBBETTS V. CONQUEST.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lessee's covenants—Covenant to repair—Action for breach of covenant to deliver up in repair—Recovery in former action—Measure of damages.

This was an argument on a special case stated by the parties for the opinion of the Court under order 34, rule 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. The action was brought to recover damages for breach of covenant to keep and deliver up in repair certain premises in the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch. By a deed of March 24, 1851, one Thomas Rouse let to Benjamin Oliver the premises in question for a term of 47½ years less ten days from Lady Day, 1851, at a rent of £350. By this deed Benjamin Oliver covenanted to repair the premises, and at the end of the term to yield them up whole, safe, and undefaced, reasonable use and wearing excepted. The plaintiffs were assignees of the reversion on this lease and entitled to sue on this covenant, and were in their turn liable to a superior landlord on similar covenants. The defendant was the executor of Benjamin Oliver, and admitted that he had sufficient assets of his testator in his hands to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, which was for breaches of the covenants above-mentioned, the action having been brought after the expiration of the term, which happened on September 19, 1898. The defendant admitted that he was responsible to the plaintiffs for the breaches complained of, except so far as his liability had been discharged or lessened by what follows—namely, that during the currency of the lease, on April 4, 1894, the plaintiffs had brought an action against the defendant for damages for breach of covenant to repair. On March 26, 1895, the action was referred to the Official Referee, who awarded £1,305 as damages. The judgment of the Official Referee was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in “Ebbetts v. Conquest,” reported in ([1895] 2 Ch., 377) and again in the House of Lords in “Conquest v. Ebbetts” ([1896] A.C., 490). The plaintiffs estimated that at that time it would have required £4,500 to put the premises into repair, if there had been no judgment for breach of covenant during the term. They claimed to recover the cost of repairing the premises after making due allowance for the sum of £1,305 received as aforesaid. They claimed alternatively for damages for breach of covenant committed between March, 1895, and September 19, 1898, estimating the amount at £1,200. The defendant contended that the whole of his liability down to March, 1895, had been ascertained and discharged by the judgment for and satisfaction of the sum of £1,305; that he was only liable for additional breaches; and that the measure of such damages was the cost, on September 19, 1898, of restoring the premises to the state in which they were in March, 1895. He paid into Court the sum of £400 in satisfaction of this liability, at the same time denying that he was liable at all. Four questions were propounded for the opinion of the Court to obtain a direction as to what was the true measure of damages which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendant for any breaches by the defendant of the covenants in the lease of March 24, 1851. The first of the questions was in these terms:—Whether the true measure of damages . . . is the cost of putting the said premises into the state of repair in which the tenant was bound to leave them at the expiration of the said term less a proper allowance for the sum of £1,305.

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. HUSKEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. ROBSON, Q.C., and Mr. BOXALL, for the plaintiffs, cited the case of “Henderson v. Thorn” ([1893] 2 Q.B., 164), impugning it on the ground that “Coward v. Gregory” (L.R., 2 C.P., 153) was inconsistent with, and not considered in, that case. The former action had nothing to do with the present one, for the cause of action there was for breach of covenant during the term, while this action was also for breach of covenant to yield up in good repair at the end of the term.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. CHARLES H. SARGANT, for the defendant, contended that when the sum of £1,305 had been recovered the premises must be taken to have been put into thorough repair. They cited “Ebbetts v. Conquest” ([1895] 2 Ch., 377), and the same case in the House of Lords ([1896] A.C., 490). In assessing that sum the official referee had taken into account that the defendant would have to yield up the premises in good repair.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that the ordinary rule by which damages are assessed for breach of covenant at the end of the term was this—the actual state of disrepair was ascertained and the cost of correcting that and restoring the premises to their proper condition was estimated, and that cost was the measure of damage. The question was whether that measure should be applied here. It had been argued that it ought not, because in the previous action for breach of covenant to keep in repair the fact that the defendant would have to yield up in repair was taken into account. His Lordship did not think that argument valid. There was no estoppel, because, though the parties to the actions were the same, the questions to be decided were different. In the former case the damages to the reversion at the date of the judgment was the matter in dispute; in the present action it was the state of repair now. The first question in the special case should therefore be answered in the affirmative; but, under the circumstances, as the defendant's liability to his superior landlord had admittedly been considered in the former action, the amount therein recovered—£1,305—should be credited, with interest thereon at 4 per cent. from the date of payment to the date of the expiration of the lease. The plaintiffs should have the costs of the special case.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE concurred.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 The Times L.R., 451) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Rigby and Collins) of May 26, 1898, reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Wright's dated February 17, 1898. The case before the Court of Appeal is reported under the title “In re Olympia (Limited)” (14 The Times L.R., 451; L.R., 1898, 2 Ch., 153; and 67 L.J., Chanc., 433). The case was argued before their Lordships on November 30 and December 1, 4, and 5 last, when judgment was reserved. The questions involved were raised by a summons taken out by the Official Receiver and liquidator under section 10 of the Companies Winding Up Act, 1890, against Mr. Montague Gluckstein. The summons asked for a declaration that Mr. Gluckstein was guilty of misfeasance or breach of trust in that he and Messrs. Joseph Lyons, John Hart, and H. T. Hartley, being promoters and directors of the company, had secretly obtained and retained for their own use out of the purchase money paid by the company for Olympia the sum of £6,341, which was alleged to have been divided among them; and that Mr. Gluckstein might be ordered to pay the whole amount, with interest. Mr. Justice Wright dismissed the application; but the Court of Appeal made an order in accordance with the terms of the summons.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Muir Mackenzie, and

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. F. Cassel were for the appellant; Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Kirby for the respondent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said:—My Lords.—In this case the simple question is whether four persons, of whom the appellant is one, can be permitted to retain the sums which they have obtained from the company of which they were directors by the fraudulent pretence that they had paid £20,000 more than in truth they had paid for property which they, as a syndicate, had bought by subscription among themselves, and then sold to themselves as directors of the company. If this is an accurate account of what has been done by these four persons, of course so gross a transaction cannot be permitted to stand. That that is the real nature of it, I now proceed to show. In the year 1892 the freehold grounds and buildings known as Olympia were the property of a company which in that year was being wound up. That company had issued debentures to the extent of £100,000 as a first charge, and a mortgage as a second charge for £10,000. The four persons in question knew that the property would have to be sold, and they combined to buy it in order that they might resell it to a company to be formed by themselves. The combination, which called itself the Freehold Syndicate, but which, perhaps, the common law would have described by a less high-sounding title, proceeded to buy up so far as they could the encumbrances on the property called Olympia. They expended £27,000 in buying debentures. These, of course, very much depreciated in value, and they gave £500 for the mortgage of £10,000. As soon as this transaction had been completed they, partners in it, proceeded to form a company, and it was of course necessary that the company should be willing to help, and accordingly the four persons in question were made, by the articles of association, the first directors. The property was sold on February 8 by the chief clerk to Mr. Justice North for £140,000, and the syndicate purchased nominally for that sum, but, by reason of the arrangement to which I have referred, that sum was less by £20,734 6s. 1d. than what they appeared to give. On March 29 they completed as directors the purchase of the property for £180,000, and they as directors paid to themselves as members of the syndicate £171,000 in cash and £9,000 in fully paid up shares, in all £180,000. The prospectus, by which money was to be obtained from the public, disclosed the supposed profit which the vendors were making of £40,000, while in truth their profit was £60,734 6s. 1d., and it is this undisclosed profit of £20,000 and the right to retain it which is now in question. My Lords, I am wholly unable to understand any claim that these directors, vendors, syndicate, associates, have to retain this money. I entirely agree with the Master of the Rolls that the essence of this scheme was to form a company. It was essential that this should be done, and that they should be directors of it, who would purchase. The company should have been informed of what was being done and consulted whether they would have allowed this profit. I think the Master of the Rolls is absolutely right in saying that the duty to disclose is imposed by the plainest dictates of common honesty as well as by well-settled principles of company law. Of the facts there cannot be the least doubt; they are proved by the deed now that we know the subject matter with which that deed is intended to deal, although the deed would not disclose what the nature of the transaction was to those who were not acquainted with the ingenious arrangements which were prepared for the entrapping the intended victim of these arrangements. In order to protect themselves, as they supposed, they inserted in the deed qualifying the statement that they had bought the property for £140,000, payable in cash, that they did not sell to the company, and did not intend to sell, any other profits made by the syndicate from interim investments. Then it is said there is the alternative suggested upon the deed that the syndicate might sell to a company or to some other purchaser. In the first place, I do not believe they ever intended to sell to anybody else than a company. An individual purchaser might ask inconvenient questions, and if they, or any one of them, had stated as an inducement to an individual purchaser that £140,000 was given for the property, when in fact £20,000 less had been given, it is a great error to suppose that the law is not strong enough to reach such a statement; but as I say, I do not believe it was ever intended to get an individual purchaser, even if such an intention would have had any operation. When they did afterwards sell to a company, they took very good care there should be no one who could ask questions. They were to be sellers to themselves as buyers, and it was a necessary provision to the plan that they were to be both sellers and buyers, and as buyers to get the money to pay for the purchase from the pockets of deluded shareholders. My Lords, I decline to discuss the question of disclosure to the company. It is too absurd to suggest that a disclosure to the parties to this transaction is a disclosure to the company of which these directors were the proper guardians and trustees. They were there by the terms of the deed to do the work of the syndicate, that is to say, to cheat the shareholders; and this, forsooth, is to be treated as a disclosure to the company, when they were really there to hoodwink the shareholders, and, so far from protecting them, were to obtain from them the money, the produce of their nefarious plans. I do not discuss either the sum sued for, as only Gluckstein alone is sued. The whole sum has been obtained by a very gross fraud, and all who were parties to it are responsible to make good what they have obtained and withheld from the shareholders. I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords, Mr. Swinfen Eady argued this appeal with his usual ability, but the case is far too clear for argument. The learned counsel for the appellant did not, I am sure, raise the slightest doubt in the mind of any of your Lordships as to the propriety of the judgment under appeal. The only fault to be found with the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal, if I may venture to criticize their judgment at all, is that they have treated the defences put forward on Mr. Gluckstein's behalf with too much ceremony. For my part, I cannot see any ingenuity or any novelty in the trick which Mr. Gluckstein and his associates practised on the persons whom they invited to take shares in Olympia (Limited). It is the old story. It has been done over and over again. These gentlemen set about forming a company to pay them a handsome sum for taking off their hands a property which they had contracted to buy with that end in view. They bring the company into existence by means of the usual machinery. They appoint themselves sole guardians and protectors of this creature of theirs, half-fledged and just struggling into life, bound hand and foot while yet unborn by contracts tending to their private advantage, and so fashioned by its makers that it could only act by their hands and only see through their eyes. They issue a prospectus representing that they had agreed to purchase the property for a sum largely in excess of the amount which they had, in fact, to pay. On the faith of this prospectus they collect subscriptions from a confiding and credulous public. And then comes the last act. Secretly, and therefore dishonestly, they put into their own pockets the difference between the real and the pretended price. After a brief career, the company is ordered to be wound up. In the course of the liquidation the trick is discovered. Mr. Gluckstein is called upon to make good a portion of the sum which he and his associates had misappropriated. Why Mr. Gluckstein alone was selected for attack I do not know, any more than I know why he was only asked to pay back a fraction of the money improperly withdrawn from the coffers of the company. However that may be, Mr. Gluckstein defends his conduct, or, rather I should say, resists the demand on four grounds, which have been gravely argued at the bar. In the first place, he says that he was not in a fiduciary position towards Olympia (Limited) before the company was formed. Well, for some purposes he was not. For others he was. A good deal might be said on the point. But to my mind, the point is immaterial, for it is not necessary to go back beyond the formation of the company. In the second place, he says that if he was in a fiduciary position he did in fact make a proper disclosure. With all deference to the learned counsel for the appellant, that seems to me to be absurd. "Disclosure" is not the most appropriate word to use when a person who plays many parts announces to himself in one character what he has done and is doing in another. To talk of disclosure to the thing called the company, when as yet there were no shareholders, is a mere farce. To the intended shareholders there was no disclosure at all. On them was practised an elaborate system of deception. The third ground of defence was that the only remedy was rescission. That defence, in the circumstances of the present case, seems to me to be as contrary to common sense as it is to authority. The point was settled more than 60 years ago by the decision in "Hichens v. Congreve," and, so far as I know, that case has never been questioned. The last defence of all was that, however much the shareholders may have been wronged, they have bound themselves by a special bargain, sacred under the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, to bear their wrongs in silence. In other words, Mr. Gluckstein boldly asserts that he is entitled to use the provisions of an Act of Parliament, which are directed to a very different purpose, as a shield and shelter against the just consequences of his fraud. My Lords, I am afraid I must call your Lordships' attention for a moment to the prospectus of Olympia (Limited). In my opinion, it is the cardinal point of the case. And I do not think full justice has been done to it. The prospectus, I am sorry to find, was prepared in the office of a well-known solicitor. I wish I could say that it displays the simplicity and candour which some persons perhaps might expect from such an origin. Now this is what the self-constituted guardians of Olympia (Limited) and its shareholders tell those whom they invite to join with them in their enterprise:—

"The promoters of this company, hereinafter called the vendors, who constitute the entire board of the company which lately produced Venice in London, recently entered into a contract on behalf of a syndicate of which they themselves are members, for the purchase of the entire Olympia property. The vendors effected this purchase on February 8, 1893, at competition before the chief clerk of Mr. Justice North in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice for the sum of £140,000 payable in cash, and they will, acting on behalf of such syndicate, be the vendors of that property to this company. Any other profits made by the syndicate from interim investments are excluded from the sale to the company. A printed form of the memorandum of agreement which was signed by each member of that syndicate may be inspected by intending applicants for shares or debentures at the offices of the solicitor of the company. . . . The vendors have agreed to resell to the company the whole of the property purchased by them on February 8, 1893, for the sum of £180,000, being nearly £18,000 less than the amount of Messrs. Driver and Co.'s valuation, payable as to £155,000 in cash, and the balance in cash or shares of the company. . . . Out of the profit to be made by the vendors on behalf of the syndicate the vendors have agreed to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum upon the amount for the time being paid up on the shares and debentures until the opening of the first entertainment. They will also provide all the preliminary expenses of the formation and bringing out of the company, and the issue of its capital up to and including allotment, and all costs, including stamp duty, in connexion with the completion of the purchase of the property and the mortgage to secure debentures. The conveyance will be made direct to the company by direction of the vendors."

My Lords, it is a trite observation that every document as against its author must be read in the sense which it was intended to convey. And everybody knows that sometimes half a truth is no better than a downright falsehood. Is the statement in the prospectus which I have just read as to the price which the vendors had to pay for the property true or false? In the letter it is true. The vendors had bid £140,000 for the property and had formally agreed to pay that sum for it. But, for all that, the sum of £140,000 was not the sum they were going to pay, and they knew that well enough. They had provided themselves with counters obtained at little cost, which in reckoning the price would be taken, as they knew, at their face value, so that the price of the property to them would be only about £120,000. Is that what Mr. Gluckstein and his associates meant the public to understand? Surely ordinary persons reading the prospectus, and attracted by the hopes of profit held out by it, would say to themselves, "Here is a scheme which promises well. The gentlemen who are putting the property on the market know something about it, for they were the sole directors and managers of 'Venice in London,' which was a very profitable speculation. They have had the whole property valued by well-known auctioneers, who say that it is worth more than is asked for it. True, they secure a profit of £40,000 for themselves, but then they disclose it frankly, and it is not all clear profit. There is interest to be paid, and all the expenses of forming the company. And they have actually agreed to pay £140,000 down. That sum they tell us is 'payable in cash.'" You will observe those last words, "payable in cash." Their introduction is almost a stroke of genius. That slight touch seems to give an air of reality and bona fides to the story. Would anybody after that suppose that the directors were only going to pay £120,000 for the property and pocket the difference without saying anything to the shareholders? But then, says Mr. Gluckstein, there is something in the prospectus about "interim investments," and if you had only distrusted us properly and read the prospectus with the caution with which all prospectuses ought to be read, and sifted the matter to the bottom, you might have found a clue to our meaning. You might have discovered that what we call "interim investments" was really the abatement in price effected by purchasing charges on the property at a discount. My Lords, I decline altogether to take any notice of such an argument. I think the statement in the prospectus as to the price of the property was deliberately intended to mislead the shareholders and to conceal the truth from them. My Lords, on so plain a case as this I am very reluctant to quote any authority; but I think I ought to call your Lordships' attention to the case of "Hichens v. Congreve," to which I have already alluded, and that for two reasons—first, because it seems to have been lost sight of in the argument of this case; and, secondly, because the facts there have a singular resemblance to the facts of the present case. The defences in the two cases are, for the most part, identical. "Hichens v. Congreve" was decided by Vice-Chancellor Shadwell in 1831. There had been a demurrer to the bill, which was overruled by the Vice-Chancellor, and by Lord Lyndhurst, Chancellor, on appeal (1828, 4 Russ., 562; 1829, 1 R. and M., 150; 1831, 4 Sim., 420), a motion for payment of money into Court, which was successful, and then the case came on for hearing. The facts were these:—A Mr. Flattery was the fortunate possessor of a property in Ireland containing treasures of coal and iron rarely met with on the other side of the Channel, and he was anxious to dispose of it. One Sir William Congreve entered into negotiations with him and found that he was willing to sell for the modest sum of £10,000. Then Sir William associated with himself two gentlemen of the name of Clarke, and the three proposed to themselves to buy the property and work it by means of a company. But they thought that the company could well afford to pay £25,000 for it, and they supposed that they might honestly, or, at any rate, without being found out, put the extra £15,000 into their own pockets, concealing from the proposed shareholders the difference in price. Mr. Flattery seems to have been not unwilling to lend himself to the scheme. So a contract was drawn up for the sale of the property from Mr. Flattery to the trustees of the company for the price of £25,000, out of which, of course, Mr. Flattery was only to keep £10,000. Sir William Congreve and the two Clarks got up the company, issued a prospectus, and prepared a deed of settlement stating that the property had been bought from Mr. Flattery for £25,000. And they appointed themselves and other persons directors of the company. A large sum of money was collected, a large body of subscribers executed the deed of settlement, and later on a private Act of Parliament was obtained establishing and regulating, but not incorporating, the company. Some years afterwards the proceedings of Sir William Congreve and his associates were discovered, and a bill was filed by certain shareholders on behalf of themselves and the other shareholders, other than the defendants, to compel them to refund the £15,000. As the Vice-Chancellor pointed out, if Sir William Congreve and the Messrs. Clarke had agreed among themselves that they would form a partnership or a company for the purpose of working the mines, and had held out to the persons who should form the company that it should be formed on the basis that they should pay £15,000 to Sir William Congreve and the Messrs. Clarke as the consideration for their having the mines, no objection whatever could have been made to the transaction. But the objection was that the real transaction was not disclosed, and "that the persons who became members of the company could not possibly know that it was the intention of Sir William Congreve and the Messrs. Clarke that the £15,000 should be paid out of the funds of the company for the benefit of Sir William Congreve, the Messrs. Clarke, and those gentlemen whom they permitted to participate in it." The noble and learned Lord, after reading an extract from the Vice-Chancellor's judgment and observing that it covered practically the whole of the present appeal, continued:—There are two things in this case which puzzle me much, and I do not suppose that I shall ever understand them. I mention them merely because I should be very sorry if it were thought that in those two matters the House unanimously approved of what has been done. I do not understand why Mr. Gluckstein and his associates were not called upon to refund the whole of the money which they misappropriated. What they did with it, whether they put it in their own pockets or distributed it among their confederates, or spent it in charity seems to me absolutely immaterial. In the next place, I do not understand why Mr. Gluckstein was only charged with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. I should have thought it was a case for penal interest. In these two matters Mr. Gluckstein has been, in my opinion, extremely fortunate. But he complains that he may have a difficulty in recovering from his co-directors their share of the spoil, and he asks that the official liquidator may proceed against his associates before calling upon him to make good the whole amount with which he has been charged. My Lords, there may be occasions on which that would be a proper course to take. But I cannot think that this is a case in which any indulgence ought to be shown to Mr. Gluckstein. He may or may not be able to recover a contribution from those who joined with him in defrauding the company. He can bring an action at law if he likes. If he hesitates to take that course or takes it and fails, I fear his only remedy lies in an appeal to that sense of honour which is popularly supposed to exist among robbers of a humble type. I agree that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My Lords,—I am satisfied of the liability of the appellant. Once the facts are analysed (and this has been done thoroughly in the Court of Appeal) they are seen to be of no ambiguous import. The appearance of complexity which the case presents arises from the matters in hand having been dressed up artificially, so that things have been separated in language and treatment which, in their nature, are inseparable and correlative. To my thinking, the central fact in the history is that, while the object of the syndicate was to make profit out of the resale of Olympia, it was an essential part of the enterprise, as originally designed and as actually carried out, that the same individuals who sold as syndicate should buy as directors. This was provided by the third head of the agreement which set up the syndicate, and it has a far-reaching effect at all the stages of the argument. First of all, it seems to me to conclude the question whether these gentlemen were promoters when they bought the mortgages. I do not lay out of account the refreshment contract and the advertising contract, for the entering into contracts for the company is a clear assumption of agency, and therefore of a fiduciary relation to it. But, apart from those contracts, where speculators have formed, exclusively of themselves, the directorate of a company, to be immediately floated for the purpose of buying the property which those same individuals are associated to acquire and resell, they have brought themselves directly within Lord Cairns's statement of the law in "Erlanger" (L.R., 3 App. Cas. 1,218; 48 L.J., Ch. 73). They have taken a decisive step in shaping and limiting the company. It may well be asked, If this be not an act of promotion, what is? The hypothesis of all the law which we are considering is that the company is not yet formed; and, unless these gentlemen had registered the company (and thus passed out of this stage altogether), it is difficult to see what more overt acts of promoting and forming the company they could have done. The only available argument against this conclusion was that the gentlemen forming the syndicate might have changed their minds and sold to an individual. This is true, but true only in the sense that, till registration of the company and a bargain with the company, they were free to change their minds, true in the sense in which every enterprise not actually consummated may be abandoned. But, as matter of fact, these men intended, when they bought the mortgages, to sell to a company constituted in the mode and form described; and they did sell to that company. The appellant in his evidence avows it; and the other facts are indicative, to the point of conclusiveness, that nothing but a company would have served the ends of the syndicate. The mere expression in a deed of the truism that the adventurers could sell to an individual if they did not sell to a company can never avail against the ascertainment of the true facts of the scheme. The facts here are that the company had been so far organized that its executive was provisionally appointed. The directors of a company are its executive organ: to them its interests are confided; and in the present instance the company, even in this, its inchoate stage, was identifiable through its executive. I hold that from the moment this step was taken the coming directors stood in a fiduciary relation to the company whose interests were to be in their sole hands. This conclusion rests, not on technical rules of law, but on the dictates of fair play embodied in law. The people for whom these gentlemen were bound to act were their coming constituents, the persons out of whose money they proposed to make their gain. And now I pass to the next stage of the case. Assuming the members of the syndicate to have been promoters at the date of the purchase of the mortgages, did they properly disclose it? In the skilful argument for the appellant the duty of disclosure on this hypothesis was conceded. But this concession must not disarm the criticism which, in considering the adequacy of the disclosure, first ascertains the relevancy of the transaction to the question what sum ought to be paid by the directors for the mortgaged property. The theory of the appellant is that the purchase of the mortgages was a collateral and independent transaction. It seems to me, on the contrary, to be an essential and inseparable part of one and the same transaction, and for this plain reason that the syndicate's gain on the mortgages had to be paid by the company. The relevancy of the mortgage transaction to the question solved by the syndicate sitting as directors is this—a company, or any one else, considering what price shall be paid draws inferences as to the true value from the price paid by the seller and the proposed advance on that price. In short, what the possible buyer wants to know is the profit to be made by his seller. He may be entitled to know this, or he may not, according as his seller is bound, or is not bound, to disclose it, but the materiality of the knowledge is indisputable. Again, this transaction had another importance. The inference of value drawn from a competitive sale by auction is founded on the assumption that the sum paid was the least that the property could have been got for. In the present case, that inference would have been unsound. I do not know whether it was necessary, in order to secure the property, that the syndicate in their last bid should advance by £8,000, whereas all previous advances had been only of £1,000. But I do know that the appellant had no interest to bid £133,000 rather than £140,000, for by the time the biddings had run thus high, it was certain that the mortgages would be paid in full, and, as the syndicate knew that the directors would pay their price, it was indifferent to them, to the matter of a few thousands, whether the price which they nominally, and the shareholders really, paid to the vendor was more or less. On these grounds I consider that the transaction in mortgages was so relevant to the question—what price should the company pay for the property, that it was necessary that it should be disclosed to the company completely and in detail, and the question is whether this was done. There are several overwhelming reasons for a negative answer. In the normal case, where the directors are truly and not merely in name the executive of the company, it may be assumed that they will be vigilant and critical of the particulars of a bargain of such paramount importance as the purchase of the property to be traded with, and that, dealing at arm's length, they will examine into anything bearing on that matter that does not tell its own story in its face. But, in the present case, the company was paralysed, so far as vigilance and criticism were concerned, for the board-room was occupied by the enemy. Now, the question whether adequate disclosure had been made to a company by a vendor bound to do so must necessarily depend upon the intelligence brought to bear on the information. And if, by his own act, the promoter has weakened, or, as here, has annulled the directorate, his case on disclosure becomes extremely arduous, for he has to make out such disclosure to shareholders as makes directors unnecessary. How this could be done we have no occasion to consider, for the appellant is not within sight of doing it. Indeed, the case is so clear that I do not think it is a case of inadequate disclosure, but of direct misrepresentation. Two statements were made which are clearly of that character. The one is the assertion that the purchase of the mortgages was a temporary investment. If this means anything, it means that the syndicate, having money on hand awaiting investment in one thing, had temporarily put it into another. The contrary is the fact; part of the price of the mortgages was subscribed by the syndicate for its purposes of which this was, in terms, one, and much the greater part was borrowed from their bankers ad hoc. The second overt misrepresentation is that the syndicate had paid £140,000 for the property, whereas the truth is that they were paying only £119,265 13s. 11d., the excuse for the former sum having been stated coming to no more than this, that they had to pay the vendor before their own accounts were closed. I have only to add that I consider the liability of the appellant for the whole sum in the order appealed against to be the necessary result of the ground of judgment which I adopt.

Brampton, and Robertson)

THE NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY V. LORD HASTINGS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Agreement for lease—Way-leave—Construction of agreement—Contemporanea expositio.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 247) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls and Lords Justices Rigby and Vaughan Williams) dated March 7, 1899, affirming the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne of July 7, 1898. The hearing below is reported in 15 The Times Law Reports, 247: L.R., 1899, 1 (Ch., 656; 68 L.J., Ch., 315). The question involved was the construction of certain indentures and the applicability to documents executed about 1853 and 1854 of the doctrine of contemporanea expositio—that is, whether the interpretation accepted and acted upon by both parties for more than 40 years must be accepted by the Court as the true meaning though it may differ from that which the words themselves bear. The action was brought to establish liability on the part of the North-Eastern Railway Company to pay a way-leave rent to the respondent for coals shipped at certain shipping staiths erected by the company on the north bank of the estuary of the Blyth. This coal in its passage from the collieries to the staiths was not carried over any land of the respondent, and the contention of the company was that the respondent was therefore not entitled to any way-leave rent in respect of its carriage. The question at issue depended upon the true construction of an agreement for a way-leave lease executed on May 18, 1854, by Jacob, Lord Hastings, and the Blyth and Tyne Railway Company, the predecessors in title of the respondent and the appellants respectively. It was not in dispute that since the date of the said agreement no such rent had ever been demanded or paid. The Blyth and Tyne Railway Company was incorporated by the Blyth and Tyne Railway Act, 1852, and was thereby authorized to maintain a railway running from the town of Blyth on the south side of the estuary of the Blyth to coal staiths on the River Tyne at Hayhole. The main railway passed for part of its length through the estate of Lord Hastings, and on May 20, 1853, an indenture of lease was executed by which Lord Hastings granted a way-leave for the railway for 1,000 years to the Blyth and Tyne Company, and that company agreed to pay 5s. per ten (each ten being about 48 or 49 tons) of all coal, &c., passing over the railway, and 1s. 3d. per ten of all coal, &c., conveyed from the coalfield situated northward of the estate of Lord Hastings described as the Seaton Delaval Estate to Blyth over a line known as the Bedlington branch. The Bedlington branch was a colliery line which passed for part of its length over lands of Lord Hastings. In 1853 the Blyth and Tyne Company applied to Parliament for power to make two branch railways, to Morpeth and Tynemouth respectively, and on May 21, 1853, that company and Lord Hastings entered into an agreement by which the company agreed to execute a counterpart of a lease by Lord Hastings in favour of the company of a way-leave over his lands for the said branch railways for the same term of years and upon the terms and conditions specified in the said indenture of lease of May 20, 1853, it being understood that the rents reserved were to apply to the railway already authorized as well as the proposed branches. Early in the year 1854 a Bill was introduced into Parliament, which afterwards became the Blyth and Tyne Railway Consolidation and Extensions Act, 1854. This Act repealed but substantially re-enacted the Acts of 1852 and 1853, and authorized the construction of further branches, one called the Tynemouth extension (coloured light blue on the ordnance map), being the southern portion of the proposed line to Tynemouth for which Lord Hastings had agreed to grant a way-leave in 1853, and the other called the Longhirst branch, which did not pass over any lands of Lord Hastings. On May 18, 1854, there was executed an indenture containing a form of way-leave lease to be granted by Lord Hastings to the Blyth and Tyne Company. This indenture, the construction of which was the main question at issue in this appeal, recited that a Bill had lately been introduced into and was then pending in Parliament for the purpose of enabling the company to continue and maintain or make complete and maintain the Dairy House branch, the Tynemouth extension, and the Morpeth branch. No reference was made to the Longhirst branch. It further recited that the said railways and works were intended to be made to a great extent upon lands belonging to Lord Hastings, and that the company had applied to him to make to them, in the event of the passing of the said Bill, a grant of way-leave over his lands through which the said railways were intended to be made. Then followed a covenant by Lord Hastings and the company, that after the passing of the Bill Lord Hastings would grant and the company would accept a grant of way-leave over such portion of the lands of Lord Hastings as were thereafter mentioned, which said grant of way-leave was agreed to be in the form of a lease as thereafter set forth. The said form of lease which was then set forth reserved as was reserved by the indenture hereinbefore mentioned of May 20, 1853, rents calculated at the rate of 5s. per ten of coals, &c., passing along the said railways and not comprised in the subsequent reservations, and at the rate of 1s. 3d. per ten of coals, &c., conveyed from the coalfield situate northward of the Seaton Delaval estate to Blyth over the Bedlington branch. But in addition to the said rents of 5s. per ten and 1s. 3d. per ten reserved by the earlier indenture, the agreed form of lease also reserved a rent calculated at the rate of 3s. per ten on coals, &c., conveyed over any part of the railways comprehended in the Blyth and Tyne Railway Consolidation and Extensions Act, 1854, and shipped at the Port of Blyth (other than coals, &c., comprised in the reservation of 1s. 3d. for coals, &c., carried over the Bedlington Branch). The appellants contended that the true construction to be put upon the reservation of the rent of 3s. in the indenture of May 18, 1854, was that in respect of coals, &c., conveyed over any part of the railways comprehended in the Act of 1854 for shipment at the Port of Blyth and passing over the lands of the respondent, but not otherwise, the company were liable to pay a rent of 3s. per ten instead of 5s. per ten as provided by the earlier indenture of May 20, 1853. It was admitted that the rent of 3s. applied, and had always been treated as applying, to the main railway as well as to the branches authorized by the Acts of 1853 and 1854. The respondent now contended that the appellants are liable to pay the 3s. rent on all coals, &c., conveyed over any part of the said railways for shipment at the port of Blyth, whether passing over lands of the respondent or not. For a period of upwards of 40 years dating from the year 1854—the date of the execution of the said indenture—the respondent had not nor had any of his predecessors in title ever claimed, nor had the appellants or their predecessors in title ever paid, the rent of 3s. per ten or any other rent of any kind in respect of coal, &c., whether conveyed to Blyth or elsewhere, which did not pass over some part of the respondent's lands, although rent had been regularly claimed and paid upon all coal which had passed over any land of the respondent. Mr. Justice North decided in favour of Lord Hastings, and his judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The appeal was heard on March 22, when judgment was reserved.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Mackarness were for the appellants; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson for the respondent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said:—In this case I think the whole question turns upon a very few words to be found in the instrument under construction. A variety of circumstances have been insisted upon to alter the construction which the words themselves naturally bear, but I am unable to see that either in the language used or on the construction of the whole instrument there is any room for doubt. The chief argument used to give an unnatural construction of the words is that the parties have so acted during a period of 40 years that the only reasonable inference to be derived from their conduct is that they have understood and acted on their bargain in a sense different from that which the words themselves convey. I am of opinion that if this could be truly asserted it is nothing to the purpose. The words of a written instrument must be construed according to their natural meaning, and it appears to me that no amount of acting by the parties can alter or qualify words which are plain and unambiguous. So far as I am aware no principle has ever been more universally or vigorously insisted upon than that written instruments, if they are plain and unambiguous, must be construed according to the plain and unambiguous language of the instrument itself. More than 100 years ago a case arose in the Court of Queen's Bench (Clifton v. Walmisley, 5 T.R., 564), in which, under a demise of certain coal mines, the lessee had covenanted to pay, among other rents and royalties reserved, one half share of all such sum or sums of money as any of the coal to be gotten by virtue of the said indenture should sell for at the pit mouth. At the time when the covenant was drawn, all the coal was sold at the pit's mouth, but after that time a canal had been made and an opportunity afforded of carrying the coal to a more distant market, where it was sold at an enhanced price. For a period of ten years the lessee had paid to the lessor the half of the enhanced price when the coal was sold at the distant market, and the same line of argument was presented in that case which has been out before your Lordships here. It was said that the circumstances showed what the real meaning of the parties must have been—namely, that the lessor should receive one-half of the price which the coal produced in the market, and it was urged that the course would not tie down the parties to the mere words but would look to the meaning that for a period of ten years the parties had acted on that view of the contract, and whether the coal was sold further from the pit or nearer to it could not possibly vary the real right of the parties. The Court rejected the evidence and held that the covenant not being ambiguous in its terms could not be explained in the way suggested. It certainly, in that case, could not have been much matter of doubt that what the parties really had in their mind, if one had been at liberty to reject the words of the covenant or treat them as ambiguous, was that the lessor should obtain one-half of the selling price of the coal. As was argued by the learned counsel in that case it was very difficult to conceive any hypothesis upon which a distinction should have been insisted upon as to the place of sale. It may be that in particular instances an adherence to the letter of a contract may produce an apparent injustice, but a different rule would render all contracts uncertain and would produce much graver injustice. And in the case of the "Trustees of the Clyde Navigation v. Laird" (8 App. Cas., 668) Lord Blackburn says:—"But though I think the reasonableness of a scheme is a very good reason for thinking that the Legislature might have wished to adopt it, and therefore for construing words as showing an intention to carry it out, if the words used will bear such a sense, it affords no justification for introducing new words, or construing the words used in a sense which they cannot bear, and I find no words in the Act of 1858 capable of bearing a meaning which would show that the Legislature intended this reasonable scheme. I equally fail to see words indicating an intention to make this, perhaps not unreasonable, exemption from the general rate if it were imposed." Now the facts out of which this case arises are simple enough. In May, 1853, Lord Hastings granted certain way-leaves to a railway company, and without going very minutely into the terms of the instrument in question, it is enough to say that the way-leave then granted or agreed to be granted was a way-leave by which, upon certain terms, the coal going over any part of the railway which crossed Lord Hastings's land should pay certain rates. It cannot be denied that in this agreement the sole right of Lord Hastings was to claim in respect of railway or parts of railways conveying coal through or over his own land. But the agreement of May, 1854, is the instrument upon which the question arises. Certain way-leaves and rights in respect of them are granted by Lord Hastings, and the whole question is whether in this instrument, like that of 1853, the right to get rents or sums is dependent upon whether the coal carried is carried through or over any part of Lord Hastings's land. The appellants seek to limit it by suggesting that the real meaning of the words used must be read by the light of the earlier agreement, in which, undoubtedly, Lord Hastings's rights were limited to coal carried over some portion of his land. But I am very clearly of opinion that no such limitation can be imported. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the clause under construction is clear and unambiguous. It does not deny that the language of the covenant—namely, "the railways comprehended in the Blyth and Tyne Railway Consolidation and Extension Act, 1854," is conclusive against the appellants, unless these words can be used in some different sense, and I am wholly unable to see how they can be. The coal in respect of which way-leave rent has been charged, and which has not been paid, undoubtedly did pass over railways comprehended in this description, and it is sought to qualify the rights of Lord Hastings under this instrument by three considerations. (1) It is said that it is unreasonable that Lord Hastings should receive way-leave rent in respect of coal passing over a railway or part of a railway which was not on Lord Hastings's land. But it is a very familiar thing that in granting similar rights a proprietor will protect himself against an evasion of the obligation by a railway company to guard against alternative routes by which when a railway company has obtained, so to speak, the key of the situation it may render a reservation of rents for way-leave of little value. Next it is said that the instrument reserves no rights of inspection or right to account, whereas such rights are expressly given in respect of such portions of the railway as pass over Lord Hastings's land, and this is true. But though it may go to show the bad drafting which the appellants so strongly insist on, I am wholly at a loss to see that the absence of such provisions can affect the plain and unambiguous words in which the obligation to pay is created. The next argument is the practice which has prevailed for 40 years between the parties, which, it is said, is inconsistent with the only sense in which the words creating the obligation can be understood. I think the argument is overstated, since there may have been circumstances which caused one particular pit, which was undoubtedly comprehended within the language of the covenant, not to be called upon to pay. That question has neither been litigated nor inquired into, and I am not at liberty to inquire into it, but whatever may be the history of it, it cannot affect the generality of the covenant to be construed between these parties, whatever may be the rights of the proprietors of the particular colliery. What those circumstances were and how it happened that the coal carried from the pit over part of the designated lines was not charged for I do not know, nor am I at liberty to conjecture. It may be that circumstances peculiar to itself, or agreement with the owners of it, caused this omission, but now that an alternative line has been created by legislation, it is difficult to see what relation that immunity has to the claim in respect of the coal carried by that alternative line. But, in truth, I do not think I have any right to know what the parties have done. I think in strictness the course they have pursued is not evidence. I think the true view is that laid down by Lord Kenyon in 1794, and I have no right to construe the covenant now questioned differently from the mode in which I should have construed it if the controversy had arisen the day after the agreement had been executed. For these reasons I must adhere to the judgment given by Mr. Justice Byrne and by the Court of Appeal, and move, your Lordships, that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

Master and servant—Master's liability to servant—Time within which to make claim for compensation—Waiver by employers—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

This was an appeal from the award of the Deputy Judge of the Walsall County Court under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant, George Wright, was a wagoner in the employment of the respondents, John Bagnall and Sons (Limited), who were iron manufacturers at West Bromwich, and on November 23, 1898, he received personal injuries by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. He was taken to the hospital suffering from permanent injuries. At the time of the accident his wages were 21s. a week. On November 26, 1898, the appellant's wife saw the respondents' ledger clerk, who told her to get a note from the hospital and bring it in three weeks' time to the works, when her husband would be "due for compensation," and that she would "pick up" half his wages. At the end of the three weeks she went with the hospital note to the works, and received 10s. 6d., and from that time either the appellant or his wife continued to receive that sum each week until September 6, 1899, either from the respondents or from the insurance company with whom the respondents were insured. About Easter, 1899, the appellant saw the respondents' manager, when an offer of £15 was made to him as compensation, "to set him up in a little business," but the appellant refused to take it. The manager told him to go home and talk it over with his wife. A few days afterwards the appellant saw the manager again, when the appellant said that he would take £200. The manager said, "If you talk about £200 we will go to the Court with you." At Whitsuntide the manager offered the appellant £30, saying that he thought that the insurance company would give that amount. The weekly payments having stopped on September 6, 1899, the appellant filed a request for arbitration to assess the compensation payable under the Act of 1897. The respondents, in their answer, took the objection that the claim for compensation was not made within six months from the occurrence of the accident, as required by section 2, subsection 1 of the Act. The Deputy County Court Judge held that "the claim for compensation" meant the filing of the request for arbitration, and that, therefore, the application was out of time. With regard to the question of waiver, he said that the payment by the respondents to the appellant each week up to September 6, 1899, of the exact sum to which the appellant was entitled under the Act, and the commencing of such payments at the time required by the Act, were calculated to make the appellant believe that he was receiving these payments by virtue of the Act and to lull him into a state of false security; but, on the other hand, the appellant should have known his rights under the Act, and if he thought that he had arrived at an arrangement with the respondents, he should have got them to enter into a memorandum of agreement embodying the terms of the arrangement, and registered the memorandum. He did not think that the respondents could be said to have waived any defence they might have on account of the lateness of the appellant's claim. With regard to the question of estoppel, he did not think that the respondents' conduct could dispense with the requirements of the statute. The language of section 2, subsection 1 was peremptory, that proceedings "shall not be maintainable" unless the claim for compensation were made within six months. He accordingly held that the appellant was not entitled to compensation, and made an award in favour of the respondents. Since the hearing before the Deputy County Court Judge the Court of Appeal decided in "Powell v. Main Colliery Company (Limited)" (16

The Times L.R., 282) that "the claim for compensation," which was required by section 2, subsection 1 to be made within six months after the accident, meant the filing of the request for arbitration. The decision of the Deputy County Court Judge upon that point was, therefore, not sought to be disturbed.

Mr. DISTURNAL, for the appellant, contended that the respondents, by their conduct, had waived the making of the claim for compensation within the six months. There was nothing in law to prevent the respondents from waiving their right to take the objection that the claim was not made within the six months. The facts showed that it was inequitable to allow the respondents to set up the objection. The limitation of time in section 2, subsection 1 of the Act affected the remedy, like the Statute of Limitations, and did not bar the right. Further, the respondents were estopped by their conduct from denying that proceedings to assess compensation had been commenced within the six months.

Mr. W. F. CRAIES, for the respondents, contended that there could be no estoppel preventing them from setting up the limitation of time. The respondents might waive the objection by not setting it up in their answer, or they might have agreed not to take the objection. The facts here did not show any waiver.

The COURT allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the Deputy County Court Judge.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that the Deputy County Court Judge held, as he (the Lord Justice) read his holding, that it was not for him to consider whether the circumstances of the case debarred the respondents from raising the objection of the lapse of time. It seemed to his Lordship that in the circumstances of this case the Deputy Judge was wrong in holding that as a matter of law the respondents were not debarred from setting up that objection. In his opinion there was evidence before the Deputy Judge that the parties had agreed absolutely that there was a liability under the Act on the part of the respondents to pay compensation, that the amount alone was not agreed upon, and that the appellant had the right to go to arbitration for the purpose of having the amount settled. The weekly payments had been made for a considerable time. Then the question arose as to commuting the weekly payments for a lump sum. Differences arose as to the amount, and the respondents' manager said that if the appellant stood out for so large a sum as £200 they would go to the Court. That was a clear recognition of the jurisdiction of the Court. Upon that the appellant forbore from taking proceedings to have the amount of the compensation assessed, but negotiated upon the question, and while the negotiations were going on the six months' limit of time expired. In that state of things there was ample evidence of an agreement that compensation was to be paid, the only question left open being the amount thereof. If that were made out the respondents were not in a position to take the objection that the six months had expired. In his opinion the respondents had also debarred themselves, by treating the question as still open to negotiations and leading the appellant to act on that view, from taking the objection. In his opinion there was ample evidence upon which the Deputy Judge might find that the respondents were not entitled to raise the defence, and there was nothing in point of law to prevent the Judge from so finding. The case must, therefore, be remitted to the Deputy County Court Judge. The appeal would be allowed, with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

Mr. CRAIES said that instead of the case being sent back to the Deputy County Court Judge his clients would agree to pay the appellant 10s. 6d. a week.

DAVIES V. RHYMNEY IRON COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Accident held not arising out of and in course of employment.

This was an appeal from the award of the Tredegar County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant was a collier in the employment of the respondents, the Rhymney Iron Company, who were the owners of a colliery. The respondents owned a line of railway about one and a quarter miles in length, from their colliery, and they ran a train to take the colliers from their work in the colliery to their homes. The colliers did not pay for the use of the train, and it was at their option whether or not they used it. The respondents were not bound to carry the men. The men got off the train at points nearest to their homes, the train stopping for that purpose. The appellant was going home by the train on March 6, 1899, and, when alighting from it at a point about three-quarters of a mile from the colliery, he fell and was slightly injured. The amount of the compensation, if any, was agreed at the sum of £3 13s. 6d. The case was, however, important as a test case. The County Court Judge found (1) that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the appellant's employment. He found as a fact that it was not a condition of the appellant's employment that he should be carried to and from his work by the train, and that the respondents provided the train as a convenience only for their workmen, and that they were not under any contract, duty, or obligation to provide it. He also found (2) that the accident did not happen to the appellant on or in or about the mine, the accident having happened at a distance of three-quarters of a mile from the pit's mouth. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondents.

Mr. BRYNMOR JONES, Q.C., and Mr. H. MORGAN, for the appellant, contended that the accident arose out of and in the course of the appellant's employment, and that the employment at the time of the accident was "about" the mine as defined by section 75 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, which was incorporated in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, by section 7, subsection 2, of that Act. The railway was the property of the respondents and belonged to the mine. It was adjacent to and appurtenant to the mine, and was used in connexion with their mining operations. They referred to "Holness v. Mackay" (1899, 2 Q.B., 319); "Lowth v. Ibbotson" (1899, 1 Q.B., 1,003); "Chambers v. Whitehaven Harbour Commissioners" (1899, 2 Q.B., 132).

Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. Anton Bertram, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that, in his opinion, upon the findings of the County Court Judge, the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the appellant's employment. The appellant had left his place of work and had availed himself of the facilities given by the respondents to go home. He went home by a route which he was not bound to take. He was under no duty to the respondents at the time of the accident, and in no sense could the accident be said to have been connected with his employment. The County Court Judge was, therefore, right. It was not necessary to express any opinion upon the other point dealt with by the County Court Judge, but he could see no reason to differ from him upon that point either.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

DIXON V. KENNAWAY AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Company—Shares—Transfer of Shares—Estoppel—Share certificates.

In this action the plaintiff, Elizabeth Rebecca Dixon, claimed a declaration that she was entitled to certain shares in the defendant company, together with the dividends accrued thereon, or for damages.

Mr. Badcock, Q.C., and Mr. T. Ribton appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Bramwell Davis, Q.C., and Mr. Kenyon Parker for the defendant company and the other defendant, Charles Halford Thompson.

Mr. BADCOCK, in opening the case, said that the defendant company was formed in 1892 to take over a wine and spirit business at Exeter. The capital of the company was £100,000 in 10,000 shares of £10 each, of which 5,000 were preference and 5,000 ordinary shares. The defendant Colonel Thompson was chairman and one of the managing directors of the company, and to him, as a vendor, had been allotted 333 fully paid-up ordinary shares, numbered 1 to 333. The company appointed a man called Liddell, who was a stock and share broker in Exeter, as their secretary. Colonel Thompson from time to time employed Liddell to sell certain of the 333 shares that had been allotted to him, and such shares were sold either by Liddell or by one of his two clerks, who were named Pitman and Clarke respectively, ostensibly as vendor, but really, as the plaintiff submitted, as agent for Colonel Thompson. In January, 1897, the plaintiff bought from Liddell 30 ordinary shares in the defendant company for the sum of £324 18s. The transfer purported to be a transfer by Pitman to the plaintiff, but the space where the numbers of the shares should have been inserted was left blank. The transfer was brought before a board meeting on March 4, at which Colonel Thompson presided, and was duly passed, and the plaintiff subsequently received a share certificate, under the defendant company's seal, certifying that she was the holder of 30 shares, numbered 115 to 144, being part of the shares allotted to Colonel Thompson. Dividends were paid to the plaintiff, and her name remained on the company's register down to the happening of the events which gave rise to the present action. In June, 1898, Liddell absconded, having never accounted for the £324 18s., and in March of the following year the defendant company instructed a firm of accountants to investigate the dealings with the shares of the company and ascertain what irregularities had been committed. In consequence of the report made by the accountant the defendant company in April, 1899, refused to recognize that the plaintiff was entitled to any shares, and demanded the return of the share certificate, which, of course, was refused. The plaintiff had also an alternative claim. It appeared that Pitman was still registered in the company's books as the holder of two ordinary shares, numbered 2,296 and 2,297; and if the plaintiff failed as regards the 30 shares she submitted that she was entitled to those two shares, as the transfer had been executed by Pitman. The report made by the accountant would reveal many irregularities and would show that on one occasion at least Colonel Thompson transferred shares to a clerk of Liddell's long after they had actually been transferred to a purchaser by the clerk. In fact it would appear that the company undertook to accept transfers without the shares being numbered, and then selected and allocated the shares to be issued to the purchaser. In any case the share certificate issued to the plaintiff was prima facie evidence, under section 31 of the Companies Act, 1862, that she was the holder of 30 shares, and the onus was on the defence to prove that she was not entitled to them.

Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS, for the defendants, said that the action raised the question which of two innocent parties was to suffer for the fraud of a third party. The plaintiff had no cause of action against Colonel Thompson either by contract or estoppel. She had no transfer from any one entitled to sell. Colonel Thompson had never parted with the 30 shares. He never employed either Liddell or Pitman to sell them, and he had always received a dividend on them. The dividends to the plaintiff had been paid by Liddell. As against the company the authorities showed that the only ground of action was estoppel, and to prove estoppel the plaintiff must prove that since acquiring the shares she had in some way altered her position either by selling or mortgaging them. The plaintiff, however, still held the share certificate.

Colonel Thompson, examined by Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS, said that Liddell bought and sold shares in the company for his own clients. In March, 1897, he did not know that Pitman was Liddell's clerk. Until June, 1898, the company had absolute confidence in Liddell. If Liddell said that the transfers were correct the board passed them, and did not examine the books in order to verify them. Witness employed Liddell to sell shares for him, and gave him a limit as to what he would take for them. He had never authorized him to sell the 30 shares in question, nor had he empowered Pitman to execute a transfer. He knew nothing of the dividends being sent to the plaintiff.

Cross-examined by Mr. BADCOCK.—There was a running account between witness and Liddell for the sale of shares. He did not remember transferring a preference share to a clerk of Liddell's which had been transferred by the clerk to a purchaser some months before. So far as he remembered, he never refused to sign anything that Liddell asked him to sign. All he cared about was to get a proper price for his shares. He had implicit confidence in Liddell.

Other evidence having been given for the defence, Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS submitted that if the plaintiff had any remedy at all she was only entitled to damages. He cited the following cases:—"Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company" (5 Q.B.D., 188), "Foster v. Tyne Pontoon and Dry Docks Company" (63 L.J., Q.B., 50), "Knights v. Wiffen" (L.R., 5 Q.B., 660), "Balkis Consolidated Company v. Tomkinson" ([1893] A.C., 396), "Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Company" (25 Q.B.D., 77).

Mr. Pitman, examined by Mr. BADCOCK, said that he received £1 a week as Liddell's clerk. He had never had any private means. He signed the transfer by Liddell's orders.

Mr. BADCOCK contended that Colonel Thompson was either the undisclosed principal of Liddell or was estopped by his conduct from setting up a title to the 30 shares. The company also was estopped, and in support of this argument he referred to "Carr v. London and North-Western Railway Company" (L.R., 10 C.P. 307) and "Bloomenthal v. Ford" ([1897] A.C., 156).

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, after stating the facts, said that the plaintiff set up two claims—the first against Colonel Thompson and the second against the company. As regards Colonel Thompson, who had given his evidence in a very straightforward manner, the plaintiff contended that he could not be heard to say that the shares were not hers on the ground that he was either the principal of Liddell in the transaction or was estopped by his conduct. It was true that Liddell had some sort of general authority to sell shares for Colonel Thompson, but Liddell had no authority to execute a transfer of those 30 shares, and, in fact, had not executed any such transfer. There was no evidence to show that Liddell was acting as Colonel Thompson's agent in this matter, and he could not hold that a general authority went so far as to make him liable. Then was Colonel Thompson estopped by his conduct? He thought not. The Colonel did not sign the plaintiff's certificate and could not be fixed with knowledge that the shares mentioned in it were his. In his Lordship's opinion it was not the duty of the directors to inspect every share certificate and see that it corresponded with what was contained in the books of the company. The plaintiff's claim therefore failed as against Colonel Thompson, but he could not acquit him of negligence in the way he trusted Liddell, and would consequently not order the plaintiff to pay his costs. Then, as regards the claim against the company, the point was one of general interest. Prima facie the certificate was evidence that the person named therein was the holder of the shares specified, and a certificate was an estoppel in favour of any person who accepted it and acted upon it. He accepted the definition of estoppel given by Lord Blackburn in "Knights v. Wiffen," with the addition of what was said by Mr. Justice Butt in "Carr v. London and North-Western Railway Company." To prove estoppel the plaintiff must show that she had altered her position, either actively by selling or mortgaging the shares or passively by resting upon the certificate to her detriment. It was clear from Pitman's evidence that the plaintiff could not have recovered anything from him. As regards Liddell she could not have recovered as against him at the date of the writ, for Liddell was then bankrupt. Could she have recovered if she had sued him before bankruptcy or before action brought? From what Lord Blackburn had said in "Knights v. Wiffen," and Lord Justice Collins seemed to have meant the same thing in "Foster v. Tyne Pontoon and Dry Docks Company," it was for the defendants to prove that no money could have been recovered from Liddell. That they had failed, in his opinion, to prove. Liddell's pass-books had been put in, and, though they showed that at times his account was overdrawn, he could not say that Liddell could not have paid if the plaintiff had brought an action against him. The defendants had relied on "Simm v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company." But that was a different case altogether, as the transfer was forged, and it was really a case of estoppel against estoppel. He held that in the present case the plaintiff had rested to her detriment on the certificate, as the time had gone by in which she could bring an action, with any hope of recovery, against Liddell. There was, therefore, a clear estoppel as regards the company arising out of the certificate. The company, of course, could only pay damages. He would order them to pay the plaintiff £324 18s., with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from January 1, 1898, as had been arranged between counsel. The company must also pay the plaintiff's costs.

SIMMS AND OTHERS V. THE REGISTRAR OF PROBATE.*
Privy Council Appeals—South Australia—Revenue—Succession Duty—Evading the payment of duty—Succession Duties Act, 1893, sec. 27.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of South Australia of December 20, 1898, reversing an order of the Right Hon. the Chief Justice (Sir Samuel Way).

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the appellants; Mr. Warmington, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., for the respondent.

LORD HOBHOUSE, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the question in the appeal was what amount of succession duty was payable to the respondent, representing the Crown, from the estate of William Knox Simms, who died on December 25, 1897, domiciled in South Australia. The appellants were entitled under his will and they claimed that duty was not payable in respect of £200,000 which the testator had covenanted to pay in 1896. The respondent contended that the testator's covenant was made with intent to evade the payment of duty, and that under the Succession Duties Act, 1893, double duty was chargeable on that sum. On September 26, 1892, the testator, who had been a brewer in Adelaide, but had retired from business, made his will. After giving some specific properties and a life annuity of £2,000 to his wife, he gave his residuary estate in trust for his children in equal shares. As to the shares of the daughters, he gave the income to the separate use of each for life. If she did not leave issue she had power to dispose of her share by will; and if she did leave issue, they took the share. Further trusts were declared in favour of husbands or wives of all his children on failure of the prior trusts. The present Succession Duties Act received the Royal Assent on October 25, 1893. It superseded the previous Act of 1876, and it imposed much heavier rates of duty—amounting for an estate so large as that of the testator to an increase of 8 per cent. When it passed and up to the time of the testator's death there were living six children of his, three sons and three married daughters, two of whom had living issue. On January 10, 1896, the testator executed a deed poll in the following terms:—"Know all men by these presents that, in consideration of natural love and affection, I, William Knox Simms, of Adelaide, in the province of South Australia, gentleman, do hereby covenant, promise, and agree, jointly and severally with my children Alfred Simms, Harry Simms, Edward Simms, Louie Colley, Clara Jane Bonnin, and Eleanor Varley, that I will pay to them the sum of £200,000, such sum to be divided between them in equal shares. And I further covenant and agree, jointly and severally with my said children, that until the said sum of money be paid and divided between them as aforesaid, or suitably invested on their behalf, I will pay to them interest thereon at the rate paid by the Associated Banks in Adelaide on deposits at three months, provided such interest shall not be less than at the rate of £1 10s. per centum per annum, such payments to be paid and payable quarterly in advance, the first of such payments to become due and payable on January 1, 1896. And I declare that as to the interest accruing due to my said children until the said principal sums be otherwise invested I will pay to my sons as they may direct, but to my daughters personally or into their respective banking accounts and to and for their sole and separate use, free from the control of their respective husbands. And I hereby declare that I will pay the principal sums due to such of my daughters as have issue living into the hands of my said sons, Alfred Simms and Edward Simms, and my son-in-law, Paul Frederick Bonnin, as trustees on their behalf, to invest the same for such daughters for life, and pay the annual income thereof to them, and thereafter to divide the same between their respective children per stirpes and not per capita. And I hereby acknowledge and declare that I am indebted to my said children in the said sum of £200,000, such principal sum to be utterly irrespective of any sum I may leave to them under my will, and not to be brought into hotchpot with my testamentary estate. In witness," &c. When the testator died no part of the £200,000 was paid, but interest thereon at $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was regularly paid by him in advance to the six children. It was shown that he received about 3 per cent. on his investment. As under his covenant he paid interest one quarter in advance, the debt was not payable strictly on demand, but it was payable at call, varying in time from three months down to a day. The Chief Justice said that $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was a very fair rate of interest for money at call of three months. On the testator's death his executors claimed to treat the whole sum as a debt and to deduct it from the estate for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of duty. On the part of the Crown it was not disputed that, independently of the express provisions of the Succession Duties Act with reference to gifts made prior to death, the estate was entitled to that deduction. Deducting the £200,000, the residuary estate had been found to amount to upwards of £115,000, on which duty had been paid. The further claim of the Crown was founded on those statutory provisions which imposed duties on gifts made with intent to evade duty. In the Act of 1876 there were two sections bearing on the question. Section 14 enacted to the effect that if a deceased person had made a gift of property with intent to evade the payment of duty, and such property were in the hands of donees or of volunteers claiming under him, it should for the purposes of the Act be deemed part of the property of the deceased donor; and it added that every voluntary gift made within one year prior to the death of the donor should be presumed to be made with the intent to evade unless the contrary be proved. The same section declared that any voluntary gift of property to take effect upon the death of the donor should be deemed to have been made with intent to evade payment of duty. It also contained a provision making donations mortis causa part of the property of the donor. Section 27 corresponded to the eighth section of the English Succession Duty Act of 1853. It enacted that where any disposition of property should purport to take effect presently, but by some secret arrangement capable of being enforced in a Court of law or equity the beneficial ownership should not bona fide pass according to such disposition, but should in fact devolve on death, the taker should be deemed to acquire the property as a succession, and, further, that where any disposition was judicially declared to be fraudulent and made for the purpose of evading the duty, the Court might declare a succession to have been conferred on the taker at such time and to such an extent as it should think just. There were difficulties in construing those clauses, occasioned probably by the fact that the Act imposed two sets of duties. The first part, in which section 14 occurred, related to probate duties. The second part, in which section 27 occurred, related to succession duties imposed by section 20 on successions as defined by section 21. Section 14 made the property given with intent to evade part of the donor's estate, clearly for the purpose of bringing it under the head of probate duty. The same provision would appear to bring the same property within the definitions of section 21, and so make it liable to succession duty, if it were not for the last clause of section 27, by which the Court was empowered to declare a succession to have been conferred after it had declared a disposition to have been fraudulent and made for the purpose of evasion. Mr. Justice Bunday laid it down in this case that to impose succession duty the Court must find fraud, and Mr. Justice Boucaut said that section 27 said substantially that an attempt to evade duty was a fraud. That question was obscure, but it was clear that neither section 14 nor 27 was framed to interfere with gifts taking full effect in presenti, except in the one case of a gift made within a year of the donor's death; in which a positive rule was laid down that intention to evade should be presumed, but might be rebutted by evidence. In the Act of 1893 matters were much simplified. Only one duty—viz., succession duty—was imposed. Section 14 of 1876 disappeared as a whole. Its provisions as to donations mortis causa were the subject of a separate section 10 of the present Act; its provision as to voluntary conveyances to take effect on death had become useless, for such gifts conferred a succession, and the object of imposing probate duty had ceased to exist. Its provision as to gifts made within a year prior to the donor's death was superseded by sections 16 and 17 of the new Act. Section 16 declared that a deed of gift should mean and include among other things every non-testamentary disposition of property containing trusts or dispositions to take effect during the lifetime of the donor. It was enacted by section 17, "The property given or accruing to any person under any deed of gift shall, in the event of the death of the donor within three months from the date of the deed of gift, be chargeable immediately after such death with succession duty according to the scale in the third schedule hereto, except in cases of death by accident." The time which might be called that of probate was shortened from a year to three months, but the imposition of duty was made a positive and peremptory rule of law, and was not reached by the indirect road of an artificial presumption rebuttable by evidence. The more general words of section 14 and the whole of section 27 of 1876 were replaced by section 27 of the present Act as follows:—"If any person has made or shall hereafter make any conveyance, assignment, gift, delivery, transfer, declaration of trust, or other non-testamentary disposition, whether in writing or otherwise, of any property, real or personal, or of any money or securities for money, or has given or shall give any mortgage or encumbrance, or has incurred or shall incur any debt, with intent to evade the payment of duty hereunder, such disposition, mortgage, or encumbrance, or the incurring of such debt, shall be deemed, so far as the circumstances will admit, to be a deed of gift under section 16 hereof, and any property accruing to any person thereunder shall be liable to duty as if the donor had died within three months from the date thereof, but double duty shall be payable in respect of such property." The matter was brought by summons before the Chief Justice sitting in Chambers. The respondent tendered no evidence of intent, relying entirely on the inferences to be drawn from the dates of events and the documents. The Chief Justice dismissed the summons with costs, holding that the act of the testator was sufficiently explicable, by a desire to make a beneficial family arrangement, resembling though by no means identical with that of his will, and not alterable as his will was. The respondent appealed to the full Court, consisting of the Chief Justice and Justices Boucaut and Bunday. The Chief Justice adhered to his former conclusion; but inasmuch as the two other Judges were of a different opinion the Court decreed that the order of the Chief Justice should be set aside and that the summons should stand over to be dealt with on the merits, the Registrar having made out a prima facie case to be answered. From that decree the present appeal was brought. The Chief Justice, in his judgment, examined the meaning of the expression "evade," and said:—"I am driven to the conclusion that the word 'evade' in section 27 means to avoid by some direct means, by some device or stratagem. The phrase 'with intent to evade payment of duty' would cover some arrangement, trust, or device—whether concealed or apparent on the face of the non-testamentary disposition—by which what is really a part of the estate of the deceased is made to appear to belong to somebody else in order to escape payment of duty." Inasmuch as no evidence was offered to qualify the effect of the covenant and the actual dealings under it, it was a necessary conclusion that Mr. Simms completely deprived himself of the power of reclaiming the £200,000, and that he put that sum entirely in the power of the covenantees. Subject only to the delay resulting from the acceptance of interest in advance the money might have been demanded from him at any moment. Whatever he might have wished or have expected to be done by his children, he took all risks. His children might forbear to enforce their claim against the wish of their father from deference and respect, or even from the reflection that the receipt of interest by their father would increase his estate, which they knew he intended for them. But changes of feeling might occur, quarrels or estrangements; or changes of circumstance, a death, an insolvency, or some great pressure for money; any of which things might lead to demands under the covenant such as the testator had made himself incapable of resisting. An act involving such consequences the Chief Justice held to be a non-testamentary disposition of property within the meaning of section 16 of the statute, which was not subject to duty under section 17 unless the donor died within three months. With regard to the expression "disposition of property," one of the other Judges below doubted, and one denied, that a covenant to pay was such a disposition. It was not, however, so contended by the respondent's counsel at the Bar. Their Lordships held that a covenant to pay conferring complete ownership of the debt, and diminishing the covenantor's net assets by that amount, was rightly deemed to be a disposition of property within the meaning of the Act. With respect to the opinion of Mr. Justice Bunday that the covenant was a sham, their Lordships could not find any evidence to support it. For all that appeared it was a genuine deed creating valid obligations on the covenantor, which might have been enforced at once. It was quite true, as the learned Judges observed, that the Act struck at valid transactions. But that was nothing new in the Act of 1893. The Act of 1876 did the same. No gift was thereby invalidated for being evasive, and, except to the extent of letting in the duty, neither past nor future enjoyment by the donee of the property evasively given to him was interfered with. It did not follow at all that because duty was made to attach on property validly transferred, it was also made to attach on property transferred in presenti and placed beyond the control of the transferor and within the immediate control of the transferee. It did not appear to their Lordships that an examination of the decisions in which the word "evade" had been the subject of comment led to any tangible result. Everybody agreed that the word was capable of being used in two senses—one which suggested underhand dealing and another which meant nothing more than the intentional avoidance of something disagreeable. Beyond that nothing was to be found having much bearing on the construction of the word, which depended entirely upon its use in the Colonial Acts. According to the majority of the Judges below, the Legislature of South Australia had enacted that every voluntary disposition of property, however honest and open, in favour of any person, however innocent or even ignorant of the transaction, might, if the motive of escaping succession duty could be traced to the disposer, be made liable to what everybody spoke of as and felt to be a penal tax; and that with no limit of time and with no limit of person such as was provided in section 14 of the Act of 1876. If a man for family or personal reasons conveyed a property in trust for an absent son and died ten years afterwards and it was shown then when the conveyance was contemplated, he said that an additional reason for making it would be avoidance of succession duties, then, according to that view of the Act, the owner of the property, whether the son or anybody claiming under him, would, though he might have been in enjoyment for years, find himself saddled with the tax doubled by way of penalty. It was quite true, as Mr. Justice Bunday intimated when he was pointing out the severity of the law, that Courts must nevertheless construe it according to its true meaning. But where there were two meanings each adequately satisfying the language, and great harshness was produced by one of them, that had legitimate influence in inclining the mind to the other. Now if the word "evade" be taken to signify some contrivance between donor and donee, that which was pointed out as the greatest harshness of the enactment would be removed or substantially reduced, seeing that the donee would be a party to the transaction which caused loss to him. It was more probable that the Legislature should have intended to use the word in that interpretation which least offended our sense of justice. Again, as regarded the difficult question of mixed motive. If the thing which constituted evasion was some contrivance between two or more persons, that was a substantial subject of inquiry with easily-defined limits. The question whether an apparent transfer was also a real one was a question which occurred not very rarely, and on which the evidence of actual dealings by the parties could usually be brought to bear. But if they were to dive into the motives of a person acting by himself, and to find out whether a desire to avoid a tax, which probably everybody thought desirable per se, was, when he gave away property, a dominant motive with him, or a substantial motive, or a minor motive, or any motive at all, that was an inquiry of a vague and indefinite kind. If the Legislature had ordered it there was no help, the Courts must obey as best they could, but they would certainly be led, as in this case, into the region of conjecture and the chances of error and injustice would be considerable. Other things being equal, it was preferable to suppose that the Legislature contemplated the more ordinary and tangible kind of judicial inquiry rather than the vaguer and more elusive one. Having regard to the language of the Act, to its connexion with the Act of 1876, and to the consequences of the two admissible constructions, their Lordships held that there was a strong preponderance of probability in favour of that which had been adopted by the Chief Justice. They thought that the law of 1893 had, as the previous law had, left people at liberty to dispose of their property during life so that it should not form part of their estates at death for the purpose of taxation or any other purpose. Against death-bed gifts the public Treasury was protected by section 17. Against sham disposals it was protected by section 27 on its narrower construction. Against real gifts on any large scale made while yet the ordinary expectation of life remained it had probably been considered in South Australia as elsewhere that there was sufficient protection in the general reluctance of mankind to part with their property to others. The Supreme Court should have dismissed the appeal to them with costs. That was the decree which their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty now to make in lieu of the decree appealed from. The respondent must pay the costs of the appeal.

OSBOEN V. VICKERS, SONS, AND MAXIM (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule 1, Clause 3—Medical Examination.

Clause 3 of Schedule 1 applies where no notice of an accident has in fact been given, but the employer waives the absence of notice.

In making an order for medical examination under Schedule 1, Clause 3, a County Court Judge has no power to order the employer to pay the fee of a doctor attending on the workman's behalf.

This was an appeal from the award of Judge Waddy, Q.C., sitting at the Sheffield County Court in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent, Robert David Osborn, was an iron planer in the employment of the appellants, Vickers, Sons, and Maxim (Limited), at the River Don Works, Sheffield, and on March 20, 1899, he was injured by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. His average weekly earnings had amounted to £2. The doctor attached to the appellants' firm, who was employed and paid by them, attended him. The appellants paid the respondent £1 a week from the first fortnight after the accident. In August another doctor was called in to examine him in consultation with the firm's medical man. On October 21 the firm's doctor reported that the respondent was completely recovered from the accident, and the appellants thereupon discontinued paying him the £1 a week. On December 5 the respondent filed with the Registrar of the County Court a request for arbitration to assess the compensation payable to him under the Act. No notice of the accident had been given. The appellants in their answer did not take the objection that no notice of the accident had been given, nor that the claim for compensation was not made within six months from the occurrence of the accident. They stated in their answer that they had paid compensation to the respondent from 14 days after the date of the accident up to October 21 at the rate of £1 per week, and they denied their liability to pay further compensation in respect of the injury on the ground that the respondent was not then suffering from the effects of the accident, and that if he was incapacitated from working it was from causes independent of and apart from the accident. The appellants thereupon desired to have the respondent examined by a medical man under Clause 3 of Schedule 1 to the Act, but the respondent's solicitor refused to consent unless the appellants paid the fee for the attendance of the respondent's medical man at the examination. On December 27 the appellants filed a supplemental answer stating the refusal of the respondent to submit himself to a medical examination as required by the appellants in accordance with Clause 3 of Schedule 1. The hearing of the arbitration was fixed for January 5, 1900, and upon that day the appellants applied for a stay of proceedings upon the ground that the respondent had refused to submit himself to a medical examination as required. The County Court Judge ordered that there should be no stay of proceedings, but that the respondent should submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner on the appellants' behalf, the appellants paying the respondent £1 ls. for the attendance of a medical practitioner on his behalf on such examination, and he adjourned the hearing of the arbitration. The appellants contended that the County Court Judge had no power to impose the condition that they should pay for the attendance of the respondent's medical man at the examination. By Clause 3 of Schedule 1, "Where a workman has given notice of an accident, he shall, if so required by the employer, submit himself for examination by a duly qualified medical practitioner provided and paid by the employer, and if he refuses to submit himself to such examination, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to compensation and any proceeding under this Act in relation to compensation shall be suspended until such examination takes place."

Mr. RUGGE, Q.C., and Mr. ARTHUR SIMS, for the appellants, contended that the County Court Judge had no power to impose the condition which he did. Clause 3 of Schedule 1 was imperative. The respondent could not say that the clause did not apply on the ground that no notice of the accident had been given. The appellants in their answer did not take that point, the sole question being whether the respondent had recovered from the effects of the accident, and therefore the case must be treated as if every step in the proceedings had been properly taken. If the appellants had intended to raise the point that no notice of the accident had been given, or that the claim for compensation was made too late, they would have been bound, under rule 17 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, to have taken the objection in their answer.

Mr. ISRAEL DAVIS, for the respondent, contended that Clause 3 did not apply, as no notice of the accident had been given. The clause was governed by the words, "Where a workman has given notice of an accident." He also contended that the Judge had a discretion under the clause to impose the condition. The respondent had already been examined by a medical man in the preceding August, and the Judge might well have thought that if the appellants wanted to have him examined again they should pay the respondent's expenses in the matter.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that in his opinion the County Court Judge was wrong. The application for the examination of the workman was made under Clause 3 of Schedule 1. The workman was injured by an accident while in the employment of his masters. No notice of the accident appeared to have been given, but the workman was attended by the doctor employed and paid by the masters. The workman was paid a weekly sum of £1, being 50 per cent. of his former average weekly earnings, for a considerable period after the accident. On one occasion a consultation took place between the doctor employed by the masters and another doctor who was called in to advise as to the treatment to be adopted. Then came the time when the doctor thought that the workman had recovered from the effects of the accident. The workman was of a different opinion, and proceedings were taken by him to have the compensation to which he claimed to be entitled under the Act of 1897 assessed by arbitration. No objection was taken by the masters that no notice of the accident had been given, nor that the claim for compensation was made after the expiration of six months from the occurrence of the accident. By section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1897, "proceedings for the recovery under the Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof. . . . and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or in case of death within six months from the time of death. Provided that the want of or any defect or inaccuracy in such notice shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings if it is found in the proceedings for settling the claim that the employer is not prejudiced in his defence by the want, defect, or inaccuracy, or that such want, defect, or inaccuracy was occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause." The workman having started these proceedings without giving notice of action, and after the six months had expired, now said that, notwithstanding that he was in default in not giving notice of the accident, he could now turn round and allege that it was a condition precedent to his examination by a medical man that he should have given notice of the accident. To his Lordship's mind that was an impossible position for the workman to take. In order to get rid of the vice of not having given notice of the accident the workman must be deemed to have shown, or the masters must be taken to have admitted, that the latter were not prejudiced by the want of notice. Therefore, the workman took these proceedings, subject to the right of the masters to insist upon his submitting himself to a medical examination as required by Clause 3 of Schedule 1, just as if notice of the accident had been given. In truth this point was taken for the first time in this Court. It was not taken before the County Court Judge. The application by the masters that the workman should submit himself to an examination by a medical man on their behalf was met at the hearing by a request that the order should only be made upon condition that the masters paid for the attendance of the workman's doctor at the examination. It was also said that the workman had been already medically examined by a doctor in August last on behalf of the masters. But that objection was quite irrelevant, because the doctor was called in for the benefit of the workman himself to consult with the doctor who was attending him as to his treatment. It was not an examination under any provision of the Act, but was only done by voluntary arrangement between the masters and the workman. If an obligation to submit to medical examination existed under the Act, it was immaterial that the workman had previously allowed himself to be examined by another medical man for a different purpose not under the Act. The masters therefore had a right to require the workman to be examined by a medical practitioner employed and paid by them. That being so, what jurisdiction had the County Court Judge to impose the condition that the masters should pay the fee of the workman's doctor for his attendance upon the examination? He (the Lord Justice) did not say that there might not be very special circumstances which would make it reasonable, and it might be almost necessary, on account of the state of health of the workman, to have the workman's own medical man present at the examination. That might be a possible case as to which he would say nothing. But no such case was made out here. The only point taken was that the County Court Judge had a right to impose the condition which he did when making the order. In his opinion, it was extra vires of the Judge to impose such a condition. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

STUART V. NIXON AND BRUCE.*

—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—

To come within the Act a workman who meets with an accident, fatal or otherwise, must have worked for his employer not less than two weeks.

This was an appeal from an award of the Liverpool County Court Judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant was the widow of a deceased workman who at the time of the accident causing his death was a stevedore's labourer in the employment of the respondents. The following are the admitted facts:—The deceased man was a casual labourer and had been employed by the respondents for five days continuously at daily wages. On the fifth day he was killed by an accident. The respondents were engaged as stevedores in loading a ship in the docks at Liverpool from the wharf by means of a winch worked by steam power, a derrick, and a fall, and they were in the occupation of the machinery. The deceased was on the day of the accident, in the course of his employment, finishing off a hold on board the ship, the hold having just been filled with cargo. The finishing off consisted in putting two iron cross beams across the hatchway. The beams had to be slung into position by means of the winch, derrick, and fall, which were all on board the ship. The deceased with three other men had put the port piece into position. The fore and aft piece was then slung, the fall was round it, and it was slung by the winch over the hatchway. The two pieces were made to fit by two cleats. The fall got entangled, and the deceased went to disentangle it, when the fore and aft beam canted and jerked him down into the hold. He died a few days afterwards from the effects of the accident. The County Court Judge held (1) that the Act of 1897, by reason of Schedule 1, Clause 1 (a), did not apply, as the deceased man had only been employed for five days by the respondents; (2) that the machinery was not, at the time of the accident, used in the process of loading the ship, as the cargo had been put on board, and the accident happened when the hatches were being put on to preserve the cargo from injury, and that therefore the machinery was not a “factory” within the meaning of section 7 of the Act. He accordingly made an award in favour of the respondents. Since the decision of the County Court Judge the Court of Appeal decided, in the case of “Sysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons (Limited)” (ante p. 250), that a workman who had been employed for less than two weeks and was injured did not come within the Act, Schedule 1, Clause 1 (b) not being applicable to such a case. By Schedule 1, Clause 1, “The amount of compensation under this Act shall be, (a) where death results from the injury, (i.) if the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings at the time of his death, a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, or the sum of £150, whichever of those sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case the sum of £300, provided that the amount of any weekly payments made under this Act shall be deducted from such sum, and if the period of the workman's employment by the said employer has been less than the said three years, then the amount of his earnings during the said three years shall be deemed to be 156 times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment under the said employer.”

Mr. LESLIE SCOTT (Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), for the appellant, said that the first part of Clause 1 (a) (i.) of Schedule 1 gave compensation equal to the workman's earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, the maximum sum not to exceed £300 and the minimum sum to be £150. That was the important part of the clause. The rest of the clause merely provided a mode of calculating the workman's weekly earnings where a calculation was necessary. The right to compensation was given by section 1 of the Act, the schedule merely stating what should be the amount of compensation. In the present case no calculation was necessary, as the appellant was entitled to the minimum compensation of £150. The decision in “Sysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons” (ante p. 250) turned upon Clause 1 (b) of Schedule 1, where the language was different. The County Court Judge was, therefore, wrong upon his point. (The Court intimated that they were against the appellant upon the first point, and that, therefore, it was not necessary to argue the second question.)

Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., and Mr. A. G. Steel, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that, in his opinion, the appeal must be dismissed. The question was whether the case of a labourer, who was employed only for one day, taking an extreme case, and who met with his death by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment on that day, came within the Act. It was contended that the decision in “Sysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons” did not govern the present case. In that case the workman, who was injured, but not killed by an accident, had, at the time of the accident, been employed by the same employer for a period less than two weeks. It was said that the observations of the Court in that case upon Clause 1 (a) (i.) were merely obiter dicta, and did not decide the present case, and that the appellant was entitled to compensation to an amount not less than £150. He (the Lord Justice), and he thought he could also speak for Lord Justice A. L. Smith, arrived at the conclusion, taking all the sections and provisions of the Act together, that the Legislature could not have intended to introduce labourers of this class into the Act. He was not pressed with the difficulties of this view suggested in the argument. He could not follow the difficulties. He did not think that Clause 1 of Schedule 1 created any real difficulty of construction at all. Its meaning was reasonably simple. The first part of Clause 1, which dealt with the death of a workman, contemplated in the first place that the workman should have been in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury causing his death. If his earnings during those three years amounted to or exceeded £300, the workman's dependants would get that sum. If his earnings did not amount to £300, then they would get the amount of his earnings, the minimum sum being fixed at £150. So far the clause related to employment by the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury. The next part of the clause dealt with a case where the employment was for less than three years. The Act said that in such a case “the amount of his earnings during the said three years shall be deemed to be 156 times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment under the said employer.” The compensation was based upon the average weekly earnings during the period short of three years. That was subject to this, that the employment must have lasted for at least two weeks. He did not say that it was absolutely necessary that the workman must have been employed every day during those two weeks, but the employment must be such as to form the basis for the calculation of average weekly earnings. That was the reasoning adopted by this Court in "Sysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons." It would be most anomalous to hold that a casual workman who was injured by an accident not resulting in death would not be entitled to any compensation, whereas, if the workman died from the effects of the accident, his dependants would be entitled to compensation. If that were the true view of the statute, a workman who after an accident lingered for some time between life and death would during that time be in a position in which he would not know whether compensation would eventually be payable or not. In his opinion, the case was covered by the decision in "Sysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons."

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred. They ought to construe the Act upon the basis that workmen who were not in the employment of the same employer for at least two weeks did not come within the purview of the Act.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed that the case was governed by the reasoning upon which "Sysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons" was decided.

PEARCE V. LONDON AND SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Master and servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, sec. 4—Sub-contractors—Exceptions from liability—"Work which is merely . . . incidental to . . . the trade . . . carried on by the undertakers."

This was an appeal from the award of the Southwark County Court Judge in proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The appellant was a painter in the employment of Messrs. Perry and Co., who were builders and contractors. Messrs. Perry and Co. had entered into a contract with the respondents, the London and South-Western Railway Company, to do such work in the way of altering, repairing, and painting the respondents' stations in the London district as they might be directed to do by the district engineer at a fixed schedule of prices. Messrs. Perry and Co. were engaged under this contract in reconstructing Hampton Court Station, and the appellant was employed by them on the work. While so employed the appellant was injured by an engine belonging to the respondents. The appellant contended that the respondents, though not his employers, were liable under section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, to pay compensation. The County Court Judge held that the respondents were not liable to pay compensation, because the operation of section 4 was excluded by the clause at the end, the building of a station being "no part of or process in the trade or business carried on by" the railway company, but being "merely ancillary or incidental" thereto. He therefore made an award in favour of the respondents. The County Court Judge also found that the accident arose "in the course of" the appellant's employment, but did not arise "out of" his employment. Upon that ground also he decided in favour of the respondents, but as it became unnecessary to argue this point in the Court of Appeal, and as they expressed no opinion upon it, the facts relating to it are omitted from this report. By section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897:—"Where, in an employment to which this Act applies, the undertakers as hereinafter defined contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work, and the undertakers would, if such work were executed by workmen immediately employed by them, be liable to pay compensation under this Act to those workmen in respect of any accident arising out of and in the course of their employment, the undertakers shall be liable to pay to any workman employed in the execution of the work any compensation which is payable to the workman (whether under this Act or in respect of personal negligence or wilful act independently of this Act) by such contractor, or would be so payable if such contractor were an employer to whom this Act applies. Provided that the undertakers shall be entitled to be indemnified by any other person who would have been liable independently of this section. This section shall not apply to any contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work which is merely ancillary or incidental to, and is no part of, or process in, the trade or business carried on by such undertakers respectively."

Mr. J. D. CRAWFORD, for the appellant, contended that section 4 of the Act applied to this case. The "undertakers," in the case of a railway, were defined by section 7, subsection 2, to mean the railway company. The railway company had entered into a contract with a contractor to do certain work at their station, and section 4 made them liable to pay compensation for an accident to a workman employed by the contractor in the execution of the work, if they would have been liable to pay compensation had such work been executed by their own workmen. The last clause of the section, however, provided that the section was not to apply to any contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work which was merely ancillary or incidental to, and was no part of or process in, the trade or business carried on by the undertakers. The reconstruction of the station was part of the business of the railway company, and was not merely ancillary or incidental thereto. The business of a railway company was to carry passengers and goods and to provide reasonable accommodation for that purpose. A station was a reasonable accommodation to provide. The County Court Judge was, therefore, wrong.

Mr. J. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. R. B. D. Acland, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that, in his opinion, the learned County Court Judge was right. The appellant was in the employment of a contractor who was, under a contract with the railway company, engaged in rebuilding Hampton Court Station. He would assume that the accident to the appellant arose out of and in the course of his employment. Inasmuch as he was not employed by the railway company he could only make them liable under section 4 of the Act. That section was clearly an enabling section. It conferred a special boon in certain cases. If the section had stopped before the proviso, a liability would, in his opinion, have been imposed upon the railway company under the section. It was not unnatural, however, to find that the boon thus conferred was clogged with a condition. The last clause in the section contained the condition. The section was not to apply to a contract with any person for the execution by or under such contractor of any work which was merely ancillary or incidental to, and was no part of or process in, the trade or business carried on by the railway company. In his opinion, it would be difficult to find a better illustration than the present of work which was merely ancillary or incidental to the business of a railway company as distinguished from work which was part of the actual business of the company. It was easy in certain cases to imagine a contract for work which was part of the business or trade of certain undertakers. But it was difficult to imagine such a contract in the case of a railway company. It was difficult to imagine a railway company entering into a contract with a contractor to work their engines upon their line for them. The business of a railway company was to carry passengers and goods. That was their primary duty. The erection of a station was no part of or process in the trade or business carried on by a railway company. There was no obligation upon a railway company, apart from any special obligation assumed by them under their Acts, to place a station at any intermediate spot on their line. Their trade and business was to carry passengers and goods from one place to another. The construction of the station was not part of the main work of the company, but was merely ancillary or incidental to it. It was, therefore, "no part of or process in the trade or business carried on by" the company. The County Court Judge was therefore right.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Metropolis—Tramways—County Council—London County Tramways Act, 1896.

The London County Council have no power to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors in connexion with their tramways.

The trial of this action was shortly reported in The Times of the 23rd ult.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Blaiklock were for the plaintiff; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Methold for the defendants.

His LORDSHIP read the following judgment:—This is an action by the Attorney-General on the relation of a large number of the omnibus proprietors of London against the London County Council, seeking a declaration that it is beyond the powers of the London County Council to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors in connexion with their tramways, or to apply the county fund for the purpose of maintaining and working omnibuses and for consequential relief. It was argued that the Court ought not to apply the doctrine of ultra vires to a public body such as the London County Council, but it seems to me that there is no foundation for this contention. The County Council is a body created by statute, and to every such statutory creation the language used by Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords with reference to a railway company in "Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company" (5 App. Cas., 481) applies. "Where there is an Act of Parliament creating a corporation for a particular purpose and giving it powers for that particular purpose, what it does not expressly or impliedly authorize is to be taken to be prohibited." And Lord Watson at p. 486 uses almost the same language. This principle was applied to the School Board for London in "Reg. v. Reed" (5 Q.B.D., 483), and I think it must be applicable to the London County Council in their character of owners of the tramways. The question is, however, of an academical character, for the jurisdiction of the Court to restrain the application of public funds to unauthorized purposes, apart from the doctrine of ultra vires, is too well established to admit of dispute, and it was not challenged before me. See "Mayor of Newcastle v. Attorney-General" (1892, A.C., 568). It was also urged that the Court ought to give a more liberal construction to the powers conferred upon a public body for the public benefit than it is in the habit of giving to similar powers claimed by companies trading for gain. I am not satisfied that this distinction is well founded. In each case a reasonable construction ought to be put upon the language of the document conferring the powers, whether it is a statute, or a charter, or a memorandum of association. Tramways are made by virtue of special Acts or provisional orders, and Parliament has, when the promoters are not the local authority, given to the local authority a power of compulsory purchase of "the tramway and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within the district." This power can only be exercised on notice at the expiration of certain periods of years and upon terms of payment which have been the subject of litigation, but which are not material for the present case. The London County Council are the local authority for this purpose. The local authority has in general no power to work any tramways they may purchase. In the year 1896 the London County Tramway Act, 1896, was passed. It contains the following recitals:—"And whereas there are in force within the county of London other local Acts authorizing tramway undertakings (all or some of which are mentioned in the schedule to this Act) under and by virtue of which Acts the Council have, or claim to have, powers to purchase at the expiration of certain periods the several tramways and undertakings thereby respectively authorized, so far as they are within the county of London, but some of the said Acts confer no powers on the Council for the working of the said tramways after they have been purchased. And whereas the Council are proceeding to give effect to the powers of purchase so conferred upon them with respect to the tramway undertakings authorized by the Acts and provisional orders mentioned in Part II. of the schedule to this Act. And whereas it is expedient that powers such as are in this Act contained should be conferred on the Council for the working of the tramways authorized by the local Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act as and when such tramways are acquired by the Council." And section 2 is in the following words:—"It shall be lawful for the Council to exercise with respect to any tramways authorized by the local Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act, which have been or shall be purchased or acquired by them under their statutory powers, the same powers of making such tramways respectively as were possessed by the company or companies respectively owning such tramways, and the Council may provide, place, and run carriages thereon and provide such horses, cars, fixed and movable plant, harness, and apparatus as may be requisite or convenient for enabling the Council to exercise such powers, and they may employ such persons as may be requisite or convenient for working the tramways for the time being worked by them." Section 10 is as follows:—"All costs and expenses of the Council in the execution of this Act (except so far as they may be otherwise provided for by this or any other Act) shall be defrayed as payments for general county purposes within the meaning of the Local Government Act, 1888, and the costs, charges, and expenses preliminary to and of and incidental to the preparing, applying for, obtaining, and passing of this Act shall be paid by the Council in like manner." Before this Act of 1896 the County Council had no power to work tramways which they might purchase, and both before and after that Act they could only purchase tramway undertakings. For example, they could not purchase the whole of the undertaking of the limited company which owned in 1896 the tramways mentioned in the schedule to the Act of 1896, and whose objects, as defined by its memorandum of association, extended beyond the owning and working of tramways. The actual terms of purchase were settled by an agreement dated December 27, 1898. From the beginning of 1899 the London County Council have worked the purchased tramways. The tramways, to which alone my attention has been called, are three on the south side of the Thames. The County Council run omnibuses from the south side of Blackfriars-bridge, where one tramway ends, across the bridge to Farringdon-street, and vice versa. They also run omnibuses from the south side of Waterloo-bridge, where a second tramway ends, across Waterloo-bridge, along the Strand, down Whitehall, and across Westminster-bridge to the place where a third tramway ends and vice versa. A halfpenny fare is charged for each omnibus journey or part of a journey. The question I have to decide is whether it is competent to the County Council to run these omnibuses. It is admitted that moneys raised by or on the security of rates have been applied for the purchase and working of the omnibuses. My attention has been called to a number of statutes, but in the result it seems that the County Council can only justify their action by reference to section 2 of the Act of 1896. It is said, and I have no doubt with truth, that it is convenient to passengers by the tramways to have a cheap conveyance to the north side of the Thames and along the Strand. I do not doubt that the traffic on the tramways is increased by reason of these omnibuses. The course adopted by the County Council in this respect is that which was followed by the limited company, the former owners of the tramways, except that the limited company did not run omnibuses along the Strand, but only ran omnibuses across each of the three bridges and back. The word "convenient" occurs twice in the section—"Convenient for enabling the Council to exercise such powers" and "convenient for working the tramways." In neither place does it mean convenient to the public or for the advantage of the public. The tramways which alone the County Council were empowered to purchase have certain definite limits at the southern and northern ends. Within those termini the County Council may, in the language of the section, "work" the tramways and convey passengers in tramcars. There are many things fairly incidental to this which they may do, and, indeed, must do. They may have stables and sheds for their horses and cars, they may have carts and horses to convey forage to their stables. In short, anything reasonably proper for the "working" of the tramways is within their powers. Anything not falling within this definition is outside their powers. It seems to me that the London County Council are really carrying on a separate and distinct business as omnibus proprietors. They do not, and they cannot lawfully, convey in their omnibuses only passengers from and to their tramways. By the Act of 1843 for regulating hackney and stage carriages in and near London they are bound to take any passenger who desires a ride and is willing to pay a halfpenny, provided there is a vacant seat. The running of omnibuses in the streets of London is certainly not expressly authorized by the Act of 1896, and in my opinion it is not impliedly authorized. It is not for me to consider whether the business of omnibus proprietors is one which may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of working the tramways. Parliament has, in the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, recognized this as a ground for altering and enlarging the memorandum of association of a company. The Act of 1890 has, of course, no direct application to the present case. I refer to it only as a statutory recognition of the doctrine that, however convenient or advantageous may be the combination of a new business with an authorized business, such combination or connexion may nevertheless be ultra vires. The result is that I must make a declaration in the terms of the claim, and I will give liberty to apply. The defendants must pay the costs of the action. I do not propose to grant an injunction unless the plaintiffs insist upon it.

Mr. MACNAGHTEN.—A declaration will be no doubt attended to.

Mr. VERNON SMITH.—I need not therefore ask for a suspension to allow an appeal.

THE QUEEN V. THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD AND THE GUARDIANS OF WILLESDEN (EX PARTE THE GUARDIANS OF HENDON).*

Poor Law—Alteration of Union—Apportionment of Annuities—Poor Law Act, 1834, sec. 32—Poor Law Act, 1844, sec. 66.

In this case cause was shown by the Local Government Board and the Willesden Board of Guardians against a rule for a certiorari to quash an order made by the Local Government Board under section 32 of the Poor Law Act, 1834. Before August, 1896, the Hendon Union had comprised the parish of Willesden. On August 12 of that year the parish of Willesden was separated from the Hendon Union by an order of the Local Government Board made pursuant to section 32 of the Poor Law Act, 1834, as amended by section 66 of the Poor Law Act, 1844, and on the following day, by a further order of the Board, the parish of Willesden was constituted a Poor Law district. Thereupon it became the duty of the Local Government Board to ascertain the proportionate value to the parish of Willesden of the workhouses of the Hendon Union and of "other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers therein," and to "fix the amount to be received, or paid or secured to be paid, by" the parish, pursuant to section 32 of the Act of 1834. Under and by virtue of section 24 (2) (d) of the Local Government Act, 1888, since March, 1889, there had been payable by the County Council of Middlesex to the Hendon Union the annual sum of £18 towards the remuneration of registrars of births and deaths, and, under and by virtue of section 26 (1) of the same Act, there had been payable the sum of £2,597, to be expended on the salaries, remuneration, and superannuation allowances of the officers of the Hendon Union (other than teachers in the Poor Law schools), and on drugs and medical appliances. By an order dated December 23, 1898 (the order now sought to be quashed), the Board ordered inter alia as follows :—

 "As and when the sums of £18 and £2,597 are received by the guardians of the poor of the said Hendon Union from the County of Middlesex in pursuance of the provisions of section 24 (2) (d) and section 26 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1888, in respect of the financial year ended March 31, 1899, and in respect of each succeeding financial year, such sums as shall be apportioned by the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union between the Hendon Union and the parish of Willesden according to the respective rateable values of the union and parish for the purposes of the poor-rate, according to the valuation lists in force on the 25th day of March next preceding the financial year in respect of which the payment is made, and the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union shall forthwith pay to the guardians of the poor of the parish of Willesden the amount so apportioned to that parish." It was sought on behalf of the Hendon Union to quash this order on the ground, first, that the Local Government Board had no jurisdiction to apportion the sums to be received by the Hendon Union from the county council at all, because they were not "property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or the benefit of the ratepayers therein" within the meaning of section 32 of the Act of 1834, and on the ground, secondly, that, assuming the Board had such jurisdiction, they had exercised it improperly, because the mode of apportionment adopted by them did not, in the words of the Act, fix the amount to be received by the parish.

The Attorney-General and Mr. H. Sutton appeared to show cause on behalf of the Local Government Board; and Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., on behalf of the Guardians of Willesden; Mr. Page, Q.C., and Mr. Bartley Dennis appeared in support of the rule on behalf of the Guardians of the Hendon Union.

The COURT discharged the rule.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the first question was whether the Local Government Board had jurisdiction to make the order which was sought to be quashed. It appeared that the County Council of Middlesex in 1889 became, by virtue of the Local Government Act of 1888, liable to make to the old Hendon Union two fixed annual payments. Since then the parish of Willesden had been carved out of the Hendon Union, and now formed a separate Poor Law district. It then became necessary to apply the provisions of section 32 of the Act of 1834 in order to ascertain what should be paid by the union which retained the joint property to the parish which was severed from it. It was said that the two annuities payable by the County Council to the old union were not "property" within the meaning of section 32, and that the Board had therefore no jurisdiction to deal with them. He could not agree to that proposition. He could not see why a fixed sum paid annually by the County Council to the union was not property. It was money received as of right, and to be used in relief of the poor-rates and for the benefit of the ratepayers. It was as much property as the rents of any freehold land. If, then, these annuities were property of the kind indicated in section 32 it was the duty of the Board to ascertain their value. The order in question did not, however, deal with that duty, but with the subsequent duty of fixing the apportionment of the annuities between the two bodies. What the Board did was to say that the Hendon Union should retain the annuities and to lay down what amount out of the annuities should be paid by the Hendon Union to the parish of Willesden. They said that that amount should be ascertained from year to year by reference to the respective rateable values of the two bodies in each year. That was a reasonable arrangement, and it was an order fixing the amount to be paid within section 32, for it ordered a payment year by year on a basis ascertainable in each year.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that section 32 of the Act of 1834 was intended to provide for all necessary adjustments between unions and parishes severed from them. The provision was put in general words because it was impossible to say beforehand what sort of property would have to be divided. The only serious question was whether the order of the Board could be said to be a fixing the amount to be received by the parish. If in fixing the amount of a yearly payment some outside basis of calculation were used, as when tithe rent-charges were fixed by reference to the price of corn or a rate of interest was fixed at 1 per cent. above the Bank rate, then there could be no doubt that that would constitute a fixing the amount of the payment. The difficulty here was that the Local Government Board had fixed the payments by reference to a matter which it was the object of the Act to put an end to, for one of the objects of the Act was to make the divided parishes independent of the increase or decrease in rateable value of each other. This consideration caused his Lordship to have doubts, but they were not such as to justify him in differing from his learned brother in discharging the rule.

ALEXANDER V. THE AUTOMATIC TELEPHONE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Directors—Breach of duty—Liability to pay for shares.

Directors of a company who so use their powers as to obtain benefits for themselves at the expense of the shareholders, without informing them of the fact, cannot retain such benefits, and must account for them to the company.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Cosens-Hardy (reported in The Times of May 13, 1899). The appeal was heard on March 20 and 22 last, when judgment was reserved. The action was brought by Messrs. M. J. Alexander and J. D. Gibbs, "suing on behalf of themselves and all the other shareholders" in the defendant company, against the company and three of its directors—viz., Messrs. Max Margowski, J. Woolf Cohen, and H. G. Sworn. The other members of the board were the two plaintiffs. The company was incorporated on July 1, 1897, with a capital of £100,000 in shares of 5s. each. The eight signatories to its memorandum of association were Margowski for 19,400 shares, the same gentleman as managing director of the Honduras Government Banking and Trading Company (Limited) for 6,000 shares, the plaintiff Alexander for ten shares, the plaintiff Gibbs for ten shares, Baron Cohen for ten shares, Justin Mandelson for ten shares, the defendant Cohen for 200 shares, and the defendant Sworn for 800 shares. Clause 5 of the articles of association provided that the shares of the company should be "under the control of the directors, who may, subject to the terms of the company's memorandum of association, issue, allot, or otherwise dispose of the same to such persons, for such consideration, and upon such terms and conditions as the board may determine . . . and may make arrangements on the issue of shares for a difference between the holders of such shares in the amount of calls to be paid and in the time of payment of such calls." The last words of the clause are, it should be observed, justified by section 24 of the Companies Act, 1867. Article 13 provided that the directors might "(subject to any special terms made on allotment) from time to time make such calls upon the members in respect of all moneys unpaid on their shares as they think fit, provided that one month's notice at least is given of the time and place for payment, and that no one call shall exceed 20 per cent. of the nominal amount of the shares, and that such calls shall be made at intervals of not less than one month." The memorandum shares and a number of other shares were allotted, and on all of them, except those held by Margowski, J. W. Cohen, Sworn, and the Honduras Company, the sum of 3s. payable on allotment had been paid. In respect of the excepted shares the plaintiffs alleged that only £784 in all had been paid, and that on these shares there was still due and payable the sum of £3,176, and the plaintiffs complained that the three defendant directors, being a majority of the board, were able to, and did, control its action by their votes, and in breach of their duty as directors and against the interests of the defendant company prevented the passing of resolutions or taking steps to enforce payment by those defendants or the Honduras Company (in which they were said to be interested) of the amounts due on their shares and the shares held by the Honduras Company. This, however, the plaintiffs complained, did not prevent the defendant directors by means of their voting power making a further call of 1s. per share, and the plaintiffs' case was that the defendant directors were acting in furtherance of their own interests and in fraud of the rights of the other shareholders, and were using the powers entrusted to them as directors for their own ends, and not for the benefit of the company. It was also alleged that the defendant directors had control of the majority of the votes of the shareholders of the defendant company. The plaintiffs accordingly asked for a declaration that the holders of the memorandum shares were bound to pay up 3s. per share—viz., 6d. on application and 2s. 6d. on allotment, in the same way as the holders of other shares. For the defence it was pleaded that on June 30, 1897, before the company was incorporated, it was agreed at a meeting of the signatories that nothing should be payable by any of the defendant directors or the Honduras Company on application or allotment in respect of their memorandum shares, and that the memorandum was signed by them on this condition; that at a board meeting, after incorporation—viz., on July 5, 1897, two resolutions were passed (both plaintiffs being present and voting in their favour) for the allotment of shares; that by the first resolution the memorandum shares were allotted without requiring any payment on allotment, and that by the second resolution a payment of 2s. 6d. per share in respect of other shares was required on allotment, 6d. per share having been already paid on application for these shares. The defendant directors also said that they were acting under the articles and in the interests of the company, and had committed no breach of duty. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy thought that the action was misconceived, since it proceeded upon the fallacy that there was an immediate debt due from every member of the company in respect of uncalled capital. It was not correct to say that the signatories to the memorandum of association became debtors to the company to the full amount of the shares. Their position was that they became subject to article 13; but upon the true construction of that article it was for those who alleged any obligation to pay otherwise than on account of the calls made at due intervals and with due notice to prove some other special terms or bargain. The allotment in respect of these signatories was made on the terms that nothing should be payable on application or allotment. The plaintiffs were attempting to alter the entire contract entered into between the company and the signatories, and to make members pay for shares otherwise than in accordance with the articles. The action failed, and must be dismissed with costs. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Rawlinson, Q.C., and Mr. Harry Dobb were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Frank Russell for the company and Mr. Margowski; and Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. W. F. Hamilton, Q.C., for the defendant Mr. Sworn. The defendant Mr. J. W. Cohen appeared in person.

The COURT now allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the following judgment:—Subscribers to a memorandum of association of a company limited by shares are liable, and only liable, by virtue of their subscription to pay up the amount of their shares as and when called up. The times when payments are to be made and the amounts to be paid are not prescribed by statute, except by section 38 of the Companies Act, 1862, which only comes into operation when the company is being wound up. But until the commencement of the winding up of the company the times and amounts of payment depend, apart from express agreement between the company and the signatories, on the company's articles of association. In the absence of other articles, table A will be applicable. That this is the true position of those who sign the memorandum of association is perfectly plain from the Companies Act, 1862, sections 8, 11, 14, 15, 23, and 38, and table A, articles 4—7. A subscriber of a memorandum becomes by section 23 a member in respect of the number of shares subscribed for by him, without any further application by him or allotment of shares to him. But as by section 22 all shares have to be numbered, and the numbers must be entered in the register (see section 25), there must be an appropriation to each subscriber of the proper number of shares properly numbered, not to constitute him a member, but to enable a proper register to be kept, and proper certificates to be given and transfers made. See sections 22, 25, and 31, and table A, articles 2, 3, and 8—16. It follows from this that, in the absence of any special agreement or article requiring a subscriber of a memorandum of association to make some payment on subscription or allotment, nothing is payable by him as a subscriber in respect of his shares until calls are made upon them. This is the strength of the defendants' case. Further, if more shares than those taken by the subscribers of the memorandum are issued by the directors, there is nothing to prevent them from offering those shares on such terms as regards payment to the company on application and allotment as the directors may think expedient. Payments so required to be made are not calls, because the payments are to be made by persons who are not yet members; but, when made, those payments must be treated, unless otherwise agreed, as payments on account of the nominal capital of the company, and as reducing pro tanto the liability of those who pay. Such persons have nothing to complain of if they pay according to their bargain, and the subscribers of the memorandum pay according to theirs. This is the weakness of the plaintiffs' case. From this point of view the plaintiffs have no ground of complaint, and the decision appealed from is unimpeachable. But there is another point of view from which the case must be regarded. There are other elements in the case which have to be taken into consideration, and on which the plaintiffs strongly rely. The directors, who had subscribed the memorandum for an unusually large number of shares, issued shares to other persons on the terms that 6d. per share should be paid on application and 2s. 6d. per share on allotment—i.e., 3s. per share had to be paid by the allottees, whilst the directors themselves paid nothing in respect of their own shares. The directors, in fact, so managed matters as to place themselves in a better position as regards payment than the other shareholders, and they did so without informing the other shareholders of the fact. This, the plaintiffs contend, was a breach of duty on the part of the directors to those who applied for and took shares upon the faith that the directors were not obtaining advantages at their expense. It is no answer to the plaintiffs' case so put to appeal to the contracts alone, for the charge is that the directors were guilty of a breach of duty in procuring those contracts and in taking advantage of them so as to benefit themselves at the expense of the other shareholders. In the statement of claim and in the Court below the defendants were charged with deliberate fraud; but this charge was ultimately abandoned in the Court below, and, having been abandoned, it cannot be brought forward again, or be listened to on appeal. But, apart from all fraud, and although the directors acted in the belief that they were doing nothing wrong, there may, nevertheless, have been a breach of duty such as is relied upon, and it is necessary to consider whether there was or was not. The company was registered on July 1, 1897. On June 30 the memorandum of association was signed and the subscribers had a meeting at which, it is said, they agreed that the defendants should pay nothing in respect of their shares on allotment. Such an agreement, if come to, could not, of course, bind the company, which was not then formed. But the defendants say that the plaintiffs Alexander and Gibbs were then told that the defendants were not to pay up anything on their shares on allotment, and that the plaintiffs assented to this arrangement. The plaintiffs emphatically deny that they knew of or assented to any such arrangement. On July 5 the first meeting of the directors was held, and on that day two resolutions were passed. One was that the shares subscribed for by those who signed the memorandum of association should be allotted to them. The resolution treats them as applying for 26,440 shares of 5s. each, and of having those shares allotted to them in the quantities applied for by each, "as per applications and allotment sheet marked A now signed by the chairman." This showed that three of those subscribers of ten shares each—viz., Alexander, Gibbs, and Baron Cohen, had paid up or were to pay up 3s. per share in respect of their 5s. shares. There was nothing to show that the other subscribers had paid or were to pay anything on their shares. There was a conflict of evidence at the trial as to whether the defendants did or did not explain to their co-directors that they did not intend to pay up 3s. on their shares. The plaintiffs Alexander and Gibbs distinctly deny that they were told anything of the sort. They deny that they saw the sheet A. The defendant Cohen and the secretary say that it was explained that the others did not intend to pay, and that the sheet A was produced. The learned Judge finds that Alexander and Gibbs knew of the resolution and concurred in it, but he does not say that these gentlemen are not to be believed when they deny that they were informed that the other directors were not going to pay. So far as it is necessary for the defendants to rely on any agreement exempting them from liability to pay 3s. like other shareholders, I am of opinion that they fail in proving such an agreement. The resolution of the 5th of July to which I am referring did not by itself, and apart from the conduct of the defendants as directors, either increase or diminish the defendants' liability as subscribers of the memorandum of association. It simply carried out what their subscription involved. The other resolution passed at the same meeting was to allot 9,560 shares to persons who had applied for them on payment of 2s. 6d. per share. This was in addition to 6d. per share already paid on application. Other shares have been issued on similar terms. Both the plaintiffs Alexander and Gibbs are holders of shares besides those for which they subscribed the memorandum of association; and they paid up 3s. per share for all of them on allotment. So far, therefore, they are in the same position as all the other shareholders except the defendants. The fact, however, that three subscribers of the memorandum paid 3s. on their shares whilst the defendants did not, is difficult to reconcile with the existence of any understanding that all the subscribers should stand on their strict legal rights. The defendants rely on Article 5 as entitling the directors to issue shares on any terms they think expedient, and to make differences between some shareholders and others. But this, I am satisfied, is an afterthought. The defendants were not in fact acting on this article at all. But, even if they did, this article would not, in my opinion, justify them in making a difference in their own favour without disclosing the fact to the shareholders and obtaining their consent to the arrangement. The Court of Chancery has always exacted from directors the observance of good faith towards their shareholders and towards those who take shares from the company and become co-adventurers with themselves and others who may join them. The maxim caveat emptor has no application to such cases, and directors who so use their powers as to obtain benefits for themselves at the expense of the shareholders, without informing them of the fact, cannot retain those benefits and must account for them to the company, so that all the shareholders may participate in them. "Gilbert's case" (L.R., 5 Ch., 559) is only one of many instances illustrating this principle. In this case there is no question that, by obtaining 3s. a share from the other shareholders and paying nothing themselves, the defendants threw upon the other shareholders a burden which they did not share themselves. It is true that by Article 121 dividends were only payable in proportion to the amounts paid up on the shares; and as regards dividends, had there been any the defendants would have been at a disadvantage. But the advantage they obtained at the expense of the other shareholders was the advantage of deferring their own contributions to the funds of the company at the expense of the other shareholders. This, in my opinion, was a clear breach of duty, unless the other shareholders knew of it and sanctioned it. The defendants say that the memorandum and articles, which named the first directors, gave notice to all the shareholders that nothing was payable by the defendants except when calls were made on their shares. The defendants further say that, at all events, the plaintiffs Alexander and Gibbs knew and assented to what was done, and that this action, therefore, cannot be sustained by them. As regards the notice given by the memorandum and the articles to the shareholders generally, I am clearly of opinion that they give no notice of anything except what they expressly state; they give no notice at all that the directors would so exercise their powers, and so act towards their shareholders, as to benefit themselves at their expense. It is impossible to come to the conclusion that the applicants for shares knew of, or sanctioned the conduct of which they now complain. The next question is, whether the plaintiffs Alexander and Gibbs knew of and assented to any arrangement to the effect that the defendants should be in a better position than themselves and other shareholders as regards payment on allotment. As already stated, the plaintiffs emphatically deny that they knew anything of the sort, and they say that they first discovered in July or August, 1898, that the defendants had not paid up 3s. on allotment like other shareholders. They say that they were unable to see the books and ascertain the facts before that time. They say, and Rhodes, the solicitor, confirms them, that nothing was said when the memorandum of association was signed on June 30, 1897, about not paying like other shareholders; and the plaintiffs say that nothing was said about it when the allotment was made on July 5, 1897. Against this must be set the resolutions then passed, and the testimony of Mr. Cohen and Mendelson, the secretary of the company. I have already referred to the resolutions and the sheet A. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy was so struck by these that, before hearing Cohen's evidence, he intimated that he was in favour of the defendants. That would certainly not be my own view. But Cohen's evidence must be considered. [His Lordship reviewed the evidence and continued.] In this state of the evidence the only conclusion I can come to is that there was some understanding between some of the persons who signed the memorandum of association that Margowski and one or two of his friends should be treated differently from other shareholders as regards payment on allotment, but that neither the plaintiffs nor any of the other shareholders, except Margowski and his friends, ever knew of or assented to the use they made of their powers to secure for themselves advantages as to payment at the expense of their co-adventurers. Having carefully read the shorthand notes of the proceedings in the Court below, I cannot help thinking that Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy placed too much stress on the resolutions, and treated them as conveying more information than they really were calculated to convey or did convey to the plaintiffs. If the learned Judge had said that he did not believe the plaintiffs, and believed Cohen and Mendelson rather than the plaintiffs, I should feel more difficulty than I do. But the learned Judge has not said that he disbelieved the plaintiffs, and I certainly see no reason for doing so. Upon the merits of the case I come to the conclusion that a breach of duty by the directors to the company and the other shareholders in it has been established. It is necessary, however, to consider the form of the act, and the relief which can be given. The breach of duty to the company consists in depriving the company of the use of the money which the directors ought to have paid up sooner than they did. I cannot regard the case as one of mere internal management which, according to "Foss v. Harbottle" (2 Hare, 461) and numerous other cases, the Court leaves the shareholders to settle amongst themselves. It was ascertained and admitted at the trial that, when this action was commenced, the defendants held such a preponderance of shares that they could not be controlled by the other shareholders. Under these circumstances an action by some shareholders on behalf of themselves and others against the defendants is in accordance with the authorities, and is unobjectionable in form. See "Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Co." (L.R., 9 Ch., 350). An action in this form is far preferable to an action in the name of the company, and then a fight as to the right to use the name. But this last mode of procedure is the only other open to a minority of shareholders in cases like the present. Apart, however, from the form of the action, the defendants contended that, having regard to the pleadings and to the calls made and paid since the action was brought, and to what took place at the trial, no relief could now be given to the plaintiffs. I have looked very carefully at the pleadings, and have observed that Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy gave the plaintiffs leave to amend their claim by introducing into it the facts stated in their reply to the defence put in by the defendants Margowski and Cohen.

Paragraph 6 of this reply raises the point proved at the trial—that the directors practically controlled the voting power of the company. Mr. Eve, who, in the Court below, placed the plaintiffs' case on its true equitable basis, gave up the charges of actual fraud, and, calls having been made and paid, he did not ask for an injunction or a receiver. But he pressed for a declaration to the effect that the defendants ought to have paid up 3s. per share on their shares on allotment. This was never abandoned. Having regard to the facts alleged in the plaintiffs' statement of claim and in their reply, and to the leave to amend, and to the mode in which the plaintiffs' counsel opened the plaintiffs' case, and urged the breach of duty of the defendants, I do not think that the defendants can successfully maintain that they have to meet on appeal a really different case from that which was made in the Court below. The plaintiffs' case was obscured by charges of fraud, and by being based in their pleadings, and to some extent in argument, on legal rather than on equitable grounds. But the facts which constitute the plaintiffs' case are set out in the pleadings, and were fully investigated in the Court below; and Mr. Eve more than once put the plaintiffs' case on its true basis. The plaintiffs' statement of claim is full of charges of fraud. These have been abandoned, and the plaintiffs must pay all the costs occasioned by them. But it does not follow that their action ought to be wholly dismissed. See "Hilliard v. Riffe" (L.R., 7 H.L., 39). The proper order will be:—Allow the appeal and reverse the judgment appealed from. Declare that the three defendants—Margowski, Cohen, and Sworn—were guilty of a breach of their duty as directors in not paying to the company in respect of the shares allotted to them on the 5th July, 1897, 3s. per share, being the amount which they obtained from the other members of the company in respect of shares allotted to them, and let the plaintiffs have liberty to apply for an order for payment if necessary. Order the three defendants to pay the costs of the appeal, and also the costs of the action, except such costs as have been occasioned by the charges of fraud, which costs are to be paid by the plaintiffs. The usual set-off as regards these costs.

THE QUEEN V. BULLIVANT AND OTHERS.*

Practice—Discovery—Documents—Privilege—
Evading payment of probate duty—Communication to solicitor—Production of documents ordered.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Mathew at Chambers for the production by one of the defendants of certain documents. The information was filed by the Attorney-General of Victoria, Australia, in the Supreme Court of that colony, against Stanley Austin, William Hose Bullivant, and Joseph Henry Grey, the executors of the will of James Austin, deceased, and Frank Austin to recover duty. The information alleged in substance that on November 9, 1894, James Austin, the testator, by two voluntary deeds conveyed to trustees certain lands in Victoria of which he was seised in fee simple upon the trusts declared by the deeds; that on November 9, 1894, the testator by a voluntary deed assigned to trustees upon certain trusts a mortgage debt of £24,000, to which he was then absolutely entitled, secured on mortgage of certain real estate in Victoria; and that on March 20, 1895, the testator by two voluntary deeds conveyed to his two sons, the defendants Stanley Austin and Frank Austin, certain lands in Victoria, of which he was seised in fee simple, to hold as tenants in common. The information then alleged that the testator died on May 15, 1896, having by his will, dated May 8, 1895, appointed the defendant, Stanley Austin, executor thereof so far as regarded his property in Great Britain, and the defendant's, Bullivant and Grey, executors thereof so far as regarded his property in Australia and elsewhere out of Great Britain; that probate of the will was duly granted in England and Victoria respectively; and that each of the conveyances and the assignment above mentioned were wholly voluntary and were made and executed by the testator with intent to evade the payment of duty in Victoria under the Administration and Probate Act, 1890 (54 Vict., No. 1,060), of that colony. The information claimed a declaration that the conveyances and the assignment were made and executed by the testator with intent to evade the payment of duty under the above Act; and that, if necessary, an account might be taken as to the amount of duty under the Act payable in respect of the same, and that the defendants should be ordered to pay the amount of the duty. The defence denied the allegations contained in the information. It appeared that the conveyances and the assignment, which were, speaking generally, for the benefit of the testator's sons and daughters, had been prepared by a firm of solicitors named Bath and Austin, of Glastonbury, Somerset, on the instructions of the testator. Mr. Bath was the member of the firm who carried out the transactions. The defendant, Stanley Austin, became a partner in the firm in 1887, and Mr. Bath died in 1895. In 1896 the testator died at Glastonbury. Stanley Austin now carried on the business in partnership with another person under the style of Austin and Bath. A commission was issued from the Supreme Court of Victoria for the purpose of taking the evidence of, among others, the defendant, Stanley Austin, in this country. Mr. Austin was accordingly examined on commission at Bristol, and he was asked on behalf of the informant whether he had in his office any book in which Mr. Bath or his clerk had entered the instructions given to him by the testator with reference to the preparation of the conveyances and assignment. The witness said that he had, but he declined to produce it on the ground that it was held by him and his partner in their professional character as solicitors, and was a professional document containing entries of communications of a professional and confidential character for the purpose of obtaining legal advice. An application was thereupon made at Chambers for an order upon the witness to produce any books containing the instructions given by the testator to the late firm of Bath and Austin with reference to the preparation, execution, or carrying into effect of the conveyances or assignment, or any of them. Mr. Justice Mathew made the order. The defendants appealed. By section 115 of the Administration and Probate Act, 1890 (of the colony of Victoria), "if any person has made, or shall hereafter make, any conveyance or assignment, gift, delivery, or transfer of any estate, real or personal, or of any money or securities for money with intent to evade the payment of duty under this part of the Act, in case such person should die the property comprised in any such conveyance or assignment, or the subject-matter of any such gift, delivery, or transfer, shall upon the death of such person be deemed to form part of his estate for the purposes of this part of the Act upon which duty shall be payable. . . ."

Mr. ERNEST POLLOCK, for the defendants, contended that the documents ordered to be produced were privileged from production.

Mr. S. A. T. ROWLATT appeared for the informant. "Minet v. Morgan" (L.R., 3 Ch., 361); "Wheeler v. Le Marchant" (17 Ch.D., 675); "Lowden v. Blakey" (23 Q.B.D., 332); "In re Postlethwaite" (35 Ch.D., 722); "Reg. v. Cox" (14 Q.B.D., 153); "O'Shea v. Wood" ([1891] P., 237, 286); "Calcraft v. Guest" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 759) were referred to.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that the question was whether the documents were privileged on the ground that they came into existence in the process of asking legal advice of a solicitor. The information was against the defendants, as executors of a testator, and the ground upon which the information was filed was that the deceased executed certain settlements with intent to evade the payment of duty imposed by the Administration and Probate Act, 1890, of Victoria. That was the basis of the information. The issue was whether or not the settlements were made with intent to evade the payment of the duty. It was elicited upon the examination of one of the defendants over here that he had a document in his possession which he must be taken to admit was relevant to the issue, because he took the objection that it was privileged upon the ground above named. Raising the question in that way came to this, that the document was relevant but privileged. Relevant to what? Relevant to the issue whether what was done was done with intent to evade payment of the duty under the Act. If so, in his opinion the document was not privileged from production by reason of its having come into existence as a consequence of advice sought from and given by a solicitor. The privilege, which was that of the client, did not cover documents which came into existence with a view to evade the statute. But, though the document which the defendant refused to produce came into that category, he might show that any particular document ordered to be produced was not relevant to the issue, and any such document he need not produce. As to such documents as were relevant to the issue, it was not a ground for refusing to produce them that they came into existence in consequence of advice being sought from and given by a solicitor as to how to evade the Act.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

ROBERTSON V. HARRIS.*

Held, no warranty to satisfy sec. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

This was a special case stated by the stipendiary magistrate of Sheffield on the hearing of an information laid by the appellant against the respondent, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, charging the respondent with selling, as pure milk, milk to which water had been added. The defence was that the respondent had purchased the milk as pure milk and with a written warranty to that effect, that he had no reason to believe, at the time when he sold it, it was otherwise, that he had sold the milk in the same state as when he purchased it, and that he was accordingly protected by section 25 of the Act. In support of this defence the respondent relied on the contract under which he bought the milk, which was in the following terms:—"January 20, 1899. Hall Farm, Duffield, I, Sarah Sheldon, of the above address, agree to sell to William Harris, of 682, Attercliffe-road, Sheffield, 1,000 gallons of milk weekly in such quantities as arranged, the milk to be pure, new milk, delivered at Attercliffe, Masborough, and Swintown stations on the Midland Railway, carriage paid, at 7½d. per imperial gallon from January 21 to March 31, 1899, both inclusive, 7½d. per imperial gallon from April 1, 1899, to September 30, 1899, both inclusive, and 7½d. per imperial gallon from October 1, 1899, to January 20, 1900, both inclusive." The learned magistrate held that this agreement had in it a written warranty within section 25 of the Act. And, as it was proved that the respondent had no reason to believe at the time when the milk was sold it was otherwise than pure, new milk, and that it was sold in the same state as when it was purchased, he dismissed the information subject to the present case.

Mr. Reginald Brown, Q.C., appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Frankau for the respondent.

In the course of the argument the following cases were cited:—"Rook v. Hopley" (L.R., 3 Ex.D., 209); "Harris v. May" (L.R., 12 Q.B.D., 97); "Farmers' Co. v. Stevenson" (60 L.J., M.C., 70); "Hotchin v. Hindmarch" (L.R. [1891], 2 Q.B., 181); "Elder v. Smithson" (57 J.P., 809); "Laidlaw v. Wilson" (L.R. [1894], 1 Q.B., 74); "Lindsay v. Rook" (63 L.J., M.C., 231); "Iorns v. Van Tromp" (64 L.J., M.C., 171); and "Hawkins v. Williams" (59 J.P., 533).

The COURT allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the magistrate with directions to convict.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said he thought judgment must be for the appellant. The question was whether there had been on behalf of the defendant a written warranty put forward sufficient to satisfy section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which provided thus:—"If the defendant in any prosecution under this Act prove to the satisfaction of the justices or Court that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect, that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that the article was otherwise, and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, he shall be discharged from the prosecution." The defendant had satisfied the section in this respect, that he had no reason to believe that the article at the time when he sold it was other than of the nature, quality, and substance demanded, but the question was whether he had shown that he had purchased it with a written warranty. He had produced an agreement under which the milk was to be pure, new milk. That was no doubt a written warranty. In "Laidlaw v. Wilson" (L.R. [1894], 1 Q.B., 74) Mr. Justice Charles said:—"It is enough if the language of the document imports a warranty and shows an intention on the part of the vendor to warrant." In the present case, though the word warrant was not used, the document did import a warranty. So far the respondent was right. But the statute required more, it required that the defendant should show that he had purchased the article with a written warranty; and after the decision in "Harris v. May" (L.R., 12 Q.B.D., 97), notwithstanding that that case had been distinguished in "Laidlaw v. Wilson," it was not enough to produce a general agreement like that in the present case, without showing also that the article was bought with it. There was no evidence that such was the case in "Harris v. May," which was in other respects very like the present case. No doubt the document there did not contain the words to be pure milk, but a mere description of the milk as good and pure milk; but it was clear that the Court held that those words amounted to a warranty; Lord Coleridge, indeed, said that an action for breach of warranty could have been brought on the contract. Again, the words of Mr. Justice Charles in "Laidlaw v. Wilson" showed what he understood to be the ground of the decision in "Harris v. May." He said that, looking at the judgment of Lord Coleridge as a whole, he thought that what Lord Coleridge really meant was that it was not such a warranty as would cover the specific delivery of milk on April 12, in the absence of some written evidence that that specific delivery was made under the contract. That amounted to saying that you must have more than a written warranty in a general agreement; you must have something written to show that the warranty covers the particular article. In "Laidlaw v. Wilson" there was such evidence. In the present case if there had been something to show that the general agreement for the delivery of milk covered the particular milk in question there would have been enough to satisfy the statute. In the absence of that the magistrate had come to the wrong conclusion.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING delivered judgment expressing his concurrence with the judgment of Mr. Justice Ridley, and further, though without deciding the point, expressing grave doubt whether to satisfy section 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, the written warranty must not refer to an article already in existence when the warranty is given.

GEDGE AND OTHERS V. THE CORPORATION OF THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.*

Insurance—Marine—"P.P.I." policy—Illegality
—19 Geo. II., c. 37, sec. 1.

When, upon the trial of an action, the plaintiff's case discloses that the transaction which is the basis of his claim is illegal, the Court cannot ignore the illegality, even if the defendant has not pleaded such illegality.

This action was brought upon a policy of marine insurance, and the case raised an important question as to the right of an assured to recover in a Court of law upon what is known as a "p.p.i." policy. The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY read the following judgment:—This action is brought by the plaintiffs, who are insurance brokers suing really on behalf and for the benefit of a Mr. Rouse and certain other gentlemen associated with him, against the defendants on an alleged policy of marine insurance dated November 14, 1898, upon the British steamship Radnorshire belonging to the Shire Line. The policy, as pleaded by the plaintiffs, is a policy for £400 on the said steamship at and from London to Yokohama, to pay a total loss in the event of the vessel's not arriving at Yokohama on or before midnight on December 31, 1898. It is pleaded by the plaintiffs that the vessel did not arrive at Yokohama on or before midnight December 31, 1898, and the amount insured is claimed by the plaintiffs. In fact, as appeared when the document was produced by the plaintiffs in evidence, the alleged policy is what is known as a "p.p.i." or honour policy, one of its terms being that, in the event of loss, "it is hereby agreed that this policy shall be deemed as full and sufficient proof of interest." The defendants, in the points of defence, do not plead the invalidity of the alleged policy, under the provisions of the 19 George II., c. 37, section 1. Their pleaded defences, in addition to a refusal to admit the correctness of the statement of the plaintiffs as to the terms of the alleged policy, are (1) concealment of material facts; (2) that the persons on whose behalf the plaintiffs effected the alleged policy had no insurable interest in the subject-matter insured. The alleged policy was, in truth, so far as regards the purpose of Mr. Rouse and certain other gentlemen for whom it was effected, a mere wager or wagering speculation. It appears that some time before November 14, 1898, the Government of Japan had made an ordinance whereby goods imported into Japan after December 31, 1898, should be liable to a higher duty than had previously been levied. This was known to Mr. Rouse, who was employed in the London office of a Japanese insurance company, called the Nippon, and he had a conversation with a Mr. Pound (who was an insurance clerk in the plaintiffs' office) upon the subject of insurances being, in consequence of the ordinance, effected in regard to the arrival in Japan of vessels carrying goods to that country. It occurred to Mr. Rouse that there was an opportunity of having what he called "a spec." He asked Mr. Pound if he thought he would be able to do a "spec." for him. Pound said he thought he might be able. They then parted. Mr. Rouse returned to his office and read in Lloyd's Shipping Gazette that the Radnorshire was the vessel of the line of steamships running between London and Japan under the management of Messrs. Jenkins and Co., which had last sailed for Japan; and that she was reported to have passed the Downs on October 30. Believing that a vessel of that type might be expected to take, roughly, about two months on the voyage, he saw from her reported position that, to use his own words, her arrival before January 1, 1899, was obviously a close thing, and what he wanted for a "spec." He mentioned his project to certain other gentlemen in the Nippon office, and they agreed to share with him in the speculation. In the result, through Mr. Pound, acting as their agent to procure an insurance, Mr. Rouse and his fellow-speculators carried out their project by obtaining from the defendants the policy in question, the slip for which was initiated by Mr. Toulmin on behalf of the defendant company. Had Mr. Toulmin known the real nature of the transaction—namely, that it was a mere bet or speculation without any interest on the part of those for whom in reality the insurance was effected—he would have declined the risk altogether. It is at the same time only just to Mr. Rouse and his friends to add that they appear to have desired throughout the transaction to act in a candid and straightforward manner. It was not through any fault of theirs that the purely speculative nature of the transaction was not disclosed to Mr. Toulmin. It appears to me that, when upon the trial of an action the plaintiff's case, as happens here, discloses that the transaction which is the basis of the plaintiff's claim is illegal, the Court cannot properly ignore the illegality and give effect to the claim. Here the insertion of the "p.p.i." clause taints the whole of the plaintiffs' case. The 19 George II., c. 37, section 1 expressly forbids the making of an assurance upon a British ship without further proof of interest than the policy, and goes on to declare that every such assurance shall be null and void to all intents and purposes. It has been suggested by the plaintiffs that the present policy is not a policy "on a ship" within the meaning of this section. I am clearly of opinion that it is. An assurance whereby the assured is entitled to be indemnified against loss in respect of the non-arrival of the ship at a certain port by a certain date may, I think, be correctly described as an insurance on the ship. If authority is wanted I think that it appears in the case—very similar indeed in its circumstances—of "Kent v. Bird" decided on the same statute in 1777 (Cowper, 583). There the defendant undertook that a vessel should save her passage to China that season, and, in the action brought upon the document of insurance, judgment was given for the defendant on the ground that the transaction was the making of a gaming or wagering policy on a ship within the meaning of the statute. Attempts to narrow the section when it speaks of an assurance on "goods, merchandises or effects," similar to the attempt of the defendants in this case in regard to an assurance "on ship," were unsuccessfully made in "Smith v. Reynolds" (1 H. and N., 221), "De Mattos v. North" (L.R., 3 C.P., 185), "Berridge v. Man On Insurance Company" (18 Q.B.D., 346). These cases show that assurances on profits, commission and advances are covered by the section, when it speaks of assurances on "goods, merchandises or effects." This policy, then, being an illegal instrument—an assurance which, in the language of Mr. Justice Grove in "Allkins v. Jupe" (2 C.P.D., at p. 389), is contrary to the direction of the statute, and so unlawful in all its incidents that the law will not countenance any part of it—I cannot give judgment upon it in favour of the plaintiffs. Then counsel argued that the illegality was not pleaded by the defendants. In my opinion that makes no difference—ex turpi causa non oritur actio. This old and well-known legal maxim is founded on good sense, and expresses a clear and well recognized legal principle which is not confined to indictable offences. No Court ought to enforce an illegal contract, or allow itself to be made an instrument of enforcing obligations alleged to arise out of a contract or transaction which is illegal, if the illegality is duly brought to the notice of the Court, and if the person invoking the aid of the Court is himself implicated in the illegality. It matters not whether the defendant has pleaded the illegality or whether he has not. If the evidence adduced by the plaintiff proves the illegality the Court ought not to assist him. (Per Lord Justice Lindley, "Scott v. Brown, Doering, McNab, and Co." [1892], 2 Q.B., at p. 728.) "If," said Lord Mansfield in his judgment in "Holman v. Johnson" (Cowper, 343) (to which Lord Justice Lindley refers as an authority immediately after the passage which I have just quoted), "from the plaintiff's own stating or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, then the Court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon this ground the Court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid for such a plaintiff." Order 19, rule 16 of the rules of the Supreme Court, upon which Mr. Hamilton for the plaintiffs laid much stress, does not touch (as the judgment of Lord Justice Lindley, which I have quoted, clearly indicates) a case like the present in which the illegality of the transaction appears upon the face of the plaintiffs' case. The purpose of that rule, as it appears to me, is to prevent the injustice which might arise from a litigant, without notice to his opponent, adducing evidence to show that a transaction which apparently is perfectly legal is really illegal—as for example that an apparently good deed was really fraudulent under 13 Eliz., c. 5; or the similar injustice which might arise if a litigant, who would otherwise have been prepared with evidence to surmount them, was suddenly called upon at the trial for the first time to meet objections to the pursuit of a legal remedy based upon the Statute of Limitations or the Statute of Frauds, or was called upon to deal with issues of which he had no notice. The rule does not affect a case like the present. There is, I think, only one other point in the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel upon this part of the case which I have to notice. It was urged that the defendants themselves were wishful that the policy should not be held void on account of its having been made in terms prohibited by the statute. Certainly the defendants' counsel did so state their attitude. But I hold that my judgment ought not to be affected by this consideration. I was referred to the course taken by Mr. Justice Bigham in the recent case of "Buchanan v. Faber" (4 Com. Cas., 223). In that case the policy sued on contained the "p.p.i." clause. In a note to the report it is stated that my brother Bigham, after consultation with Mr. Justice Mathew, intimated that he would, with the consent of the parties, hear the case as if the policy did not contain the "p.p.i." clause. I need not say that I should be very slow not to adopt a course which they had approved, and if I ever felt impelled by my own conviction to take a different view from them I should have very great misgiving as to the correctness of my own view. But what I am invited to do here is something quite different from that which was asked by the parties and permitted by my brother Bigham in that case. That was, in effect, to treat the vitiating clause as deleted. What I am invited to do is to treat the policy as valid with the vitiating clause retained as part of it. If that were done here which the Court did in "Buchanan v. Faber"—viz., if I dealt with this policy as if it contained no "p.p.i." clause—the plaintiffs, so far from being helped, would obviously be involved in a fatal difficulty. They, admittedly, never had any insurable interest; the absence of such an interest has been pleaded by the defendants; and the only possible reply to this defence lies in the presence in the policy of the "p.p.i." clause. If that is treated as gone, the plaintiffs' case goes with it. Deciding this case, as I do, upon the grounds which I have stated, I feel, nevertheless, in view of the care bestowed upon it by the learned counsel on both sides, that I ought not to let pass unnoticed another aspect of the case which was presented for my consideration. The defendants argue that, even if the policy can be treated as not invalidated by the "p.p.i." clause, they have a good defence to the action, because it was obtained by the concealment of a material fact—a fact, that is to say, "which if communicated would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter in considering whether he would enter into the contract at all, or enter into it at one rate of premium or another" (see per Lord Justice Brett, "Rivaz v. Gerusai," 6 Q.B.D., at p. 229). The fact referred to is the purely speculative character of the transaction. That it was not expressly communicated by Mr. Pound to Mr. Toulmin is indisputable; but the plaintiffs say to the defendants, "You are not entitled to rely on this non-disclosure; you knew perfectly well that we were negotiating for a policy with a 'p.p.i.' clause, and you contracted to give us such a policy. Mr. Pound was justified in assuming that Mr. Toulmin knew all he had to tell, and in the circumstances you must be taken to have waived being informed of the purely speculative nature of the risk" (see "Carter v. Boehm," 3 Burr., 1,907). It appears to me that there is much to be said for this view, but upon the whole, if it was open to me to treat the policy as a valid policy and I had to decide the case upon this point, I should feel myself, upon the evidence given before me, obliged on this point also to decide in favour of the defendants' contention. On the materiality of the fact of this being purely a speculative or wagering venture on the part of Mr. Rouse and his friends Mr. Toulmin is clear and emphatic. He would not have entertained the risk if he had known of it. As I understand his evidence, "policy proof of interest" in the ordinary understanding of underwriters means at least the possible existence of a business interest—an interest which may be hard to prove or may not admit of legal proof as an insurable interest, but still some business interest. The facts in the case of "Buchanan v. Faber," to which I have had occasion to refer, afford an illustration, I think, of a class of risk of this latter sort. In fact the clause is sometimes stipulated for in policies which are intended to cover substantial interests such as disbursements and advances. It is not understood, if I follow Mr. Toulmin's evidence correctly, to cover a mere wager. The only case, according to Mr. Toulmin, in which he has accepted a purely speculative or wagering risk—and that he has done only on rare occasions—is in the particular case of "overdue" vessels, and then only at specially agreed rates of premium. The defendants' evidence is substantially confirmed, I think, by the conduct and by the evidence of Mr. Rouse. Mr. Rouse is himself a clerk in an insurance office, and he expressly enjoined Mr. Pound to state in negotiating for the insurance the speculative nature of the transaction. The idea was, he says, that they could not be too careful. He says, no doubt, elsewhere in his cross-examination that he did not see the materiality of a "spec." or real interest, but he goes on to admit that the underwriters would probably quote a higher rate of premium in the case of a "spec." Mr. Pound's excuse for not obeying Mr. Rouse's instructions on this point as given to him by Mr. Rouse was that he had not got the chance of making the disclosure. It was quite an insufficient excuse, as I understood what took place between Mr. Pound and Mr. Toulmin; but I believe that Mr. Pound did not at all mean to do anything improper or unfair. I think he possibly drew an unwarranted inference from Mr. Toulmin's words and manner that Mr. Toulmin either knew or was willing to waive inquiry about the circumstances of the insurance. Upon the whole, as I have already said, upon the evidence before me, if I had to decide on this issue I should feel obliged to decide it in favour of the defendants. It is not, however, necessary for me to do so, and I give judgment for the defendants on the grounds which I have previously stated. Under the circumstances of the case, including those to which I need not refer, except for this purpose—namely, that, as appears by Mr. Toulmin's letter of November 14, 1898, the defendants repudiated the policy for reasons which the facts do not warrant, and which implied an unjust imputation upon the plaintiffs' representative—I give judgment for the defendants without costs.

*Reported by F. G. BUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case a Divisional Court had refused to grant the applicant, Evans, a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition to the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies. Proceedings were being taken before the Chief Registrar for the dissolution of a society, of which Evans was the managing director. Evans had certain claims against the society, and the society had certain claims against him. Evans sought for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Chief Registrar from adjudicating upon these claims. He renewed his application by way of appeal to this Court, and obtained a rule nisi. The Chief Registrar now showed cause against the rule.

Mr. Sutton appeared for the Chief Registrar; Mr. Stutfield for the applicant.

The COURT discharged the rule.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, under the circumstances of the case the writ of prohibition ought not to be issued. Proceedings had been commenced for the dissolution of a friendly society under the provisions of section 80 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. The manager, Evans, had claims against the society, and the society had cross-claims against him. By section 80 the Registrar had power to make an award for a dissolution, and he had power to investigate the affairs of the society. By subsection 3, if upon the investigation it appeared that the funds of the society were insufficient to meet the existing claims thereon, the Registrar might award that the society be dissolved. By subsection 5, "Every award under this section, whether for dissolution or distribution of funds, shall be final and conclusive on the society in respect of which the award is made, and on all members of the society, and on all other persons having any claim on the funds of the society, without appeal, and shall be enforced as a decision on a dispute under this Act." In his opinion, the Registrar was not proposing to do anything in this case except what he had jurisdiction to do under the section. The rule must therefore be discharged.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

REED V. FRANKS.*

Bill of Sale—Bills of Sale Act, 1878, secs. 8 and 10—Consideration—Defeasance.

This was an action brought by Mr. John H. Reed, the plaintiff, against Mr. Edwin Franks, a money-lender, trading as Edwin Franks O'Toole, the defendant, for damages for breaking and entering his premises and for wrongfully taking possession of his goods.

Mr. Frank Mellor appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Tudor Howell for the defendant.

On December 9, 1898, the plaintiff, who is a nurseryman and market-gardener, executed a bill of sale in favour of the defendant upon his furniture, then about to be moved to 44, Jewel-road, Walthamstow, by way of security for the payment of the sum of £30 and interest thereon at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum. The principal sum of £30 was repayable under the bill of sale by 12 monthly instalments of £2 10s. each, with the interest due at the time of payment. On the same day as that on which the bill of sale was executed, the defendant signed and gave to the plaintiff the following note:—"I beg to say I will accept 25 shillings interest per month for the loan of £30 made to you this day by me." The plaintiff, accordingly, paid £3 15s. per month. A portion of the June instalment being overdue on June 30, and again on July 3, the defendant's agents entered the plaintiff's premises and took possession of the furniture, under the powers granted by the bill of sale. The plaintiff afterwards sold some of the furniture and with the proceeds, through his solicitor, paid to the defendant £25 5s., receiving in return a receipt expressed to be in "full settlement on both sides of the bill of sale." He paid a further sum of £1 17s. 6d. for possession expenses. The plaintiff's case was that the entry into his premises was unlawful, because it was effected forcibly by breaking a pane of glass, and, further, because the bill of sale was bad. The grounds on which the bill of sale was said to be bad were (1) because the agreement to accept 25 shillings per month interest was a defeasance of the bill which ought to have been set forth in the bill, as it is required to be done by section 10 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and (2) because the consideration in the bill was incorrectly stated, a sum of 30 shillings having been deducted from the £30 for expenses.

The plaintiff said that towards the end of 1898 he was in want of money, and a judgment summons for £20 had been issued against him. He received a letter from the defendant and entered into negotiations for a loan. Two sums of 7s. 6d. each were charged for preliminary expenses. It was arranged that the defendant should advance £30 on a bill of sale on the witness's furniture, but the defendant undertook not to register the bill. The witness looked at the bill of sale, and observed that the interest was too high. The defendant then agreed to sign the note in which he agreed to accept 25s. per month interest. The bill was afterwards signed. The defendant demanded a further sum of 30s. for expenses, and threatened to register the bill unless this was paid. The sum was accordingly paid. Afterwards the defendant drew a cheque for £30, which the plaintiff cashed. On July 2 he noticed that a pane of glass had been broken in one of the windows of his house. The defendant's men were in possession from July 3 to July 5.

The defendant, in his evidence, denied that any sum was paid to him by the plaintiff for expenses. There was never any question of not registering the bill of sale. The document by which he undertook to accept 25s. per month interest was signed at the plaintiff's request and for his convenience. He preferred to pay an even amount rather than to trouble himself with calculating amounts which would gradually decrease as the instalments were paid off. The bill of sale was registered six days after execution.

Mr. MELLOR submitted that the bill of sale was bad, and cited "Edwards v. Marcus" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 587) and "Firth v. Cowburn" (19 Ch.D., 419).

HIS LORDSHIP withdrew the case from the jury. He said that the entry on to the plaintiff's premises was justified unless the bill of sale were bad. With regard to the first point on which it was impugned, he did not think that the agreement signed by the defendant amounted to a defeasance of the bill of sale within section 10 of the Act of 1878. It was not an agreement to alter the rate of interest, but merely an arrangement as to the manner in which the interest should be paid. The bill was, therefore, not void on the first of the grounds set up, nor was there evidence that it was void on the ground that the consideration was incorrectly stated; for, even assuming that the 30s. was paid after the payment of the £30, it was paid, on the plaintiff's own evidence, not as a deduction, but in order to prevent the bill of sale being registered.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendant, with costs.

Patent—Joint patentees—Interest of survivor—Covenant to assign—Joint and several covenant—Agreement—Construction.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (15 The Times L.R., 336), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 336. It raised a question as to the construction of an agreement to assign a patent granted to two patentees. By an agreement under seal dated May 25, 1883, and made between Lucien Gaulard and John Dixon Gibbs (hereinafter called "the vendors") of the one part and the plaintiff company of the other part, after reciting that the vendors were the inventors of certain inventions in connexion with the manufacture and construction of secondary generators for the distribution of electricity and other apparatus connected with electrical lighting for which they had obtained her Majesty's letters patent and of which they had filed specifications and that the vendors had also obtained certain foreign patents, it was agreed that (1) the vendors should sell and the company should purchase the exclusive privilege of using, exercising, and vending all the inventions within the United Kingdom and the other countries named, with the full benefit of all extensions, &c.; (2) that "the vendors and each of them" should from time to time and at the request and cost of the company do all such acts and things as by the company might be considered necessary or expedient for procuring confirmation of any of the patents, and for obtaining extensions and prolongations, and that the vendors would communicate all improvements and other inventions and at the request and cost of the company patent the same and execute assurances for vesting the new patents in the company; (3) that in the event of infringement the company should "be at liberty to commence, carry on, and prosecute in their own name, or in the name of the patentees or any of them or the executors or administrators of any of them or otherwise, all such actions and proceedings" as the company might think fit; (4) that "the vendors and each of them" should at all times thereafter give the company advice as to the use of the inventions. Clause 5 stated the consideration payable, and Clauses 6 and 7 were as follows:—(6) The vendors shall without delay, at the expense of the said company and to the satisfaction of the solicitors of the said company, establish a title to all the said inventions and letters patent and privileges hereby agreed to be sold, and assign and transfer the same to, and cause the same to be legally vested in, the said company or such person or persons as the said company shall appoint for the purpose. (7) The assignment and transfer of the said letters patent and other premises sold shall be prepared by and at the expense of the said company and shall be expressed to be made in pursuance of this agreement and in consideration of the payment of the said sum of £220,000, to be paid in fully paid-up shares and cash as before mentioned, and the said vendors and all other necessary parties, if any, shall at the cost of the said company execute such assignments to the said company or as they shall direct, and such assignments respectively shall contain a covenant by the said vendors that all the letters patent thereby assigned or any letters patent which may thus have been obtained in substitution for the same or in respect of such invention as is protected thereby are valid and in nowise void or voidable, and also such other covenants and provisions as may be reasonably required by the said company for giving effect to the sale hereby agreed to be made. Provided that the consideration money may be apportioned among two or more assignments as the said company shall think fit." All the patents referred to in the agreement were granted to Gaulard and Gibbs and not to either of them separately. Amongst others was an English patent of September 13, 1882 (4,362 of 1882), which was in the usual form of a grant to two patentees. After reciting that Gaulard and Gibbs had presented their petition to the Crown that they were in possession of an invention for a new system of electricity for the production of light and power, believed to be of great public utility, and that they were the first and true inventors thereof, &c., and that the petitioners had prayed for a grant "unto them, their executors, administrators, and assigns" of letters patent for the sole use, benefit, and advantage of the said invention within the United Kingdom for 14 years, it proceeded as follows:—"Know, therefore, that we . . . by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, do give and grant unto the said Lucien Gaulard and John Dixon Gibbs, their executors, administrators, and assigns, our special licence, full power, sole privilege, and authority that they the said "Gaulard and Gibbs, "their executors, administrators, and assigns, and every of them by themselves or by their deputy, or deputies, servants, or agents, or such others as they, the said "Gaulard and Gibbs, "their executors, administrators, and assigns shall at any time agree with and no others and from time to time and at all times hereafter during the term of years expressed, shall and lawfully may make, use, exercise, and vend their said invention" within the United Kingdom "in such manner as to them the said "Gaulard and Gibbs, "their executors, administrators, and assigns or any of them shall in their discretion seem meet, and that the said "Gaulard and Gibbs, "their executors, administrators, and assigns shall and lawfully may have and enjoy the whole profit, and benefit," &c., coming by reason of the invention for the period therein mentioned, "To have, hold, exercise, and enjoy the said licences, powers, privileges, and advantages . . . unto the said "Gaulard and Gibbs, "their executors, administrators, and assigns" for the term of 14 years; "and to the end that they the said "Gaulard and Gibbs, "their executors, administrators, and assigns, and every of them, may have and enjoy the full benefit and sole use and exercise of the said invention." Gaulard died in 1888, and Mme. Henriette Unesime Ruelle, one of the defendants, was his administratrix. In the present action, which was brought against Gibbs and Mme. Ruelle, the company alleged that the consideration for the sale of the patents had been paid, that the patents had not been assigned to the company, and were entirely or in part void or voidable, that in some countries the patents had been declared void, and that the company had suffered damage by having to pay costs and by the value of the patents having been reduced. The company, accordingly, claimed (1) that the defendants might be ordered to assign the patents; (2) damages for breaches of agreement and warrants; and (3) repayment of a portion of the purchase money. As against Gibbs the action was compromised. The defendant Mme. Ruelle alleged by her defence that the plaintiff company had taken proceedings in France against her and others to enforce the agreement of May 25, 1883, and that by an order of the Paris Court of Appeal of June 2, 1897, the plaintiff company were ordered to pay to her under the agreement the sum of £2,581 3s. with interest, and that this sum still remained unpaid, and she counterclaimed for payment of that amount with interest. At the trial of the action it was objected that the grant of letters patent was to Gaulard and Gibbs jointly, and that on the death of Gaulard the joint interest passed to Gibbs by survivorship, and further, that the obligation created by Clause 7 of the agreement was merely a joint covenant, and that the survivor Gibbs was the only person who could be sued upon it. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy upheld these objections and came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any relief against Mme. Ruelle, and he dismissed both the action and the counterclaim. Mme. Ruelle appealed from this decision, so far as it related to the counterclaim, and the plaintiffs served a cross notice of appeal on Mme. Ruelle, so far as the judgment related to the action.

Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Rowden, Q.C., were for the defendant, Mme. Ruelle; Mr. Gore-Browne (Mr. Moulton, Q.C., with him) appeared for the plaintiff company.

The COURT allowed both appeals.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he was unable to adopt the view taken by the learned Judge. Gaulard and Gibbs were two patentees who were entitled to various patents and, amongst others, to a patent for the distribution of electricity by secondary generators. It was obvious that they were not mere co-owners of these patents and that they took them out for the purpose of making money, and they agreed to sell them to the plaintiff company by an agreement under seal of May 25, 1883. After referring to this agreement, and particularly to Clause 7, his Lordship said that that clause distinguished the case from the decision of the House of Lords in "White v. Tyndall" (13 App. Cas., 263), upon which the learned Judge had mainly proceeded. The learned Judge treated this agreement as being in substance a joint covenant by Gaulard and Gibbs to assign the patents, and a joint covenant by them that the patents were valid. He, the Master of the Rolls, could not think that that was the true construction of this agreement, and the learned Judge had himself admitted that the proper form of covenants for title in an assignment by two joint tenants was to make them joint and several. The learned Judge had taken a short cut in dealing with the rights of the parties, and had held that this was a joint covenant, and that consequently on the death of Gaulard there was no remedy against his personal representative, and it followed from that view that the counter-claim also failed. In their Lordships' opinion that order ought to be reversed and there ought to be a declaration that upon the true construction of the agreement the right of the plaintiff company to relief against Mme. Ruelle ought to be ascertained upon the footing that Gaulard and Gibbs had jointly covenanted to assign the patents mentioned in the agreement to the plaintiff company, and that such assignments should contain joint and several covenants by Gaulard and Gibbs with the company that such patents were valid and in no wise void, and, further, that the amount due from the company to Mme. Ruelle ought to be ascertained upon the footing of the judgment of the French Court of Appeal. The action and the counter-claim would be remitted to the learned Judge for trial and all the costs would be reserved to be dealt with by him.

LORDS JUSTICES RIGBY and COLLINS concurred.

Vaughan Williams, and Romer, } 1900.
L.J.J.) April 25.

THE QUEEN V. SHIEL AND OTHERS.*

Practice—Appeal—Police magistrate—Application to state a case—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, sec. 33.

A magistrate cannot be made to state a case on the ground that his decision is erroneous in point of law where he is following a decision of the High Court by which he is bound.

This was an appeal by the London County Council against a judgment of a Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Channell and Mr. Justice Bucknill, reported in The Times of February 2. Proceedings had been taken before a magistrate under section 150 of the London Building Act, 1894, by the County Council against Shewin Brothers and Co. Section 74 of that Act requires that when a building exceeding ten squares in area is used in part for the purposes of trade or manufacture, and in part as a dwelling-house, the two parts shall be separated by walls and floors constructed of fire-resisting materials, and all passages, staircases, and other means of approach to the part used as a dwelling-house shall be constructed of fire-resisting materials. The present proceedings were taken in respect of a building which was intended to be used as a fully-licensed publichouse, part of which was to be used for living in, and the question proposed to be raised was whether a publichouse was within section 74. The magistrate decided against the London County Council. The County Council asked the magistrate to state a case for the opinion of the Court, but the magistrate declined to do so on the ground that the same point was considered and decided in "Carritt v. Godson and Son" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 193), in which Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrance, sitting as a Divisional Court, held that a publichouse was not within the section. "Carritt v. Godson and Son" was a case decided under a criminal section of the London Building Act, and there was, accordingly, no right of appeal from that decision to the Court of Appeal. The County Council had taken these proceedings under a different section in order, if possible, that they might take the matter to the Court of Appeal. They obtained a rule calling upon the magistrate to show cause why he should not state a case. Shewin Brothers and Co. appeared to show cause against the rule, and the Divisional Court discharged it.

Mr. Horace Ivory appeared for the County Council in support of the appeal; Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., appeared for Shewin Brothers and Co.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that this was an application which in his experience was unprecedented. The London County Council, with full knowledge that the law upon the matter had been laid down in "Carritt v. Godson and Son" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 193), and that that decision was binding on the magistrate, took proceedings before the magistrate under the London Building Act, 1894. At the hearing the magistrate was referred to the case of "Carritt v. Godson and Son," and it was his duty to administer the law as laid down in that case. It was conceded that the present case was on all fours with that case and that it could not be distinguished from it. Thereupon the County Council applied to the magistrate to state a case for the opinion of the Court under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. By that section a magistrate could only be asked to state a case upon the ground that his decision was erroneous in point of law, or was in excess of jurisdiction. The magistrate said that his decision was not erroneous in point of law, because he was bound by the decision in "Carritt v. Godson and Son." It seemed to him (the Lord Justice) that the magistrate was perfectly right, and it would have been wrong for him in the circumstances to have stated a case. The magistrate refused to state a case. It was said that the County Council desired to get rid of the decision in "Carritt v. Godson and Son," though the Legislature had said that that decision was to be final and without appeal. By means of this application the County Council hoped to get rid of that decision, and if the Court ordered the magistrate to state a case the County Council might carry the matter to the House of Lords. The Divisional Court refused to order the magistrate to state a case on the ground that the decision of the magistrate was not erroneous in point of law as the law stood. The County Council then appealed to this Court. The magistrate was not in error in law, because he could only have done what he did. If there was any civil proceeding by which the case of "Carritt v. Godson and Son" could be questioned he did not know, but he would be no party to establishing a practice which seemed to him to be quite new.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

IN RE THE HAYCRAFT GOLD REDUCTION AND MINING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Compulsory order—
Petition for compulsory winding up after resolution for voluntary winding up.

This was a petition for a compulsory winding up on which his Lordship reserved judgment on the 5th inst.

His LORDSHIP delivered judgment as follows:—This is a petition for the compulsory winding up of a company by fully-paid shareholders. It is opposed by the company and by a large body of fully-paid shareholders on the ground that the company is being wound up voluntarily and that this is an absolute bar to the petition; and, alternatively, on the ground that no fraud has been proved in passing the resolution to wind up voluntarily, which, it is said, is the only state of facts which justifies the Court in making a compulsory order after a voluntary winding up at the instance of a shareholder. The facts of the case are very peculiar. The company was incorporated in 1896 with a nominal capital of £200,000, divided into 200,000 shares of £1 each. It appears that 95,000 shares have been issued, and £88,000 or thereabouts has been paid up or treated as paid up on these shares, and the balance is said to be due in respect of shares held by an insolvent company from which nothing can be recovered. The company has not been successful. It is alleged that there are circumstances connected with the promotion and formation of the company which bring the case within the settled rules of the Court, of which the recent decision in the Olympia case is but an instance, and that considerable sums of money are recoverable from all or some of the directors and from the vendors. On January 30, 1899, the second ordinary general meeting of the company was held, at which the chairman proposed that the directors' report and the accounts to October 31, 1898, be and are hereby passed and adopted. After considerable discussion an amendment was proposed and carried that the directors' report and statement of accounts submitted to this meeting be not received and not adopted, and that, having regard to such report and accounts, it is necessary to take prompt action to protect the interests of the shareholders, and that a committee consisting of three shareholders, with power to add to their number, be and is hereby formed for the purposes following (inter alia)—to investigate all matters and things touching the formation and promotion of the company and the carrying on of its business; to call for and obtain the production of all books, papers, and documents in the possession, custody, or power of the directors and other officers and the solicitors of the company and others relative to the affairs of the company and its promotion; to report to the shareholders as to such investigations; to obtain such legal advice and other professional assistance as it may be deemed necessary for any of the above purposes; and that the proper costs and expenses incurred by the said committee be paid by the company. It was decided to adjourn the meeting for two months or until such time as the committee should have completed their investigation. The committee thus appointed prepared a report, the accuracy of which has not been fully investigated or established before me. It is sufficient, however, to say that if one-half of the allegations in the report can be made good a case of gross fraud involving serious pecuniary liability towards the company will apparently be established. In July, 1899, the committee, having completed their report, authorized their solicitors to supply the directors with a copy. The directors declined, as they were at perfect liberty to do, to meet the committee for the purpose of discussing the report, and suggested that as the adjourned annual meeting of the company was to be held in October it would be better to wait till then. The adjourned annual meeting was not held in October, but on December 20, 1899, two notices were issued purporting to be signed "by order of the Board, R. Gordon, secretary," one of which gave notice that the adjournment of the second ordinary general meeting from January 30 last would be taken at the Queen's Hotel, Manchester, on Friday, December 29, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and the other gave notice that an extraordinary general meeting of this company would be held at the same place on the same day at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon for the purpose of considering, and, if deemed expedient, passing, the following extraordinary resolution:—"That it has been proved to the satisfaction of this meeting that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the same, and accordingly that the company be wound up voluntarily and that Mr. Robert Gordon, of St. Lawrence-house, King-street, Cheapside, London, be appointed liquidator for the purpose of such winding-up." These two meetings were held. The report of the committee had not been printed or circulated among the shareholders, and so far as appears the only persons aware of the contents were the members of the committee and the directors. It appears from the minute-book that at the adjourned general meeting the directors' report and the accounts were received and adopted, and that at the extraordinary general meeting the resolution of which notice was given was declared duly carried. No mention is made in the minutes of the report of the committee. Proxies to a very large number were held by the persons incriminated or their nominees, who were in a position to carry any resolution. Mr. Gordon, the liquidator, proceeded with most unusual rapidity to arrange for the dissolution of the company and the destruction of all its books. On

*Reported by D. PRITCHARD, Esq., Barrister-at Law.

February 20, 1900, notice was given by the liquidator that a general meeting of the members would be held on March 1, following the words of section 142 of the Companies Act, 1862. This led to the presentation of the petition on February 27. On March 1 the meeting was held. The liquidator produced accounts showing that a sum of less than £5 had been received and expended by him and the following resolutions were passed:—“(1) That the account submitted to this meeting and showing the manner in which the winding-up has been conducted and the property of the company disposed of be received and adopted; (2) That the books, accounts, and documents of the company and of the liquidator thereof be retained by the said liquidator, he undertaking not to destroy the same until after the disposal of the petition presented to wind up the company or until the order of the Court, the books, accounts, and documents not under any circumstances to be destroyed before the dissolution of the company.” Assuming everything to be regular, the result will be that the company will be dissolved at the end of three months (section 143). On referring to the directors’ minute-book it appeared that there was no trace of any board meeting after January 20, 1899. Mr. Gordon, who gave evidence in the box, and who was the secretary of the company, admitted that in fact there was no meeting of the board authorizing the notices for the meetings on December 29. He says, however, that he spoke through the telephone to one director, had a conversation with the chairman, in whose office he is a clerk, and wrote letters to the other directors. I have seen some of their replies, which in substance left the secretary to fix his own day. There is, however, nothing to show that any single director was asked to approve of the resolution as proposed which involved the appointment of Mr. Gordon as liquidator. Under article 56 the directors may, whenever they think fit, convene an extraordinary general meeting. By article 97 two directors are a quorum, and by article 101 a meeting of directors at which a quorum is present shall be competent to exercise all or any of the authorities, powers, and discretions by or under these presents vested in or exercisable by the directors jointly. Under these circumstances, the question arises whether the resolution to wind up voluntarily was validly passed. It was laid down by the Court of Exchequer in “D’Arcy v. the Tamer Kit Hill, &c., Company” (2 L.R., Exch., 158) that directors must act together as a board and that it is not sufficient to procure the separate authority of a sufficient number of directors to constitute a quorum. That case turned upon the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, but it seems to me to be equally applicable to a limited company under the Act of 1862. In Collee’s claim (12 Eq., 246), Vice-Chancellor Bacon seems to have treated the decision of the Court of Exchequer as turning upon a common law rule of pleading, and, although it was not perhaps necessary to the decision of the case before him, he certainly regarded an agreement which on the face of it was signed by four directors at different dates and not as a board, as a contract binding the company. I cannot follow the criticisms of the Vice-Chancellor, and I prefer the view of the law taken by the Court of Exchequer. My attention was, however, directed to the case of “Southern Counties Bank (Limited) v. Rider,” decided by the Court of Appeal in 1895 (73 L.T., 374). [After stating the facts of decision in that case, his Lordship continued.] I do not think the decision in that case can be taken as laying down any general principle which I am bound to follow. Neither the case in the Court of Exchequer nor this case before Vice-Chancellor Bacon was cited. It does not touch the question whether a notice given without any kind of board meeting having been held is valid. In the present case I cannot regard the omission to convene a board meeting to consider matters of such vital moment as a winding up of the company and the appointment of a liquidator as a mere irregularity. I believe that one or more of the directors, with the deliberate purpose of screening themselves from the investigation suggested by the report of the committee, ingeniously devised and carried out a scheme by which the chairman’s clerk should be appointed liquidator and the company should be dissolved and the books destroyed at the earliest possible moment. I think the attempt has failed, and as there was, in my view, no voluntary winding up in existence there is no reason why I should not now make a compulsory order. I may observe that there has been no subsequent meeting of the board ratifying and confirming what was done by Mr. Gordon in the name of the board, and it is not for me to consider what might be the effect of such a ratification or confirmation of an unauthorized act. I do not, however, wish to decide this case solely on the ground of the invalidity of the extraordinary general resolution. I shall, therefore, now assume that there is a valid voluntary winding up. It is clear that such a voluntary winding up is not a legal bar to the jurisdiction of the Court to make a compulsory order on the application of a shareholder. That was decided by Sir John Romilly in 1863 in “In re Fire Annihilator Company” (32 Beav., 561). It is true that the company was there being wound up under the Act of 1856 and not under the Act of 1862, but I do not think the difference is material. That decision was recognized by the Lords Justices in “In re Gold Company” (11 Ch.D., 701). If, therefore, the Court has jurisdiction to make the order, I cannot hold that this jurisdiction ought to be fettered in the manner suggested in argument. The existence of a voluntary winding up is a strong reason why the Court should decline to interfere, but circumstances may justify interference. The most common instance, no doubt, is where the Court holds that the resolution to wind up voluntarily has been passed fraudulently, but that is not exhaustive. I cannot regard the resolutions which have been passed as an honest exercise of the wishes of the shareholders with regard to the winding up of the company. No plausible reasons for objection on the part of a shareholder to a compulsory winding up can be suggested. Unless I make the order, the company will be dissolved, the books will be destroyed, and the directors, promoters, and others will escape the risk of being called upon to pay large sums into the coffers of the company. If I make the order no further call can be made upon the shareholders who are fully paid up. They cannot be required to find money to prosecute the litigation which the allegations in the report invite. I am driven to the conclusion that the shareholders objecting to the order are either persons directly implicated in the charges or persons desirous of screening those who are so implicated. I regard the whole proceedings connected with the winding up and the attempted dissolution of the company with grave suspicion. There is nothing in the Gold Company’s case or in any other case which prevents me, in circumstances such as these, from exercising the jurisdiction which I possess. I think it is eminently just and equitable that this company should be wound up by the Court, and such inquiry and investigation be made as is contemplated by the statute. The petition must be amended by alleging alternatively that the extraordinary resolution to wind up was not validly passed. And upon the petition so amended I make the usual compulsory order, with the usual order as to costs.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., Mr. George Hart, and Mr. Nepean were for the petition; Mr. E. C. Macnaghten,

VIZETELLY V. MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY (LIMITED).*

Defamation—Libel—Publication—Liability for—Circulating library.

This was an application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Grantham and a special jury, reported in The Times of March 7. The action was brought to recover damages for the publication of a libel. The plaintiff, Mr. Edward Vizetelly, was a newspaper correspondent and journalist, and in the year 1889 he was employed by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, to proceed to Africa for the purpose of undertaking a rescue expedition to find Mr. (now Sir H. M.) Stanley, the explorer, and to furnish matter for Mr. Bennett's publications. Mr. Stanley was then engaged in looking for Emin Pasha. The plaintiff met Mr. Stanley on November 30 at Msura, when he was returning to the coast after having relieved Emin Pasha. The plaintiff sent off letters, for which he received from Mr. Bennett a sum of £2,000. In October, 1898, a work entitled "Emin Pasha: His Life and Work," was published by Messrs. Constable and Co., which contained the following passage, purporting to be an extract from the diary of Emin Pasha for November 30, 1889:—"Vizetelly sent off three messengers to-day to the coast, each with a bulky letter. However, as he is not yet sober, he cannot, surely, have written them himself, and the solution of the problem is, as Dr. Parke tells us, simply that Mr. Stanley had the correspondence ready and knocked it down to the highest bidder—Vizetelly—i.e., Gordon Bennett—and quite right, too." The book was given to the plaintiff by the Illustrated London News to review, when he discovered the passage complained of. He brought an action against Messrs. Constable and Co., the publishers, which was settled by payment of £100 and a promise to recall the book. A notice appeared in the Publishers' Circular to the effect that Messrs. Constable requested that all copies of Vol. I. of "Emin Pasha: His Life and Work" might be returned to them immediately, as they wished to cancel a page and insert another one in its place. A similar notice appeared in the Athenæum. Some months later the plaintiff discovered that the defendants were selling copies of the book containing the incriminated passage. It appeared that the defendants had not seen the notice in the Publishers' Circular or the Athenæum. The plaintiff wrote a letter of complaint to the defendants, and subsequently commenced this action. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants had published the above words by selling and circulating the book containing them, and had continued to do so after notice that it contained them. The defendants denied that they had acted with negligence, saying that what they had done was in the ordinary course of business, and that, immediately on receiving notice that the book contained a libel, they withdrew it from circulation and sale. At the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £100.

Mr. ASQUITH, Q.C., and Mr. SCRUTTON (Mr.

McCall, Q.C., and Mr. J. K. F. Cleave with them) appeared for the defendants in support of the application for a new trial or judgment. The grounds of the application were that there was no evidence in support of the plaintiff's case, and that the learned Judge had misdirected the jury and that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The question was whether the defendants were responsible as publishers of this libel. The defendants were merely vendors of the book in question, and it was clear that they did not, in fact, know that the book contained a libel. If a man who circulated a book did not in fact know that it contained a libel, he was not to be held liable unless the circumstances were such that he ought to have known it. That was held to be the law in "Emmens v. Pottle" (16 Q.B.D., 354). It could not reasonably be said that the defendants ought to have known that this was a publication which was likely to contain a libel. It was impossible for the defendants to read through all the enormous number of books which were submitted to them every year. They were justified in relying to a great extent on the publishers. The publishers here were admittedly a very high-class firm, the author was a scientific writer, and the book was in the nature of a scientific work. The true inference to be drawn from the facts in this case was that the defendants did not publish this libel. An accidental publication was not a publication at all—see "Regina v. Munslow" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 758) and "Mallon v. W. H. Smith and Son" (9 The Times L.R., 621).

Mr. CYRIL DODD, Q.C. (Mr. Bassett Hopkins with him), for the plaintiff, said that the action was fought at the trial upon the question whether the defendants had taken proper care to ascertain whether the books they circulated contained libels. "Emmens v. Pottle" introduced an exception to the general law. That was the case of a newspaper vendor, which was a very different case from that of a circulating library. In the former case newspapers were sold off almost as soon as they were received; in the latter case there was an opportunity to inquire into the nature of the book. There was evidence to justify the finding of the jury.

Mr. R. B. D. Asland held a watching brief on behalf of Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son.

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the defendants applied for judgment upon the ground that they did not publish the libel, and in the alternative for a new trial upon the grounds that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that there had been misdirection. He wished to state at the outset that he based his judgment on the special facts of the case, and he did not intend to lay down the law applicable to every case of a circulating library, because, in his opinion, the jury were justified in the circumstances in saying that the defendants did "publish" the libel. The circumstances of the case were these:—The book in question was published in 1898 by Messrs. Constable and Co., the well-known publishers, and the title of the book on the outside of the cover was "The Life and Work of Emin Pasha." On the title page inside the book appeared the words "Emin Pasha, his life and work: compiled from his journals, letters, scientific notes, and from official documents, by Georg Schweitzer, with an introduction by R. W. Felkin, M.D., F.R.S.E." The defendants took copies of the book from the publishers, and in due course they circulated the book among their subscribers, and also sold some copies of it. The plaintiff received the book from the Illustrated London News for the purposes of review, and he then discovered the passage complained of. It was clear that this passage was a libel on the plaintiff. He took proceedings against Messrs. Constable and Co..

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

who paid him £100, apologized, and undertook to withdraw the book. The plaintiff on October 29, 1898, wrote a letter to the Athenæum, and it was not denied that that paper was taken in by the defendants, though they did not see the plaintiff's letter. On November 5, 1898, Messrs. Constable and Co. wrote to the Athenæum a letter as to the withdrawal of the book from circulation. On November 12, 1898, a notice appeared in the Publishers' Circular, a well-known trade publication in which a publisher would usually insert a notice of the withdrawal of a book on account of a libel in it. The notice was to the effect that Messrs. Constable and Co. desired all copies of the book to be returned to them in order that they might cancel a page. On the same day the same notice appeared in the Athenæum. On March 10, 1899, the plaintiff went to the defendants' establishment and bought a copy of the book, and he found that the page containing the passage complained of was unexpurgated. What defence had the defendants to the action? None at all, unless they could bring themselves within the case of "Emmens v. Pottle." In that case the defendants were newsvendors, and they sold a newspaper containing a libel on the plaintiff. The jury in that case found—first, "that the defendants did not nor did either of them know that the newspapers at the time they sold them contained libels on the plaintiff." In the present case also the defendants did not know that the book contained a libel on the plaintiff. The second finding in "Emmens v. Pottle" was "that it was not by negligence on the defendants' part that they did not know there was any libel in the newspapers." Where was there any finding of the jury in the present case that it was not by negligence on the defendants' part that they did not know there was any libel in the book? The third finding in that case was "that the defendants did not know that the newspaper was of such a character that it was likely to contain libellous matter, nor ought they to have known so." Upon those findings the Judge who tried the case (Mr. Justice Wills) entered judgment for the defendants. When that case went to the Court of Appeal Lord Esher said:—"I agree that the defendants are prima facie liable. They have handed to other people a newspaper in which there is a libel on the plaintiff. I am inclined to think that this called upon the defendants to show some circumstances which absolve them from liability, not by way of privilege, but facts which show that they did not publish the libel. . . . I am not prepared to say that it would be sufficient for them to show that they did not know of the particular libel. But the findings of the jury make it clear that the defendants did not publish the libel. Taking the view of the jury to be right, that the defendants did not know that the paper was likely to contain a libel, and still more, that they ought not to have known this, which must mean that they ought not to have known it, having used reasonable care—the case is reduced to this, that the defendants were innocent disseminators of a thing which they were not bound to know was likely to contain a libel." Applying the law so laid down to the facts of the present case, Mr. Mudie, who was the only witness called for the defendants, in his evidence stated in effect that there was no one in the establishment to exercise supervision over the books except himself and his co-director, and that they could not do it properly as the books were too numerous. Mr. Mudie also stated that on one or two occasions they had books that contained libels, but no action for libel had been brought against them before the present one. He admitted that it was cheaper to run the risk of an action than to employ readers. Was it surprising that the jury came to the conclusion that the defendants did not exercise due care to see that the book did not contain a libel? The defendants did not get from the jury a finding similar to that in "Emmens v. Pottle." Out of the mouth of Mr. Mudie himself there was ample evidence to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that the defendants had failed to prove their plea. There was another point. The defendants took in the Athenæum and the Publishers' Circular. They knew that they were trade publications. They never looked to see what was advertised in those papers, nor did they employ any one to do so. They did not see the notices in those papers respecting this book, and the jury might well say that the defendants did not take due care in their business. There was therefore evidence upon which the jury might find that the defendants had failed to prove the plea as in "Emmens v. Pottle," and, in his opinion, the verdict of the jury was quite right. With regard to the summing up of the learned Judge, it was based upon the case of "Emmens v. Pottle," and, in his opinion, there was no misdirection. The application must be dismissed with costs.

Mr. SCRUTTON asked for a stay of execution to enable the defendants to consider whether they would take the case to the House of Lords. The plaintiff had been paid the £100.

The COURT refused a stay.

IN RE LINOTYPE COMPANY'S TRADE MARK APPLICATION.*
Trade Mark—Registration—Capacity for—Invented word—"Tachytype."

This was a motion on the part of the Monotype Company, made under the direction of the Board of Trade in the usual manner to an appeal to them, for the purpose of reversing a decision of the Comptroller of Trade Marks who allowed the Linotype Company to register as a trade mark the word "Tachytype" in connexion with the manufacture of a machine, the English patent for which the Linotype Company purchased from an American company called the Tachytype Company. There are patented labour-saving rival machines, called respectively the linotype and monotype, well known in the newspaper and printing trades, by which type making and composing are performed at one operation at great rapidity. The machine patented by the Tachytype Company is of a similar class.

Mr. THOMAS TERRELL, Q.C., and Mr. J. W. GORDON argued in support of the motion that the word "Tachytype" was not capable of being registered as a trade mark as "an invented word" within the meaning of the definition of a trade mark contained in the Patent Designs and Trade Mark Act, 1883, section 64, as amended by section 10 of the Act of 1888.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Bousfield, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian for the Linotype Company were not called upon.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY said:—The section which alone I have to consider is section 64 of the Patent Code, subsections (d) and (e), and in substance the question is whether this is an invented word within the meaning of the section. It has been decided by the House of Lords that the subsections (d) and (e) are separate and distinct, and that there is no justification for incorporating into (d) the limitation found in (c). Hence there may be a perfectly good invented word, although it has some reference to the quality of the goods with respect to which it has been used. In reading this section I do not find anything whatever to lend colour to the suggestion that the applicant must be the first inventor, and although it is true that almost every word in use once was invented, we must have regard to what is commonly known at the time application for registration is made. Tachytype is a word which comes within the meaning of the phrase an invented word. I doubt whether any one who is not a scholar more or less could have an idea of attaching any meaning to it. I had my attention called to certain dictionary words in which "tachy" is used as a prefix. All I can say is there is not a single one of those words that I can recall ever having heard before. I must confess such ignorance. I think if I were to hold that the word tachytype is not a word falling within the term invented word I should be disregarding what was said by the Law Lords in the "Solia" case. The Linotype Company, who are the applicants for the trade mark, have taken an assignment of certain letters patent and also leave and licence to use this name so far as the Tachytype Company are concerned, and have got an assignment of such goodwill as the Tachytype Company had. I have come to the conclusion that they never had any substantial business in this country, and that greatly assists the applicants. I cannot find anything in the statute to show that the applicant must be the first and true inventor of the name to be used as a trade mark, still less that there was no prior user. For these reasons I must dismiss this motion with costs.

Court of Appeal (Lindley, M.R.,
L.JJ.) 1900.
April 30.

IN THE GOODS OF CATHERINE EUPHRASIE MARTIN, OTHERWISE GUILLARD—LOUSTALAN V. LOUSTALAN.*

Domicil—Married woman—Frenchman residing in England—Animus revertendi—Will—Revocation by marriage—French law.

This was an appeal against a decision by the President of the Probate Division (reported in The Times of August 7 last). The plaintiff, Marie Loustalan, claimed by the action probate of the will of Catherine Euphrasie Martin, otherwise Guillard, as contained in a notarial copy, the will being dated January 16, 1870, being executed according to French law, and being expressed in the French language. The testatrix was then unmarried. She died on January 2, 1895, in a fire at a laundry in the Edgware-road, of which she was the proprietress. The plaintiff alleges that the deceased by the will named her universal legatee, or heiress, or residuary legatee. She alleges that the holograph original is now deposited at Pau, in France, in accordance with an order of the Civil tribunal at Pau, made on April 3, 1895. On October 23, 1896, the Court at St. Nazaire declared that the deceased was the wife of Louis Guillard and was domiciled in the arrondissement of St. Nazaire, and that by the will the plaintiff was put in possession of the estate in the capacity of universal legatee, and she accordingly claimed that that judgment was binding on the defendant, who was and always had been a French subject. The defendant, Jean Loustalan, in his defence traversed the plaintiff's allegations and claimed that on March 22, 1895, the English Court had granted him letters of administration to the estate prior to the legal proceedings in the Courts at Pau and St. Nazaire, which had been instituted without notice to him. The Loustalan family were peasants living on a farm at Vigneux, near Pau, in the arrondissement of St. Nazaire. The plaintiff was the sister of the deceased and the defendant was her brother. The two sisters started life as lay helpers in a convent near to their home, but subsequently the elder of the two, Catherine, had herself trained as a finisher in laundry work. Shortly afterwards she came to England, obtained a situation with a widow lady, and travelled about with her as her companion. In 1870, when at Lascelles-hall, near Huddersfield, she wrote to her sister for some papier timbré, on which she executed a holograph will and sent it to her sister to be lodged with a notary at Pau. In 1874 she married a Frenchman named Louis Guillard, of the commune of St. Nazaire, who afterwards assumed the name of Martin, the ceremony taking place in London. After 1866, her sister Marie joined her, and they set up the laundry in Edgware-road, which in January, 1895, was burnt down, and in that catastrophe the testatrix and a number of French girls in her employment lost their lives. The husband was brought up to be a teacher of French, but, owing to a serious offence, a sentence amounting to ten years' penal servitude was passed upon him, and he thereupon fled to England until the period of proscription of 20 years under French law had run out against him, and he did not return to France until 1890. The questions were (1) what was the domicile of the testatrix and her husband; (2) whether the marriage was celebrated according to English or French law; (3) whether the will was revoked by the marriage. The President held that the husband's domicile, and therefore that of the testatrix, was in France at the time of her death. But he did not think there was enough to show that the parties had been married according to the matrimonial law of their nationality. He did not think there was sufficient to show that they did not intend their marriage to be according to the English law and that that law should govern their matrimonial relations. By English law when two persons married the marriage revoked the wills of both. This was not so under French law. His Lordship could not suppose that the parties intended that that provision of English testamentary law should affect them, though they had been married according to the English law. His Lordship therefore held that the will had not been revoked by the marriage. He accordingly granted administration with the will annexed to the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

Mr. Inderwick, Q.C., and Mr. Grazebrook were for the defendant.

Mr. H. J. H. Mackay was for the plaintiff.

The appeal was heard on March 29 and 30 last, when the Court reserved their judgment.

The COURT allowed the appeal, the Lords Justices differing from the Master of the Rolls.

The MASTER of the ROLLS read the following judgment:—The will which is in question in this case was made in this country by a Frenchwoman before her marriage, and was not attested as required by English law. By English law, by which I mean English law irrespective of all foreign law, the will is therefore clearly invalid. But foreign law must be taken into account. Those principles of private international law which are recognized in this country are part of the law of England, and on those principles the validity of the will, so far as it affects movable property, depends on the law of the domicile of the testatrix when she died. The domicile of the testatrix must be determined by the English Court of Probate according to those legal principles applicable to domicile which are recognized in this country and are part of its law. Until the question of the domicile of the testatrix at the time of her death is determined the Court of Probate cannot tell what law of what country has to be applied. The testatrix was a Frenchwoman, but it would be contrary to sound principle to determine her domicile at her death by the evidence of French legal experts. The preliminary question by what law is the will to be governed must depend in an English Court on the view that Court takes of the domicile of the testatrix when she died. If authority for these statements is wanted, it will be found in "Bremer v. Freeman" (10 P.C., 306; see pp. 359, &c.); "Doglioui v. Crispin" (L.R., 1 H.L., 301); and "In re Trufort" (36 Ch.D., 600). In each of the last two cases a foreign Court had determined the domicile and the English Court had also to determine it, and did determine it, to be the same as that determined by the foreign Court. But, as I understand those cases, the English Court satisfied itself as to the domicile in the English sense of the term and did not simply adopt the foreign decisions. The course universally followed when domicile has to be decided by the Courts of this country proceeds upon the principles to which I have alluded. But, further, the validity of a will of movables made by a person domiciled in a foreign country at the time of such person's death not only may, but must, depend on the view its Courts take of the validity of the will when made and on its subsequent revocation if that question arises. These questions may or may not turn on the domicile of the testator as understood in this country. For example, in this case it is agreed on all hands that by the law of France the will in question, being a holograph will made by a French subject, was valid when made, whatever her domicile may have been when she made it. It is also agreed on all hands that by French law marriage does not revoke the prior wills of the spouses. But the testatrix married a Frenchman in this country after she made her will, and the question whether her will was thereby revoked as to her movables is the real question on which this case turns. By whatever Court this question is to be decided, the English law of marriage which in such a case involves and, indeed, turns on English views of domicile must be considered. If this view be ignored the effect of the marriage will be inadequately and, indeed, erroneously ascertained. If the domicile of the testatrix is to be treated as English when she became a married woman her will was revoked by her marriage, for such is the law of England whatever the intentions of the parties may be (1 Jarm. on Wills, c. 7), but if her domicile was French her will would not be revoked by English law and still less by French law. Both laws are alike in regarding her domicile as that of her husband as soon as she married him. The effect of her marriage must therefore depend on the English view of his domicile. It would be useless and indeed entirely misleading to ask a French expert what effect the French law would give to an English marriage without explaining the English law to him, and no explanation of that law would be adequate or correct if it excluded the English view of the domicile of the parties. Having thus stated the principles which, in my opinion, ought to be applied to the case, I proceed to consider the facts and the evidence of the experts called at the trial. As already stated, the will was made in England by a Frenchwoman in the French language and was a holograph will valid by the law of France whether she was then domiciled in England or France. It was made in 1870. She was in service in England, and this by French law rendered her domicile (in the French sense) English at that time. She afterwards set up a laundry business in London. Her principal establishment was therefore here, and, according to French law, she was clearly domiciled (in the French sense) in England. In May, 1874, she married a French refugee known by the name of Martin. He came over to this country in 1868 and made a living by teaching languages. There was no settlement or anything in the nature of a settlement. The marriage was celebrated by a French Roman Catholic priest in a Roman Catholic church in the presence of a registrar. At the time of the marriage both the man and the woman signed a declaration stating that they were both domiciliés in London. They lived together in London for some years and carried on the laundry. In 1881 and 1884 leases of the laundry house were granted to the husband. In 1890 the husband and wife separated; he assigned the leases to her and returned to France, where he has ever since lived and lives now. His wife remained here and continued to carry on the laundry business until her death in January, 1895. It was believed that she had died intestate, and her brother obtained letters of administration to her estate. The will, which had been sent to France in 1870 and had been deposited with a notary, was brought forward recently by the testatrix's sister who was constituted by it her residuary legatee. At her instance the letters of administration have been revoked, and probate of the will has been granted. The will has been judicially recognized as valid in France. But as the proceedings there were ex parte, I attach little importance to this fact, although no appeal has yet been made to set aside the order so obtained. The learned President decided, and, in my opinion, rightly decided, that the domicile of the testatrix in the English sense was French when she died. It became necessary, therefore, to determine whether by the law of France her will was valid when she died. Experts were called and examined and cross-examined at great length on a number of points, many of which are not now, at all events, material or in controversy. The experts all agree that the will was valid when made. They also all agreed that according to French law the testatrix was domiciled (in the French sense) in England when she made her will and when she married. They also all agreed that, according to French law and in the French sense, her husband was domiciled in England when he married. Treating the husband and wife as domiciled in England when they married they differed as to the consequences. M.M. Guastalla, Gorostaeze, and Measil think that the marriage revoked the will. M. Mesnil is quite clear upon the point; the others are less so, but they, I think, take the same view. M. Astone, when first called, stated that the marriage did not revoke the will, that it depended on nationality, not domicile, in the French sense. When recalled he apparently adhered to his opinion, but considered that the revocation might depend on the intention of the parties and on the adoption of the matrimonial régime by the spouses. All these experts based their opinion on their view that at the time of the marriage the parties were domiciled in England and they applied the English law of marriage to that state of things. But, as I have already pointed out, the English law of marriage, when considered with reference to its effect on property involves, and in a case like this cannot be severed from, English views of domicile. The learned President came to the conclusion that the domicile of the husband at the time of the marriage was in France, not in England. But he also came to the conclusion that both husband and wife intended to marry according to English law and that the English matrimonial law should and would govern their future property. He further considered that the law by which wills are revoked by marriage was not part of the English matrimonial law but part of the English testamentary law, and that this law did not apply to the case. I confess I have great difficulty in adopting this view of the case. If, as the President considered, the parties were (according to English views) domiciled in France when they married, their marriage would not revoke their previous wills; and the French experts should have been told so and should have been directed that their assumption of an English domicile was inadmissible. It is plain from their evidence that, according to French law, the domicile in the French sense of both husband and wife was in England and not in France both when the marriage took place and when the testatrix died. I have no doubt that this conclusion was quite correct, but for the reasons I have already given I consider it necessary to examine the effect of the marriage according to English views of domicile. I proceed, therefore, to inquire whether the President was right in his view that the husband was domiciled (in the English sense) in France and not in England when he married. We start with the fact that the husband had a domicile of origin in France. According to English law the burden of proving that he lost that domicile and acquired an English domicile is on those who assert that he did so. Further, the domicile to be acquired must be not domicile in the French sense but in the English sense. The experts all tell us that he lost his French domicile in the French sense by coming to England and setting himself up as a teacher of languages here. But to acquire an English domicile in the English sense not only is a change of residence and place of business required, but there must be an intention to adopt the new residence permanently or for an indefinite period. See the authorities collected in "Dicey's Conflict of Laws," pages 104 et seq. I cannot come to the conclusion that this intention is proved. I see no proof of any intention to abandon France as his domicile in the English sense, and to acquire a domicile in the English sense in this country. I do not say there is no evidence tending to establish a change of domicile in the English sense, but such evidence in my opinion falls short of proof, and is, in fact, outweighed by evidence on the other side. The circumstances tending to show an abandonment of an intention to return to France are that the husband came over here and taught here; that he married a woman in business here; that he and she described themselves as then domiciliés à Londres; that he intended to settle here until he could safely return; that he lived here with his wife for some years, and after it was safe to return to France: that he took leases in his own name; and that (whether he knew it or not) he had lost his French domicile in the French sense. Against this must be set the facts that he was a French subject and had a French domicile of origin, that he came here to avoid imprisonment, that he dared not go back to France for many years, but that he could safely do so at the end of 20 years from the time he fled from his own country, that he does go back a few years after it is safe to do so, and that he has ever since been and is now settled in his native country and living with his own relatives. If we look at all the facts as we now know them they, in my opinion, point to a retention of his domicile of origin (in the English sense of the word domicile) rather than to an abandonment of such domicile and a subsequent re-acquisition of it when he went back to France. What has happened since marriage throws a great deal of light on what was obscure at the time of marriage. But if we carry our minds back to the time of marriage and disregard all subsequent events (which I do not think we ought to do) the fact that he was then a criminal fugitive who dared not go back to France for a definite number of years but could safely go back when they had elapsed would prevent me from inferring an abandonment of an intention to return to France when he could safely do so. (See Dicey, 142.) I should not arrive at the same conclusion if he had fled from his country for life unless pardoned as an English criminal fugitive would have done to escape from the operation of the laws of his own country. The definite period after which he could safely return is to my mind all important. As to the declaration made by husband and wife when they married that they were domiciliés à Londres, I have no doubt that domicilié was used in the French sense, i.e., in the sense of residence and not in the sense of what we mean by "domiciled," which has a very different signification. Upon the question of domicile (in the English sense) my own conclusions are that the domicile of the testatrix was French when she made her will; French up to the time she married; French by her marriage; and French when she died. Her domicile was French by and after marriage because, in my opinion, her husband's domicile was French. The domicile of the testatrix being French when she made her will and when she died it became necessary to ascertain the effect of her will on her movable property according to the French law. The husband being, in my opinion, domiciled in France when she married, it became necessary to ascertain the effect of such marriage by French law upon her will; and, if in order to ascertain this it became necessary for the French experts to be told what the English law was, they should have been told that it depended on the view which an English Court would take of the domicile, in the English sense, of the husband; and if I am right in my view of his domicile, the experts should have been told that by English law the marriage in this case did not revoke the wife's will. It was not necessary or, indeed, proper on this occasion to pursue the inquiry further and to see what matrimonial régime the parties intended to adopt. It is not necessary to cite authorities to show that it is now settled that according to international law as understood and administered in England the effect of marriage on the movable property of spouses depend (in the absence of any contract) on the domicile of the husband in the English sense. The authorities will be found collected in "Foote's International Law," edition 2, pp. 315-321, and "Dicey's Conflict of Laws," 648 et seq. This being clear the will was not revoked; and if not revoked it was clearly valid as regards the wife's movable property. Section 18 of the Wills Act does not apply to the wills of foreigners who die domiciled abroad (Deane's Wills Act, note to section 18, cites an authority for this) and the effect of the marriage was not to vest the wife's property in the husband. French law did not so vest it, neither did international law as understood and administered in this country. The English law applicable to English people and according to which a woman's personal property formerly vested in her husband on marriage and according to which her will was revoked by marriage even before the Wills Act could not on principle apply to French spouses married in England, but (according to English views) domiciled in France when they married. In my opinion the will has been properly admitted to Probate, but it will not apply to leasehold property, for that is not regarded as movable property, to which the lex domicilii is applicable (Dicey, 72). A great quantity of expert evidence was taken on the difficult question whether the French law of communauté des biens was to be applied to the property of these persons. As I understand the expert evidence the question turns not only on the marriage but on the effect of what the husband and wife did afterwards. This question may arise hereafter but it does not arise now, and I purposely, therefore, say nothing more about it.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY read the following judgment :— I see no sufficient reason to differ from the President's conclusion that the mutual rights of the spouses as to movables were to be determined by English law. If it is necessary, in order to support this conclusion, to hold that the husband's domicile at the date of the marriage, or, at any rate, the matrimonial domicile, was English, I should not hesitate to hold that it was. The husband had been brought up to be a teacher or professor of French, and at first, and down to the time of the marriage in 1874, had no other means of gaining his livelihood than by teaching French. His departure from France was brought about by his fear of a prosecution for an offence alleged to have been committed by him whilst he was a professor of French and in connexion with his exercise of his professorship. Over and above the punishment to be imposed for the offence, if proved, it is obvious that conviction for such an offence would have an extremely prejudicial and not improbably a prohibitive effect on his subsequent exercise of his profession in France. As he did not elect to abide his trial in France, his evasion of a trial was almost, if not quite, equivalent to a renunciation for all his life of his profession in France. He went in the first place to Belgium, and was in his absence convicted and sentenced. The precise date of this conviction I cannot find, but it must have been before his coming to England, which was in 1868 or 1869. He might at any time have gone back to France and submitted to trial, but he did not elect so to do. It appears that 20 years after the date of his conviction he would have been safe from punishment, but he would then have been advanced in years, and if it is suggested that he formed from the first the intention of going back after the 20 years and becoming again a professor in France, such an intention would, in my opinion, be so irrational that, in default of the strongest evidence, it ought not to be imputed to him. Nor could he have had the intention of going back without having the means of supporting himself. Evidence of any such intention does not exist. I take it that the proper conclusion is, not that he had the intention of returning to France at the end of an interval however long, but that he had no intention of returning at all. He adopted the name Martin, which might pass for an English name, and at any rate would have the effect of keeping in the background the discredited name of Guillard. He was supporting himself as a teacher of French at the time of the marriage in 1874, when a prospect opened of gaining a probably easier living by means of his wife's laundry. He married (being 51 years old) with the clearly-formed intention of living by the laundry business, whether or not he assisted with money or by his personal exertions in carrying it on. I consider the reasonable inference to be that he intended to remain in England, and was domiciled there according to English, as he certainly was according to French, law. It is his intention that governs, not that of the wife, in the absence of any marriage settlement, and I conclude that he intended English law to apply, and that law gave him immediately on the marriage the exclusive right to all the wife's movables, that is, to everything that could pass by the holograph will of 1870. As by the marriage she would become incapable of making another will, the will of 1870 would be revoked. It matters not that she might subsequently, by an alteration in the law, become entitled to personal property which she could dispose of by will. Such a new testamentary power would not, in my opinion, revive the will which had already been revoked. I have considered the question of the husband's domicile exclusively with reference to the facts as they existed previously to and at the date of the marriage. The subsequent events do not, in my judgment, throw any light upon the question adverse to the conclusion which I have arrived at. The taking of leases for terms of years of various lengths would tend rather to show that his connexion with England was permanent than otherwise, though probably it is not of much importance. True it is that at length, not before 1890, when he was already about 67 years old, he returns to France, but in the circumstances that does not give any ground for supposing that he always, from the time when he left France, had the animus revertendi. One of the reasons for returning was the state of his health, another probably the unsatisfactory state of his relations with his wife. But probably the most important thing to notice is that his residence in France was rendered possible by his having acquired a considerable fortune from his wife's property which he had no reason to count upon before the marriage. True it is that the 20 years the expiration of which brought immunity from punishment for the offence for which he had been condemned had run, but it was not on the expiration of that period, but at least several years later that he returned. I am not disposed to hold this evidence of an intention throughout to return which would prevent his acquiring an English domicile. The fact that he took steps for vesting in his wife all his interest in the laundry business would be strong evidence of his intention to remain out of England, and I agree with the Master of the Rolls that in 1895 he, and therefore his wife at her death, had a French domicile.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read a judgment to the same effect as that of Lord Justice Rigby. He grounded his judgment on the change of the husband's domicile, from a French to an English domicile, at the time of the marriage, and his Lordship thought that, if he did change it then, his subsequent reversion to a French domicile would not prevent English law continuing to govern the matrimonial property. In his Lordship's opinion the decision of the Court below ought to be reversed and the grant of letters of administration with the will annexed revoked.

VIDITZ V. O'HAGAN.*

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (15 The Times L.R., 416), reversed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's (reported in 15 The Times L.R., p. 416). In November, 1864, Mrs. Viditz, the only child of an Irish peer, was at the age of 18 married to Mr. Viditz, who was then and still is a domiciled Austrian. The marriage took place in Switzerland. Prior to the marriage, marriage articles, dated November 24, 1864, were executed at Berne, at the British Embassy, between Mr. Viditz of the first part, Mrs. Viditz of the second part, trustees of the third part, and the lady's father of the fourth part, and it was thereby declared and agreed by and between the parties thereto, and Mr. Viditz covenanted with the trustees, that in case the intended marriage should take place all such personal property as Mrs. Viditz was then entitled to in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy, and also all such sums of money, stocks, funds, or other personal property, whether in possession, remainder, or expectancy, as might at any time during the joint lives of the husband and wife come to the lady or to her and her husband in her right under any will, settlement, or by gift or otherwise (save and except pecuniary legacies), should be vested in the trustees upon the usual trusts for the benefit of the lady for life for her separate use, with a restraint upon anticipation, and after her death upon trusts for the issue of the marriage, with an ultimate trust for the father absolutely. There was one very unusual provision empowering the father to alter and vary any of the provisions, clauses, matters, or things therein contained, and to add or supply any other provisions, clauses, matters, or things which might be deemed necessary or proper. This could not, as the learned Judge held, enable the father to enlarge or extend the scope of the settlement so as to bring in fresh property. These articles were duly executed by the lady, who attained 21 in 1867. The settlement was in English form, and the Court treated it as a good settlement and governed by English law, without reference to the formalities or the substantial provisions which would have been required either by the law of Austria or by the law of Switzerland. In 1870, on the death of the lady's mother, she became entitled to a sum of £6,000, which was paid over to the trustees of the deed of 1864 and invested in Consols. In 1880 a deed in English form was executed in Paris, which purported to be a settlement made in pursuance of the articles. Mr. and Mrs. Viditz, the trustees, and her father were all parties to this deed. It recited the investment of the Consols and declared trusts of that sum similar, so far as material, to the trusts in the articles, and it contained a covenant to settle after-acquired property differing from the covenant in the articles, inasmuch as pecuniary legacies were not excepted. In 1882 the father died, and Mrs. Viditz thereupon became entitled in possession to a sum of £2,000, which was received by the trustees of the settlement and invested. This £2,000 and the £6,000 were sums to which Mrs. Viditz was at the date of her marriage entitled in reversion contingently upon attaining 21. The father by his will left all his property to set aside the will. The result was that a compromise was effected in March, 1884, under which a sum of £13,000 was to be settled upon her and her children, and a sum of £5,000 was to be paid to her. No part of this sum had been received, however. In 1892 Mrs. Viditz became entitled under the will of an aunt to a legacy, which also had not yet been received. In the same year the trustees informed Mrs. Viditz that the £5,000 payable to her under the compromise would have to be paid to the trustees of her marriage settlement. This led to advice being taken, and on November 18, 1893, a document was executed by Mr. and Mrs. Viditz in Austria by which they purported to annul and put an end to the settlement. There was evidence that according to Austrian law it is competent to a husband and wife to revoke a marriage contract, notwithstanding the birth of issue. Mr. and Mrs. Viditz and their children, who have attained 21, brought this action claiming a declaration that the settlement created by the deeds of 1864 and 1880 had been got rid of by the transaction of 1893, or, alternatively, they asked for rectification of the settlement so far as it went beyond the articles, and in particular they asserted that the settlement, if binding at all, was only binding to the extent of the funds actually in the hands of the trustees, and that it was competent to the lady to repudiate the settlement so far as the £5,000 and the legacy were concerned. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy held that the marriage articles of 1864 were valid and were governed by English law, and that, the lady not having repudiated them within a reasonable time after she attained 21, she was absolutely bound by them, and that she could not therefore elect from time to time during the joint lives of her husband and herself as property fell in whether she would affirm the articles. Consequently, the £5,000 was bound by the settlement. His Lordship also held that, if ratification were needed, there had been sufficient ratification. But, as to the £2,000 legacy, his Lordship held that the settlement of 1880 must be rectified so as to accord with the articles and to expressly exclude pecuniary legacies, and that the £2,000 was not bound by the settlement. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Dicey, Q.C., and Mr. Micklem, Q.C., were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. Ingpen, Q.C., were for the trustees; Mr. G. D. Lynch was for some mortgagees of the £5,000.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said the first question was as to the construction of the articles—whether the £5,000 was comprised in the settlement or not. In his Lordship's opinion this sum must be considered as having arisen from the real estate of the lady's father, and it was not included in the covenant as to her after-acquired personal property, but in another covenant relating to real estate which was not binding on her. Consequently the £5,000 was not bound by the settlement. The second and more difficult question was whether the settlement had become binding on the lady. Under English law it was a voidable contract. By Austrian law she was unable to ratify the contract, or to place it out of her power to revoke it. She executed documents which by English law would have amounted to a ratification, but by Austrian law those documents were invalid so far as they purported to ratify the settlement. She had neither before nor after the marriage power to make an irrevocable contract. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy held that the settlement was an English one and governed by English law; that under that law it became binding on the lady, unless she repudiated it within a reasonable time after she attained 21, and that, as she did not repudiate it within a reasonable time, it had become binding on her. In the view of the Master of the Rolls that was not sound reasoning. The point now raised did not arise in "Van Grutten v. Digby" (31 Beav., 561) on which the learned Judge relied. In the present case the difficulty arose on the capacity to contract. What was the effect of English law as expounded by the House of Lords in "Edwards v. Carter" ([1893] A.C., 360)? Some contracts by infants were held to be absolutely void on the ground that they could not possibly be for the benefit of the infant. But the great bulk of contracts by infants were voidable—i.e., the infant when he came of age could elect whether he would affirm or repudiate the contract. If the infant did nothing to repudiate within a reasonable time after attaining 21 the contract would bind him. It would be an entire mistake to apply this part of the English law to such a case as the present. Could the doctrine as to a reasonable time be applied? It seemed to his Lordship that it would be contrary to good sense to do so, for the result would be that the contract would be binding when the infant had never had capacity before or after the marriage to make or to affirm it. In his Lordship's view the effect of the infant's change of domicile by the marriage was that the English doctrine had no application, because of her incapacity to confirm the contract. It might be put in another way by saying that the effect of the change of domicile was to enlarge the time for repudiation. His Lordship did not see how it could be said that a reasonable time had elapsed. The result was that the settlement must be considered as annulled.

ROBERTSON V. THE MAYOR, &C., OF BRISTOL.*

Local Government—Streets—Alteration—Jurisdiction of local authority.

When a street has been laid out and subsequently taken over by a local authority they have no power under sec. 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to deal with it as they think best in the public interest by altering the proportions of footway and roadway.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham's in an action tried before him without a jury at Bristol on February 23, 1899. The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from removing certain kerbing and paving laid by the plaintiff in Robertson-road, St. George's, a suburb of Bristol, and formerly under the jurisdiction of an urban district council. The plaintiff was owner of a building estate in St. George's, upon which he had laid out a wide road called after him Robertson-road. The by-laws of the urban district council prescribed that an owner laying out a building estate should submit plans showing roads of a width of 36ft. in all, including the carriage-way and two footways, each of the footways being one-sixth of the total width; in other words, that the carriage-way should be 24ft. wide and each of the footways 6ft. wide. The plaintiff deposited plans marking out Robertson-road, and showing it to be of greater width than 36ft. Part of that road was in fact designed to be of a width of 45ft., having a carriage-way of 30ft. and two footways of 7ft. 6in. each, and the remainder of a width of 40ft., having a carriage-way of 27ft. and footways of 6ft. 6in. each. These plans were submitted to the urban district council in 1891 and 1892, and were approved by the council. The road was laid out and dedicated to the public, but had not been taken over by the highway authority. On October 31, 1897, the Bristol Extension Act came into operation, and by that Act the district of St. George's became part of the City of Bristol and came under the jurisdiction of the defendants, who were minded to take over the roads in that district and to make them repairable by the public under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875. They accordingly served notices on the owners of houses fronting Robertson-road, but not on the plaintiff, annexing to the notices plans which showed their intention of turning part of the footways into the carriage-way. Having served these notices, the defendants commenced the work and began to alter the footway as notified. The plaintiff thereupon threatened proceedings, and subsequently issued a writ claiming the injunction as above stated. The defendants justified their action under section 150 of the Public Health Act, asserting that the right and duty of deciding how much of a public road should consist of footway and how much of carriage-way were vested in them as the highway authority. Section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, enacts that, where any street within an urban district (not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large), or the carriage-way, footway, or any other part of such street, is not sewered, levelled, paved, or made good to the satisfaction of the urban authority, such authority may, by notice to the respective owners or occupiers of premises fronting such parts as may require to be made good, require them to make good the same within a time specified in such notice. If the notice is not complied with the urban authority may execute the necessary works themselves. The case was tried before Mr. Justice Grantham, who gave judgment for the defendants, holding that when a local authority takes over a street they have power under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to deal with the carriage-way and the footways as they think best in the public interest. From this decision the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. J. A. FOOTE, Q.C., Mr. DUKE, Q.C., and Mr. WEATHERLY, for the plaintiff, contended that there was no power given to the defendants by the Public Health Act to change a footway or any part thereof into a carriage-way. The road must be taken over as it was dedicated. The soil of the road was still vested in the plaintiff as owner, and if an owner chose to dedicate a footway there was no power, except by an order of quarter sessions, to convert it into a carriage-way. There was no power given by section 150 of the Public Health Act, under which the defendants purported to act, to annihilate the distinction between footway and carriage-way and thus alter the dedication.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. CLAVELL SALTER contended that the highway authority had power to alter roads under their general jurisdiction over highways. The works done by the defendants were merely incidental to paving the street.

Counsel for the plaintiff were not called upon to reply. The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiff had an undoubted right to dedicate a footpath 7ft. 6in. wide; but the corporation contended that section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, justified them in altering the road as dedicated and enabled them to dedicate to passengers by carriage what the plaintiff had already dedicated to foot passengers. Section 150 gave no such power as the defendants claimed, or in any way enabled them to change a footway into a carriage-way, or a carriage-way into a footway. Mr. Justice Grantham had held that when a street had been laid out and taken over by a local authority that authority had power to deal with it as they might think best for the public interest. But no such power was to be found conferred by section 150. Under that section the local authority must deal with the street as they found it. That was the street which they were empowered to sewer, metal, pave, and make good. In this case plans had been deposited showing the relative proportions of footways and carriage-way, and these plans had been approved. It was the street laid out in accordance with those approved plans that the corporation had power to make good, and no section gave them power to alter the respective proportions and make good a street different from that which they had approved. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

TURNBULL, MARTIN, AND CO. V. HULL UNDERWRITERS' ASSOCIATION (LIMITED).*

Insurance—Marine—Freight—"Warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time"—Delay in repairing refrigerating machinery.

*Reported by W. HUSSEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment was delivered in this case, which was an action brought to recover a total loss on a policy of insurance on freight. The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Theobald Mathews for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW read the following judgment:—This was an action to recover a total loss on a policy on freight on a cargo of frozen meat. The insurance was on the outward voyage of the steamship Buteshire for freight expected to be earned on the homeward voyage, and the risk was described in the following terms:—"At and from London to any port or ports and (or) place or places in any order or rotation in Australia and (or) Tasmania and (or) New Zealand, risk to continue until steamer sails from final loading port on homeward voyage." The subject-matter was described as follows:—"Upon freight of frozen meat, chartered or as if chartered, on board or not on board, full interest admitted." The policy also contained the following special clause:—"Chartered freights and freights are warranted free from any claim consequent on loss of time whether arising from a peril of the sea or otherwise." It was not disputed that the words "or otherwise" meant other perils insured against. The evidence showed that at the time when the vessel sailed no contracts had been secured by the plaintiffs for the shipment of frozen meat from the colonial ports, but such contracts were made, and the homeward cargo was booked at Newcastle, Melbourne, and New Zealand ports while the vessel was making her outward voyage. Frozen meat must be shipped at the times specified in the contracts with shippers, and the shipments cannot be delayed. Where the vessel is disabled from fulfilling her engagements frozen meat would in the ordinary course be forwarded in another vessel. A delay involving no great length of time due to damage by perils insured against, either to ship or machinery, would prevent the vessel from earning freight contracted for, and would thus defeat the object of the adventure. The risk would therefore seem to be one which underwriters would be cautious about accepting. The Buteshire was fitted with refrigerating machinery of a special kind in three of her five holds. The other holds were used for ordinary cargo. The ship arrived at Sydney on October 15, 1898, and discharged her outward cargo. On October 18 a fire occurred on board, and so damaged her refrigerating machinery that she was disabled from carrying a cargo of frozen meat. Materials for the repair of the refrigerating machinery could not be procured, and must have been brought from England, and the owners properly determined to send the vessel home with such ordinary cargo as she could procure and to have the damage repaired in England. The earning of the freight was in this way rendered commercially impossible. It was argued for the plaintiffs upon the authority of "Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company" (L.R., 10 C.P., 125) that a delay due to a peril insured against which frustrated the object of the voyage and prevented the vessel from earning her homeward freight entitled the plaintiffs to recover as for a total loss. For the defendants reliance was placed on the terms of the warranty and upon the decision in the case of "Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company" (2 Com. Cas., 33, 238; [1897] A.C., 609). The loss, it was argued, was due not merely to the fire, but to the time which the repairs must have taken. The argument for the plaintiffs, on the other hand, that the claim was consequent not upon loss of time but upon the disablement of the vessel by a peril insured against was rejected by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in that case. The damage in both cases was of such a character that it became impossible to prosecute the voyage within the necessary time. An attempt was made to distinguish the present case from the decision in "Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company" on the ground that this was not chartered freight; but the warranty applies not only to chartered freight but to all freights; and the several contracts of affreightment made with the shippers had the same operation as if they were grouped in a charterparty. In each case the result of the peril insured against would have been the same—viz., to disable the ship from fulfilling her engagements in proper time. It seems to me that no such distinction can be reasonably made. The ship was damaged by a peril insured against; and its capacity to carry frozen meat was suspended until her machinery had been repaired. If she could have been repaired promptly there would have been no loss of freight. The loss, therefore, was "consequent on loss of time" within the meaning of the warranty. I give judgment for the defendants.

IN RE THE ESTATE OF EGMONT'S SETTLED ESTATES—EGMONT V. LEFROY.*

Settled Land Acts—Improvements and Reparation—Payment out of capital moneys—Jurisdiction—Settled Land Act, 1882, sec. 57, subsec. (2).

The Court has jurisdiction under sec. 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, to direct capital moneys to be applied in payment for improvements unauthorized by the Act of 1882, but authorized by a settlement made prior to the Act of 1890.

This was an application on the part of the Earl of Egmont, the tenant for life under a settlement dated August 15, 1889, for a direction to the defendants, the trustees of the settlement, for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, to pay to the Earl the sum of £3,997 12s. 6d. out of capital moneys in their hands subject to the settlement, being the amount claimed to have been expended by him in works of reparation and improvement on the Cowdray estate from September 5, 1897, to June 30, 1899. The settlement, which is dated August, 1889, provided (inter alia):—(1) The trustees and trustee for the time being of these presents whether several or only one are and is hereby appointed and declared to be the trustees of this settlement for all the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, or any Act or Acts altering or amending the same, and also for the purpose mentioned in section 42 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881. (4) For the like purpose (that is, for the purpose of that settlement) section 25 of the Act last aforesaid (the Settled Land Act, 1882) shall be read and take effect as if, in addition to the works or purposes of improvements therein enumerated, there were inserted therein the words rebuilding, reparation, or permanent improvement or additions of or to building of any description whether used or occupied for residential, farm, or other purposes.

Mr. Ingpen, Q.C., and Mr. Bateman Napier appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Gurdon for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, in giving judgment, said:—

*Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No scheme for any portion of the work done in respect of which the claim is now made was ever submitted to the trustees, and the tenant for life asks for an order under the powers conferred on the Court by section 15 of the Act of 1890. So far as the expenditure by the tenant for life has been for improvements actually authorized by the terms of the Settled Land Act, 1882, it is not disputed that the Court has a discretion to allow it; but it is argued on behalf of the trustees that the Court has no jurisdiction under section 15 of the Act of 1890 to make an order directing capital money to be applied in or towards payment for improvements unauthorized by the terms of the Act of 1882, although authorized by the settlement, having regard to the fact that the settlement is dated prior to the Act of 1890. Having regard to the terms of section 57, subsection (2), of the Act of 1882, I am of opinion that this argument is not well founded. The tenant for life has had conferred upon him by the settlement a power additional to and larger than those conferred by the Act, and, if the matter had rested there, I think that there would have been a power exercisable by virtue of the settlement independently of the Act, and that probably section 15 of the Act of 1890 would have had no application to the additional power; but section 57, subsection (2), expressly provides that any additional or larger powers so conferred shall, as far as may be, notwithstanding anything in the Act, operate and be exercisable in the like manner, and with all the like incidents, effects, and consequences, as if they were conferred by the Act, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement. In the present case I find no contrary intention expressed. Section 15 of the Act of 1890 is not a repealing section, nor is there any question of divesting or altering any right accrued prior to the passing of the Act of 1890. So that neither section 38 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, nor any doctrine as to repeal not affecting rights or liabilities accrued, appear to have any application. The Act of 1890 expressly provides that it is to be read as one with the Act of 1882, and it contains no saving in respect of settlements made between the respective dates of the passing of the two Acts. I think that the additional powers are to operate with all the like incidents as if they were conferred by the original Act, and, if they had been conferred by the original Act, section 15 of the Act of 1890 would have applied. One of the incidents is that the Court has power to authorize payment, although no scheme has been first submitted. Upon the construction of the settlement, I am of opinion that I have power to allow, beyond the works of improvement enumerated in the Acts of 1882 to 1890, reparations or repairs to buildings for residential, farm, or other purposes which, but for the terms of the settlement, might otherwise have fallen upon the tenant for life or have remained undone; but I do not think that such reparations extend to decorative or fancy repairs or to what may be termed casual repairs, such as whitewashing or painting, or putting in panes of glass to broken windows. I think the reparations or repairs intended are repairs of a substantial nature. It must also be borne in mind that the Court does not, under section 15 of the Act of 1890, as a rule, allow everything which would have been allowed as proper expenditure had a scheme been submitted. I may also add that I should not allow general expenses of the establishment for doing estate repairs; but I think that a reasonable payment for work done by the permanent staff in and about the allowed repairs may be allowed, as though outside labour had been made use of. With these observations, I think the right course to take will be to adjourn the matter back to Chambers with liberty to adduce fresh evidence before the Master.

IN RE W. H. GLADSTONE, DECEASED—GLADSTONE V. GLADSTONE.*

Settled Land Acts—Tenant for life—Lease of surface reserving minerals—Settled Land Act, 1882, secs. 6 and 17.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, enables the tenant for life to grant a lease of the surface reserving the minerals.

"In re Newell and Nevill's Contract" ([1900] 1 Ch., 90) overruled.

This appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's raised a question of importance upon the construction of the Settled Land Act, 1882—viz., whether the power of leasing, given by the Act to a tenant for life, enables him to grant a lease of the surface of land (e.g., a building lease) reserving the minerals. In the recent case of "In re Newell and Nevill's Contract" ([1900] 1 Ch., 90) Mr. Justice Kekewich held that a tenant for life is not enabled to grant such a lease; and in the present case Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy simply followed that decision, without expressing any opinion of his own. The present case related to the Hawarden estates, settled by the will of the late Mr. W. H. Gladstone. Under an order of the Court the trustees of his will have been authorized to exercise on behalf of his infant son the powers which the Act confers on him as a quasi-tenant for life of the estates. The question was whether the trustees could grant a building lease of part of the estates, reserving the mines and minerals under the land comprised in the lease. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy answered this question in the negative. The trustees appealed.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. O. Leigh Clare were for the trustees; Mr. A. Lyttelton, Q.C., was for the infant; Mr. Eustace Smith was for the reversioner.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that in the absence of authority he should have thought it reasonably clear that the tenant for life had power to grant the lease in question. The governing section of the Act was section 6, which conferred on a tenant for life power to "lease the settled land or any part thereof, or any easement right, or privilege of any kind, over or in relation to the same, for any purpose whatever" for the respective terms specified. His Lordship could not agree in the view of Mr. Justice Kekewich, which Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy had followed. Section 6 was very wide and strong in its terms. It applied to building leases and to mining leases and other leases. Looking at the words alone one could not see how there could be any doubt about their meaning. If Mr. Justice Kekewich was right, a tenant for life could not grant a lease of minerals reserving the surface. Such a construction of section 6 would cut down the powers conferred by it in a manner which did not appear to be justified by the words. This was his Lordship's conclusion independently of any authorities or of any other section of the Act. Section 13 confirmed this view. Section 17 looked a little the other way, but his Lordship did not think that the doubt raised by it was sufficient to override the clear words of section 6. Apart from the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich the Master of the Rolls did not think the authorities which had been referred to afforded any assistance to the Court. They were all before the Act, which was intended to get rid of a number of authorities and to enable a tenant for life to do what he could not have done under the old law of real property. The decision in "Dayrell v. Hoare" (12 A. and E., 356), on which Mr. Justice Kekewich had relied, was plainly right both under the old law and the new law. A power to lease land did not authorize the lessor to lease part of the land and impose a burden upon the rest of it. The decision had been misunderstood by Mr. Justice Kekewich. It appeared to his Lordship that under section 6 there was ample power to grant the lease in question.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

VALLÉE V. BUCKNALL NEPHEWS.*

Charter-party—Liability of shipowner—Exceptions—Construction of charter-party.

The plaintiff in this case claimed damages for breach of a contract for the carriage of a cargo of 164 cattle and 954 sheep in defendants' steamship Merida from Buenos Ayres to this country. The contract, which was in the form known as a "live-stock charter-party," provided that water for the cattle and sheep on the voyage was to be provided by the steamer in accordance with the Argentine Government regulations. For the cargo in question these regulations required a daily supply of 11½ tons of water. The plaintiff's case was that the water supplied was both insufficient in quantity and bad in quality, being muddy and rusty, and frequently full of salt, and that in consequence four bullocks died on the voyage and the remainder of the cattle and sheep were, when landed, in such poor condition as to be much depreciated in value. The defendants denied that the water supplied was either insufficient or bad, and they also relied on certain exceptions in the charter-party and bill of lading as, in any event, exonerating them from liability. A considerable body of evidence was given, the trial lasting nearly three days, and at the conclusion of the case his Lordship reserved his judgment.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Lewis Nood for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in delivering judgment, said that, with regard to the question of law arising on the construction of the charter-party, the effect of the exceptions in the charter-party was that the shipowners were not to be liable for damage resulting from the unseaworthiness of the vessel or from any negligence on the part of the captain or crew. It was said on behalf of the defendants that if the cattle had suffered damage, it arose either from unseaworthiness of the vessel or from the captain's negligence and that the defendants were therefore protected by the exceptions. But there was another very significant clause which provided that water was to be provided by the steamer in accordance with the regulations of the Argentine Government. The defendants said that the effect of the exceptions was to strike out that clause; but his Lordship did not accept that contention. The two clauses were independent of each other, and clause 15 was introduced for a very obvious and necessary purpose. The defendants were therefore bound to supply an adequate quantity of drinkable water. As to the question of fact, there was no doubt that the cattle did arrive at Deptford in a thin and shrunken condition. The carrying capacity of the water tanks on board the Merida was 490 tons, and the total amount of water required by the regulations for the voyage was 437 tons. If, then, the tanks had been full at the start, there would have been an ample supply. The plaintiff's witnesses said that there was nothing of the sort, and there was this very significant fact that at Las Palmas 68 tons more of water were shipped, and if that were added to 490 tons a most extraordinary quantity of water must have been used on the voyage. The learned Judge proceeded to review the evidence at length, and he stated that he was unable to accept as correct the statements of the captain, who was the chief witness in support of the defendants' case, as to the quantity of water on board, which, in his Lordship's opinion, was not 490 tons, but something over 200 tons. As to the quality of the water, on two occasions it was found to contain salt, and the animals refused to drink it, but there had been no evidence that they had suffered damage from the salt. Rust and mud had, after leaving Las Palmas, been found in the water. It was said this was due to the bad weather and that if the water had been allowed to stand in the tubs it would have been quite right, but that was not easy to do when the vessel was rolling. In conclusion, his Lordship held that the plaintiff had made out his case; that the condition of the cattle and sheep on arrival was due to an insufficient supply of water and to its bad quality. There would, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff, with costs, the amount of the damages to be agreed upon by the parties, or, in the event of difference, to be settled by his Lordship.

CITY OF LONDON ELECTRIC LIGHTING COMPANY (LIMITED) V. MAYOR, & C., OF LONDON.*

Metropolis—Lighting—Contracts—Validity—
City of London Sewers Acts, 1848 and 1851—Construction.

In this action, which was before the Court on April 27 and 28, the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that three several agreements—(1) an agreement dated May 19, 1890, and made by and between the Brush Electrical Engineering Company (Limited) and the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London; (2) an agreement dated May 28, 1890, and made by and between the Laing, Wharton, and Down Construction Syndicate (Limited) and the said Commissioners; and (3) an agreement dated February 5, 1891, and made by and between the Brush Electrical Engineering Company (Limited) and the said Commissioners—were valid and subsisting. The three agreements were transferred to the plaintiffs by two indentures, dated August 21, 1891. The defendants, who are the successors in title and office of the Commissioners of Sewers, alleged against the plaintiffs' claim that, at the respective times when the contracts and indentures were made and thereafter, persons being Commissioners of Sewers and persons being members of the Court of Aldermen, and persons being members of the Common Council of the City of London were, or became, directly or indirectly, interested or concerned in the said contracts, and that by reason thereof, and by virtue of section 42 of the City of London Sewers Act, 1848, the said contracts were and became null and void. On the conclusion of the arguments, his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL delivered the following

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. H. PORTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

judgment:—By three contracts dated respectively May 19, 1890, May 28, 1890, and February 5, 1891, the Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London contracted with the Brush Company and the Laing, Wharton Syndicate respectively for lighting the City by electricity. On August 21, 1891, the said contracts were assigned to the plaintiff company with the consent of the Commissioners, such consent being necessary to the assignment. At the date of the said contracts and indentures the sole power of (amongst other things) lighting the streets of the City was vested in the Mayor and Corporation of the City, to be executed by persons nominated by them under their common seal and constituted Commissioners of Sewers of the City. By the City of London Sewers Act, 1897, the Commissioners ceased to exist, and all their property, debts, duties, and liabilities were vested in the Mayor and Corporation of the City. The City has been lighted under the said contracts since 1891, but in consequence of certain facts which came to the knowledge of the defendants during last year, they have repudiated the contracts. The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action for a declaration that the said agreements were and are valid and subsisting and binding on the defendants. The question, in my opinion, depends on the construction of the City of London Sewers Acts, 1848 and 1851. The Act of 1848, after repealing certain earlier Acts and vesting the power of lighting in the Commissioners, as before stated, and providing for the appointment of the Commissioners and their meetings, quorum and the like, enacts in section 33 as follows:—"And be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners, or any committee appointed by them, to enter into and contract in the name of the Commissioners with any persons for the execution of any works directed or authorized by this Act to be done by the Commissioners, or for furnishing materials or labour, or for any other matters or things whatsoever necessary for enabling them to carry the purposes of this Act into full and complete effect, in such manner, and upon such terms, and for such sums of money, and under such stipulations, regulations, and restrictions as the Commissioners or such committee shall think proper; and every such contract shall be in writing, and shall specify the several works to be done, and the materials or labour to be furnished, and the prices to be paid for the same, and the times within which the said works are to be completed, and the penalty to be incurred in case of the non-performance thereof; and every such contract may also specify the persons to whose satisfaction the same are to be completed or finished, and the mode of determining any dispute which may arise concerning or in consequence of such contract." The Act then provides by section 41 that "the Commissioners are not to be personally liable on such contracts, and engrafts on that by way of proviso section 42 as follows:—"That no person, being a Commissioner, or a member of the Court of Aldermen or of the Common Council of the City, shall be directly or indirectly interested or concerned in any contract which shall be made or entered into by or on behalf of the Commissioners for the execution of any works by this Act directed or authorized to be done or executed, or for furnishing materials or labour, or for any other matter or thing whatsoever, upon pain that every such contract shall be null and void, and that the person who, being a Commissioner, or a member of the said Court of Aldermen or of the Common Council, shall be so interested or concerned therein shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of £100 to any person who shall sue for the same, to be recovered in any of the superior Courts by action of debt or on the case." It is admitted that at the date of the contracts in question certain Commissioners, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen were shareholders in the Brush Company and also in the plaintiff company; it has not been proved, and I therefore hold it not to be the fact, that any Commissioner, Alderman, or Common Councilman who was a shareholder in either of the said companies took part in the negotiations for or settlement of any of the contracts or conveyances. The defendants contend that the mere fact that any Commissioner, or Alderman, or Common Councilman is at the date of the contract, or afterwards becomes, the holder of one share in the contracting company renders that contract absolutely void, and, if the Act of Parliament has said this in plain terms, I am bound so to decide. The Court has no power to depart from the plain words of an Act of Parliament on any ground of supposed hardship or the like. I respectfully adopt the Lord Chief Justice's judgment in "Attorney-General v. Carlton Bank" ([1899] 2 Q.B., at p. 164):—"The duty of the Court is, in my opinion, in all cases the same, whether the Act to be construed relates to taxation or to any other subject—namely, to give effect to the intention of the Legislature as that intention is to be gathered from the language employed, having regard to the context in connexion with which it is employed. The Court must, no doubt, ascertain the subject-matter to which the particular tax is by the statute intended to be applied, but when once that is ascertained it is not open to the Court to narrow or whittle down the operations of the Act by seeming considerations of hardship or of business convenience or the like. Courts have to give effect to what the Legislature has said." But there is another principle applicable to the construction of Acts of Parliament and all other documents—namely, that if there are two possible constructions and one will lead to an unjust and unreasonable result and the other will not, the Court will prefer the latter. To adopt Lord Blackburn's words in "Roths v. Kirkcaldy, &c." (7 App.Cas., 702)—"I quite agree that no Court is entitled to depart from the intention of the Legislature as appearing from the words of the Act because it is thought unreasonable. But when two constructions are open the Court may adopt the more reasonable of the two." There are many other authorities to the same effect; it is sufficient to refer to "Railton v. Wood" (15 App.Cas., at p. 366) and "Plumstead Board of Works v. Spackman" (13 Q.B.D., at p. 888). I have, first, therefore, to see whether the Act of Parliament is absolutely clear or is fairly susceptible of two constructions. Now the Act contemplates that the Commissioners will enter into contracts of two sorts—(1) for the construction of works or supply of materials to the City which will become their own property, and which I hereafter refer to as "construction contracts"; and (2) for the supply of water for cleansing or of gas or other illuminant for lighting the City by companies or persons owning waterworks or gasworks or the like—e.g., section 52 vests all existing sewers and buildings, &c., connected therewith, and all other sewers to be thereafter made, in the Commissioners, and section 53 authorizes the Commissioners to make such sewers; section 54 enables them to deepen and alter sewers. These all fall under the first class of contracts to which I have referred. Then, section 55 enables the Commissioners to contract for the supply of water and compels every present and future water company having mains within the City to supply water for public purposes, and section 116 enables the Commissioners to contract with gas companies and other persons to supply gas or light the City by any other mode. Both these fall under the second class of contracts. Returning to the consideration of sections 33 and 42, counsel on both sides are agreed, and I concur, that "null and void" in section 42 means null and void, and not voidable, and that the words in section 42, "or for any other matter or thing," correspond to and are no wider than the words in section 33, "or for any other matters or things whatsoever necessary for enabling them to carry the purposes of this Act into full effect." It is said by the defendants that these words are perfectly general, with nothing to restrict their generality; but, if this be so, the three preceding lines of the section, "for the execution," &c., are superfluous. It is idle to specify two particular sets of contracts if you follow them up with "all contracts." In my opinion the words must be confined to matters ejusdem generis, and I come to this conclusion not merely for the reason first stated, but on the true construction of the whole Act. Thus the latter part of section 33, "every such contract shall be in writing," &c., points clearly to the fact that the Legislature was dealing with contracts containing such particulars as are specified in that section. Again, section 34 is the only section that enables seven of the Commissioners or their clerk to execute contracts on behalf of the Commissioners; and the contracts which they or he are so authorized to execute are to be executed also by the person contracting to perform the work or to supply the materials or labour mentioned therein. It would indeed be strange if the words in section 33, "any other matter or thing," had the wide meaning attached to them by the defendants, that all reference to them should be omitted from this section. Further, the whole set of clauses from 33 to 42 appear to me to form a fasciculus of clauses relating to construction contracts only; see especially sections 35, 38, and 39. And I am confirmed in this view by finding, when I come to section 116 (for the better lighting of the streets), that a fresh power of contracting is given to the Commissioners. If the defendants were right in their contention that every form of contract within the powers of the Commissioners is authorized by section 33, it would have been needless to create by section 116 a further power to enter into contracts with gas companies and other persons for lighting the City. In my opinion the distinction between the power to enter into construction contracts, contained in sections 33 to 42, and the power to contract for a supply of light under section 116, or for water under section 55, is reasonably plain. The Act contemplates that certain works may have to be done by the Commissioners—e.g., making sewers, drains, &c. (sections 53 and 54)—and it also contemplates that the Commissioners, without constructing works, may obtain a supply of light for the City (section 116) and may obtain a supply of water for flushing, scouring, and cleansing sewers and drains (section 55). The sets of sections are entirely distinct, and, in my opinion, section 42 relates only to the contracts specified in section 33, and those contracts are limited to the class that I have already stated. But then it is said that the contracts in this case contain clauses which make them construction contracts within sections 33 and 42. In my opinion this is not so. They are in terms contracts to light the City by electricity. The supply is obtained and supplied by virtue of the powers given by permanent orders under the Electric Lighting Acts. It is true that the Commissioners have required the insertion of certain provisions which compel the works to be done in a particular manner and enable the defendants to require alterations and the like to be made, but the works are to remain the property of the plaintiffs, and all the provisions relied on relate only to the regulation and efficiency of supply. The mere fact that under the public Act of Parliament and section 35 of the contract the defendants have at a future date an option of purchasing the plaintiffs' undertaking, so far as it relates to the public lighting of the City, cannot, in my opinion, make the contracts construction contracts within the meaning of the Act of 1848. But there is a further point on which, in my judgment, the plaintiffs also succeed. Section 42 forbids a Commissioner or Alderman or Common Councilman to be "directly or indirectly interested or concerned in any contract," &c. Now I have not to consider the words of this section standing alone, because the Act of 1851, section 53, enacts as follows:—"That no person, being a Commissioner, who is a shareholder in, or surveyor, solicitor, or agent for any gas company, water company, paving company, or any work, undertaking, or speculation the contracting with or the promotion or carrying out of which shall be discussed at any meeting of the Commissioners, shall be eligible to sit or vote as a Commissioner while such subject is under the discussion of the Commissioners." This Act, the defendants' counsel stated, was passed in order to continue the earlier Act, which would otherwise have expired, with such variations and additions as the experience of two years had shown to be necessary, and the two Acts are to be construed as one, the later Act overriding the first, if repugnant. Now, if a shareholder in the contracting company is a person indirectly interested in that contract under section 42, no such contract could ever be entered into, because the Act renders it null and void ab initio. It would be idle, therefore, to enact that a Commissioner who is a shareholder in any company so contracting shall not be eligible to vote on the contract, if the mere fact of his interest as a shareholder renders it impossible that any contract at all could be entered into. In saying this I am following the reasoning on which the Court of Appeal proceeded in "Todd v. Robinson" (14 Q.B.D., at p. 745), although in this case the reasoning leads to the opposite conclusion. Further, this view is consistent with the opinion that I have already expressed on the construction of sections 53 and 42, and confirms me in that opinion, for in 1851 a company (one man or otherwise) incorporated to carry out contracts for work was quite unheard of. The Legislature, therefore, in 1851 treated shareholders as persons who could not possibly be directly or indirectly interested in construction contracts, and therefore excluded them by necessary implication from the provisions of section 42. In my opinion this is the true construction of the two Acts, but if I had more doubt than I have on this point I should prefer this construction on the principle of avoiding injustice to which I have already referred. The defendants press on me the desirability of removing all possibility of temptation from Commissioners, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen, and, without casting any imputation on gentlemen who occupy these positions, I agree that it is desirable that no man should be placed in a position in which his interest may conflict with his duty. But the defendants have, without the clause in question, all the rights of ordinary persons to compel their fiduciary agents to account for secret profits or to enforce the disability of voting pointed out in "Dimes v. Grand Junction, &c." (3 H.L.C., 759). The clause in question, if construed as the defendants contend, would create a novel and far-reaching disability, affecting not only innocent third persons, but the Corporation and citizens themselves. For example, I am told that the Commissioners are 91 in number and the Common Councilmen more than 200, and there are besides several Aldermen. According to the defendants' contention, if any one of this numerous body, either at the date of the execution or at any time during the subsistence of a contract to supply gas, held a single share in the supplying gas company, the whole contract becomes ipso facto and irremediably void. Now the number of gas companies having access to the City is necessarily limited, and the result might well be an absolute prohibition of the use of gas for public purposes in the City. This would be even more serious if it applies also to water companies, but I do not call these companies in aid, because it is possible that the provisions for assessing payment in section 55 might be held to exclude them from section 42. Again, assume that a company has, on the faith of a contract with the Commissioners, expended a large sum on works for the supply of gas or (as in the present case) electricity to the City, and one single Common Councilman, unknown to both parties, held one share in the company at the date of the contract, or subsequently purchased one single share in the company; the whole contract would be or become void, and this would be the case even if he was interested as a cestui que trust only and his name did not appear at all, so that no reasonable care could guard against the avoidance of the contract. If there are two alternative constructions reasonably possible, it cannot be right that the Court should adopt that which forfeits the money of innocent shareholders for the act of a third person over whom they have no control, and which may prevent the City from the use of gas or electricity unless and until they can, at their own expense, erect their own works and themselves supply gas or electricity. In the view that I take it is unnecessary for me to consider the other points made by Mr. Cripps or to draw any distinctions between the three contracts. I therefore make a declaration as asked by the plaintiffs, and order the defendants to pay the costs of the action.

On behalf of the defendants counsel then intimated that the Corporation had no desire to avoid the contracts, but had felt it their duty to adopt the course which they had adopted.

Bankruptcy—Dismissal of bankruptcy petition—Funds in hands of receiver—Deduction of all proper expenses.

This was an appeal in bankruptcy from an order of the Registrar's. The appeal raised an interesting and important question of bankruptcy law—viz., as to the right of the Official Receiver while acting as Interim Receiver during the pendency of a bankruptcy petition which is ultimately dismissed to be recouped all proper expenses incurred in so acting before handing over the receipts to the debtor. On January 18, 1900, a bankruptcy petition was presented against A. B. and Co., an American firm who carried on business in Baltimore and also in England and in other parts of Europe. Before the petition was heard the Official Receiver was appointed Interim Receiver and he obtained the leave of the Court to appoint a special manager of the business in England. The special manager was duly appointed and by the terms of his appointment he was to pay over to the Official Receiver all moneys coming to his hands from the business, and any moneys which might be required for current expenditure and disbursements were to be paid out of moneys to be provided by the Official Receiver from time to time not exceeding the amount paid in by the special manager. The special manager carried on the business for about five weeks and he effected sales and got in moneys and incurred expenses and liabilities. When the petition came on to be heard it was dismissed on the ground that A. B. and Co. were an American firm resident in America and were not debtors within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, but the receiver was continued pending an appeal. The appeal was heard on February 28 and was dismissed, and the Court discharged the order appointing the Official Receiver to be Interim Receiver. On April 2, 1900, the Registrar made an order that the sum of £409, which represented the gross receipts paid by the special manager into the hands of the Official Receiver, should, after deducting certain official fees, be paid to the debtors. The special manager and the petitioning creditors appealed against this order. The ground of the appeal was the special manager in the course of carrying on the business of the firm had paid out of his own pocket large sums for wages and other necessary expenses which he had not been recouped; and the appellants asked that an account might be taken of those expenses and that the £409 might be applied in reimbursing the special manager the amount found due on the account. On behalf of the debtors it was contended that inasmuch as the bankruptcy petition was dismissed for want of jurisdiction the whole of the £409 belonged to them and that the special manager must look to the petitioning creditors for any loss he might have sustained.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the appellants; and Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington for the firm.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question on this appeal was what order the Court ought to make in respect of a sum of £409 which was in the hands of the Official Receiver. After referring to the facts, his Lordship observed that the petition was dismissed on the ground that the alleged debtors were not debtors within the meaning of that expression in the Bankruptcy Act and that in that sense there was no jurisdiction to make a receiving order against them. But it was obvious that the Court which made the order had a general jurisdiction to make receiving orders against debtors and in his Lordship's opinion this order was an erroneous order rather than an order without jurisdiction. No doubt the distinction was very fine, but in the view which he took of this case it was not necessary to go into that question minutely. The petition having been dismissed, whether for want of jurisdiction or because the debtors did not owe the petitioning creditors any debt within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, the receiver had no authority to carry on this business, neither had the special manager. But it did not follow that everything which had been done by the receiver before the dismissal of the petition should be wholly disregarded. As receiver he must pass the accounts which were usually passed by receivers and in accounting he must bring into the account what were usually regarded as just allowances. The money in question in this case was money paid over to the receiver by the special manager, who had not deducted any expenses which in passing his account he would have had a right to deduct. In other words these receipts were gross receipts and were not in any sense a balance in the hands of the receiver. The Registrar had treated this money as belonging to the debtors. In his Lordship's opinion that was wrong in principle. It was said that if the Court allowed these deductions it would be robbing the debtors; but if the Court refused to allow them it would be robbing its officers. The duty of the receiver was to account and pay over the balance and it would be a gross injustice not to deduct all just allowances. Even if the appointment of the receiver were without jurisdiction, in the proper sense of the word, the Court would not compel its officer to pay more than the balance due from him on taking the accounts. This would involve no injustice to any one because no one could get the money claimed from the receiver without making just allowances. The appeal should be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred. He said that the money paid over to the receiver represented the gross profits and could not be called in any correct sense the profits or produce of the business. It was the duty of the Court to protect its officers—the Official Receiver and his duly appointed agents.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed. He thought that the question really turned upon whether the debtor was entitled to treat the special manager as a wrong doer. In his opinion he was not so entitled. It was clear that the Court had a general jurisdiction over the subject matter, though it had come to an erroneous conclusion. Anything done under the order of the Court was good till it was set aside, and the persons who so acted were not wrong doers. The only account against them was on the footing that what was done was done for the benefit of the debtor, and that involved the obligation on the part of the debtor of reimbursing the expenses incurred in so doing.

Frauds, Statute of—Memorandum in writing—
Sufficiency of—Reference to another document.
Decision of Darling, J. (15 The Times L.R., 426), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Darling, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 426. The action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract to purchase a house belonging to the plaintiff, and known as Caryll Hurst, West Grinstead. In July, 1898, the defendant, having seen the house, made the plaintiff's agents a verbal offer. On July 7, 1898, the plaintiff's agents, John Churchman and Sons, wrote to the defendant as follows:—

“ Horsham, July 7, 1898.

“ Dear Sir,—Re Caryll Hurst, West Grinstead. The owner of the above writes us, ‘ I was not here this morning until too late to telegraph. I could not entertain for a moment the offer of £2,050 for the whole property; my lowest price would be £2,600. The land, building, planting, road-making, &c., have cost me out of pocket £200 more than this, but I will make some sacrifice (but not more than this) if I had an offer to purchase outright. The house and grounds up to the iron fence is what I offer to let for £110, or to sell for £2,200. This is what I have spent on it. The additional four and three-quarter acres I purchased for £850, and it has cost me, including draining, planting, legal expenses, &c., over £700, and I cannot think of selling it for appreciably less.’ Trusting you will see your way to increase your offer,

“ We are, yours, &c.,

“ C. W. Le Blanc, Esq.”

On July 11 the defendant went to the offices of Messrs. Churchman and Sons and signed the following document:—“ I, the undersigned, agree to purchase Caryll Hurst, West Grinstead, Sussex, at the sum of £2,450, dated July 11, 1898.—C. WILLOUGHBY LE BLANC.” On the same day Messrs. Churchman and Sons sent the defendant the following letter:—

“ Dear Sir,—Caryll Hurst, West Grinstead. Referring to your call of this morning, as promised we wired the owner, saying you had offered £2,450 for above, and we, as agents for the owner, accept this offer. The contract to be prepared by vendor's solicitors: will you kindly let us have the name and address of your solicitor, and oblige, “ Yours,

“ JOHN CHURCHMAN AND SONS.

“ C. W. Le Blanc, Esq.”

“ The Black Horse Hotel, Horsham, July 23, 1898.

“ Dear Sirs,—Caryll Hurst. We thank you for your letter just received, and have carefully weighed the contents. My wife and self, after much deliberation, have come to the conclusion that, considering the somewhat complicated nature of the title, the good price we contemplated paying, the further outlay that would be necessary—indeed, absolutely essential, in the near future—we would sooner withdraw from the purchase. With regard to the small charge that may be made by the vendor's solicitor, if you think it fair, I shall be glad if you will settle the same on my behalf.

“ Yours very truly,

“ CLAUDE W. LE BLANC.

“ Messrs. Brooks, Jenkins, and Co., Doctors' Commons.”

The plaintiff claimed damages for the defendant's refusal to complete.

Mr. Justice Darling held that the document of July 7 was sufficiently connected with that of July 11 as to form a memorandum in writing within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, and he accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at £300.

Mr. ROMER MACKLIN (Mr. Duke, Q.C., with him) for the defendant, contended, first, that the letters of July 7 and 11 did not contain the terms of any contract. There were only negotiations all through, and no final agreement was arrived at. Secondly, there was no document signed by the defendant which incorporated another document containing the name of the vendor. The letter of July 7 was not incorporated by reference or otherwise in the document of July 11 signed by the defendant. There must be something on the face of the document signed by the defendant so referring to the other document as to sufficiently connect them together. “ Pierce v. Corf ” (L.R., 9 Q.B., 210).

Mr. S. H. DAY, for the plaintiff, argued that the learned Judge was right in holding that there was a sufficient memorandum in writing to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this was an action by a vendor against a vendee for not completing the purchase of a property, and the learned Judge at the trial had given judgment for the plaintiff for £300 damages. The defendant appealed, and said, in the first place, that there was no contract, and, in the second place, that there was no memorandum to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. The question as to the Statute of Frauds was so overloaded with decisions that it was impossible to draw on one's common sense with regard to it. But, in his opinion, independently of the statute, there was no contract at all in this case. The parties seemed to him to have been merely negotiating all through, and neither of them appeared ever to have thought that a binding contract had been arrived at.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he agreed that there was no binding contract between the parties. He also thought that the memorandum in writing on which the plaintiff relied was not sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. It was deficient in not mentioning the name of the vendor, and it also left the subject matter of the purchase unascertained. It was impossible to tell from it whether what the defendant proposed to buy was the house alone or the house together with 4½ acres of land.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER was of the same opinion.

Stock Exchange—Failure of broker—Liability of broker's client to jobber.

This action, which raised a point of great importance as to the extent of the liability of members of the public to jobbers on the Stock Exchange upon contracts effected with the jobbers through a broker on the Stock Exchange where the broker has become a defaulter, was brought by the plaintiffs, a firm of jobbers on the Stock Exchange, to recover £227 9s. 4d., the amount of the difference between the price at which the defendant had bought certain shares and the amount for which the plaintiffs had sold them after the broker's default. The defendant paid into Court, with a denial of liability, £102 9s. 4d., the amount of the difference between the contract price and the "hammer" price at which the transaction had been closed between the plaintiffs and the broker. The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the learned Judge.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Spencer Bower appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Norman Craig for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, said this was an action brought to recover damages for the refusal of the defendant to take delivery and pay for certain shares which it was alleged had been purchased by him of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were dealers in shares on the Stock Exchange, and on November 28, 1899, the defendant instructed Mr. Beasley, who was a broker and a member of the Stock Exchange, to purchase for him 200 East Rand Extension shares. In accordance with these instructions 200 of these shares, neither more nor less, were purchased of the plaintiffs through Beasley for the mid-December account. On December 11 the shares were, on the instructions of the defendant, carried over by the plaintiffs to the end-December account. On December 14 Beasley became a defaulter, and, in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange, ceased to be a member of the House. The usual process of liquidation, which was explained in the evidence given in "Ex parte Grant, in re Plumby" (13 Ch.D., 667), was followed. The accounts between Beasley and different dealers were closed at the "hammer prices," prices ascertained in accordance with the regulations of the Stock Exchange, and the differences which Beasley would be entitled to receive were balanced against the differences which he was bound to pay. It was clear that that process had no operation outside the Stock Exchange: the regulations were not intended to affect and did not affect the outside public. As between Beasley and the plaintiffs this transaction and his other transactions were closed on December 14. When that took place the plaintiffs, in accordance with the established course of business and usages of the Stock Exchange, applied to Beasley for the name of his principal, and they were furnished with the name of the defendant. One of the plaintiffs then had an interview with the defendant and pointed out to him the three courses open to him—namely, he might either take up the shares and complete the transaction with the plaintiffs direct, or might appoint another broker in the place of Beasley, or might treat the transaction as closed at the hammer price. The last course would have involved him in a loss of £102 9s. 4d. The defendant took none of those courses. Time was given to him, and, after a considerable interval, the plaintiffs received from him an intimation that he did not consider himself responsible to the plaintiffs on the transaction, and in point of fact he repudiated the transaction. The plaintiffs immediately treated the transaction as at an end and sold the shares at the best price obtainable, which, the market having gone down in the interval, involved a loss of £227 9s. 4d., the amount claimed. The case was ably argued by counsel for the defendant. They intimated that they proposed to raise hereafter the question whether there was privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant, but they did not ask him (the learned Judge) to differ from the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Kennedy in the recent case of "Beckhussen and Gibbs v. Hamblet" (5 Com. Cas., p. 217, and ante, p. 278), where Mr. Justice Kennedy held that in a transaction like the present there was privity of contract between the dealer and the customer. Mr. Justice Kennedy gave judgment for the customer in that case because there the broker had bought a block of shares, part only of which he intended to apply to the particular contract. His Lordship entirely agreed with the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Kennedy. Upon the evidence laid before him he could not possibly come to any other conclusion than that the contract was binding between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The first point argued in this case was that the contract was made in accordance with the usages of the Stock Exchange, and that, in accordance with those usages, the account had been closed and the contract brought to an end, and that the utmost liability of the defendant was to pay the difference arrived at upon the hammer price. There was no trace in the rules of any such intention. Suppose that the shares were bought for the purpose of investment; why should such a transaction be closed and the client called upon to pay differences because his broker had been in default? There was neither reason nor evidence to lead to such a conclusion. It was said, why should the shares be kept open after the settlement at the hammer price? The answer was given by the evidence as to the perfectly reasonable course of business followed in such cases—namely, that the dealer was entitled to be told the name of the client and to ascertain from him which of the three practicable and sensible courses open to him he proposed to adopt. From that it seemed clear that the contract was kept alive, and the only question that remained was what damages ought to be paid in the event of the client ultimately failing to pay for the shares. What happened was that the plaintiffs were in doubt as to whether the defendant would take up the shares or not. It was argued that there was no obligation on the defendant to exercise any option, and that he could never be responsible for more than the difference upon the hammer price. But time was given to the defendant, and there was an expectation to the last that the defendant would settle the matter. But on December 21 he intimated to the plaintiffs that he would be in no way responsible for the transaction, and subsequently raised a further defence that he had never had any notice or knowledge that Beasley ever carried over any shares for him. The plaintiffs were entitled to treat the defendant's repudiation as a rescission of the contract. The market was going down; they took the only reasonable course and sold the shares, with the result that there was a loss of the amount claimed in the action. There was no reason why they should not recover that sum, and there must be judgment for that amount.

Judgment accordingly.

DANIEL V. THE OCEAN COAL COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Compensation, to whom payable—Money invested in Registrar's name for benefit of children—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Sched. I., secs. 4, 5, 6, and 7.

This was an appeal from an award of the Judge of the Pontypridd County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was Mary Daniel, the widow of a workman who had met with his death in consequence of accidental injuries sustained by him in the course of his employment. The applicant had taken out letters of administration to her deceased husband's estate, and had thereby become his legal personal representative. The County Court Judge by his award ordered that the respondents, the Ocean Coal Company (Limited), should pay the sum of £246 7s. to the dependants of the deceased workman as compensation, and he declared that the persons entitled to share in such compensation as dependants were Mary Daniel, the widow, and Evan David Daniel and William John Daniel, the infant sons of the deceased. And he ordered that the said sum of £246 7s. be apportioned as follows, viz.:—£146 7s. to and for the benefit of the widow and £100 to and for the benefit of the sons in equal shares; and he ordered that the sum of £146 7s. apportioned to and for the benefit of the widow should be paid to her, and that the sum of £100 apportioned to and for the benefit of the sons should be paid to the Registrar of the County Court and should be invested by the registrar in his name in the Post Office Savings Bank for the benefit of the sons. The applicant appealed from this award, and it was contended on her behalf that the County Court Judge had no power to make an order in these terms, but that, inasmuch as she was the legal personal representative of the deceased, the County Court Judge was bound, by section 4 of the First schedule to the Act, to order the whole of the compensation to be paid to her.

Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C. (Mr. Rhys Williams with him), appeared for the applicant, and said that the words of section 4 were express:—"The payment shall, in case of death, be made to the legal personal representative of the workman." This was not qualified by section 6, which provided for the sum allotted as compensation being invested for the benefit of the person entitled thereto. [LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS.—Mr. Minton-Senhouse, in his book "Accidents to Workmen," in a note to section 4, says:—"He"—that is, the legal personal representative—"does not, however, receive it as personal representative of the deceased workman, nor is it part of the workman's estate or liable for his debts. He holds it as a trustee under the statute."]

Mr. Ruegg, Q.O., and Mr. Anton Bertram, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the first schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act must be read together. By section 4, "The payment shall, in case of death, be made to the legal personal representative of the workman, or, if he has no legal personal representative, to or for the benefit of his dependants, or, if he leaves no dependants, to the person to whom the expenses are due; and if made to the legal personal representative shall be paid by him to or for the benefit of the dependants or other persons entitled thereto under this Act." By section 5, "Any question as to who is a dependant, or as to the amount payable to each dependant, shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration under this Act." By section 6 "The sum allotted as compensation to a dependant may be invested or otherwise applied for the benefit of the person entitled thereto as agreed, or as ordered by the committee or other arbitrator." By section 7 "Any sum which is agreed or is ordered by the committee or arbitrator to be invested may be invested in whole or in part in the Post Office Savings Bank by the registrar of the County Court in his name as registrar." Reading all those sections together he had no doubt that the County Court Judge had power to make the order which he had made in this case. The appeal would, therefore, be dismissed, but, as the question raised on the appeal did not concern the respondents, it would be dismissed without costs.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

RENDALL V. HILL'S DRY DOCK AND ENGINEERING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Time within which claim must be made. Held, no waiver by employers.

This was an appeal from an award of the Judge of the Cardiff County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was a shipwright who sustained accidental injuries in the course of his employment on December 19, 1898. The applicant did not make any claim on his employers or send in any request for proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act until more than six months after the date of the accident. During that period weekly payments of £1 were made to him by an insurance company with whom his employers had insured their liability under the Act, and he gave receipts, which were expressed to be on account of compensation which might be or become due to him under the Workmen's Compensation Act. When this case was before the County Court Judge the case of "Powell v. Main Colliery Co." (ante, p. 282) had not been decided. In that case the Court of Appeal held that, on the construction of section 2 of the Act, proceedings under the Act were not maintainable unless a request for proceedings was filed within six months of the accident. The County Court Judge made an award in favour of the applicant for a weekly payment of 18s. The employers appealed.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH (Mr. Albert Parsons with him), for the employers, contended, on the authority of "Powell v. Main Colliery Co.," that the proceedings were not maintainable.

Mr. BAILHACHE, for the applicant, argued that the weekly payments, coupled with the taking of the receipts from the applicant, estopped the employers from setting up the defence that the applicant had not made a claim for compensation within six months. He relied on the case of "Wright v. John Bagnall and Sons" (ante, p. 327).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in this case the applicant had not, so far as appeared by the evidence, given any notice of accident as required by section 2, subsection 1, of the Act, and he certainly had not made any claim for compensation by filing a request for arbitration within six months of the accident. The employers were insured, and they sent in to the insurance company particulars of the accident, in which they stated that the workman's wages were £2 a week. The insurance company did what good masters would have done, that was to say, they made him payments of £1 a week on account, and they took receipts. The Court could not hold that that amounted to a waiver or estoppel so as to preclude the employers from now raising the defence that the applicant had not made a request for proceedings within six months. This case was quite different from that of "Wright v. Bagnall." In that case there was an absolute agreement between the parties as to liability of the respondents to pay compensation under the Act, and the only matter which remained in question was the amount. In the present case there was no evidence of such a state of things as that. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

TURNBULL V. LAMBTON COLLIERIES (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Employment "on, in, or about a mine"— —"Adjacent to and belonging to a mine"—
Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

This was an appeal from the award of the Durham County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The respondent on the appeal, Frances Turnbull, was the widow of a deceased workman, John Thomas Turnbull, who was killed by an accident arising out of, and in the course of, his employment. The appellants, the Lambton Collieries (Limited), owned a number of collieries, among them being one called the Burnmoor Colliery. They also owned a private railway called the Lambton railway, about 12 miles in length, which connected the various collieries with the North-Eastern Railway Company. The deceased man was an engine driver in the employment of the appellants, and upon the day of the accident he was engaged in driving a train containing coal from the Burnmoor Colliery to the coal depôt belonging to the appellants next the North-Eastern Railway Company, where the coal from the collieries was stored, and from which the coal was distributed to purchasers. When the train arrived at a point three-quarters of a mile from the pit's mouth of the Burnmoor Colliery, near the junction of a siding belonging to the appellants and leading to the coal depôt, the deceased man, who was standing on the footboard of the engine, leaned too far out from the engine, and in consequence his head struck against some wagons standing on the siding, and he was killed. The railway at the place where the accident happened ran parallel with the North-Eastern Railway Company. The accident occurred on the through running line of the Lambton railway. The Lambton railway was held and maintained by the appellants, under wayleave leases granted to them by the owners of the land upon which the railway stood, and was not constructed or carried on under the powers of any Act of Parliament, or used for the purposes of public traffic. It was under the sole control of the appellants, and was used only for the conveyance to its place of delivery of mineral traffic belonging to them and arising at their various collieries, and not for the purposes of any one colliery only. It was the sole means by which coals were conveyed away from the collieries. The depôt to which the train which the deceased was driving was conveying coals was used for selling coals produced at the appellants' collieries to the public in the neighbourhood, and also for supplying such coals to workmen employed at the various collieries belonging to the appellants. The County Court Judge decided in favour of the respondent on the ground that, in his opinion, the accident occurred "on" the appellants' works and adjacent to their Burnmoor mine. By section 7, subsection 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, "This Act shall apply only to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on or in or about a railway, factory, mine" By subsection 2, "Railway" means the railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies. . . . "Mine" means a mine to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, . . . applies." By section 75 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, 'Mine' includes every shaft in the course of being sunk, and every level and inclined plane in the course of being driven, and all the shafts, levels, planes, works, tramways, and sidings, both below ground and above ground, in and adjacent to and belonging to the mine."

Mr. SCOTT FOX, Q.C., and Mr. H. MANISTY for the appellants, contended that there was no evidence upon which the County Court Judge could find that the accident occurred "on" the mine as defined by section 75 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887.

Mr. ROBSON, Q.C., and Mr. DANCHEWITS, Q.C., for the respondent, contended that the siding where the accident happened was by section 75 of the Act of 1887 made part of the mine, and therefore the accident happened "on or in or about" the mine.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the place where the accident happened was not a "railway" within the definition in section 7, subsection 2, of the Act of 1897. It was said that the accident happened "on or in or about" a mine. To find the definition of "mine" section 75 of the Act of 1887 had to be looked at. Apart from the definition in section 7b of the Act of 1887, the accident clearly did not happen "on or in or about" the mine, because it happened three-quarters of a mile away from the mine. There remained the question whether the meaning of the word "mine" was enlarged by section 75 of the Act of 1887 so as to include this spot three-quarters of a mile away. The words in that section, "adjacent to and belonging to the mine," meant physically adjacent to and belonging to the mine itself, and not merely belonging to the mine owner. In his opinion there was no evidence upon which the County Court Judge could find that the spot where the accident happened was adjacent to and belonging to the mine.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

NICKOLL AND KNIGHT V. ASHTON, EDRIDGE, AND CO.*

Sale of Goods—Contract—Shipment by particular vessel—Performance of contract rendered impossible by sea peril—Implied condition excusing vendors.

In this case the plaintiffs claimed damages for the breach of contract, dated October 24, 1899, by which the defendant sold to the plaintiffs a cargo of Egyptian cottonseed to consist of from 1,600 to 1,900 tons to be shipped per the steamship Orlando at Alexandria and (or) Port Said and (or) Ismailia during January, 1900, at £6 3s. 9d. per ton. In November the Orlando stranded in the Baltic and sustained damage, and it was impossible for the necessary repairs to be executed in time for the ship to load the cargo in January. On December 28 the defendants informed the plaintiffs that the performance of the contract was impossible. After some abortive arbitration proceedings this action was commenced on February 28. The plaintiffs claimed as damages £2,740, being the difference between the contract price and the market price on January 31. The defendants contended that, the performance of the contract having become impossible, they had not committed a breach; and they further contended that, if they were liable, the proper measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the market price at the end of December, on which basis they paid £750 into Court whilst denying liability. At the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. W. Hollams appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Bray for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW delivered judgment, and, after stating the facts, said that the argument for the plaintiffs was that the contract was an absolute contract to load a cargo in January, and that there was therefore an implied warranty that the ship should be fit to take a cargo on board at that time; that the defendants had taken the risk of the ship's not being able to do so, and must pay damages for the breach of contract. The principle for which the plaintiffs contended was to be found in many cases, the most recent being "Ashmore v. Cox" (4 Com. Cas., 48, [1899] 1 Q.B., 436). For the defendants it was urged that any such warranty was unreasonable, and ought not to be implied. Both parties, it was argued, assumed that the ship would be fit to fulfil her engagement, and therefore there was an implied condition, it was said, by which the defendants were excused if the performance of the contract was rendered impossible by a sea peril. His Lordship read a passage from the judgment of Mr. Justice Blackburn in "Taylor v. Caldwell" (3 B and S., at p. 833), which stated the principle applicable to this case, and, continuing, said that in his opinion the defendants' contention was right, and that under the circumstances the contract was at an end, it having become impossible to perform it, and that a condition ought to be implied that in the circumstances which had happened neither party ought to be bound. It was further contended for the plaintiffs that such an implication was not reasonable in this case having regard to clause 5 of the contract, which contained, it was said, the sole conditions on which the contract was not to be binding. That clause provided that, in case of prohibition of export, blockade, or hostilities preventing shipment, the contract or any unfulfilled part thereof was to be cancelled. It was said that, there being that express provision, no additional condition ought to be implied. A similar argument was urged in "Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company" (L.R., 10 C.P., 125). The expressed and the implied stipulations were, however, not repugnant to each other, and the implied stipulation applied to a different stage of the transaction from that dealt with by clause 5. There had been a prolonged argument as to the measure of damages. It was not necessary now to decide that point, but his Lordship expressed the opinion that the plaintiffs' contention was not tenable. Having regard to the decision in "Roth v. Taysen" (1 Com. Cas., 240, 306), the plaintiffs were bound to mitigate the loss by acting as reasonable men of business, and it appeared that they could have got another cargo in December for less than the price which would have been payable at the end of January. There would be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

IN RE HARRISON.*

Bankruptcy—Void settlements—Payment of premiums on life policies—Death of bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 47.

This was an application by the trustee in bankruptcy of Cartmell Harrison claiming a declaration that two-fifths of the moneys payable under certain policies on the life of the bankrupt, or at any rate all premiums paid by the bankrupt to keep on foot the policies between 1889 and 1895, and two-fifths of the premiums paid by him between 1895 and 1899 in respect of the same policies, were voluntary settlements of the property of the bankrupt within the meaning of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and void against him (the trustee) accordingly in the following circumstances:—In 1877 Mr. Cartmell Harrison executed a post-nuptial settlement by which certain policies of insurance on his own life became vested in trustees for the benefit of members of his family as he might appoint. There was no covenant or other provision for payment of the premiums. In 1895, on the marriage of a daughter, Mr. Harrison appointed for her benefit three-fifths of the interest in the policies; but again there was no provision made for keeping up the policies. He continued to pay the premiums until his bankruptcy, which occurred in November, 1899, and was followed in two days by his death. The Bankruptcy Act, 1883, section 47, enacts that "any settlement of property, not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or encumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration . . . shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement." It was agreed that the appointment to the daughter on her marriage in 1895 made the settlement one for valuable consideration to the extent of the three-fifths appointed to her; and it was admitted that the parties claiming under the settlement could not prove that the settlor (Cartmell Harrison) was solvent in 1889.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie and Mr. Whinney appeared for the trustee in bankruptcy; Mr. Reed, Q.C., and Mr. O. L. Clare appeared for the trustee of the settlement.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said.—The question is whether for the purposes of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, Mr. Cartmell Harrison's payments of the premiums on the settled policies, during the ten years before his bankruptcy, ought to be regarded as voluntary settlements, either of the premiums paid or of so much of the value of the policies as those payments may be supposed to have produced. The contentions of the respondent, as I understand them, are that the only settlement was the original settlement made in 1877, more than the ten years before the bankruptcy; that the annual payments of the premiums did not increase the sum which was to become payable on the death, and which was the subject of the settlement, but were merely performances of the condition on which the continuance of the liability of the insurance company depended; and that, even if the payment of the premium in any year can be regarded as a settlement at all, it was a settlement only of the amount of the premium itself and not of any part of the value of the policies. It seems however to be plain that the payment of the premiums is part of the consideration for the insurance (see "Dalby v. India and London Life Assurance Company," 15 C.B., 365), and the payment of each part of the consideration is pro tanto a purchase of the right to the amount insured, and, being paid for the purpose of acquiring or securing the settled fund and so converted into a portion of the settled fund, seems to be a fresh settlement from time to time as the payments are made. The payment of the premiums transfers the money from the settlor as the consideration for the settled fund continuing to exist. I cannot see any difference in this respect between payment of the premiums on an old policy and the payment of a premium for a new policy. In either case the payment of the premiums upon a settled policy seems in effect either to be a settlement of the premiums paid or a settlement of what is produced by the payment of it; and the only remaining question is which of these two settlements it should be considered to be. It seems to me that the thing which is settled is not the premium paid, but the fund or result which is produced by it; and that the section undoes in favour of the trustee in bankruptcy, not the payment of the premiums, but the alienation from the settlor's estate of whatever it is that, by paying the premiums for the purposes of the settlement, he has assured to the voluntary cestui que trust—and that is, not the amount of the premium, but the benefit resulting from the payment of it. The case seems to me to be the same in substance as if the money paid as premiums had been invested in buying the reversion of an estate for the benefit of the volunteer. In that case the trustee in the settlor's bankruptcy would, I suppose, take not the price at which the reversion was bought, but the reversion, which may be much more valuable than the price paid for it, but which, and not the price paid, is in the case supposed, the property which at the time of the accrual of the trustee's title is vested in the volunteer by virtue of the settlement and but for the settlement would have been vested in the bankrupt. This it is which the section gives back to the bankrupt, and through him to his trustee in bankruptcy. It is admitted by the trustee in bankruptcy that so much of the value of the policies as represents three-fifths of the premiums paid before 1895 must be regarded as settled in 1895 for valuable consideration. There must be a declaration that the trustee in bankruptcy is entitled to so much of the value of the policies as represents the premiums paid during the ten years before the bankruptcy, after deduction of so much of that value as represents premiums paid between the commencement of the ten years and the appointment in 1895. If the amounts cannot be agreed there must be an inquiry.

BARRON V. WILLIS.*

Solicitor—Duties—Fiduciary relation—Solicitor and client—Gift by client—Absence of independent advice.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (15 The Times L.R., 469), reversed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's (reported in The Times of July 7 last and in 15 The Times L.R., 469). The case was one of interest and importance to solicitors. The plaintiff, Mrs. Annie Butler Barron, the wife of Mr. William Barron, and formerly Mrs. Joseph Willis, sought to rectify or set aside a deed executed by her in 1891. In October, 1889, the plaintiff was married to Mr. Joseph Willis. He was the only son of Thomas Willis, who died in April, 1890, having appointed his widow, Ann Willis, his executrix and sole residuary legatee. On December 29, 1890, a deed was executed which was made between Ann Willis of the first part, Joseph Willis of the second part, the plaintiff (then his wife) of the third part, and the defendants Nicholas Willis, Isaac Dunn, and William Moore Skinner of the fourth part. It contained a recital that the property of Thomas Willis consisted of the particulars mentioned in the first three schedules, and that the property mentioned in the fourth schedule belonged to Joseph Willis. There was a further recital that Ann Willis believed that it was her late husband's intention to revoke, or partially revoke, his will and to dispose of his property in favour of his widow and son, and that, with a view to carrying out in some measure the wishes of the testator and also with the object of making provision for Joseph Willis and his wife and any future wife and the lawful issue of Joseph Willis, it had been agreed between Ann Willis and Joseph Willis by way of family arrangement that the properties mentioned in the schedules should be settled in manner thereafter expressed. The trusts were during the joint lives of Ann Willis and Joseph Willis to pay him £100 a year, subject thereto to pay the income to Ann Willis during her life, and subject thereto there was a protected life interest given to Joseph Willis, and after his death the trust was for the widow of Joseph Willis during her life, with subsequent trusts in favour of the children or issue of Joseph Willis, and in default of issue a general power of appointment by deed was given to Joseph Willis and the plaintiff jointly, and subject thereto a general power of appointment by deed was given to the survivor, and subject thereto the property was settled in trust as to one half for Nicholas Willis and as to the other half for Frederick Herbert Skinner, son of the defendant William Moore Skinner, absolutely. Nicholas Willis was a cousin of Joseph Willis, and Frederick Herbert Skinner was a great friend of Joseph Willis, and was then under 21 years of age. In the year 1891 differences arose between Joseph Willis and his wife mainly, if not entirely, by reason of the intemperate habits into which he had fallen. On October 3, 1891, a deed was executed by Joseph Willis, the plaintiff (his wife), and Ann Willis. This deed contained a recital that the deed of 1890 did not in all respects carry out the wishes of the parties to the family arrangement, and that it had been agreed that for the purpose of varying the trusts of the same deed and of fully carrying out the intention of the parties the deed now being stated should be executed, Ann Willis concurring therein to show her assent to the same; and the deed provided, first, that the provision for the widow of Joseph Willis during his life should be read and construed as a provision only for the benefit of the widow so long only as she should remain the widow of Joseph Willis, and that the words "after the decease of the survivor" should be read and construed as "after the decease of the survivor or the marriage of the widow"; and by the same deed Joseph Willis and the plaintiff, in exercise of the joint power of appointment vested in them in case of failure of issue, appointed that the trust funds should be held in trust for such person and in such manner as Joseph Willis alone should by deed appoint, and in default of appointment, and so far as no such appointment should extend, then (excluding the power of appointment by the widow of Joseph Willis) upon the trusts declared by the principal deed of 1890. Joseph Willis died intestate and without issue in September, 1893. By a deed dated August 2, 1894, and made between the plaintiff of the first part, Ann Willis of the second part, Frederick Herbert Skinner of the third part, and Nicholas Willis, Isaac Dunn, and William Moore Skinner of the fourth part, after an accurate recital of the effect of the deeds of 1890 and 1891, and a recital that it had been agreed by way of family arrangement that such further modification of the trusts as was therein-after contained should be executed, it was witnessed and it was thereby agreed and declared, and particularly Ann Willis, Nicholas Willis, and Frederick Herbert Skinner thereby agreed, declared, and directed that the direction contained in the settlement for payment or application of the income of the trust funds to or for the benefit of the widow of Joseph Willis during her life should have full force and effect, and that that income should be paid to the plaintiff during her life in the same manner as if Clause 1 of the modification deed of 1891 had not been inserted therein, and in all other respects the deeds of 1890 and 1891 should be and were thereby confirmed. All the three deeds of 1890, 1891, and 1894 were prepared by Mr. Skinner as solicitor, with the assistance of counsel. Mrs. Ann Willis died in April, 1897. In November, 1897, the plaintiff married her present husband, Mr. Barron, and on February 22, 1898, this action was commenced, claiming a declaration that the deed of 1891 was not binding on the plaintiff so far as it purported to deprive her of the general power of appointment given to her by the deed of 1890; a declaration that the deed of 1894 was not binding on her so far as it confirmed the deed of 1891; and rectification of the same deeds so far as necessary. Mr. Skinner purchased the reversionary interest of his son in one moiety of the property. The facts above set forth were stated by the learned Judge in his judgment to be undisputed. And he said that upon the evidence he had arrived at the following conclusions with regard to the facts which were in dispute:—In the first place, he thought that Joseph Willis and his mother, Ann Willis, were both desirous that the property which came from them should not go to "a strange man," by which, of course, was meant a second husband of the plaintiff, or to any member of her family, and this desire was made known to the plaintiff. She did not deem this desire unreasonable or improper, and she consented to give effect to it. Joseph Willis and his mother thought that the deed of 1890 did not, in respect to those matters, give effect to their real intentions, though those intentions had not been communicated to Mr. Skinner. He was angry at the suggestion that there was any mistake on his part, and unwilling that the deed should be modified. In the second place his Lordship thought the deed of 1891 was in substance a transaction between the plaintiff and her husband. In the third place, he thought the nature and effect of the deed of 1891 were explained to the plaintiff on September 30, 1891, and again on October 3, when it was executed by her and her husband, and that on that occasion Mr. Skinner suggested that both of them should go to some other solicitor. In the fourth place, he thought the deed of 1894 was most carefully explained to the plaintiff before its execution, and he believed that she understood its effect, although she had now brought herself to believe that it was never explained to her and that she never understood it. In the fifth place his Lordship thought that Mr. Skinner did act as the plaintiff's solicitor in the matter of the 1894 deed, which was not complained of, but that he did not act for her in the matter of the 1891 deed. Whether at that time the relation of solicitor and client existed between the plaintiff and Mr. Skinner was a matter of more doubt, but on the whole he was not satisfied that Mr. Skinner did act as her solicitor until long after the execution of the deed of 1891. In the sixth place his Lordship thought that no case had been made for setting aside or rectifying the deed of 1891, unless it could be impeached on the ground of some fiduciary relation. And on the whole his Lordship came to the conclusion that the plaintiff's claim had failed, and he dismissed the action.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. Ashton Cross were for the plaintiff; Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. P. S. Stokes for the defendant N. Willis; Mr. F. A. Milne for the defendant Dunn; and Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Austen Cartmell for the defendants W. M. Skinner and F. H. Skinner.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case was an important and difficult one. It had occupied a long time, but he could not say that any time had been unnecessarily consumed. The case was important because it was very near the line. The principles of law were well settled, though the application of them was difficult. The question was whether Mr. W. M. Skinner stood in such a confidential relation to the plaintiff in these transactions as made it his duty to see that she had independent advice. His Lordship made no reflection on Mr. Skinner, nor said that he did not act with perfect honesty. But on a consideration of the facts his Lordship thought it impossible to say that a confidential relation did not exist between the plaintiff and Mr. Skinner. Under the deed of 1890 he was a trustee for the plaintiff as much as for any other of the persons interested. Under that deed his position was one of difficulty and delicacy, not only because he was a trustee, but because his own son took a benefit under the deed. Before the deed of 1891 was executed the plaintiff had consulted Mr. Skinner about her position. In the latter part of the summer of that year there was some unpleasantness between her and her husband. He and his mother appeared to have desired that the deed of 1890 should be altered, and they naturally consulted Mr. Skinner. The plaintiff was told that they desired to have some alterations made, and his Lordship was satisfied that the plaintiff knew that it was intended to cut down her life interest to an interest during widowhood, and that her power of disposition was to be cut down. She knew that her husband was to have some power of disposing of the property. Whether she knew that her power of disposition was to be taken away altogether was more obscure. It was left to Mr. Skinner to carry out these intentions. There were different ways of doing this. What was his duty to the plaintiff in the matter? She said that she trusted him to carry it out properly. He did to a certain extent suggest that she should go to another solicitor, but he did not explain to her her real position. He never gave her the advice that the proposed deed was so adverse to her interests that she ought not to execute it without independent advice. He set too low a standard of his duty. It was contended that he was merely carrying out a previous bargain between the parties. Considering his position it was impossible to accept that view. He did not rise to the occasion or appreciate the extreme delicacy of his position. He did not explain to her the loss which she would suffer by the deed, and she did not realize it. The rule which governed such cases was well settled. It was founded on a knowledge of human nature and was intended to prevent the very mischief which arose in such a case as the present. As to the deed of 1894, she by it confirmed the deed of 1891 without having independent advice, and the confirmation could not bind her. The defendant Nicholas Willis, being a volunteer, had no equity to prevent the setting aside of the deed of 1891. Mr. Justice Cosens-Hardy had not attributed sufficient importance to the confidential relation which existed between the plaintiff and Mr. Skinner in 1891, and he had overrated her admission that she did not employ Mr. Skinner as her solicitor. The appeal must be allowed and the declarations for which the plaintiff asked made.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY delivered judgment to the same effect, in the course of which he said that, assuming that the effect of the deed of 1891 was fully explained by Mr. Skinner to the plaintiff, that was not enough. She was entitled to independent advice. The rule of law was that a person who entered into a transaction which had the result of benefiting the solicitor who acted in it was not bound by it, unless he had independent advice. It was plain that the plaintiff had no such advice. Mr. Skinner gave her an explanation of the deed, but that was entirely beside the mark.

PARDOE V. PARDOE.*

Waste—Tenant for life—Timber—Will—Construction.

A testator gave his wife (the tenant for life) "full and absolute control" over all his property during her life; held that these words did not enable her to commit waste.

This was an action for waste. The question was whether the defendant, who was tenant for life in possession of certain estates in Shropshire, was entitled to cut timber and apply the proceeds of sale thereof to her own use. The estates in question belonged to the late Mr. George Pardoe in fee simple. By his will, dated in 1879, he gave all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever and over which he might have any power of disposition by will unto and to the use of his wife, the defendant, Mary Elizabeth Pardoe, during her life, and after her decease, subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies thereinbefore given, the testator gave all his real estate and all the residue of his personal estate unto and to the use of his brother Frederick Pardoe, if living at his decease, and the testator appointed his said wife his sole executrix and gave her full and absolute control over all his property during her life. The testator died on November 29, 1884, during the lifetime of Frederick Pardoe. Frederick Pardoe, by his will dated in 1887, devised all the real estate of which he had power to dispose under the will of his brother (subject, inter alia, to the life estate therein of the defendant) to the use of his son, the plaintiff George Owen Pardoe, during his life without impeachment of waste, and after his decease to the use of his first and other sons successively according to seniority in tail with remainders over. Frederick Pardoe died on December 20, 1892, and his will was duly proved by his executors. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, Mrs. Pardoe, claimed to be entitled to cut and sell timber and timber-like trees on the estate and to retain the proceeds thereof for her own use and benefit, notwithstanding that by the will of her late husband she was not punishable for waste; and that she had in fact from time to time cut and sold considerable quantities of timber and timber-like trees and applied the proceeds for her own use and benefit. The plaintiff claimed certain declarations and consequential relief. The defendant admitted that she had on several occasions cut timber on the estate, but alleged that she had laid out the proceeds of sale of such timber in repairs on the estate, and she claimed to be entitled to cut timber in a due course of management of the estates.

Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. P. M. Walters appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. G. E. Cruickshank for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, after stating the facts of the case, said that all the Court was now asked to do was to make certain declarations and to grant an injunction. The first question was whether the defendant was made impeachable for waste. That was a question of construction. The testator gave his wife, the defendant, "full and absolute control over all his property during her life." The question was whether that enlarged her interest under the will, and in his Lordship's opinion it did not. The property in question included real and personal estate. Where there was a gift of personal property for life with remainder over, the intention of the testator was shown that the property should pass to the remainderman. According to the rule in "Howe v. Lord Dartmouth," property of a wasting nature must not, in such a case, be retained, but must be sold, unless it appeared from the will that specific enjoyment by the tenant for life was intended. Though the question did not arise in this case with reference to personal estate, it might be considered, by way of a test, what was the testator's meaning with regard to the personal estate. Would the words used by the testator enable the defendant to set aside the rule in "Howe v. Lord Dartmouth"? In his Lordship's opinion, they would not. They only gave the defendant wide powers of management and did not affect the nature of the interests given by the will. It was, therefore, incumbent upon the defendant to preserve the personal property in such a way as not to affect the rights of tenant for life and remainderman. The same reasoning applied as to the real estate. The words did not enable the defendant to commit waste, and she was therefore impeachable for waste. That being so, it was proved that she had cut oak trees over 20 years old, which, according to law, were timber trees, and a tenant for life was not entitled to cut them unless authorized by the will to do so. Prima facie, therefore, she had committed waste, and the burden was upon her to show that she was entitled to do so. Two defences were set up. First, it was said that this was a timber estate within "Honywood v. Honywood" (L.R., 18 Eq., 306) and "Dashwood v. Magniac" ([1891] 3 Ch., 306). In the former case Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls, said, "Once arrive at the fact of what is timber, the tenant for life impeachable for waste cannot cut it down. That I take to be the clear law, with one single exception, which has been established principally by modern authorities in favour of the owners of timber estates—that is, estates which are cultivated merely for the produce of saleable timber, and where the timber is cut periodically. The reason of the distinction is this, that as cutting the timber is the mode of cultivation, the timber is not to be kept as part of the inheritance, but part, so to say, of the annual fruits of the land, and in these cases the same kind of cultivation may be carried on by the tenant for life that has been carried on by the settlor on the estate, and the timber so cut down periodically in due course is looked upon as the annual profits of the estate and, therefore, goes to the tenant for life." And the ground of the principle upon which this was based was more fully explained in "Dashwood v. Magniac." What his Lordship had to do was to see how the estate had been dealt with in the lifetime of the testator. [He dealt with the evidence on that point.] It was to the effect that the trees had been cut at random and that the woods had not been worked periodically. The essence of a timber estate was that there should be a regular course of cultivation. Upon the evidence there was nothing of the sort during the life of the testator. If it were to be held that this estate was a timber estate within "Honywood v. Honywood," then almost every estate in England might be a timber estate. This estate was, in his Lordship's opinion, a very good example of what was not a timber estate. That defence therefore failed. Then it was said that what had been done came within the power of management conferred by the will. His Lordship then further referred to the evidence as to what had been done in the woods on the estate, and came to the conclusion that the defendant had not treated the woods in due course of management; she had destroyed the timber without properly cultivating the underwood. The plaintiff was entitled to (1) a declaration that the defendant was not dispunishable for waste; (2) a declaration that she was not entitled to cut timber and timber-like trees except in due course of management and at seasonable periods for the benefit and preservation of the estate; (3) a declaration that the defendant was liable to account for the proceeds of timber and timber-like trees wrongfully cut down, and was not entitled to apply such proceeds for her own use and benefit. There would be no injunction, but liberty would be given to apply for one if it should become necessary.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Revenue—Stamp duty—Company—Increase of nominal share capital—Stamp Act, 1891, sec. 113.

This was a special case stated by consent upon information filed by the Attorney-General claiming from the Midland Railway Company duty and penalties alleged to be due by reason of the increase of the nominal share capital of the company under the authority of an Act of Parliament to the amount of £60,367,581 3s. 6d., and by reason of the neglect of the company to deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a statement of the amount of such increase within the period of one month after the passing of the Act authorizing the same, contrary to section 113 of the Stamp Act, 1891. That enactment provides that "in case of any increase of the amount of nominal share capital of any corporation or company, whether now existing or to be hereafter formed, being authorized by any . . . Act, a statement of the amount of such increase shall be delivered by the corporation or company to the Commissioners" within one month after the passing of the Act. The same section provides that the statement shall be charged with an ad valorem duty of 2s. for every £100, and also provides for the payment of penalties in the event of neglect to deliver the statement. By an Act passed on August 6, 1897, the Midland Railway Company were authorized to make the following alterations in their stock:—£342,500 Midland Railway four per cent. guaranteed stock was authorized to be created and issued to the Kettering, Thrapston, and Huntingdon Railway Company in substitution for the then existing four per cent. guaranteed stock of the company; £25,000 Midland Railway four per cent. preference stock was authorized to be created and issued to the liquidators of the same company in extinguishment of contingent rent payable to the company; £960,000 new stock was authorized; £3,899,121 5s. four per cent. consolidated perpetual rent-charge stock was authorized to be consolidated so as to amount to £6,238,594 guaranteed stock, bearing interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum—an increase of £2,339,472 15s.; £150,000 Sheffield and Rotherham perpetual preferential stock was authorized to be consolidated so as to amount to £375,000 guaranteed stock, bearing interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum—an increase of £225,000; £6,337,076 12s. 6d. four per cent. consolidated guaranteed preferential stock was authorized to be consolidated so as to amount to £10,139,322 12s. guaranteed stock, bearing interest at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum—an increase of £3,802,245 19s. 6d.; £29,048,191 15s. four per cent. perpetual preference stock was extinguished, and in lieu thereof £46,477,106 16s. two-and-a-half per cent. perpetual preference stock was created—an increase of £17,428,915 1s.; and ordinary stock (existing and authorized) to the amount of £35,434,947 8s. was extinguished, and in lieu thereof there was created £35,434,947 8s. preferred converted ordinary stock, entitled to a dividend at the rate of £2 10s. per cent. per annum, and £35,434,947 8s. deferred converted ordinary stock—an increase of £35,434,947 8s. The railway company delivered such a statement as is required by section 113 with reference to the £342,500 Midland Railway four per cent. guaranteed stock, the £25,000 Midland Railway four per cent. preference stock, and the £960,000 new stock, and such statement was stamped in accordance with the Act, but they refused to deliver a statement with reference to the remainder of the increases of share capital authorized by their Act. The Commissioners, however, claimed duty upon the whole of the increases of share capital amounting to £60,558,081 3s. 6d.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (with whom were Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. S. A. T. Bowlatt) contended that in the case of each stock there was an increase of the nominal share capital of the company, and that the duty was therefore payable. He cited "Attorney-General and Milford Docks Company" (69 L.T., 458).

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SIR R. REID, Q.O. (with whom were Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. Loechnis), for the defendants, distinguished "Attorney-General and Milford Docks Company" upon the ground that in that case the alteration of capital was effected in order to make persons shareholders of the company who were before only debenture-holders, and that there was, therefore, in that case a real increase in the share capital of the company. He contended that section 113 did not apply where there was, as here, no real addition to the value of the company's capital.

The COURT gave judgment for the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that he did not find that section 113 required the interpretation which Sir R. Reid put upon it. "Nominal share capital" meant the capital of the company in shares computed according to the figure value attached to the shares. An increase of the nominal share capital would therefore take place if the figure value of the shares was altered from, say, £100 to £200, and the increase of share capital so effected would be one in respect of which the additional duty provided for by section 113 would be payable. In his Lordship's opinion the alteration in the stock of the Midland Railway Company authorized by their Act of 1897 did amount to an increase of their nominal share capital, and the duty was payable accordingly.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that he was of the same opinion. Sir R. Reid's contention amounted to this—that whereas the section said, "in case of any increase of the amount of nominal share capital," he would read it as if it ran "any real increase," and he said that what happened in this case was that there was only a nominal increase in the amount of the nominal share capital, and not a real increase. Suppose the nominal share capital stood at £50,000 and a rearrangement took place the result of which was that the nominal share capital stood at £75,000. That could not happen without an increase of the amount of the nominal share capital. It was true that the assets of the company might not have been increased, but the nominal share capital was undoubtedly increased.

OWEN V. LAVERY.*

Malicious Prosecution—Maliciously presenting bankruptcy petition—Absence of reasonable and probable cause.

This was an application for a new trial or judgment in an action tried before Mr. Justice Grantham and a special jury, reported in The Times of March 27. The action was brought to recover damages from the defendant for maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause presenting a bankruptcy petition against the plaintiff. The facts were these:—In the year 1895 there was a syndicate called the Iberian Mines Syndicate (Limited), which was working some mines in Spain. By a resolution passed in November, 1895, the syndicate appointed the plaintiff Owen to be its manager in Spain at a certain salary and also at an additional remuneration (if the syndicate should sell its property to a company at a profit) of 5 per cent. in cash and shares of such profit less all proper deductions. By a resolution passed in June, 1896, the syndicate decided to sell its property to a company formed for the purpose of buying it, and entered into voluntary liquidation and appointed the defendant Lavery liquidator. The sale to the new company was duly carried out, and it became the duty of the defendant to discharge all claims on the syndicate. He received on behalf of the syndicate £20,000 in cash from the new company and shares in the new company of the face value of £95,000. In May, 1897, the plaintiff received 1,500 shares on account of his claim against the syndicate, and there still remained due to him in the hands of the defendant a large sum exceeding, according to the plaintiff's account, £4,000. In 1898 the defendant, who was the holder of a bill of exchange for £68 13s. 4d. accepted by the plaintiff, sued the plaintiff thereon, and obtained judgment against him for that amount on March 7, 1898. On March 18 the defendant served a bankruptcy notice on the plaintiff in respect of the judgment, and on April 5 he presented a bankruptcy petition against the plaintiff, and on May 4 a receiving order was made. On July 22 the defendant, as liquidator, submitted accounts to the shareholders of the syndicate, and the liquidation was concluded and the syndicate dissolved. On December 8 the plaintiff was adjudicated bankrupt. In March, 1899, the Official Receiver, who had been appointed trustee in the bankruptcy, assigned the plaintiff's claim against the defendant as liquidator to Mrs. Owen, the wife of the plaintiff. She brought an action against the defendant, and the defendant settled the action by paying her £1,400. A portion of that sum—viz., £700—was paid to the Official Receiver, who paid therewith the plaintiff's debts in full. The adjudication of bankruptcy and the receiving order were thereupon rescinded, and subsequently the plaintiff brought this action, alleging that the defendant had taken the bankruptcy proceedings maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £2,000 damages, and the learned Judge entered judgment accordingly.

The defendant appealed.

MR. MCCALL, Q.C., and MR. HOBSON, for the defendant, contended that there was no evidence of malice or of want of reasonable and probable cause. The motive with which a legal act was done could not be inquired into. Here there was at date of the bankruptcy petition a valid debt due from the plaintiff upon which the defendant had a legal right to issue a bankruptcy notice and obtain an adjudication in bankruptcy against the plaintiff, under section 4 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. At that date there was no debt due from the defendant to the plaintiff which could be legally set off against that due from the plaintiff to the defendant. They cited "Johnson v. Emerson" (L.R., 6 Ex., 329), "King v. Henderson" ([1898] A.C., 720). The adjudication had only been set aside because the creditors had been paid in full.

MR. RAWLINSON, Q.C., and MR. S. H. EMANUEL, for the plaintiff, read a letter from the defendant showing that as early as July, 1897, he knew that a large sum was due from him to the plaintiff. They contended that the purpose of the bankruptcy proceedings was not to obtain payment of the debt but to prevent the plaintiff from establishing his claim against the defendant as liquidator of the Iberian Mines Syndicate (Limited).

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH, in giving judgment, said that there was no reason to interfere with the verdict and judgment of the Court below. It was clear that the jury had agreed with the learned Judge that the bankruptcy proceedings were part of a fraudulent scheme to prevent the plaintiff from getting his just due. His Lordship was not surprised at that conclusion. That in an action the gist of which was malice the Court would not take upon itself to say that the verdict of £2,000 was excessive. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

*Reported by W. HUSSEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred. The mere motive with which a legal act was done was immaterial, but the act of issuing proceedings in bankruptcy for purposes foreign to the legitimate object of the bankruptcy legislation and as an abuse of the process of the Court might well be called a fraudulent act. Such an act had two of the essentials of an actionable wrong, being malicious and without reasonable and probable cause. The third essential was not wanting—viz., that the proceedings should have been set aside; for it was not necessary that they should be set aside on the ground of being an abuse of process. The reason why it was necessary that the proceedings should have been set aside was simply because it was unseemly that there should be in existence two decrees of the Court inconsistent with each other. Given malice and want of reasonable and probable cause for issuing process, the necessary allegation that such process had been set aside was proved if the process was, in fact, set aside. It was not necessary to show that it ought never to have been issued. The adjudication had been set aside here, and therefore the act of the defendant had all the essentials of a wrong.

BEAUMONT V. BOWERS (SURVEYOR OF TAXES).*

Revenue—Income-tax—Salary of public servant —Deductions—Sums chargeable on salary by virtue of an Act of Parliament—16 and 17 Vict., c. 34, sec. 2, Sched. E.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The appellant, Mr. Herbert Beaumont, was appointed clerk to the Guardians of the Poor of the Wakefield Union and the Assessment Committee and School Attendance Committee of the said union on March 4, 1884, a date prior to the commencement of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896, which came into operation from and immediately after the 29th day of September, 1896. The appellant did not exercise the option allowed to him as such officer or servant by signifying in writing to the aforesaid authorities within three months after the commencement of the Act, in pursuance of section 15 thereof, his intention not to avail himself of the provisions of that Act. He was assessed to the income-tax under Schedule E for the year ended April 5, 1899, in the sum of £510, the amount of his salaries as clerk to the Guardians Assessment Committee and School Attendance Committee of the Wakefield Union. After deducting the sum of £221 for expenses borne by him in the performance of the duties of the appointments which he holds, duty was left payable on the net sum of £289, which, at 8d. in the pound, amounts to £9 12s. 8d. The appellant claimed that the assessment was excessive by the duty on a sum of £15 10s. deducted from, or paid by, and borne by him for contributions made annually by him under the provisions of sections 12 and 13 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., cap. 50). Section 12 of that Act makes an annual contribution, according to a scale fixed by section 13, compulsory on every officer to whom the Act applies. In return for these contributions the Act provides for the superannuation of the officer after serving 40 years or on his attaining 65 years, and in other circumstances. The assessment to income-tax in respect of a public office such as the appellant holds is laid under the general charging rule of the Act 16 and 17 Vict., cap. 34 section 2, Schedule E, into which has to be read the rules for charging the duties assessable under the now obsolete Schedule E of 5 and 6 Vict., cap. 35, section 146, the first of which rules charges all persons holding public offices with tax on all "salaries, wages, fees, perquisites, or profits, after deducting therefrom the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament where the same have been really and bona fide paid and borne by the party to be charged." The Commissioners confirmed the assessment.

MR. ASQUITH, Q.C., and Mr. J. ROSKILL, for the appellant, submitted that he had the right under section 146 of the Act of 1842 to make the deduction claimed, as it was in respect of compulsory payments made by virtue of an Act of Parliament.

MR. ROWLATT (the Attorney-General, Sir R. B. Finlay, Q.C., and Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., with him), for the Crown, submitted that the payment was not a legitimate deduction under the 146th section. It was found necessary to introduce into section 54 of the Act of 1853, in order to legalize a somewhat similar deduction, the following words, "and any persons who shall under any Act of Parliament be liable to the payment of any annual sum or to have deducted from his salary or stipend, in order to secure a deferred annuity to his widow or a provision to his children after death, shall be entitled to deduct." That if section 146 had the extended meaning which the appellant sought to give it, then the deduction made under the fifth rule of the same section from the salaries of public officers in respect of income-tax payable by them would also be a legitimate deduction, which admittedly it was not.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the decision of the Commissioners was wrong, and the appeal must be allowed. Prima facie there was power to deduct the payments, as they were "duties or other sums payable or chargeable by virtue of an Act of Parliament." It had been contended that as section 54 of the Act of 1853 expressly authorized certain deductions, amongst which the present deductions were not included, that it could not have been intended that the compulsory payments made by the appellant should be included. The answer was that section 54 only dealt with insurance matters. It went on to say, in order to cover the whole ground, that where the payments were made to benefit others who should come after the recipient they should be included. To hold otherwise would be to place a very limited construction upon section 146.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING concurred. Section 54 did not cover all the ground of section 146, nor did section 146 wholly cover section 54. It was perfectly possible that two Acts of Parliament might overlap one another. To some extent they dealt with the same thing, but he did not therefore draw the inference that the words used were not to have their usual meanings.

Appeal allowed.

MARSH V. HUGHES-HALLETT.*

Contract—Offer and acceptance—Horse sent on approval—Failure to return.

Held, concluded contract.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action brought by Mr. Frederick Marsh, the plaintiff, against Mr. Victor Hughes-Hallett, the defendant, to recover £65, the price of a horse. On January 13 last the plaintiff inserted an advertisement in the Field announcing that he had a dun gelding hunter for sale for £65. On January 14 the defendant wrote to the plaintiff:—"Will you send your hunter to me for a few days' trial? I will pay all expenses and take all risks," adding that he desired to try him with the Grafton hounds. On January 15 the plaintiff wrote:—"If you like to wire me to-morrow morning I will send the horse down that day for you to try on Wednesday. If you do not buy him you return him here on Thursday and pay three guineas for the day's hunting. If you buy him you pay £65 and no charge for the day. . . . He is at your risk while in your possession." On the following day the defendant wired:—"Send horse if week's trial for three guineas." On the same day the plaintiff wrote:—"I certainly should not send a hunter for a week's hunting with the Grafton for three guineas. . . . I will send him for a day's hunting as per my letter of last night, but not for longer." On January 18 the defendant wrote:—"Considering I take all risks I think the sum mentioned quite enough for a week's trial of a hunter." On January 21 the plaintiff wrote:—"If you will like to try the horse I will send him down for a week's trial for five guineas, you to take all risks. I don't think there is much chance of his coming back." On January 22 the defendant wired:—"Send horse to-day, with bridle, on terms of your letter." The horse was accordingly sent to the defendant. On January 29 the defendant wrote to the plaintiff saying that he had not had an opportunity of thoroughly testing the horse, and requesting him to extend the time for trial. The plaintiff replied that, the time for trial having expired on the 29th and the horse not having been returned, he considered that the horse was sold to the defendant. The defendant did not accept this position and returned the horse.

Mr. GARLAND (Mr. Ellis Hill with him), for the plaintiff, contended that the correspondence showed a completed contract for the sale of the horse on trial, which became an absolute sale on the defendant's failure to return the horse at or before the end of the period fixed for the trial.

Mr. STIMSON, for the defendant, contended that no completed contract for sale on trial could be inferred from the correspondence, because there was never any acceptance of the offer to sell. The most there was was a contract for the hire of the horse. He cited "Harvey v. Facey" ([1893] A.C., 552).

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE said that the question was whether there was a contract for the sale of the horse subject to approval. It was clear that the horse was offered for sale by means of the advertisement. The defendant then intimated that he wished to have him on trial. The plaintiff's letter of January 15 contained a proposal to send the horse on trial, to be returned on Thursday if not bought. The defendant did not dissent from the terms of that letter, but wired, "Send horse if week's trial." If the defendant had wired "send horse" that would have been an acceptance of the terms of the plaintiff's letter. Then followed further correspondence, and in reply to the plaintiff's letter of January 21 the defendant wired, "Send horse to-day." This telegram, taken in conjunction with what preceded it, constituted a contract on the part of the defendant to take the horse on approval for a week, and if he approved of it to buy. The rule was that if goods were delivered to a buyer on approval and if the buyer did not intimate his disapproval at or before the time stated, or if no time was stated a reasonable time, the property in the goods passed to him. He gave judgment, therefore, for the plaintiff.

FRITCHARD v. DOUGHTON, LOVYCK, AND CO.*

Gaming—Betting—Commission agent—Action for money had and received.

Action dismissed, on the ground that there was no evidence that defendant had made the bets for plaintiff or had received any money in respect of them.

This was an application by the defendants for a new trial or judgment in an action tried before Mr. Justice Darling and a common jury, reported in The Times of April 5. The action was brought to recover the sum of £120 alleged to have been received by the defendants as agents of the plaintiff, being the proceeds of bets made and won by them on his behalf. At the trial the plaintiff gave evidence to the effect that in 1899 he received an advertisement from the defendants, who had an office at 46, Pall-mall, offering to execute betting commissions for him. A book of rules and a circular issued by the defendants showed that they called themselves Turf commission agents, and acted as such. On October 11 the plaintiff telegraphed to the defendants to put £20 on Scintillant, which won the Cesarewitch at 6 to 1, but he had never received the money. On October 17 the plaintiff telegraphed to the defendants, saying that he had not received the week's account. On the same day the defendants replied "Awaiting report of inquiry, continue business." It was contended on the part of the defendants that the burden of proving that the money had been received by the defendants rested upon the plaintiff. The learned Judge, however, held that there was evidence to go to the jury, it being admitted that the defendants acted as commission agents. The defendant Lovyck, who said that he was the sole partner in the defendants' firm, then gave evidence denying that his firm had made the bet or received the money. He also said that he did not always place bets out, but sometimes made them with himself. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for £120, and judgment was entered accordingly.

Mr. SPENCER BOWER, in support of the defendants' application for judgment or a new trial, contended that the plaintiff had not given any evidence that the defendants had received any money on the plaintiff's behalf; and that, therefore, the action for money had and received could not be maintained.

Mr. HOLMAN GREGORY, for the plaintiff, argued that, as the defendants held themselves out as commission agents, it was their duty to place the plaintiff's bet out. And there was evidence to go to the jury that the defendants had in fact placed the bet out and had received payment of the bet. Their telegram of October 17 as to continuing business was an admission that they had transacted some business for the plaintiff, and there was no suggestion of any other transaction between the parties except the bet in question. He relied on the judgment of Mr. Justice Charles in "Grimerd v. Wiltshire" (10 The Times L.R., 505).

The COURT allowed the application, and directed that judgment should be entered for the defendants.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH, after stating the facts, said that the only cause of action which the plaintiff could have possibly had against the defendants in the circumstances was one for not fulfilling the mandate given to them by him by making a bet in accordance therewith. He could not, however, maintain such an action, for the defendants would have successfully set up the defence that the transaction between the parties was a gambling transaction. In fact, he had brought his action for money had and received, but in order to succeed in that it was necessary for him to show that the defendants had in their pocket £120 belonging to the plaintiff. In other words, he must prove that the defendants had carried out their mandate by making a bet in accordance with his instructions, and that they had received payment of the bet from the person with whom the bet was made. There was no evidence whatever that the defendants had made the bet or that they had received any money in payment of the bet. Therefore, the only cause of action on which the plaintiff attempted to rely, viz., that of money had and received, failed absolutely. In his opinion the learned Judge would have been well advised if he had acceded to the application made by the defendants' counsel at the end of the plaintiff's case, and had withdrawn the case from the jury. The defendants were entitled to have judgment entered for them.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS was of the same opinion. He hoped that this case might have the advantage of teaching people who were inclined to invest their money on such terms as those disclosed by the rules and circular issued by the defendants that they had no security whatsoever for the money which they so invested. It was always possible for the person whom they so trusted, instead of placing the bets out in accordance with the authority conferred upon him, to make the bets with himself; and if he did that he was in an impregnable position, in which he could not successfully be sued in any sort of action. His Lordship could not understand how people could be so foolish as to risk their money in such a way.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred. He thought the evidence pointed to the irresistible conclusion that the defendants had never received any money on the plaintiff's behalf.

GARTSIDES (BROOKSIDE BREWERY) (LIMITED) v.
COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Sched. I., “Mortgage,” &c. (2).

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. By an indenture dated June 24, 1898, and expressed to be made by Gartsidcs (Brookside Brewery) (Limited), the appellants, and the North of England Trustee Debenture and Assets Corporation (Limited), as trustees for the registered holders of debenture stock (hereinafter called the trustees), after defining (in effect) by Clauses 1 and 39 the term “debenture stock” as meaning a sum of £600,000, the appellants by Clause 6 provided that they might give notice of intention to redeem the debenture stock not earlier than December 31, 1915, and covenanted on the day and place fixed for redemption in such notice to pay to the registered holder of any debenture stock the nominal amount of the debenture stock referred to in such notice, with interest to the date of payment and with an additional bonus of 10 per cent., and by other provisions of the deed, and in particular by Clauses 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 24 thereof, conveyed and demised the freeholds and leaseholds set out in schedules 1, 2, and 3 thereof unto the trustees, and declared they would stand possessed of the leases referred to in schedule 4 thereof in trust for the trustees, and by way of floating security charged with the payment of all principal moneys, bonuses, and interest which might become payable in respect of the debenture stock and all other moneys which might become payable under those presents all its other property and assets, present or future. This instrument was stamped with the duty of £825, being ad valorem mortgage duty of 2s. 6d. per cent. on £600,000, and was adjudged by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to be duly stamped in accordance with section 88 (1) of the Stamp Act, 1891, and the heading “Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant,” &c., in schedule 1 of the Act. By Clause 28 of the indenture of June 24, 1898, it was provided that the trustees might release any of the hereditaments described in the schedules thereto upon having conveyed to them hereditaments of equal value, notwithstanding that such substituted hereditaments might at the time be already subject to the floating charge thereby created. By an indenture dated July 24, 1899, after reciting that the trustees had agreed to release the hereditaments therein described (being a portion only of the hereditaments specifically assured to them by the indenture of June 24, 1898) on the appellants assuring to them hereditaments of equal value, the parties proceeded to carry such agreement into effect by releasing the said hereditaments, and in place thereof the appellants conveyed other hereditaments to the trustees to hold upon the trusts and for the purposes declared by and in the indenture of June 24, 1898. This instrument was presented to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for their opinion as to the stamp duty with which it was chargeable, and the Commissioners, being of opinion that the instrument was chargeable under the heading “Mortgage, Bond, Debenture,” &c., in Schedule 1 of the Stamp Act, 1891, by reference to the sub-heading (2) thereof as “being a collateral or auxiliary or additional or substituted security by way of further assurance for the above-mentioned purpose where the principal or primary security is duly stamped,” with the duty of 6d. for every £100 of the amount secured, assessed it as liable to £150, that being the duty at the rate of 6d. per cent. of £600,000, the amount secured by the principal indenture. They did not assess duty in respect of the premiums, amounting to £6,000, in deference to the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of “Knight’s Deep (Limited) v. the Commissioners of Inland Revenue” ([1900] 1 Q.B., 217). The appellants, being dissatisfied with the decision of the Commissioners, required them to state their case for the opinion of the High Court, the question being whether the instrument was charged with the proper amount of duty. The appellants contended that the instrument was not a mortgage within the meaning of the schedule, because it was not within section 86 (1) a security for a “sum of money advanced or lent at the time, or previously due and owing”; the money secured by the indenture of June 24, 1898, being only due in futuro, and there being nothing in the instrument itself to show that it was a security for money, and that it was not a substituted security within the meaning of sub-heading 2, because the properties which were included in the instrument were already included as part of the floating security under the original deed. “Jones v. the Commissioners of Inland Revenue” ([1895] 1 Q.B., 484) was cited.

The Attorney-General (Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C.), and Mr. S. A. T. Rowlatt appeared for the Crown; Mr. W. O. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Cartmell for the appellants.

The COURT gave judgment for the Crown.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that in his opinion the instrument was within the heading "Mortgage," &c., in schedule 1 of the Stamp Act, 1891, by reference to sub-heading 2. The instrument, though not in terms a security, contained a reference to the former instrument dated June 24, 1898, and upon referring to the instrument of June 24, 1898, it was clear that the later instrument was a substituted security. The argument that the money secured was not "due and owing" within section 86 was not a good one. The words of the section could not be narrowed so as to mean due and owing at the time. There having been a security in June, 1898, he was of opinion that the instrument under discussion was a substituted security and was chargeable with duty as such.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING gave judgment to the same effect.

COBBETT V. LOCKE-KING.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Compensation—Misdescription—Contract for sale of land—Error in quantity.

The particulars of a contract for the sale of land contained a misdescription of the quantity of land in one parcel; held that the purchaser was not entitled to compensation under the contract, as he was well acquainted with the land he was buying.

In this case the plaintiff claimed compensation from the defendant under the terms of a contract entered into between the parties. The defence was that no compensation was due to the plaintiff.

Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Gore Browne for the defendant.

The plaintiff's case was that a contract in writing was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant on August 12, 1897, by which the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff, amongst others, two parcels of land at Weybridge, the one containing 2 acres 2 roods 16 poles and the other containing 4 acres 7 poles or thereabouts. The contract contained a provision that if any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars should be discovered the sale should not be annulled, but that due compensation should be allowed by the vendor in respect thereof, and under this clause the plaintiff claimed compensation to the amount of £500 from the defendant, owing to the fact that the second parcel of land, which was described in the particulars as comprising 4 acres 7 poles, in reality only contained 2 acres 3 roods 7 poles. The amount of compensation claimed was the sum which the plaintiff had been compelled to pay to the National Land Corporation (Limited) as compensation on a sale by the plaintiff to the corporation of the lands in question described as above.

MR. ENGLISH HARRISON, on behalf of the plaintiff, contended that where there was an agreement for compensation the rights and liabilities of the parties must be regulated by that contract and by nothing else. If compensation was to be paid if an error was in fact discovered, it did not matter at what time it was discovered, and in the present case the plaintiff was therefore entitled to recover. He cited the cases of "Palmer v. Johnson" (12 Q.B.D., 33) and "Lett v. Randall" (49 L.T., 71).

The defendant's case was that the plaintiff knew that the land in the parcels in question only comprised 5½ acres instead of 6½ acres, as set out in the particulars. It was treated by both parties as 5½ acres, and the whole amount comprised in all the parcels as 29 acres, and the amount which the plaintiff had agreed to purchase had actually been conveyed to him.

MR. BRAY, on behalf of the defendant, said that the negotiations had been going on for two years, and the plaintiff knew perfectly well what land he was buying. In order to entitle him to compensation the error must be such a one as would, except for the clause in the contract, entitle the plaintiff to annul the sale. The law was thus stated in "Dart on the Law of Vendors and Purchasers":—"A purchaser will lose his right to . . . compensation on the ground of . . . a variation from the description in the particulars if, at the time of entering into the contract, he had, or by using due diligence might have had, knowledge of the defect; or if, after having become acquainted with it; he, without insisting thereon, proceed in the treaty; or a fortiori take possession." He referred to "In re Turner and Skelton" (13 Ch.D., 130).

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in giving judgment, said he thought the proper conclusion to come to was that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the compensation he claimed. He did not think that the description of the size of the plot of land in question was material as regarded the intention of the parties. The plaintiff knew perfectly well the land he intended to buy; he had lived in the neighbourhood of it and had been negotiating for it for some time. The case of "Lett v. Randall," though not altogether easy to get over, was not actually decided entirely on the grounds in the present case. He did not think there was anything to justify him in refusing to be guided by the decision in "Re Turner and Skelton," where the statement from "Dart's Vendor and Purchaser" was quoted with approval. There would therefore be judgment for the defendant with costs, and if the defendant desired to have a rectification of the agreement by the insertion of the correct amount of land comprised in the parcel, he was entitled to it.

INMAN V. ACKROYD AND BEST (LIMITED).*

Company—Directors—Remuneration.

Held, that the articles of association did not entitle a person, who ceased to be a director before his fee for the year became payable, to recover a proportionate part of such fee.

In this case a question was raised as to the right of a director of a limited liability company, who had ceased to be a director before his fee for the year became payable, to recover a proportionate part of such fee. The facts and arguments appear from the judgment.

MR. E. BRAY appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Llewelyn Davies for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE, in a written judgment, said:—This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant company remuneration for services rendered by him as a director of the defendant company. The plaintiff claims one £125, as one year's remuneration, from November 1, 1897, to November 1, 1898, and that portion of his claim had been admitted. The plaintiff further claims remuneration from November 1, 1898, to May 30, 1899, the date when he resigned his office of director. Remuneration for this latter period at the rate of £125 a year, amounts to £72 18s. 4d., and this part of the claim is in dispute, the defendants contending that the plaintiff is not entitled to claim remuneration for a period of less than a year's service. The 81st article of the articles of association of the company is as follows:—"The directors shall be paid out of the funds of the company by way of remuneration for their services, and exclusive of travelling expenses, the sum of £125 per annum, per director, and such further sum as shall from time to time be determined by the company in general meeting, and the same shall be divided among them in such proportion and manner as the directors by agreement may determine, and in default of such determination, equally. The said sum of £125 per annum may be increased, but not diminished by the company in general meeting." That article does not seem to me to provide for the payment of any specific sum to an individual director. The directors as a body are to be paid out of the funds of the company the sum of not less than £125 per annum, per director, and the aggregate sum is to be divided amongst them in such proportion and manner as the directors may agree, and in default of such agreement, it is to be divided amongst the directors equally. I feel the greatest difficulty in putting a construction on this article which would justify a payment to be made out of the funds of the company for the remuneration of the directors of a sum of £62 10s., half-yearly, per director, or a sum of £31 5s., quarterly, per director. I think the reasonable construction of this article is that a sum shall yearly be paid out of the funds of the company for the remuneration of the directors who have served during the year, and that that sum shall be not less than £125 per director. That, I think, means that the aggregate sum must depend upon the number of directors who have completed a year's service, or at least upon the number of directors who are serving at the time the annual sum is paid out of the funds of the company. . . . I think I am supported in the view I have expressed by the decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy, in the case of "Salton v. New Beeston Cycle Company" ([1899] 1 Ch., 775). In that case, the provisions of the article of association upon which the question turned, were not, I think, materially different from the provisions of article 81 in the present case, and the learned Judge held that no remuneration could be claimed except for a complete year. This decision was followed by Mr. Justice Wright in the case of "In re Central De Kaap Gold Mines" (W.N., November 11, 1899, p. 216). In the latter case the words of the articles of association were not more favourable to the claim of the directors than the words of the 81st article in the present case, yet Mr. Justice Wright held that nothing by way of remuneration for services by the directors could be claimed except for a full year. . . . It was contended by Mr. Bray that even if, according to the provisions of the 81st article of the articles of association, the plaintiff could not claim remuneration in respect of service for a portion of a year only, yet that by the operation of the Apportionment Act of 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 85) the plaintiff was entitled to recover a proportionate part of the annual sum which would be payable to him had he served a whole year. One difficulty in the way of my acceding to this contention is that if the Apportionment Act applies to cases of this kind, then the Act ought to have been applied by Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy in the New Beeston Cycle case and by Mr. Justice Wright in the Central De Kaap Gold Mines case. It is true that neither of the learned Judges gives any reasons why he considers the Apportionment Act inapplicable, but the provisions of the Act cannot have been overlooked; in each case it must have been decided to be inapplicable. I cannot overrule, even if I were so inclined, the two decisions referred to. But it seems to me that there is good reason why the Apportionment Act should be held not to apply. If it applies at all to the remuneration claimed by the plaintiff, it applies because his remuneration falls under the word annuities, which by the interpretation clauses includes salaries. Salary means a stated periodical payment. It is a definite sum computed by time. But in the present case I think that the plaintiff, even if he had served the full year, could not have claimed as a matter of course any definite share of the aggregate sum to be set apart for the payment of directors. The aggregate sum is, according to the 81st article, to be divided among the directors in such proportion and manner as the directors by agreement may determine. It is only in default of such determination that the sum is to be equally divided. It seems to me, therefore, there was no definite periodical payment to which the plaintiff could make an unconditional claim. His claim to remuneration was not a claim in the nature of salary to which the Apportionment Act of 1870 could apply. I must give judgment for the defendants, with costs.

THE DORA FORSTER.*

Insurance—Marine—Policy on ship—Particular average loss—Subsequent total loss of vessel.

Judgment was given in this case which was heard on the 8th inst., when judgment was reserved. The case is reported in The Times for the 9th inst.

The action was brought by the owners of the late steamship Dora Forster to recover from the defendants, the Union Marine Insurance Company, the sum of £24 16s. 9d., being the balance of a particular average loss alleged to be due under a policy of marine insurance. The Dora Forster was insured with the defendant company for £800 under a time policy, dated July 13, 1898, for 12 months from July 3, 1898, to July 3, 1899, the value of the vessel for the purposes of the policy being agreed to be £16,000. On December 10, 1898, during the continuance of the policy, when on a voyage out to Savannah, the Dora Forster, by reason of perils insured against in the policy, suffered damage to her machinery and cylinders to the extent of some £1,500. A claim was put forward by the plaintiffs against the defendant company for a particular average loss, and on January 21, 1899, the defendant company paid the sum of £52, being 6½ per cent. on the amount of the policy, on account of the claim. The damage was repaired at Savannah and the repairs were completed on January 18. The cost of the repairs was paid for by the charterers of the ship at Savannah, the Georgia Export and Import Company, and they obtained from the master of the Dora Forster a promissory note for the amount, purporting to pledge the ship and her freight, and payable three days after the arrival of the Dora Forster at Liverpool on her return voyage. The

*Reported by HUGH C. S. DUMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Georgia Export and Import Company effected insurances with the Firemen's Fund Insurance Company to cover the amount secured by the promissory note above referred to. The Dora Forster was totally lost on her voyage home, and on April 1, 1899, the defendant company settled a total loss under the policy sued on in this action. The Georgia Export and Import Company also recovered in full under their insurances with the Firemen's Fund Insurance Company, and it was stated that they were making no claim against the owners of the Dora Forster. The plaintiffs now sought to recover the balance of their claim in respect of the particular average loss. The defendant company denied that in the circumstances they were under any liability to the plaintiffs for the particular average loss, and they counterclaimed for the return of the sum of £52 already paid by them, which they alleged had been paid under a mistake of fact.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Roche appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in the course of a long and exhaustive judgment, pointed out that the plaintiffs had sustained and would sustain no loss in fact, and the question, which raised a novel and somewhat difficult point, was whether under those circumstances they could recover from the insurance company the amount of this particular average loss. In his opinion the facts did not support this claim. He thought that by the arrangements which were made at Savannah between the Georgia Company and the master of the Dora Forster the owners of the Dora Forster never became liable for the cost of the repairs at Savannah. The case was within the principle which was well stated in section 1,267 of "Phillips on Insurance," and was like the case where repairs were paid for by a bottomry bond, and where no personal liability was imposed on the owners, if the vessel was lost on her voyage home. There was, consequently, never any loss for which the owners could have made any claim. With reference to the counter-claim, he thought that the £52 was only paid without prejudice and on account of such claims as the insurance company might ultimately prove to be liable for. It was paid under a mistake of fact and should be returned. In his opinion the law in the matter followed what in a business sense was the justice of the case. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs on both the claim and the counter-claim.

THE CATHAY.*

Ship—Collision—Limitation of liability—Foreign ship.

The provisions of Sched. VI. of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, with regard to the deduction of crew space apply to foreign ships.

Judgment was given in this case, which was heard on April 30, and is reported in The Times for May 2. The action, which raises a point of great interest and importance to foreign shipowners, was brought by the owners of the Danish steamship Cathay seeking to limit their liability under section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, in respect of a collision which occurred on September 4, 1899, between the Cathay and the Clan Line steamship Clan MacGregor. By the collision the Clan MacGregor was sunk and lost with her cargo, and the Cathay was damaged. In an action which was heard on October 31 (reported in The Times for November 1) both vessels were found to blame, and it appeared that the amount for which under that decision the Cathay was liable would exceed the amount at which she could limit her liability under the Act. The plaintiffs claimed to have their liability limited on payment into Court of the sum of £32,046 14s. 5d., being £8 per ton on 4005·84 tons, the gross tonnage of the Cathay without deduction for engine rooms, but deducting crew space. The defendants, the owners of the Clan MacGregor and her cargo, contended that the owners of the Cathay were not entitled to make any deduction for the crew space, because under section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, crew space could only be deducted where it had been certified under the regulations scheduled to the Act with regard thereto, and that under Schedule VI., Clause 3, a certificate that the crew space was such as was required by the Act had to be given by one of the surveyors of ships under the Act to the collector of Customs, and the space was only to be deducted if the certificate was obtained and not otherwise, and that no such certificate had been given in this case. The plaintiffs contended that the requirements of Schedule VI. were not binding upon foreign ships, and that, under section 84 of the Act, the foreign register was conclusive as to the proper deduction of the crew space in the case of ships belonging to a country to which, by an Order in Council, the provisions of section 84 had been made to apply, as had been done in the case of Denmark.

Mr. Stokes appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Scruton for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in the course of a long and elaborate judgment, said that there was no doubt that the provisions of Schedule VI. had to be strictly complied with in the case of British ships seeking to limit their liability, and he thought that there was no distinction with respect to foreign ships having regard to the decision in the case of the Franconia (L.R., 3 P.D., 164), which was a judgment of the Court of Appeal with respect to the deduction of crew space in the case of a German ship and defended upon the construction of the analogous sections in the earlier Merchant Shipping Acts, those of 1854 and 1867. The reasoning in the case of the Franconia applied equally to the present case, and was binding upon him. The foreign register could not be accepted as conclusive. The importance of the case was very great because it affected not only the tonnage on which foreign shipowners would have to assess payments in limitation of liability actions, but also might very possibly affect the tonnage on which harbour dues, &c., would have to be paid. It seemed, at any rate, that it was impossible for foreign ships to deduct crew space for the purpose of limitation of liability. No such certificate as was required by Schedule VI. had been in fact obtained by the plaintiffs, who would only be entitled to limit their liability on payment into Court of £8 per ton on their gross tonnage without any deductions.

—Cargo in frozen condition—Decrease of amount that could be stowed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 465) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Rigby, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting), dated July 5, 1899, reversing the judgment of Mr. Justice Bruce, dated August 5, 1898. The case is reported 15 The Times L.R., 465; L.R. [1899] 2 Q.B., 364; 86 L.J., Q.B., 930. The action was brought to recover £337 14s. 8d. dead freight on 450 tons cargo short shipped, or alternatively a like amount as damages for breach of charter in not loading proper or usual wet woodpulp; in consequence of which, it was alleged, the said pulp loaded so badly as to prevent the steamship Isis from being loaded so as to carry within 450 tons of her proper cargo. By a charter-party, dated December 22, 1897, the appellants, who are the owners of the steamship Isis, chartered her to the respondents to load at Bangor, Maine, U.S.A., a full and complete cargo of wet woodpulp, containing about 80 per cent. of water. Ice prevented the steamship from reaching Bangor, and she was loaded at Bucksport, having proceeded there in accordance with a clause in the charter-party which provided that if ice should prevent the steamer from reaching Bangor charterers were to load the steamer at Bucksport. There are two kinds of wet woodpulp—viz., one in the production of which the wood is subject only to mechanical action, and another kind which is produced by chemical action. The respondents offered a cargo consisting in part of wet wood mechanical pulp and in part of wet wood chemical pulp. All the wet woodpulp offered by the respondents contained the proper percentage of water, and no cause of complaint could or would have arisen if the woodpulp had not been partly frozen as hereinafter stated. The steamship arrived at Bucksport on January 6, 1898, and during the time of loading a severe frost prevailed, as was usual there at that season. The quantity shipped was about 2,496 tons, and the appellants' case was that if the wet woodpulp had not been frozen the steamer could have loaded an additional 448 tons. It was admitted that no more than the quantity shipped could be stowed of wet woodpulp in a frozen condition. Mr. Justice Bruce delivered judgment in favour of the appellants. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams, while agreeing that what was tendered for shipment was wet woodpulp, dissented on the ground that the evidence did not in terms prove that wet woodpulp when shipped in a frozen condition was accepted as a full and complete cargo.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., Mr. Gardner Horridge, and Mr. Hyslop Maxwell were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Collingwood Hope for the respondents were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that the substance carried was well known in the trade by a familiar name, and the charter-party provided that a full and complete cargo of it should be loaded. It was to be wet woodpulp containing 50 per cent. of water. That requirement was fulfilled. If the parties had intended to make some stipulations as to the amount of tonnage to be conveyed, it was open to them to do so in the terms of the charter-party. It was obvious that the amount would vary according as the loading was in summer or winter; in summer the article would pack more closely. It was contended for the appellants that the article ought to have been of a class which should make the greatest amount of tonnage. But there was no ground for such a contention. The respondents had fulfilled their obligation. The stipulated article was tendered and the ship was so loaded that she could hold no more, and there was a full and complete cargo, and an entire performance of the obligations of the charter-party. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

CRAIG V. NICHOLS.*

Army—Exemption from tolls—Army Act, 1881, sec. 143.

An officer's private carriage used by him in proceeding to his military duties is not exempted from payment of tolls by sec. 143 of the Army Act, 1881.

This was an appeal by case stated from justices of Plymouth. An information was heard before the justices charging the respondent with unlawfully demanding and receiving from the appellant, an officer in her Majesty's Regular forces, a toll of 4d. for passing along the Embankment-road, a turnpike road, contrary to section 143 of the Army Act, 1881. The question raised by the case was whether an officer of the Regular Army was exempt from the payment of the toll in question in respect of a private carriage in which he was proceeding to a place where his military duty required him to go. Section 143 of the Army Act, 1881, provides, inter alia, as follows:—"All officers and soldiers of her Majesty's Regular forces on duty or on the march, and their horses and baggage . . . and all carriages and horses belonging to her Majesty or employed in her military service, when conveying any such persons as above in this section mentioned, or baggage, or stores, or returning from conveying the same shall be exempt from the payment of any duties or tolls . . . in passing along or over any turnpike, or other road or bridge, otherwise demandable by virtue of any Act of Parliament. . . ." It appears from the case that the appellant was a major in the Royal Artillery stationed at Fort Bovisand, about six miles from Plymouth. He resided at Spencer-terrace, in Plymouth, and his duties frequently necessitated his attendance at the headquarters office, Mount Wise, Devonport. On July 10, 1899, he proceeded in his own private carriage from his residence in uniform to the headquarters at Devonport, where he transacted official business. He left the headquarters office in the same carriage, accompanied by his soldier servant. The servant was not in uniform. He drove through the Modbury-road toll-gate in the Embankment-road to Fort Bovisand, a distance of nine miles, in order to discharge official duty. The toll collector demanded and received the toll of 4d. authorized by a local Act of Parliament in respect of the carriage, notwithstanding that the appellant informed him that he was on duty. The carriage was the private property of the appellant, for which he took out an Excise licence, and was used by him partly for his own private purposes and partly for carrying out his military duties. The appellant was in receipt of allowances from the Government for a horse in connexion with his duties as a major in her Majesty's Army, but he was not in receipt of nor entitled to any allowance in respect of a private carriage, nor would he have been at liberty to hire a private carriage at the cost of the Government to convey him from Plymouth to Fort Bovisand for the purpose of discharging his duty at the Fort. The justices were of opinion that the carriage was not "employed in her Majesty's military service," not having been requisitioned for military service under the Mutiny Act, or otherwise appropriated for her Majesty's military service, so as to come within the exemption in section 143 of the Army Act, and dismissed the information. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the exemption applied to every carriage which was used in military service, and that the carriage in question was so being used at the time when the toll was exacted.

Mr. Yarborough Anderson appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. Frank Bodilly for the respondent.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the case was clear. The question was whether the carriage was being "employed in her Majesty's military service" within the meaning of section 143. The words quoted could not be read in the wide sense suggested by the appellant's counsel as including any carriage being used in military service. In view of the other words of the section and taking into consideration the fact that allowances were made to officers for horses and carriages used by them in military service, he was of opinion that the words meant carriages employed in military service by the authority of those who were in command. The words were put in the way they were put in the section because they were intended to refer to three classes of carriages—namely (1) those which were employed in military service as part of the military equipment; (2) those which were requisitioned under the Mutiny Act; and (3) those in respect of which allowances were made to the officers to whom they belonged. The words did not include a carriage which was only used by an officer on duty because it was his pleasure to so use it. The carriage in question was therefore not within the exemption provided for in the section.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM concurred.

IN RE MARLEY.*

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Discretion of the Court —Bankruptcy Act, 1890, sec. 8, subs. 2.

On an application for discharge it is not usual to refuse the discharge until the debtor has paid 10s. in the pound, unless there is a reasonable prospect of there being some available funds or property.

This was an appeal by the bankrupt from an order of the Judge of the County Court of Croydon refusing his discharge until he had paid 10s. in the pound to his creditors. The bankrupt practically had no assets, and he had no means and no prospect of obtaining any property, and did not propose to engage in any business. His wife had considerable means. His bankruptcy had been brought about by his having backed bills for other persons as a surety. He had not received any part of the consideration paid for the bills. The learned County Court Judge had made the order in the exercise of his discretion under section 8, subsection 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which provides that on the hearing of an application for an order of discharge the Court shall, on proof (inter alia) that the bankrupt's assets are not of a value equal to

10s. in the pound on the amount of his unsecured liabilities, either refuse the discharge or suspend the discharge for a period of not less than two years, or suspend the discharge until a dividend of not less than 10s. in the pound has been paid to the creditors. The County Court Judge expressed the opinion that it was the duty of the bankrupt to work and earn the means for paying his creditors.

MR. COLAM, who appeared for the bankrupt, contended that the County Court Judge had wrongly exercised his discretion. He ought to have suspended the discharge for two years. The case fell within the principle of "In re Bullen" (5 Mor., 243), "In re Shackleton" (6 Mor., 304), and "In re Gould" (7 Mor., 215), which went to show that such an order as that appealed against ought not to be made where there was no reasonable probability of anything being paid to the creditors.

MR. MUIR MACKENZIE, who appeared for the Official Receiver, submitted that the discretion exercised by the Court below should not be interfered with. The cases cited were all decided under section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883; but that section was repealed by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, which gave (section 8) a wider discretion to the Court.

MR. COLAM replied.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT.—I do not like interfering with an order made by the Court below in the exercise of its discretion, but I understand it to be the usual practice not to make an order of this kind unless there is a reasonable prospect that some funds or property will be forthcoming which may be made available for the payment of the debts of the bankrupt. I think the appeal should be allowed, and that the better order to make will be to suspend the discharge for two years.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING.—I agree.

Ship—Collision—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. 11—Construction—Anchor light "in forward part of the vessel."

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bucknill reported in The Times of December 19. The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Ella Sayer to recover damages sustained by them by reason of a collision which occurred about 11 p.m. on August 10 of last year in Quebec Harbour, in the River St. Lawrence, between their vessel and the defendants' steamship Philadelphian. The Ella Sayer, a steamship of 2,549 tons gross register, 313ft. in length, was lying at anchor in about mid-channel. The Ella Sayer was carrying two anchor lights, the one forward being on the fore-shroud of the starboard fore-rigging, just abreast of the foremast, 23ft. 6in. above the hull, and 72ft. from the stem. The Philadelphian, a steamship belonging to the Leyland Line, of Liverpool, of 5,120 tons gross register, was proceeding down the St. Lawrence on a voyage from Montreal to Liverpool with cattle and a general cargo. The Philadelphian was in charge of a duly licensed pilot. The Philadelphian struck the Ella Sayer with her stem, and damaged her. The main question was whether the Ella Sayer was carrying her forward anchor light "in the forward part of the vessel" as required by Article 11 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, 1897. The learned Judge held that the Philadelphia was to blame for going at excessive speed, and for not keeping a good look out. He also held that a light 72ft. from the stem was not "in the forward part of the vessel" within the meaning of Article 11, and that therefore the Ella Sayer had committed a breach of the rules, but that this breach could not possibly have contributed to the collision. He therefore held that the Philadelphia was alone to blame. The defendants, the owners of the Philadelphia, appealed. By Article 11 "a vessel under 150ft. in length, when at anchor, shall carry forward, where it can best be seen, but at a height not exceeding 20ft. above the hull, a white light in a lantern so constructed as to show a clear, uniform, and unbroken light, visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least one mile. A vessel of 150ft. or upwards in length, when at anchor, shall carry in the forward part of the vessel, at a height of not less than 20ft. and not exceeding 40ft. above the hull one such light, and at or near the stern of the vessel, and at such a height that it shall not be less than 15ft. lower than the forward light, another such light."

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C. (Mr. Aspinall, Q.C., and Mr. W. S. Glynn with him), for the defendants, said that the only question on the appeal was whether the learned Judge was right in holding that the Ella Sayer was not to blame as well as the Philadelphia. He contended that the learned Judge was wrong. First, the forward anchor light on the Ella Sayer was not "in the forward part of the vessel" within the meaning of Article 11. Those words did not mean any part of the ship forward of amidships. They meant somewhere near the stem. The object of Article 11 was, in the case of a vessel 150ft. in length or upwards, to show by the position of the lights the length of the vessel so as to enable passing vessels to avoid her. A distance of 72ft. from the stem could not be called "in the forward part of the vessel." In construing Article 11 its object must be borne in mind, and it would render the rule useless to construe it in any other way. Upon the construction of the rule the learned Judge decided in favour of the defendants, but he held that the breach of the rule could not possibly have contributed to the collision. Upon this latter point he contended that the learned Judge was wrong.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—We are against you upon the first point, and therefore you need not go into the second question.

Mr. Laing, Q.C., Mr. Dawson Miller, and Mr. Adair Roche, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, differing, however, from Mr. Justice Bucknill upon the construction of Article 11.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question depended entirely upon the construction of Article 11. They must construe the rule according to the language used. The Ella Sayer had an anchor light in the fore-shroud of the starboard fore-rigging, and a second anchor light at or near the stern. The question was whether the forward light was "in the forward part of the vessel" within the meaning of Article 11. The learned Judge held that it was not, but at the same time he held that the breach of the rule could not possibly have contributed to the collision, because those on the Philadelphia never saw any light at all. In his (the Lord Justice's) opinion the learned Judge was wrong upon the construction of the rule. The language seemed plain. In the first part of the rule relating to vessels under 150ft. in length, the word "forward" seemed to him to be used in contradistinction to "aft." The part of the rule applicable to the present case was that relating to vessels of 150ft. or upwards in length. The forward light on the Ella Sayer was about a quarter of the ship's length from the stem. Was that "in the forward part of the vessel"? The words were not "at or near the stem." In his opinion the light was in the forward part of the vessel. In regard to the after light, it was to be observed that the rule did not say that it must be "in the after part of the vessel," but it more or less fixed the spot by saying, "at or near the stern." Counsel for the appellants contended that the Court ought to read the words "in the forward part of the vessel" as "at or near the stem." What justification was there for introducing such language into the rule? The framers of the rule had drawn a distinction between the forward light and the after light. It was said that the object of the rule was to indicate the length of the vessel by the position of the two lights. If that were so, the framers of the rule had not carried out their intention. The result was the forward light in the present case was, in the terms of the rule, "in the forward part of the vessel." That being so the Ella Sayer had committed no breach of Article 11. It was unnecessary, therefore, to consider the second question upon which the learned Judge decided in favour of the plaintiffs. The appeal must therefore, be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed. It was contended that the Court ought to construe the words of Article 11, "in the forward part of the vessel," as "at or near the stem." In his opinion that could not be done. The words in the rule "at or near the stern" gave a substantially fixed point for the after light, whereas the words "in the forward part of the vessel" did not give any fixed point, but left the matter largely to the discretion of the master.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

THE SACCHARIN CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. QUINCY.*

Patent—Infringement.

The plaintiffs were the owners of three patents which together gave them the sole authority within the United Kingdom to make, use, or vend saccharin; held, that although they could not prove which of the three patents had been infringed, they could prove infringement of one or other of them by the defendant, and were, therefore, entitled to damages.

HIS LORDSHIP gave judgment in this action, tried on the 2nd and 3rd inst., as follows:—The plaintiffs in this action are owners of 12 patents. They allege in their statement of claim that the defendant has infringed and threatens to infringe these several patents, and they seek an injunction and damages. The fact is that the defendant in December, 1897, and January, 1898, purchased 33lb. of saccharin from the Chemical and Drugs Company (Limited), who were then carrying on business at Manchester. This is the only infringement relied upon. The validity of the patents is admitted. The sole issue before me is that of infringement. It appears from the evidence of Dr. Passmore, the only witness called by the plaintiffs, that the 12 patents may be conveniently, for the purposes of this action, treated as only three in number, and that these three relate to separate and distinct modes of producing a chemical compound known as saccharin, and that it is not possible to tell from the examination of any particular parcel under which process it has been produced. These patents are dated in 1885, 1894, and 1895. Saccharin was, in and prior to 1898, manufactured on a commercial scale only on the Continent, and only under one or other of these three processes. No evidence was adduced as to the place where, or as to the process by which, the parcels purchased by the defendant were produced. But the plaintiffs assert that Dr. Passmore's evidence is sufficient, unless answered by the defendant, to establish that it was made in contravention of their rights as patentees, and they ask an injunction and damages accordingly. The defendant, who is probably as ignorant as the plaintiffs are, of the place where, or the process by which, the purchased parcels were produced, called no evidence, and claimed a nonsuit on the ground that the plaintiffs have not shown which patent right was infringed. The peculiarity of the case is this. If the plaintiffs had brought three separate actions in respect of their three patents, I think they must have failed in each action, for there is neither presumption nor proof that any particular patent has been infringed, and it is forcibly argued on the part of the defendant that three bad actions cannot be so combined as to form one good action. Now, as to the injunction, I think the plaintiffs' case fails; an injunction cannot be properly granted except in respect of a patent which the defendant has infringed or threatened to infringe, and only during the continuance of that patent. I am satisfied that the saccharin was not made under all three processes. It was made under one of the three, though I cannot tell under which of the three. It may have been under the 1885 patent, which has now expired, and in respect of that patent no injunction could now be granted. The plaintiffs, therefore, have not established that which is necessary to entitle them to an injunction. As to the damages, there is more difficulty. Treating the pleadings as amended in order to raise the real question, the plaintiffs allege that they were in 1897 and 1898 the owners of three patents which, together, gave them the sole authority within the United Kingdom to make, use, or vend saccharin, that the damages recoverable for infringement must be identical in amount whichever of the three patents was infringed by the defendant, and that, although they cannot prove which of the three patents has been infringed, they can recover damages for infringement of one or other of the three patents, as they have proved that the defendant has infringed one or other of them. Now, in the ordinary case of a claim for alternative relief, the plaintiff has to prove at the trial under which of the alternatives pleaded he is entitled to succeed. The present plaintiffs cannot bring themselves within this principle. But I am not satisfied that under the modern practice it is always essential to establish the particular alternative, provided only that the rights of the plaintiffs and the obligations of the defendant are identical under each of the alternatives, and that the alternatives exhaust every possible contingency and are mutually exclusive. Suppose all the coal in the parish of X lying to the east of a certain fault is demised in 1890 by A to B, and by a subsequent lease in 1891 all the coal in the parish lying to the west of the fault is demised by A to B, and suppose that the rents and royalties reserved by the two leases are identical. The precise position of the fault may be unknown to both A and B, or, indeed, to any living person. B works coal within the parish in 1892. He ought not, it seems to me, to be able to refuse to pay any royalty unless A can show whether the coal has been got from the east or from the west of the fault, or whether his right depends upon the lease of 1890 or upon the lease of 1891. The coal must have been got from one side or the other of the fault, and the amount payable for royalty will be the same in either case. Common sense requires that A should be entitled to sue alternatively either under the first lease or under the second lease. In the case supposed the two alternatives exhaust every possible event, and, that being so, I think A ought to recover. The present case, though not turning upon contract, ought, I think, to be dealt with upon the same footing. I find as a fact that the plaintiffs' three patents covered every possible mode of producing saccharin. One of the three patents must have been infringed. The right to damages is precisely the same, the measure of damages is precisely the same, whichever of the three patents was in fact infringed. The nature and extent of the wrong done by the defendant does not depend upon the particular patent infringed. Justice requires that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the plaintiffs, who have certainly had a right infringed by the defendant, should not be without a remedy. I shall therefore direct an inquiry, without mentioning any particular patent, whether any and what damages have been sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the use by the defendant of 33lb. of saccharin purchased by the defendant in December, 1897, and January, 1898, or any other saccharin purchased by the defendant before June 1, 1899. I shall reserve the costs of the inquiry, and I shall expect the plaintiffs before proceeding with the inquiry to make a definite demand of a particular sum. I regret that evidence was not adduced at the trial as to the amount of damages. With reference to the costs of the action, the plaintiffs have partly failed and partly succeeded. I do not regard with sympathy or favour actions of this nature brought against a purchaser. I give no costs to the plaintiffs up to and including judgment. The subsequent costs will be reserved.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. J. Graham, and Mr. Colefax were for the plaintiff corporation; Mr. A. J. Walter and Mr. Bucknill for the defendant.

There were three other similar actions for trial, which counsel agreed could not be distinguished; similar orders were therefore taken in each action.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE JEWISH COLONIZATION ASSOCIATION AND ANOTHER.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Foreign domicile—Property situate abroad—Succession Duty Act, 1853, secs. 2 and 16—Finance Act, 1894, sec. 2, subs. 2.

Judgment in this case, which was reserved on May 9 last, was delivered. The arguments were heard on May 8 and 9, and reports of the case appeared in The Times of May 9 and 11.

The following counsel appeared in the case:—For the Crown, Sir Richard Webster, Q.C., Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C., and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins; and for the defendants, Sir R. Reid, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Dicey, Q.C., Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Schuster.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in a written judgment, said:—This was an information claiming estate and succession duty on the death of Baron de Hirsch de Gereuth upon property in respect of which he had made a disposition in favour of the Jewish Colonization Association. The

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Jewish Colonization Association was on September 10, 1891, formed into a company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, by a certificate of the Board of Trade. On its being proved that no portion of the income was intended to be used as profit to its members it was registered under section 23 of the Companies Act, 1867, without the addition of the word "limited." Its objects were, stated generally, to assist the emigration of Jews from any parts of Europe or Asia to other parts of the world, and to form colonies for their reception. The office was to be, and was, in London. By article 25 of the articles of association its affairs were to be under the general control of a council of administration, consisting of not more than six nor less than three persons—none of whom were required to be members of the company—who were required to be elected by the company in general meeting, and to hold office for five years. By the memorandum of association it was stated that the objects for which the company was established were, amongst others (a) to assist to promote the emigration of Jews from any part of Europe or Asia and principally from countries in which they might be subjected to any special taxes or political disabilities, and to form colonies in other parts of the world; (c) to accept gifts of money or property on the terms of the same being applied to the purposes of the company; (n) to invest the moneys of the company not immediately required for the operations of the company in the public stocks of the English, French, Belgian, Dutch, and German Governments or of the United States of America; (s) to do all such other lawful things as were incidental or conducive to the attainment of these objects; provided that the company should observe the provisions of the 21st section of the Companies Act of 1862 where applicable, and that, in case the company should accept any gift on such special trusts as to be subject to the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, the company should if required by the Charity Commissioners vest the same in the special trustees thereof. The nominal capital of the company was to be £2,000,000, in 20,000 shares of £100 each, of which 19,992 were allotted to Baron de Hirsch. The seventh clause of the memorandum of association provided that if, in the event of a winding up or dissolution of the company, there remained any property it should not be distributed among the members of the company but be transferred to some institution with objects similar to those of the company, and that if such institution should not be selected by the members at or before the time of the winding up or dissolution it should be selected by the Judge of the High Court of Justice having jurisdiction in that behalf. By article 18 of the articles of association the first general meeting was to be held within four months after the incorporation, and subsequent general meetings were to be held once at least in every year in London or such other place as the council might from time to time determine, and the council might at any time convene an extraordinary general meeting. The first general meeting was held on October 14, 1891, at the offices of the company at 17, Old Broad-street, London, and at this meeting Baron de Hirsch was elected chairman of the council, and resolutions were passed approving two sets of rules defining the duties and powers of the council. It is not necessary to set out all these rules. By the first of them the directors were to be subject to the control of the council, and to exercise all such powers of the company as were not expressly reserved to the company in general meeting. The meetings continued to be held at the registered office in London, but the business there transacted was, until after the death of Baron de Hirsch on April 21, 1896, of a formal character.

The council held their meetings in Paris, and at these meetings they, by virtue of the articles of association and of the rules, conducted its affairs. On July 22, 1892, at a meeting of the council Baron de Hirsch proposed to hand over to the association various securities on condition that he was allowed by them during his life to have the income resulting therefrom and from any which might be substituted for them, and the council resolved to accept the gift and to affix the seal of the association thereto. On August 26, 1892, in pursuance of this resolution an indenture was entered into and executed by Baron de Hirsch and by the association the terms of which, so far as they need now be mentioned, are as follows:—The deed was expressed to be made between Maurice, Baron de Hirsch de Gereuth, described as of 82, Piccadilly, in the county of Middlesex (thereinafter referred to as the "donor"), of the one part, and the defendant corporation, the Jewish Colonization Association, described as having its registered office at 17, Old Broad-street, in the City of London (thereinafter referred to as "the association"), of the other part, and recited that the donor had agreed to give to the association and the association had agreed to accept the stocks, shares, and securities mentioned in the schedule on the terms and conditions thereinafter expressed. It was witnessed that in pursuance of the said agreement the association covenanted with the donor inter alia as follows:—(1) That the association would during Baron de Hirsch's life deal with the investments of the property as the baron should from time to time direct; (2) that the association would pay the income of the investments to the baron; and (3) that the association would, after the death of the baron, apply the property for the promotion of the emigration of Russian Jews from Europe to agricultural colonies in America and to other similar purposes. At about the same time all the stocks, shares, and securities mentioned in the schedule (which were at the time held partly by the London and Westminster Bank and partly by other banks situated abroad) were duly transferred by direction of Baron de Hirsch in pursuance of the indenture to the account of the association with the several banks, and were thenceforward held by the association upon the trusts and for the purposes declared by the indenture, and pursuant thereto from that time onwards the council paid the income accruing thereon to Baron de Hirsch during his life. All the securities were transferable by delivery. Baron de Hirsch de Gereuth died sine prole on April 21, 1896, domiciled in Austria; and it is now contended by the Crown that succession duty and estate duty are payable on the value of those securities or of the investments now representing the same, on the ground that the succession had descended by English law and that by that law the trust must be administered. On the other hand, Sir Robert Reid, while admitting that estate duty is payable on such of the securities as were situate in England at the time of Baron de Hirsch's death (that is to say, on such of them as were at the London and Westminster Bank), contended that no succession duty was payable on any of the securities, and no estate duty on those which were situated abroad. As by section 2, subsection 2, of the Finance Act, 1894, "property passing on the death of the deceased when situate out of the United Kingdom shall be included only if, under the law in force before the passing of this Act, legacy or succession duty is payable in respect thereof, or would be so payable but for the relationship of the person to whom it passes," the single question in the case is whether in these circumstances, where the domicile of the predecessor is foreign and the property is situate abroad, duty is payable under the 2nd and 16th section of the Succession

Duty Act, 1853. Section 2 enacts as follows:— "Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after an interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person, in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred or to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a succession: and the term 'successor' shall denote the person so entitled; and the term predecessor shall denote settlor, disposer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the succession is or shall be derived." His Lordship referred to and discussed the following cases:—"Lovelace's Settlement" (4 De G. and J., 340), the effect of the decision in which he said was that the Succession Duty Act applied to a succession under a British settlement to British property vested in British trustees and falling under the jurisdiction of a British Court, though the predecessor and successor were both domiciled abroad; to "In re Wallop's Trusts" (1 De G., J., and S., 656), "Wallace v. the Attorney-General" (L.R., 1 Ch., 1), "The Attorney-General v. Campbell" (L.R., 5 H.L., 524), "In re Badact's Trusts" (L.R., 10 Eq., 288), "Lyall v. Lyall" (L.R., 15 Eq., 1), and proceeded:—It follows from the decision in "The Attorney-General v. Campbell" that if, in order to administer the property or to carry out the trusts upon which it has been disposed resort must be had to English law, succession duty is payable although the domicile of the testator be foreign; and it follows also from that and the previous decisions that if the disposition of the property be made by a testator acting under a power given him by an instrument which must be construed and carried into effect by the laws of England then also succession duty is payable, although the domicile of both predecessor and successor is a foreign one. But, if the gift or devise be made by a person domiciled abroad, then even though the property be situate in England, unless the intervention of the English law is required in order to carry the gift or devise into effect, succession duty is not payable. Having referred to "In re Cigala's Trusts" (7 Ch.D., 351) and to "The Attorney-General v. Felse" (10 The Times L.R., 337), he proceeded:—Now what is the case in the present instance? Sir Robert Reid's points were—(1) that the property was situate abroad; (2) that it was settled by a foreigner domiciled abroad; (3) that the deed was executed abroad; and (4) that the deed was executed in favour of foreigners. But the argument appears to assume that in order to make succession duty payable the domicile must be English and the property situated in England, or, at all events, that these are circumstances to be chiefly considered, whereas from an examination of the authorities it has been shown that that is not so. With regard to the third point, I think this cannot be material. The deed was an English deed. It purports so to be. Baron de Hirsch and the association are alike described in it as resident in England, and the registered office of the latter is stated to be in London. I therefore think it must be treated as an English document. With regard to the fourth point, this also if true would not be material, according to the Lovelace case, in which both predecessor and successor were domiciled abroad. But it seems incorrect to say that the beneficiaries of this trust, meaning by that phrase the Russian Jews, were the successors on whom the tax is to fall, if it is to fall. They are not, and no one on their behalf is in the position of a cestui que trust or can call on the council or the company to carry out the trust in a particular manner in favour of any applicant or of any body of applicants. Then is the council the successor, so that it may be argued that the domicile of the members of it is a foreign one? Their whole authority to act in this matter is derived from the company, the owner of the property. It is the company that has become beneficially entitled on the death of Baron de Hirsch. Until that event the income had to be paid to him through the persons authorized by the company to do so. After that event the income is dealt with by the same persons on the same authority, but freed from the life interest. But it was argued that the domicile of the company is French, because the meetings of the councillors have been held in Paris. But, according to that view, the domicile could be changed by a mere resolution to hold the meetings elsewhere; and that does not seem reasonable. "The Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson" (1 Exch. D., 428) was quoted on this point. . . . So far as that decision goes it is not against the view that this company was domiciled in England. It was further put, however, and with much astuteness, that it would not be by the British Courts, nor under their jurisdiction, that this property would be administered. It is true that it would not be governed by the rules of our municipal law in all matters. Thus, by the Austrian law (as was stated to us) an Austrian father cannot divest himself of property so as to impair the rights of his children to legitim; and any alienation at any time having that effect may on the death of the father be set aside to the extent to which it has that effect. The Austrian law was the law of the domicile of the deceased, and it could have been applied in this case if there had been any children. Again, if there had arisen any question upon which the French Government found that the association were working against their recognized policy, or interfering with colonies in a way not in their opinion desirable, there can hardly be any doubt that they could have enforced upon them the law of France. So could the Government of any country in which the association were working; and, further than that, if a proceeding were brought in England to determine such a point it can hardly be supposed that, assuming the jurisdiction, it would not have been exercised in favour of and by reference to the laws of the country concerned. But although it is true that these and other instances may be given where the foreign law would by any tribunal be allowed to apply to the administration of this trust, is it not true also to say that, in order fully to administer the property and to determine all questions relating to it, recourse must be had to the English tribunal? By it foreign law may have to be applied—some instances have been given where it probably would be so—but the property is owned here by a company registered under the Companies Acts. Suppose a winding up or dissolution; under what Court but the English Court having that jurisdiction could it be conducted? The 7th clause of the memorandum admits that. But the English law governs this company also in many other ways, such as its very name, the possible acquisition of land or of gifts on trust, and the share capital. And although the income be administered abroad and the property is foreign, in the sense of being situated abroad, it is here that it is owned. The property may be transferred from our country to another, and the council may sit in Austria or some other country, but here until the title be altered remains the ownership. Probably, as was stated at the Bar, it was in order to gain the security given by our law that the company was constituted in England and made owner of the property. For these reasons I think that the Crown is entitled to judgment.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING read a considered judgment, arriving at the same conclusion.

Judgment was given accordingly for the Crown, with costs.

MR. DANCKWERTS applied for a stay of execution pending an appeal, but, on the suggestion of the Attorney-General, the application was adjourned. Mr. Danckwerts stated that the amount of the duty would be upwards of a million and a quarter sterling.

THOMAS V. VAN OS.*

Metropolis—Unsound food—Public Health (London) Act, 1891, sec. 47—Functions of medical officer and police magistrate.

This was an appeal by way of a special case from the decision of the magistrate sitting at the Thames Police-court, the question raised being whether, before a magistrate acting under section 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, condemns an article as being unsound, or unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, it is necessary that the magistrate should have before him evidence that the goods were intended for the food of man. In July of last year an application was made to the magistrate to condemn 117 tubs of strawberries. The magistrate refused the application on the ground that there was no evidence before him that the strawberries were intended for the food of man. A rule nisi was then obtained directing him to state a case, and this rule was made absolute on January 11, 1900. From the case as stated the following facts appeared:—The appellant was the medical officer of health for the district of Limehouse. On July 17, 1899, he saw a van in Devonport-street, Ratcliffe, containing the fruit, which upon examination he found to be unsound and unwholesome and unfit for the food of man. The strawberries were sent to the defendant from Holland under contract with one Van Namsen, and on arrival in London the defendant had ordered a carman to convey them to Messrs. John Moir, Limited, of Brook-street, Ratcliffe, who on seeing them refused to take them. The defendant admitted that the strawberries were unfit for the food of man. The medical officer, acting under section 47 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, caused them to be brought before the magistrate, who refused to condemn them on the ground that there was no evidence that the fruit was intended for the food of man or sold or exposed for sale or deposited for the purpose of sale at the time of the seizure. He held that when Messrs. John Moir refused to take the fruit any intention of applying them for the purposes of food or sale was exhausted. In the absence of such evidence he held that he had no jurisdiction to make any order of condemnation.

MR. R. D. MUIR, for the appellant, contended that there was ample evidence that the strawberries were intended for the food of man, being deposited in a van for purposes of sale; that the defendant was unaware that Messrs. John Moir had refused them, and that the intention to sell continued after such refusal. He further argued that the question whether the goods were exposed for sale was not one for the magistrate but for the medical officer. He cited "White v. Redfern" (5 Q.B.D., 15), "Vintner v. Hind" (10 Q.B.D., 63), "In re Bater and Birkenhead Corporation" ([1893] 2 Q.B., 77).

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY, in giving judgment, said that section 47 of the Act defined the powers of the medical officer of health. He might enter upon the premises of the defendant and inspect and examine any article intended for the food of man. It was obvious that as a preliminary to putting his powers in force the medical officer must make up his mind whether the articles examined came within the description in section 47—that is, whether they were intended for the food of man or exposed for sale. Having made up his mind on that question his duty was to examine the articles. If he found them unsound or unwholesome or unfit for the food of man, then, and not till then, the functions of the magistrate came into operation. The magistrate must then decide whether the articles were in fact unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man, and, having decided that, his further duties were merely ministerial. The question whether the articles were intended for the food of man was, at this stage of the proceedings, immaterial, and did not become material until subsection (2) of section 47 came into operation and the person exposing the goods for sale was charged on summons for an offence under the Act. The case of "White v. Redfern" (5 Q.B.D., 15) was properly decided and covered this case in principle.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM concurring, the case was remitted to the magistrate with an intimation that the strawberries ought to have been condemned.

SYNGE V. SYNGE.*

Divorce—Desertion, what amounts to—Reasonable excuse—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, sec. 27.

The refusal of a wife without cause to grant her husband conjugal rights constitutes a "reasonable excuse" within the meaning of sec. 27 of the Divorce Act, 1857, for his refusing to live with her.

This was a wife's suit for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's desertion and adultery. The issue as to adultery was tried before the President and a common jury and resulted in favour of the petitioner, who is known on the stage as Miss Granville. The question of desertion was by consent argued before the Court itself, and judgment was reserved. The case has been fully reported in The Times on April 27 and 28, May 2, 4, 5, 10, and 11.

MR. DEANE, Q.C., and MR. LE BAS were for the petitioner; MR. GRAZEBROOK for the respondent Major Syngé.

THE PRESIDENT, in delivering a considered judgment, said that the only question he had now to consider was whether the respondent had deserted the petitioner without reasonable excuse. The learned Judge then gave an outline of the facts in the case—pointed out that according to the petitioner's view the desertion had commenced on December 4, 1896, at which date the respondent wrote from Sandwich, "I may add that I have now virtually settled here." On full consideration of the facts of the case he had come to the conclusion that the separation between the parties which constituted a desertion by one or other of them occurred in fact at a much earlier period. In order to explain this view it was necessary to consider the relations of the parties at several periods after their return from India in 1888. In 1889 they lived as husband and wife—no doubt in great affection. The respondent remained in India in 1890, and towards the end of the year wished his wife to rejoin him there, and then occurred circumstances which were of vital importance in the case. At first the lady was willing—nay, anxious—to go. At that very time she found or made an opportunity of trying her powers as an actress on the stage, and she afterwards secured an engagement and gave up the idea of going to India. This step she took without in any way consulting her husband. As soon as the respondent heard what had occurred he returned to England, and although he did not at first ascertain where she was living he soon discovered her whereabouts. On February 4, 1891, the wife wrote to her husband suggesting that they should live together “nominally,” and the full meaning of this word was made clear in a letter of February 12 in which the lady makes it a condition that “we shall only live together nominally as man and wife.” The respondent declined to sign the proposed conditions but he accepted them in this sense, that from February to July he lived in the same house as his wife, but occupying a separate bed-room. In his evidence the respondent stated that he accepted the inevitable unwillingly, as his wife’s insistence left him no alternative. In August, 1892, the respondent wrote a very important letter to his wife expressing his intention of not living the same sort of life as was imposed on him when he was last at home, and in reply the petitioner wrote offering to be the best of friends and companions so long as he did not insist on what was distasteful to her. After this date the parties never lived together again, and the husband resumed his military duties, while the wife remained in London pursuing the avocations of the stage. In March, 1893, the respondent wrote to his wife, asking her whether she was still of the same mind, and in her reply the petitioner asked him what he had to offer her for the independence she had earned. In 1894 the husband was anxious that his wife should go back to India with him, but the lady replied that they had better remain “friends at a distance.” In 1896 he again wrote asking her whether she had made up her mind about what he had asked her, and she replied, “Leave well alone.” Consideration of the facts and letters in their sequence showed conclusively that it was impossible to say that any desertion took place in the sense of commencing at the end of 1896. The period of the commencement of the separation was clearly defined as having taken place at the time of the husband’s return from West Africa in August, 1892. From that time the separation so long begun continued, even after the husband was willing to cohabit if and only if marital rights were allowed to him, and the wife was willing to cohabit if and only if such marital rights were not insisted on. It was argued on behalf of the petitioner that the husband was an officer in the Army having military duties out of London and the wife an actress compelled to live in town, and that for this reason they were unable to live together. He (the learned Judge) did not, however, accept that view, for in his opinion the only obstacle in the way of cohabitation after August, 1892, was the wife’s refusal to allow the exercise of marital rights. It was therefore necessary to consider at this point a question which went to the root of the case—namely, whether the refusal of a wife, without cause, to live maritalement with her husband gives the husband a reasonable excuse within the meaning of section 27 of the Divorce Act of 1857 for refusing to live with his wife. Mr. Deane had based his arguments on the undoubted principles of the old Ecclesiastical Courts, which had laid down that “the duty of matrimonial intercourse cannot be compelled by the Court, the ‘matrimonial cohabitation may,’” “Forster v. Forster” (1 Hagg. Cons., 144, 154). A refusal to cohabit had never been regarded as a matrimonial offence, but it was clear also that a “reasonable excuse” within the meaning of section 27 of the Act of 1857 need not be a matrimonial offence either. It was so held in “Russell v. Russell” ([1895] P., 315) that “desertion without cause” in section 16 of the Act of 1857 did not limit the cause to the commission of a matrimonial offence. It was clear that “desertion without reasonable excuse” in section 27 is no more limited than desertion without cause in section 16. This at any rate was the view of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in “Oldroyd v. Oldroyd” ([1896] P., 175, 182) when he said that “cause,” “reasonable cause,” and “reasonable excuse” all mean the same thing. Did, therefore, the refusal of marital rights by a wife constitute a reasonable excuse for desertion by a husband? The answer depended on questions of a general character, and there was no reported decision on the point. The learned Judge then referred to some dicta in “Mackenzie v. Mackenzie” ([1895] A.C., 384-389), when Lord Herschell said, “It appears to me that it would be essential for the party suing for a divorce to show that he or she had during that time used every reasonable endeavour to induce the other, and had been ready and willing to discharge on his or her part all marital duties.” Again, in “Rippingall v. Rippingall” (24 W.R., 967) Lord Hennen said, “It was proved that Mrs. Rippingall refused to perform her conjugal duties, but that was no ground for refusing the order asked for. I cannot speculate as to her motives, but it must be presumed that she is now prepared to act in a different way.” It certainly appeared to him (the learned Judge) that Lord Hennen would not have so expressed himself had he thought that a wife while insisting in refusing to perform her conjugal duties, was nevertheless entitled to claim cohabitation from her husband by a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. He need only have said that the performance or non-performance of the conjugal duty was immaterial. In “Ousey v. Ousey” (43 L.J., 35) it was held by Lord Hennen that the desertion by a husband was excusable when a wife was unable or unwilling to consummate the marriage. The only case which had been cited which was at all in point was “Rowe v. Rowe” (4 S. and T., 162). That was a petition for judicial separation on the ground of the husband’s cruelty and adultery, and the husband pleaded that the wife had wilfully withdrawn herself from cohabitation, and refused to render conjugal rights. It was held that this plea was no answer. His Lordship also referred to “Duplany v. Duplany” ([1892] P., 53), and said that in the absence of authority he would not hold that a husband who declined to live with his wife—she having refused him the rights of a husband—had no reasonable grounds for so acting. He could not think any husband was bound to continually expose himself to such mortification and misery as was necessarily involved in the sort of life to which the petitioner invited the respondent in her letter of August 24, 1892. The objects of married life, as expressed in the marriage service, were not the less true because they were the utterances of a more plain-spoken age than the present, and—while human nature remains what it is—a husband has the right to decline to submit to a groundless demand of his wife that he should live with her as a husband only in name. He (the learned Judge) adopted the wise words of his great predecessor, Lord Stowell, who said in “Forster v. Forster,” speaking of a wife’s withdrawal from cohabitation:—“This species of malicious desertion is a ground for divorce in some countries—certainly not so here, and still less will it justify a wife in a resort to unlawful pleasures that lawful ones are withdrawn. It is not to be considered as a matter perfectly light in the behaviour of a complaining husband that he has withdrawn himself without cause and without consent from the discharge of duties that belong to the very institutions of marriage, and if he has done so he ought to feel less surprise if consequences of human infirmity should ensue." The result is that, in my opinion, the respondent either did not desert his wife, but rather that she deserted him, or if he did desert her, then he did so with reasonable excuse within the meaning of the Act of 1857. His Lordship then proceeded to deal with the medical part of the case and said that he was satisfied that the petitioner never communicated to the respondent what she now alleged was the reason of her refusal to cohabit. It was, however, not difficult to form a conjecture as to what the real reasons of the petitioner's conduct were. The respondent had stated in his evidence that his wife had given him various reasons, the first of which was that she feared that her duties on the stage might be interfered with by her having children if she lived with the respondent as her husband. When one considered at what time this objection was first made—namely, in 1890 or 1891, on the eve of her going on the stage—that she had formed a strong determination that nothing should prevent her from testing to the utmost, and with brilliant hopes of success, her powers, and bearing in mind the conditions she imposed in her letter of February 12, 1891, it was obvious that the main ground of her refusal to cohabit arose not from any belief as to his state of health, but from her fear that interference more or less complete might be caused to the career which she had marked out for herself. He was therefore compelled to say that it had not been proved that the petitioner had acted bona fide in refusing to live maritalement with her husband. Mr. Deane had pressed the argument that even if a wife refused to cohabit without good cause, still the husband was bound not to sever himself from her, but to live with her and endeavour by kindness in course of time to obtain from her the fullest proofs of affection. But in this case it must be remembered that the experiment of living together nominally had been tried in 1891 with results satisfactory to neither party, and if a main cause of the wife's refusal was devotion to her art, lapse of time could not be looked to to produce any beneficial effect, indeed, increasing success on the stage would naturally increase the objection to any course which could be supposed likely to impair it. As to the costs the means of the parties were about equal. No doubt the petitioner should pay the costs of the petition which had failed, while the respondent should pay the costs of the issue of adultery. It would, however, practically amount to the same thing to order each party to pay his or her own costs.

Mr. GRAZEBROOK.—Then your Lordship dismisses the petition.

Mr. DEANE.—I submit that my client is entitled to a judicial separation on the authority of "Duplany v. Duplany." Perhaps your Lordship will reserve the question as my client may wish to appeal?

The PRESIDENT.—All I do now is to dismiss the petition for divorce. I will hear the arguments as to granting a judicial separation on Monday next after motions.

Ship—Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions—Her Majesty's battleships—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, sec. 419 (4).

Decision of Gorell Barnes, J. (ante, p. 241), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, sitting in Admiralty. The case is reported ante, p. 241. The plaintiff was the owner of the sailing ship East Lothian, and the defendant was Lieutenant George H. S. Potter, R.N. The action was brought to recover the damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of a collision which occurred about 11 10 p.m. on August 7, 1899, in the entrance to the English Channel, about ten miles S. by E. of the Wolf Rock, between the East Lothian and H.M.S. Sans Pareil. The Sans Pareil at the time was one of the B Division of the Channel Fleet, which was returning up Channel from the naval manœuvres. The fleet consisted of about 30 ships of war, and was proceeding in columns of divisions in line ahead disposed abeam to starboard. The Sans Pareil was leading the second division, with a line of cruisers headed by H.M.S. Europa on her starboard hand, on her port hand being a line of battleships headed by H.M.S. Alexandra, the flagship, and a further line of cruisers was on the port side of the flagship. The defendant was in charge of H.M.S. Sans Pareil at the time, as officer of the watch. The plaintiff's case was that the East Lothian, a full-rigged iron ship of 1,389 tons register, with a crew of 19 hands, was on a voyage from Nantes to Cardiff, in ballast, with two passengers on board, and was in tow of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis. The East Lothian was on a course of N. 9° E. magnetic, and, with some sail set to assist the tug, was making about six knots. The weather was dark, but fine and clear, with a moderate breeze from the S.E., and the tide was low-water slack. The East Lothian was carrying the regulation side lights and a stern light, and the tug was carrying two vertical white lights in front of the foremast, the regulation side lights, and a white light abaft the mainmast for the tow to steer by. The lights were burning brightly. It was admitted that the steering light on the tug was not in accordance with Article 3 of the Regulations, inasmuch as it was visible forward of the beam. In these circumstances the masthead light of the Sans Pareil was observed amongst a number of other lights distant several miles and bearing between 4 and 5 points on the port bow, and as she came nearer her green light became visible, as also the green lights and signalling lights of the other vessels of the fleet. The East Lothian and her tug kept their course and speed, and passed ahead of the line of cruisers, the Europa porting to make room for them. As the Sans Pareil approached she opened her red light, but instead of passing clear astern of the East Lothian she came on showing both her side lights, and with her stem and rain struck the port side of the East Lothian, causing her such damage that she sank in a very few minutes, and with her crew's effects was totally lost. The defendant's case was that the Sans Pareil, with the fleet in the formation described above, was proceeding up Channel at a speed of 10 knots on a course of S. 72° E. magnetic. In these circumstances he saw about two miles distant, and about 4 points on the starboard bow, the masthead, port side light, and steering light of the tug. He made out the steering light, which was showing forward of the beam, to be an auxiliary white light of a steamship exhibited in accordance with Article 2 (c) of the Regulations. As the bearing of the lights did not alter, the helm of the Sans Pareil was ported so as to bring the lights of the tug on her port bow, and then steadied. Immediately afterwards, in order to keep clear of the line of cruisers on the starboard side, and in order not to throw out the line of which she was the leading vessel, her helm was put hard-a-starboard. The defendant then observed on his starboard bow the red light of the East Lothian. As a collision appeared inevitable the engines of the Sans Pareil were put full speed astern, but the collision occurred almost immediately. The defendant charged the plaintiff with improperly attempting to proceed across and through a large fleet of ships of war steaming in company. The defendant admitted that the Sans Pareil was to blame for starboarding at the last moment. The trial of the action took place before Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, sitting with Trinity Masters. The learned Judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Robert Finlay) and Mr. R. B. D. Acland appeared for the defendant; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the plaintiff.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the action was brought by the owner of the East Lothian in respect of a collision between that vessel and her Majesty's battleship Sans Pareil, which at the time of the collision was one of a fleet of 30 ships of war proceeding up the English Channel. The squadron was steering nearly due east, and was formed of four columns, the two outer columns consisting of cruisers, and the two inner columns of battleships. The Sans Pareil was the leading ship of the more southerly line of battleships. The distance between the columns was eight cables. The East Lothian was coming down the Channel in tow of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis. The squadron was going at the rate of ten knots; the tug and tow at six knots. The fleet was first sighted by the East Lothian at the distance of six miles. The vessels forming the columns then had the East Lothian and the Sir W. T. Lewis on their starboard side. The tug kept its way across the bows of the squadron, and cleared the first column, but the Sans Pareil came into collision with the East Lothian with the result that the East Lothian was sunk and unfortunately one man was drowned. The navigating officer on board the Sans Pareil saw the tug, and ported his helm in order to avoid her, but he did not observe that she had a vessel in tow, and having ported sufficiently to pass under the stern of the tug he starboarded in order to regain his position in the squadron, and also to keep clear of the line of cruisers on his starboard side. The learned Judge who tried the case found that the Sans Pareil was alone to blame. The defendant now asked this Court to say that both vessels were to blame. The vessels were crossing vessels, and the Sans Pareil had the East Lothian on her starboard side. But the present case did not come within the general rule laid down in Article 19 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, but it came within the exception laid down in Article 27. Article 19 was as follows:—"When two steam vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." Article 21 said, "Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way of the other, the other shall keep her course and speed. Note.—When, in consequence of thick weather or other causes, such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving-way vessel alone, she also shall take such action as will best aid to avert collision (See Articles 27 and 29)." Article 27 was as follows:—"In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." In the circumstances of this case the tug ought not to have kept her course. She ought not to have crossed under the bows of her Majesty's fleet. [LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH.—Why not? Where do you find the legal right of a squadron to sweep the seas? Could a regiment of cavalry sweep down a high road from hedge to hedge?] The course covered by the fleet here was not more than 2½ miles in breadth. A prudent sailor would not have attempted to do as the tug did here. It was obviously an imprudent thing to do. The master of the tug ought either to have starboarded his helm or have slowed down, and the fleet would have passed him in a few minutes. Her Majesty's ships were not bound by the rules made under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894; it was so provided by section 741 of that Act. There were, however, similar regulations for her Majesty's ships made by Order in Council. But it could not be said that the tug was bound by Article 21 to keep her course here. For she was only bound to do so where "by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way." And her Majesty's ships were certainly not bound by these rules. A notice had been issued by the Board of Trade, which was as follows:—"Notice to shipowners and masters. Single ships approaching squadrons. The Board of Trade desire to call the attention of shipowners and masters to the danger to all concerned which is caused by single vessels approaching a squadron of warships so closely as to involve risk of collision, or attempting to pass ahead of, or through, or to break the line of such squadron. The Board find it necessary to warn mariners that on such occasions it would be in the interests of safety for single ships to adopt timely measures to keep out of the way of and avoid passing through a squadron." He did not suggest that that was binding on mariners, but it was a notice to them of how it was reasonable to act under particular circumstances. He submitted that the accident was caused by the negligent act of the master of the tug.

Mr. R. B. D. ACLAND followed on the same side.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, for the plaintiff, said that at the trial the Attorney-General had admitted that the reason why the defendant starboarded was because he thought the tug was a ship without any tow behind it. The point taken to-day, that the defendant's object was to regain his position and to keep clear of the column to his right, was a new point. Article 21, as a statutory regulation, did not impose any duty on the East Lothian, because it only applied where the other vessel was by the statutory regulations bound to keep out of the way. It could not be said that every breach of common care amounted to a breach of a statutory regulation with its penal consequences. Neither did Article 27 make disregard of the "notice to shipowners" a breach of regulations. Even if the East Lothian was wrong in crossing in front of the fleet, the Sans Pareil was guilty of negligence in running her down.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied.

THE COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that this was an action by the owner of a merchant ship called the East Lothian against the navigating officer of her Majesty's ship Sans Pareil. The plaintiff complained that at 11 o'clock at night on August 7, 1899, the Sans Pareil negligently ran into and rammed the East Lothian at the entrance to the English Channel and sank her. The facts were not in dispute. On the night in question a fleet, or squadron, of her Majesty's ships were steaming up the Channel disposed in four columns. The southernmost column consisted of eight cruisers headed by the Europa. North of that was a line of seven battleships headed by the Sans Pareil. North of that was another line of battleships headed by the Alexandra. And north of that again was another line of cruisers headed by the Melampus. The space of water covered by the squadron was about two miles and a quarter in width, and the length of the squadron was a mile and three-quarters or two miles. The squadron was going at a speed of ten knots. At the same time the East Lothian, in tow of the tug Sir W. T. Lewis, was going at a speed of six knots in a northerly direction on a course which would take her across the course in which the squadron was proceeding. The Sir W. T. Lewis and the East Lothian were both exhibiting proper lights, such lights showing that the Sir W. T. Lewis was a tug with a vessel in tow. The squadron was seen by the East Lothian at a distance of six miles, and it was on the port side of the East Lothian. It was perfectly clear that the ships forming the squadron and the East Lothian were crossing vessels, and the ships of the squadron had the East Lothian on their starboard side. The East Lothian continued on her course and kept up her speed. She crossed in front of the Europa, and continued until she came level with the line of battleships headed by the Sans Pareil. The lines were at a distance of about three-quarters of a mile from one another, and the ships were following one another at distances of about 400 yards. The navigating lieutenant of the Sans Pareil, seeing the tug, ported his helm in order to go astern of her, but he negligently mistook her for a vessel not having any other vessel in tow, and, having ported and got clear of her, he starboarded his helm in order to get back into his proper line, with the result that he ran into the East Lothian. This action was brought, and it was practically an action against the Crown. Mr. Justice Barnes, having heard the case with the assistance of Trinity Masters, gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, and the Crown appealed. The Attorney-General put forward a proposition which in substance amounted to this, that a squadron of her Majesty's ships might, whenever they pleased, proceed along the Channel in four columns disposed as this squadron was, and that it was the duty of all other ships to get out of their way. He could find no rule or regulation, or Act of Parliament, or law, to support that proposition. There were two sets of rules as to navigation. One set of rules was made under section 418 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and those rules bound all merchant ships. Section 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act provided that the Act should not apply to ships belonging to her Majesty, and it followed that the rules made under the Act had no application to her Majesty's ships. But two years after the passing of that Act her Majesty by Order in Council made rules for ships of the Navy. These rules were identical in their terms with the statutory regulations governing merchant ships, but it was important to observe that they were not statutory regulations. Article 21 of the statutory regulations said that "where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed." That referred to the case of crossing ships. But it only applied where the rule applied to both the crossing ships, and therefore it did not apply to the present case; for the Sans Pareil was not bound by the statutory regulations. But it seemed to him that what the article prescribed was a rule of good seamanship. Then Article 27 said that, "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." It was said that, though it was prima facie the duty of the East Lothian to keep on her course in accordance with Article 21, yet, in the special circumstances of the case, she ought to have disregarded that rule and had regard to Article 27. The real point was whether the East Lothian was guilty of an infringement of a statutory regulation so as to be deemed to be in fault in accordance with section 419, subsection 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act. If she had broken a statutory regulation, then she would be deemed to be in fault, and she would be jointly liable with the battleship. But if she was not guilty of a breach of a statutory regulation, but only of negligence, then the right of action against the battleship would be a common law right of action, and the ordinary considerations as to contributory negligence would arise. He did not think that the statutory regulations applied, but, if he was wrong on that point, then he did not think the East Lothian had been guilty of any breach of the regulations, for the regulations themselves contemplated a departure from the regulations, and said that, if the circumstances were such as to justify a departure from them, the master was to follow the rules of good seamanship and do his best to avoid a collision. In his opinion the East Lothian was not in fault under the statute. With regard to the cause of action for negligence, it was admitted in the Court below that the Sans Pareil was to blame, but the defendant contended that the plaintiff's vessel was guilty of contributory negligence. The Court had now put to the assessors the question whether the East Lothian in the circumstances of the case was guilty of negligence in passing across the bows of the battleship. And the answer to that was that the East Lothian had been guilty of improper navigation. He agreed with that. But the question then arose whether those on board the Sans Pareil could by the exercise of ordinary care and skill have avoided the collision. The defendant ought to have seen the tow, but failed to do so. He was guilty of negligence in thinking that everything had passed him, and instead of keeping on his port helm a little longer, as he ought to have done, he starboarded too soon. If he had been hampered by the rest of the fleet, other considerations would have arisen, but there was nothing to hamper him, the Sans Pareil really being in the same position as if she had been sailing alone. It seemed to him to be impossible to say that the Sans Pareil could not by the exercise of ordinary care and skill have avoided the collision. The appeal would therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said that the view which the Court took was that in the circumstances there had been no infringement of any statutory regulation. The question therefore was a mere question of common law or Admiralty law, and, having regard to what was clearly established law, no serious question arose after the admission made by the Attorney-General in the Court below. He did not assent to the proposition that her Majesty's ships when moving in squadrons were governed by the same rules as other ships were. It seemed manifest to him that if her Majesty's ships when formed in a squadron were held to be governed by the ordinary regulations, it would result in extreme danger not only to such ships as they might meet but to the men-of-war in the squadron. He thought that the ordinary rules of navigation would not apply, not because of any special favour or exemption to her Majesty's ships, but because when they were moving in squadrons, as they clearly had a right to do, that constituted a special state of circumstances which would make it bad seamanship to apply the ordinary regulations. The assessors had advised them that the East Lothian had been guilty of improper navigation. In his opinion there were special circumstances here which justified a departure from the regulations. Had there been a breach of Article 27? It seemed to him that where there were circumstances justifying a departure from the rules, it could not be said that the rules were obligatory. But on the facts there seemed to be a good deal to show that the East Lothian and the tug in dealing with these rules refused to depart from them notwithstanding the special circumstances which existed. They persisted in keeping on their course though the circumstances were such as to render a departure from the rules necessary. He was notwithstanding prepared to say that this was an infringement of Article 27. His Lordship then referred to "Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company," 1 App. Cas., 754, and the case of "The Margaret," 19 App. Cas., 873, and came to the conclusion that in the face of the admission made in the Court below, the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes must be affirmed.

WALKER V. BARKER.*

Principal and Agent—Authority to receive payment—Payment by cheque.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from the judgment of the Judge of the Westminster County Court. The question raised was whether a shop assistant has authority to receive payment on behalf of his employer by means of a cheque payable to himself where the cheque is subsequently duly honoured. The plaintiff sued for the price of jewels sold and delivered. The defendant pleaded payment. On several occasions the defendant had purchased jewelry and had paid in cash across the counter to one Miles, who was an assistant at the plaintiff's shop in Regent-street. In December, 1897, the defendant bought a bracelet worth £34. In the following February he came with his cheque-book to pay for this bracelet. Miles asked that the cheque should be made payable to himself, and the defendant made the cheque payable to "L. Miles or order." This cheque was subsequently cashed by Miles, who embezzled the proceeds. The question in the case was whether this constituted payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of £34. It appeared that when paying a subsequent account in 1899 the defendant had signed a cheque payable to the plaintiff. That cheque had been drawn out by Miles and signed by the defendant, who did not observe to whom it was payable. The learned Judge held that when the cheque was cashed it constituted payment, and so far as regarded the £34 he found for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. H. DOBB, for the plaintiff, admitted that Miles had authority to receive payment in cash or by cheque drawn in favour of the plaintiff; but not by cheque payable to any one else. The position of a servant such as Miles was different from that of a commercial agent, the liability of the agent being merely to account, that of the servant to hand on to his master what he receives in specie—"Bridges v. Garrett" (L.R., 5 C.P., 451). If this cheque had been handed on in specie, as it ought to have been, it would have been valueless to the plaintiff until the further events, the endorsement by Miles and the payment of the cheque, followed. He cited also "Pearson v. Scott" (9 Ch.D., 198). The result of holding this to be payment would be that payment by cheque to any one of the numerous assistants in a West-end establishment would be payment to the proprietor.

Mr. Cagney, for the defendant, was not called upon to argue.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY held that the case was covered by "Bridges v. Garrett" (L.R., 5 C.P., 451), the authority of which had not been shaken by "Pearson v. Scott" (9 Ch.D., 198).

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that the question was whether there was any evidence to support the holding of the County Court Judge. In his Lordship's opinion there was. It was clear Miles had authority to accept payment in cash, or by cheque drawn in favour of his master. These facts justified the inference that he had authority to accept payment by cheque drawn to himself provided he received cash for that cheque. In this case Miles did receive cash for the cheque and that was equivalent to payment. It made no difference whether he received the cash from the defendant himself or from the defendant's agent—i.e., his banker.

BELL V. PLUMBLY.*

Stock Exchange—Carrying over—Failure of broker—Privity of contract.

In this case the plaintiff claimed damages for the defendant's failure to accept and pay for 1,000 shares in the Colonial Goldfields (Limited), alleged to have been bought of the plaintiff by the defendant through his broker.

Mr. English Harrison, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. Atkin appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Richard Nevill for the defendant.

The facts were as follows:—Before the middle of October, 1899, the defendant had open on the Stock Exchange 500 Colonial Goldfields shares, which had been purchased for him by Mr. Charles Hemmerde, his broker. These shares had been carried over from time to time. On October 12, Hemmerde bought on the instructions of the defendant 1,000 more shares in the same company for the end of October account; therefore, when that day arrived, the defendant had 1,500 shares to be dealt with, and, as he did not wish to take them up, arrangements had to be made to carry over. It was, however, found to be impossible to carry over the whole 1,500 on the Stock Exchange. The plaintiff, Mrs. Bell, was a lady of means who was in the habit of employing her money, through Hemmerde, in the "taking in" of shares, the arrangement being that various sums were from time to time sent to Hemmerde to be dealt with in this way, 10 per cent. contango being charged, of which 9 per cent. was credited to Mrs. Bell, the remaining 1 per cent. being retained by Hemmerde. Mrs. Bell's business affairs were under the control and direction of her son. In the present case, when the difficulty arose about carrying over the defendant's shares, Hemmerde arranged that 700 of the shares should be carried over on the Stock Exchange and 800 through him with the plaintiff. The actual transfer of the 800 shares was made in the names of Hemmerde and his clerk, that being in accordance with their arrangement with Mrs. Bell, the object being to save her trouble. The shares were carried over at successive accounts, with the exception that 400 only were carried over on the Stock Exchange, the balance being with the plaintiff until the approach of mid-December account, the date of which was December 14. A few days before that date Hemmerde informed the defendant that he would not be able to arrange for the carrying over of more than 500 of the shares, and that he must take up and pay for the remaining 1,000 shares.

*Reported by W. HUSSEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant gave "a name," and an account was sent to him showing that 500 had been carried over and 1,000 closed, there being a balance due from the defendant of £1,256. On December 14 Hemmerde was declared a defaulter on the Stock Exchange. Application was made on behalf of Mrs. Bell to the defendant for payment. Negotiations followed, but without result, and eventually this action was brought. The defence was that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, said the defendant was bound to admit that he was liable to some one, but, it was said, not to the plaintiff. The transactions between the parties appeared somewhat complicated, but they could be illustrated very simply. A contract was made by the defendant through his broker to buy shares. The defendant, being unable to take them up, applied to his broker to get the shares carried over. This could not be done on the Stock Exchange, and the broker then told the defendant that he (the broker) had a client who would find the necessary money. By arrangement between the broker and his client the broker retained 1 per cent. as his commission out of the 10 per cent. contango which was charged for the carry over. It was said that the result of the transaction was that two separate contracts were entered into, one between the defendant and the broker, and the other between the broker and the plaintiff. His Lordship was of opinion that that result did not follow, and that it was never intended that the broker should as regards the defendant occupy the position of principal. It appeared that the plaintiff through her son kept a very vigilant eye on what the broker was doing with her money, and every separate transaction was treated by the broker in his books as one affecting the plaintiff. In this particular case the son was informed by the broker at each stage as to what was being done in the matter of the shares, and the son entirely approved. There was a clear case of a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the plaintiff was therefore entitled to judgment for the amount claimed.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £635 with costs.

TYLER V. KINGHAM AND SON (LIMITED).*

Adulteration—Certificate of public analyst—Evidence—Margarine.

This was an appeal by case stated from the decision of justices of Middlesex, sitting at Brentford, dismissing a summons, issued at the instance of the appellant, an inspector of weights and measures, against the respondents, charging them that, being persons dealing in margarine, they did not conform to one of the regulations referred to in section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887, inasmuch as they did deliver to Isaiah Longstreeth a package containing margarine without having durably marked on the top, bottom, and sides thereof, in printed capital letters not less than three-quarters of an inch square, the word "margarine." It was proved that on September 21, 1899, the appellant purchased from Longstreeth, a retail grocer, an article which was represented to him as being what he asked for—namely, butter. The appellant purchased the article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis. He complied in every respect with section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and Longstreeth accepted one of the three parts into which the article purchased had been divided by the appellant. The appellant on the same day delivered one of the other parts of the article to the public analyst, who on October 3 certified that the same contained 10 per cent. of foreign fat not butter fat. After the analyst had given his certificate the appellant applied for and obtained summonses against Longstreeth, one under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and one under section 6 of the Margarine Act, 1887. The article from which the sample purchased by the appellant was taken was purchased by Longstreeth, with no intention of having it analysed, from the respondents, who delivered it to him with an invoice and in a tub marked "pure butter." The summonses against Longstreeth were heard by justices sitting at Brentford on October 24. The justices found that the article purchased by the appellant was margarine, but that the words branded on the tub together with the invoice from the respondents amounted to a warranty given by the respondents to Longstreeth that the article was butter, and they accordingly dismissed the summonses. On October 26 the appellant applied for and obtained the present summons. On the hearing of the summons the appellant offered in evidence the certificate of the public analyst, but it was objected on the part of the respondents that the same was not admissible as evidence. They did not require the analyst to be called as a witness, but contended (1) that, the summons being in respect of a sale by the respondents to Longstreeth, the appellant was not a competent prosecutor, the right to proceed being limited by section 20 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875, to the person causing an analysis to be made, in support of which contention "Smart and Son v. Watts" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 219) was referred to; and (2) that the certificate of the public analyst was not evidence as against the respondents, as no part of the sample of the article sold to the appellant and subsequently analysed had been offered or delivered to them. The justices, being of opinion that the sample taken and certificate given in Longstreeth's case could not be used in the respondents' case, and there being no other evidence as to the nature of the article in question, dismissed the summons.

Mr. LEWIS RICHARDS, on behalf of the appellant, contended that, Longstreeth not having purchased the article in question with the intention of submitting the same to analysis, section 14 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (incorporated into the Margarine Act, 1887, by section 12 thereof), did not apply, and that under the circumstances the certificate of the analyst was made evidence by section 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. He cited "Buckler v. Wilson" ([1896] 1 Q.B., 83). Section 21 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, so far as it is material, is as follows:—"At the hearing of the information in such proceeding the production of the certificate of the analyst shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, unless the defendant shall require the analyst to be called as a witness. . . ." And section 12 of the Margarine Act, 1887, provides that all proceedings under that Act shall be the same as those prescribed by sections 12 to 28 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

Mr. Bonsey, for the respondents, was not called upon to argue.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the analyst's certificate obtained for the purpose of the previous prosecution was not admissible as evidence in the proceedings against the respondents. In "Buckler v. Wilson" there was evidence to show that the article in question was margarine. The production of the certificate of an analyst was only one way of proving that the article was margarine. There were other ways of doing the same thing. But here the appellant had simply tried to put in as evidence of that fact a document which was not evidence.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM said that he was of the same opinion. The question was whether there was evidence before the justices that the article was margarine. The only evidence of that fact offered to them was a certificate of analysis procured for the purpose of prosecuting Longstreeth, who on some previous occasion was prosecuted for selling a part of the article in question as butter. By the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, such a certificate given under the circumstances provided for in the Act was admissible as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein in the prosecution of Longstreeth, but that did not make it evidence in the prosecution of any one else in the world. When in the prosecution of the respondents the appellant tendered the certificate of analysis as evidence that the article sold by the respondent Longstreeth was margarine the justices upheld the objection of the respondents to the admission of the evidence, and, in his Lordship's opinion, they were right in so rejecting the evidence. The respondents were entitled to require proper evidence of the fact that the article sold was margarine. The production of a document signed by a person who was not present, or who, at any rate, was not put in the witness-box, was not the proper way to prove the fact. The case of "Buckler v. Wilson," cited by the appellant's counsel, did not apply at all. It was true that the prosecution was taken under the same section, but in that case the analysis had been taken for the purposes of the case, and the certificate was admitted without objection. It was true that an objection was taken that certain of the conditions laid down in the Act in regard to the analysis had not been complied with. But that objection having been held to be bad, the respondent in the case admitted the result of the analysis, and did not dispute that the article in question was margarine. Here, however, the respondents required proper and strict proof that the article was margarine.

MR. BONNEY asked their Lordships to say whether they decided anything as to the question whether the appellant was the proper person to prosecute.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM.—We have heard no arguments on that point, and we decide nothing upon it.

EDGAR V. PLOMLEY AND ANOTHER.*

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—Administration action—Priority—Fund carried to a separate account—Mortgage.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of November 17, 1897.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. A. A'Beckett Terrell were counsel for the appellant; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. George Serrell for the respondents.

LORD DAVEY, in delivering (for Lord Hobhouse) their Lordships' judgment, said the question in the suit arose in the administration of the estate of William Shepherd, who died in 1855, and who had devised his real estate to be divided among his wife and children when the youngest child should attain the age of 21. Each child was to take a life interest with remainder to his or her children. The testator left eight children, of whom one was named James. The youngest child attained 21 in 1876. In 1879 James Shepherd was appointed a trustee of the will, and in 1882 he became sole trustee. Mr. Plomley, the respondent, purchased the interest of some of the devisees, and in August, 1885, he instituted a suit against James Shepherd and all the other beneficiaries praying for a sale of the testator's land with a view to distribution of the proceeds, according to the interests of the parties to be ascertained by the Court. A decree for sale was made on December 3, 1885. The suit was numbered 3,840. On March 29, 1888, a decree was made on further consideration by which it was ordered that eight separate accounts should be opened, the fourth of which was headed, "The account of James Shepherd and his children." The purchase moneys of the testator's land were to be paid to the several accounts in certain specified proportions. And as to account No. 4 it was ordered "That all moneys which shall at any time hereafter during the life of the defendant James Shepherd be carried over to the credit of the said account number four (4) in respect of the interest or income arising from unpaid purchase moneys of the said hereditaments, or otherwise received or credited to the said account in respect of interest or income, and all interest and income that may arise from the investments, if any, of the said moneys or any part thereof respectively which may from time to time be authorized by this Court, be paid from time to time as and when the same shall have been carried over or credited as aforesaid to the defendant James Shepherd or his duly authorized attorney or attorneys until further order." As regarded some of the accounts, it was ordered that nothing should be paid out of Court without notice to the persons mentioned, but no such order was made to affect account No. 4. On the 26th September, 1893, the respondent and Anne Jones, who was one of the testator's children, jointly instituted a suit against James Shepherd alone. That suit was numbered 6,542. The plaintiff stated that some of the land was still unsold, and they prayed for an account of rents and profits received by James Shepherd, and so far as necessary for administration of the trusts of the will. On May 11, 1894, a decree was made for the account asked for. In October, 1895, Shepherd assigned to the appellant (Edgar) all his interest in the estate for the purpose of securing £725 and interest. The mortgage deed specified Shepherd's interest under account No. 4 in suit 3,840, to the credit of which there was then standing £5,158 6s. 5d., and it gave to the appellant full powers of application to the Court for procuring payment to himself. The pendency of suit 6,542 was known to the appellant. In March, 1895, the liability of James Shepherd to the other sharers in the estate (under the decree in suit 6,542) was established and he was ordered to pay into Court about £2,500 and costs. Meanwhile in October, 1896, the respondents filed a new claim against Shepherd and the appellant, claiming declarations that the sums due from Shepherd (who had been made a bankrupt) were charges on his interest under the will, and further that they had priority over the appellant's mortgage. The appellant did not claim to enforce his mortgage against any interest of James Shepherd in the testator's estate except the fund standing to the credit of account No. 4 in suit 3,840. That was now the sole question; whether, in the peculiar position in which that fund was placed by the decree of March 29, 1888, priority of charge should be given to the mortgagee of James Shepherd, or to the beneficiaries whose funds he had misapplied. The Chief Judge in Equity gave the respondents a decree in accordance with the prayer of their claim. He relied on the general principle that a defaulting trustee must make good his default before he was entitled to take any part of the trust estate for his own benefit.

*Reported by W. J. SOULSBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

and that his assignee could not stand in any better position. As for the effect of the decree carrying over funds to No. 4 account, he considered that suit 3,840 was a mere partition suit, and that the order was nothing more than a declaration that, so far as that suit was concerned, the fund might be treated as the separate property of the persons named in the heading. No question of administration, he said, was or could have been raised in that suit. There was no res judicata between the parties, or, if any, it was only that James Shepherd was entitled to the income of the fund until further order. The appellant's contention that he was a bona fide purchaser for value was, in the opinion of the learned Chief Judge, displaced by the fact that he had notice of suit 6,542. So far as regarded the liability of James Shepherd and his assignee in bankruptcy that judgment could not be and was not impeached. But as regarded the position of the appellant it raised a question of some subtlety and difficulty. There was not only no indication prior to October, 1895, of a purpose to enforce liability against the fund carried to account No. 4, but the proceedings in the two suits, when put together, were such as to induce a belief that the fund appearing by the separate account to be free was really free by not being attacked in suit 6,542. Their Lordships were disposed to agree with the learned Judge that it might not be quite accurate to apply the term res judicata to an order of that kind; because, though made in a suit in which one of the respondents was the plaintiff and the other a defendant, the particular question which had now arisen was neither decided nor raised. But that was hardly more than a verbal question. The important point was that the order was made in the presence of all parties interested; and its intention was to treat the fund as so far separated from the estate that it could be dealt with by the separate donees without notice to the others. That was a step forward in the administration of an estate, and it saved a great deal of expense and trouble. That fund could not be actually paid out because nobody had acquired an absolute and indefeasible interest in it, for the absolute interests acquired by the children were liable to variation in amount by the birth of more children. But the object of separate accounts was to relieve the subjects of each account from entanglement with the others, and to make the persons specified in each heading the owners of the fund carried to its credit, so far as was consistent with the necessity for retaining those funds in Court. The retention of the fund was not meant to prevent adult owners of interests in it from dealing with those interests. The division into separate accounts was intended to facilitate such dealings. Of course it was true that so long as any fund remained in Court claims against its owners could practically be enforced against it which could not practically be enforced if it were paid out. It was open to the other parties to the suit to show that they had claims enforceable against a separate fund which were not known or not existent when the fund was separated, and by proper proceedings to enforce them notwithstanding the order to separate the fund. But until some step was taken for the purpose the separation was commonly and rightly looked upon as showing that the separated funds were free from claims by the other sharers in the estate. Persons honestly dealing with those whom the Court declared to be owners of such funds were justified in trusting to that declaration, and their Lordships held it to be unjust to subject them to claims by the other sharers arising out of matters subsequent to the separation or latent at the time (vide "In re Eyton," 45 Ch. Div., 458). After referring to other incidents and points raised in the case their Lordships said the result was that the decree could not stand so far as it was adverse to the appellant. The proper order would be to discharge the decree so far as it declared that the charges established by the plaintiffs against James Shepherd had priority over the appellant's mortgage, and so far as it awarded an injunction against the appellant, and so far as it ordered that no part of the interest accruing on account No. 4 should be paid to the appellant, and so far as it directed the appellant to pay costs. Instead thereof the decree should declare that the mortgage of October 24, 1895, was as between the plaintiffs and the appellant a valid security, and the first charge on the interests of James Shepherd thereby assigned; and should order that the income of the funds comprised in account No. 4 should be paid to the appellant until further order, and that the plaintiffs should pay him his costs of suit. That would leave standing all those parts of the decree which related to James Shepherd and to Mary MacGovern, and to the requisition of notice to the plaintiffs before any principal money was paid out, and to the questions reserved for further consideration. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty in accordance with that opinion. The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal.

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Undertakers," who are.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Liverpool County Court Judge under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman, William Percival, who was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. It appeared that a building was being erected on the premises of Messrs. Bowman and Co., chemical manufacturers. The building was over 30ft. in height, and was being constructed by means of a scaffolding. The building was being erected under the supervision of Messrs. Bowman and Co., who supplied the materials for it, and who employed the architect. The appellant, John Garner, at the request of Messrs. Bowman and Co., supplied the labourers for the brickwork of the building. The men so supplied acted under the orders of Messrs. Bowman and Co.'s foreman, and the appellant had nothing to do with the work, nor was he responsible for the way in which the work was done, nor had he any control over the men when at work. The appellant paid the men he supplied for the work, and Messrs. Bowman and Co. remunerated him by a payment—an extra halfpenny an hour upon the men's time. William Percival was one of the labourers supplied for the work by the appellant, and while at work on the building he fell off a scaffolding and was killed. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he was not an "undertaker" within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and was not, therefore, liable to pay compensation. The County Court Judge held that the appellant was the person undertaking the construction of the building, and was therefore an undertaker. He accordingly made an award in favour of the widow. Garner appealed. By section 7, subsection 1, of the Act, "This Act shall apply only . . . to employment by the undertakers as hereinafter defined on, in, or about any building which exceeds 30ft. in height, and is either being constructed or repaired by means of a scaffolding, or being demolished. . . .” By subsection 2, “ ‘Undertakers’ in the case of a building means the persons undertaking the construction, repair, or demolition.”

Mr. A. P. Thomas appeared for the appellant; Mr. M. V. D’Arcy appeared for the respondent.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the person against whom proceedings must be taken to recover compensation was the person undertaking the construction of the building. It was clear that in the present case Messrs. Bowman and Co. were the persons undertaking the construction of the building. They were erecting the building on their own land, they employed their own architect, the building was being erected under their supervision, and the men were, while at work, under the control of their foreman. The appellant merely undertook to supply the labour. That did not make the appellant an “undertaker” within the meaning of the Act. In truth, the proceedings were taken against the wrong person. The decision of the County Court Judge must therefore be reversed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

GENTLE V. FAULKNER.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Covenant not to assign—Assignment for benefit of creditors—Declaration of trust.

Covenant in a lease not to assign held to refer to legal assignments.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Ridley in an action tried before him without a jury on July 5, 1899, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 466. The action was brought by the lessor against the lessee to recover possession of a shop at St. Albans on an alleged forfeiture of a lease for 21 years dated December 25, 1897. The lease contained among others a covenant “not (except by will) to assign or underlet the premises or any part thereof without the consent in writing of the lessor first had been obtained”; and it also contained a proviso for re-entry “if and whenever there shall be any breach or non-observance of any of the covenants,” or “if and whenever the lessee shall become bankrupt or have a receiving order made against him or shall execute an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or any of them.” The defendant on January 6, 1899, executed an assignment for the benefit of his creditors (to use the description thereof therein contained), by which he assigned to William Brook Keen for the benefit of his creditors “all the freehold, copyhold, and other lands, estates, tenements, hereditaments, and premises (save and except such as are of leasehold tenure), and all the stock, &c., of him the assignor,” and further it was stated in the deed, “the assignor hereby declares that he will stand possessed of all leasehold property of which he is now possessed for the said trustee and to assign and dispose of the same in such manner as the trustee shall from time to time direct for the purposes of these presents.” On January 27 the plaintiff’s solicitors sent to Keen by post notice of a claim for forfeiture resting upon the execution of this assignment. On February 1 the writ was issued. The trustee since the assignment had had possession of the shop and managed the business. For the plaintiff it was contended (1) that there was a breach of covenant not to assign the premises; (2) that there was an assignment for the benefit of creditors which disposed of the land leased, so that in either case the landlord would be entitled to enter without giving notice under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, section 14, subsections 1, 6; and (3) that there was in any case an assignment for the benefit of creditors which would entitle the lessor to enter after notice given, and that such notice had been given and served according to the Act. For the defendant it was contended (1) that there was no breach of the covenant not to assign the premises; (2) that there was no assignment which disposed of the land leased within the meaning of section 14, subsection 6, of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, nor any assignment at all, or at the most only such an assignment as would render notice necessary under subsection 1 of the same section, and that the notice was bad and insufficiently served. The learned Judge held that the declaration of trust of the leaseholds contained in the assignment of January 6, 1899, operated, since the Judicature Act, 1873, as an assignment; that there had therefore been a breach of the covenant not to assign, which by subsection 6 of section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, entitled the plaintiff to re-enter without giving any notice; and, the question of the validity of the notice becoming immaterial, he gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Mr. WITT, Q.C., and Mr. KEEN, for the defendant, contended that a covenant not to assign was a covenant not to execute a legal assignment. A declaration of trust was not a legal assignment. An assignment for the benefit of creditors was not necessarily a breach of a covenant not to dispose of the land leased. Notice must, therefore, be served on the lessee before the lessor could re-enter, and, as this had not been done, the defendant was entitled to judgment. They cited “Friary Holroyd, &c., v. Breweries v. Singleton” ([1900] 1 Ch., 86; 2 Ch., 261).

Mr. H. TINDAL ATKINSON and Mr. T. H. CARSON, for the plaintiff, contended that there had been a breach of the covenant against assigning and disposing of the land, and that no notice was necessary to entitle the plaintiff to recover possession (“Ex parte Gould,” 13 Q.B.D., 454). If notice was necessary it was duly served on Mr. Keen, who was in substance the only person interested in the case. They also cited “In re Hughes” ([1893] 1 Q.B., 595); “Ramage v. Womack” ([1900] 1 Q.B., 116).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the covenant not to assign meant a covenant not to make a legal assignment. The defendant in this case had, no doubt, made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors of part of his property, but expressly excepting his leaseholds. This assignment, however, contained a declaration of trust, and it was said that since the Judicature Acts such a disposition operated as an assignment. It was admitted that before those Acts it would not have had this effect, but the contention was that since the Judicature Act, 1873, section 24, subsection 4, requiring the Courts of Common Law to give full effect to equitable estates, a declaration of trust had all the effect of a legal assignment. That enactment did not convert into legal assignments instruments which without its aid had not the force of legal assignments. There was therefore no assignment within the meaning of the covenant. The second point was that the lessee by executing this assignment for the benefit of his creditors had broken a condition against disposing of the land leased, so that the lessor was, by subsection 6 (i) of section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, entitled to re-enter without giving any notice. But an assignment for the benefit of creditors might or might not dispose of the land leased. The plaintiff did not prove enough by merely proving such an assignment. To entitle the lessor to re-enter without notice there must be a covenant which on its face bound the lessee not to dispose of the land leased and a breach of that covenant by a disposal of the land. No such covenant or breach was proved here. Therefore notice was necessary before the lessor could re-enter. By section 14 of the Conveyancing Act that notice must be served on the lessee. The notice in this case was not served upon the lessee, but only upon Mr. Keen. It was said that section 67 of the Act validated the notice notwithstanding. That section provided that a notice should be valid if addressed "generally to the persons interested." That did not exonerate the plaintiff from serving the notice on the lessee. This had not been done, and therefore the notice was insufficiently served. Consequently the plaintiff had no right to possession, and there must be judgment for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER, in concurring, said that a condition against assignments for the benefit of creditors or any of them could not fairly be described as a condition against disposing of the land leased. An assignment for the benefit of creditors might or might not include the land leased. Subsection 6 of section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, dealt with two classes of conditions, the first containing well-known covenants in leases against assigning and under-letting; the second containing conditions directed to the solvency of the lessee. The lease in question contained examples of both classes. The covenant against assigning for the benefit of creditors clearly came within the second class and not within the first, and was inserted with an intention quite different from that to which those of the first class owed their existence. It was to be remembered that in section 14 short general descriptions of the covenants and conditions were used, and a condition against disposing of the land leased was not a fair description of a covenant against assigning for the benefit of creditors. The result was that notice was necessary before the lessor could re-enter, and as notice had not been served on the right persons there must be judgment for the defendant.

BATT V. MATTINSON.*

Adulteration—Procedure—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899.

The provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, apply to prosecutions instituted after the date of its commencement, notwithstanding the fact that the offence took place before that date.

This was an appeal by case stated from the decision of the justices of Wellingborough. An information was preferred by the respondent, Thomas Mattinson, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, against the appellant, Alfred Richard Batt, the manager of the Midland Stores, Wellingborough, charging him that on December 19, 1899, he did unlawfully sell to the prejudice of the respondent, the purchaser, a certain article of food which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded—namely, golden syrup, the same being adulterated with glucose syrup, contrary to section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. The summons was dated January 8, 1900, and was served on January 9, and was returnable on January 19. No copy of the analyst's certificate was served with the summons, and the summons did not state the quantity or proportion of glucose alleged to be contained in the golden syrup. The analyst's certificate was not given until January 2. At the hearing before the justices it was objected on behalf of the appellant that, inasmuch as the information was not laid until January 8, the proceedings should have been regulated in accordance with section 19 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, which came into force on January 1, and which provides that the summons shall state the particulars of the offence alleged, and also the name of the prosecutor, and shall not be returnable less than 14 days from the day on which it was served, and that there must be served with the summons a copy of the analyst's certificate obtained on behalf of the respondent. Section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, provided that the summons in proceedings under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, should contain particulars of the offence charged, and be made returnable not less than seven days from the day on which it was served. On the part of the respondent it was contended that, the offence having been committed on December 19, the date of the purchase, the procedure followed, which was in accordance with the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and of section 10 of the Act of 1879, was correct, the provisions of those Acts remaining in force, by virtue of section 38 (2) of the Interpretation Act, 1889, as regards any offence committed before January 1. The justices overruled the objection, and, having heard the case on the merits, convicted the appellant.

Mr. BONSEY, on behalf of the appellant, contended that, inasmuch as the provisions of section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, were repealed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, the provisions of the later Act applied to prosecutions instituted after the date of its commencement, notwithstanding the offence in respect of which the prosecution was instituted took place before that date, upon the principle that alterations of procedure were retrospective unless it was otherwise provided in the enactment making such alteration.

Mr. MACASKIE, for the respondent, contended that the old form of procedure was the correct form, and relied on section 38 (2) of the Interpretation Act, 1889, which provides as follows:—"Where this Act or any Act passed after the commencement of this Act repeals any other enactment, then, unless the contrary intention appears, the repeal shall not—(c) affect any . . . obligation or liability . . . incurred under any enactment so repealed; or (d) affect any penalty, forfeiture, or punishment incurred in respect of any offence committed against any enactment so repealed; or (e) affect any investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy in respect of any such . . . obligation, liability, penalty, forfeiture, or punishment as aforesaid; and any such investigation, legal proceeding, or remedy may be instituted, continued, or enforced, and any such penalty, forfeiture or punishment may be imposed, as if the repealing Act had not been passed," contending that there was at the time of the commencement of the new Act a subsisting liability under the old Act, the legal proceeding in respect of which would not be affected by the new Act. He contended further that, even if the Act of 1899 applied, all matters in regard to which that Act was not complied with were matters which could be cured by an adjournment. He cited "Neal v. Devenish" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 544), in which it was held, under section 10 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, that the omission of particulars of the offence from the summons did not deprive the justices of jurisdiction, but merely entitled the defendant to an adjournment in the event of the justices being satisfied that he was prejudiced by such omission.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said that the general rule was that enactments altering procedure had a retrospective effect unless a contrary intention appeared from the enactment. There certainly was no such contrary intention expressed in section 19 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899. The respondent relied on section 38 (2) of the Interpretation Act, and especially on headings c, d, and e thereof. But those provisions related only to cases in which the enactment creating the obligation, penalty, &c., had been repealed. The effect of the provision was that a person who had committed an offence prior to the commencement of the repealing Act remained liable notwithstanding the repeal of the enactment creating the offence, the old Act remaining in force to that extent. But in the present case the enactment creating the offence with which the appellant was charged was not repealed. For this reason the justices were wrong in holding that section 38 (2) of the Interpretation Act had the operation contended for, and, accordingly, it was proper that the new procedure should be followed, notwithstanding the fact that the offence was committed prior to the commencement of the Act by which such new procedure was instituted. With reference to the point that all the matters in regard to which the Act of 1899 was not complied with were matters capable of being cured by an adjournment, he thought that the case of "Neal v. Devenish" was distinguishable, because the particulars were part of the summons and could therefore be amended under Jervis's Act. But, turning to the present case, the summons being made returnable less than 14 days from the date of service was not a matter capable of amendment under Jervis's Act. It was a matter that never could be put right. Nor could the omission to serve a copy of the analyst's certificate with the summons be put right. If it was not done at the time of serving the summons it could not be done afterwards. For these reasons he thought that the appeal should be allowed.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE delivered judgment to the same effect.

IN RE FORD.*

Bankruptcy—Trustee's title—Money paid into Court to abide result of an action.

This was an application by the trustee in the bankruptcy claiming a sum of £1,000 paid into Court in these circumstances:—In August last Messrs. Jay sued the bankrupt Ford for £1,116 4s. 6d. and applied for judgment under Order XIV. of the High Court Rules. On September 21 Ford, on certain suggestions of fraud, obtained leave to defend upon an order which ran as follows:—"It is ordered that . . . the plaintiffs be at liberty to sign final judgment for the claim endorsed on the writ, and costs to be taxed, unless the sum of £1,000 be paid into Court within three days." Ford paid the money into Court, and on December 5 put in a defence and counter-claim, which was amended by leave on January 10. No reply was delivered, nor was any notice of trial given. On January 29 Ford filed his own petition, on which a receiving order was made, and adjudication followed. The trustee in the bankruptcy now claimed the £1,000 in Court on the ground that it still remained the money of the bankrupt at the time when the trustee's title accrued, which was the date of the receiving order; and that the plaintiffs at that time were and still remained mere ordinary creditors for whatever debt they might be able to prove in the bankruptcy.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie and Mr. Sinclair appeared for the trustee.

Mr. REED, Q.C., and Mr. MACASKIE, who appeared for Messrs. Jay, contended that in substance the £1,000 was paid into Court to abide the event, and that Messrs. Jay were secured creditors to the extent to which they could establish their claim.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said,—It seems plain on principle and on the authorities that Messrs. Jay are for the present entitled to the benefit of the security which they obtained by the order of September 21 and the payment into Court in compliance with the order. The order must be treated as an order that the right to the money when paid into Court "shall abide the event." See "Bird v. Barstow" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 94), where the order appears to have been in the same form as in this case, and it is settled that when money is paid into Court to abide the event it must be treated as a security that the plaintiff shall not lose the benefit of the decision of the Court in his favour; see "Ex parte Banner" (L.R., 9 Ch., 379), "Ex parte Bouchard" (L.R., 12 Ch.D., 26), "In re Gordon" ([1897] 2 Q.B., 516). The very object of such an order is that the plaintiff shall be in as good a position, so far as the money paid in extends, against contingencies, such as bankruptcy, as if he got immediate judgment. The cases cited show that when the plaintiff has without default on his part failed to get judgment before the bankruptcy "the event" is the decision of his right in the bankruptcy. The money must remain in Court until the event is decided by the trial of the action, if that is to be tried, or by adjudication upon a proof by the plaintiffs in the bankruptcy.

ASHWELL AND NESBIT (LIMITED) AND ANOTHER V.
STANTON.*

Contract—Consideration—Detriment.

In this case Mr. E. Pollock appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Manisty for the defendant.

This was an action for £500 for supplying heating, ventilating, and lighting to certain shops and premises in Duncan-street, Leeds. The defendant counter-claimed in the following circumstances:—The original contract for doing the work contained no date for the completion of it. It was alleged, however, that, in the course of the work, a verbal promise was made that it should be finished by November 4, 1897. On the strength of this, the defendant incurred large expenses in advertising the opening of the premises on that day, and hiring managers and shop assistants. The premises, however, were not lighted by that date and the expenditure thereby wasted formed the subject-matter of the counterclaim.

The question of the counterclaim had been already before a Divisional Court consisting of Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Ridley last year, when it was found that an absolute oral promise to complete by November 4, 1897, had been given, but judgment on the question as to whether there was consideration for the promise was reserved; and the point was now, owing to the prolonged illness of Mr. Justice Wills, re-argued by consent of both sides.

Mr. POLLOCK, for the defendant, on the counterclaim, contended that there was no evidence of any advantage accruing as the result of the promise made. He cited "Alderson v. Maddison" (8 App. Cas., 467); "Dashwood v. Jermyn" (12 Ch.D., 776), and the comments thereon in "Pollock on Contract."

Mr. JUSTICE BUCKNILL cited the definition of consideration contained in "Pollock on Contract," which included a "detriment" suffered by the other side as a form of good consideration.

Mr. Manisty was not called upon.

Mr. JUSTICE DARLING, in giving judgment, said that Mrs. Stanton had, on the faith of the promise made her, incurred expenses which were a detriment to her. The case of "Dashwood v. Jermyn" (supra) showed that, if a person altered his position as the result of a promise made him, there was a contract with good consideration.

Mr. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

Leave to appeal was granted.

THE QUEEN V. WINDER (EX PARTE THE CORPORATION OF BOLTON).*

Licence—Appeal—Costs of Justices on appeal—Taxation—Alehouse Act, 1828, sec. 29—Order for costs quashed.

In this case cause was shown against a rule for a writ of certiorari to quash an order of the Lancashire Quarter Sessions. In August last an application was made to the justices of Bolton for an alehouse licence in respect of premises known as Halliwell Lodge, in substitution for a licence theretofore held in respect of the Rope and Anchor publichouse. The application was refused, whereupon the applicants appealed to the quarter sessions. The appeal was heard at the October sessions and was allowed, and the licence was granted. The quarter sessions also made an order (which is the order now sought to be quashed), under and by virtue of section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, ordering that the costs incurred by the justices in appearing to support their decision before the quarter sessions should be paid by the treasurer of the borough of Bolton out of the borough fund to Mr. Robert Winder, the clerk to the justices, and they adjourned the sessions until November 14 for the clerk of the peace to ascertain the amount of the costs. Before the date named Mr. Winder appeared before the clerk of the peace, who certified the amount of the costs to be £310 16s. 4d., which amount was inserted in the order, and the order, having been drawn up and dated the first day of the sessions, was served upon the treasurer of the borough. No sum was taxed off the bill of costs handed in by Mr. Winder. It comprised several items of "profit" costs, including 40 guineas for preparing the brief. The treasurer of the borough of Bolton refused to pay the sum named in the order, and proceedings had been taken to bring the order up to the High Court in order that it might be enforced. The grounds on which the order was now sought to be quashed were (inter alia) as follows:—(1) That the taxation took place in the absence of the treasurer of the borough of Bolton—that is to say, the party who was ordered to pay the costs; (2) that the order was bad, because no bill of costs was served with it; (3) that it was bad, because it directed payment to be made to the clerk to the justices, and not to the justices themselves; and (4) that no consent was given by the treasurer that the costs should be taxed out of sessions. Section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828, after providing that, in the event of an appeal from the judgment of any justices being dismissed or abandoned, the Court of Quarter Sessions should have power to order the appellant to pay the costs of the justice, provided as follows:—"And in every case in which the judgment so appealed against shall be reversed it, shall be lawful for the Court, if it shall think fit, to adjudge and order that the treasurer of the county or place in and for which such justice whose judgment shall have been reversed shall have acted on the occasion when he shall have given such judgment shall pay to such justice, or to whomsoever he shall appoint, such sum as shall, in the opinion of such Court, be sufficient to indemnify such justice from all costs and charges whatsoever to which such justice may have been so put; and the treasurer is hereby authorized to pay the same, which shall be allowed to him in the accounts."

Mr. AVORY showed cause on behalf of the justices. He contended, in answer to the grounds of objection 1, 2, and 4, that the order was not an order for a taxation of the costs as between party and party, but was similar to an order for the payment of the costs of a prosecution and that the amount of the costs could be therefore estimated by the clerk of the peace in the absence of the treasurer. In connexion with the third ground, he read an affidavit made by Mr. Winder, in which he stated that the justices of Bolton, on October 9, 1899, passed a resolution in which they authorized Mr. Winder to incur the expense of appearing to support their decision at the quarter sessions, and that nine of the justices, being a majority of three of those who were present on October 9, had signed an authority or appointment appointing Mr. Winder to receive the sum of £310 16s. 4d., and he contended that, under the circumstances, the order was a sufficient compliance with the statute, especially as Mr. Winder, being the clerk to the justices, was the person likely to be appointed to receive the money. He cited "Reg. v. Binney" (22 L.J., M.C., 127) and "Reg. v. Justices of Ely" (25 L.J., M.C., 1).

Mr. LAWSON WALTON, Q.C., Mr. C. W. MATHEWS, and Mr. GUY STEPHENSON appeared on behalf of the Corporation of Bolton in support of the rule. They cited "Freeman v. Read" (10 L.J., M.C., 123, and 1 E. and B., 810); "Reg. v. Mortlock" (7 Q.B., 459); and "Reg. v. Long" (1 Q.B., 740).

The COURT made the rule absolute.

Mr. JUSTICE RIDLEY was of opinion that the order was bad, inasmuch as it directed the payment to be made to Mr. Winder and not to the justices or to a person appointed by the justices; and, further, because the costs having been taxed out of sessions without the consent of the person liable to pay them, there was no order of the justices adopting the taxation.

Mr. JUSTICE BIGHAM said the order was bad in two respects. It was bad on its face, because it did not state that the money was to be paid to a person whom the justices had appointed to receive payment, and it was bad also because the Court of Quarter Sessions had not exercised any jurisdiction as to the amount of the sum to be paid. It appeared that Mr. Winder never had, in fact, been appointed to receive the money. Some of the justices appeared to have appointed him, but not those who were entitled to the indemnity. With regard to the second point, the Court of Quarter Sessions had power to order the treasurer of the borough to pay such a sum by way of costs as they were of opinion was sufficient to indemnify the justices. The Court never, in fact, expressed any opinion at all. They made the order that a sum should be paid, but never expressed any opinion as to the amount. "Costs and charges" in section 29 meant costs and charges to which the Court thought the justices were properly put. There really was no taxation at all. A very large bill was put in, but the person who had to pay had no notice of the taxation. He did not know it was going on, and not a penny piece was taxed off the bill. His Lordship thought that in this proceeding the party ordered to pay ought to have an opportunity of being heard at the taxation and making objections to any items he thought fit.

By consent of the parties appearing, it was ordered that the bill of costs should be taxed in the Crown Office after notice to the treasurer of the borough.

Ship—Bill of lading—Conditions as to rate of discharge—Discharge to proceed "continuously."

Judgment was delivered in this case. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Magdala and they claimed damages for the detention of the Magdala at Avonmouth, the port of discharge. The defendants were the consignees of a part of the cargo.

Mr. Robson, Q.C., and Mr. T. Gardner Horridge appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Inskip for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in delivering judgment, said that the action was brought by the shipowners against the consignees of part of the cargo to recover damages for the detention of the steamer Magdala. The defendants with other consignees received goods which had been shipped under bills of lading containing the following clause:—"Goods are to be received by the consignee immediately the vessel is ready to discharge and continuously at all such hours as the Custom House authorities may give permission for the ship to work." The vessel arrived at the dock at Avonmouth with a cargo of grain on November 8, 1899, and it was said for the plaintiffs that if the cargo had been received by the consignees continuously the discharge would have finished by November 14, whereas owing, it was said, to the default of the defendants and the other consignees the vessel was detained until November 20. The usual course was followed in the discharge. A firm of well-known stevedores, Messrs. King and Son, were appointed to act for the ship, and the dock company undertook to do the merchants' part of the work. The dock company had to put the grain into bags in the vessel's hold, to weigh the bags on deck, and to land them, and for this purpose 16 gangs of men would have been required for a continuous discharge. The stevedores' men had to lift the bags from the hold by means of winches and to guide them on to the deck, and this part of the work required 21 men. It was admitted that there was at this time a difficulty in obtaining labour and that there was a great press of work at the dock; and it was impossible for the discharge to be completed by November 14. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that there was an absolute obligation on the defendants to receive the cargo continuously, and that their duty was the same as if a period of six days had been expressly mentioned in the bill of lading as the time within which the cargo was to be received. The defendants said that regard must be had to the actual circumstances which occurred, and that the duty of the consignees was not an absolute duty, but only to make all reasonable efforts to receive the cargo continuously. His Lordship was unable to accept the plaintiffs' contention. The word "continuously" did not add to the obligation of the merchants, and afforded no indication of an intention to fix a definite time or rate of discharge. It meant no more than that the merchant bound himself to do his work in a reasonable time and with a reasonable amount of exertion. If it was intended that he was to be responsible for all extraordinary causes of delay, the language used in this bill of lading was not the right language to use. The case came within the principle laid down in "Hick v. Raymond" ([1893] A.C., 22) and was clearly distinguishable from the case of "Budgett v. Binnington" (25 Q.B.D., 320) which had been relied on by the plaintiffs. There would be judgment for the defendants with costs.

BETTANY V. EASTERN MORNING AND HULL NEWS COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Principal and Agent—Commission—Advertisement agent—Alleged custom as to payment after termination of engagement.

Custom held not proved.

The plaintiff in this case had formerly been the advertisement agent in London for the newspapers owned by the defendants, and had been paid a commission of 10 per cent. upon all advertisements obtained in London for the newspapers. In June, 1898, the defendants terminated the plaintiff's engagement, after notice. The defendants paid the plaintiff commission up to Christmas, 1898, on all advertisements published in their papers which had been originally obtained by the plaintiff. The claim in this action was for commission for advertisements published since Christmas, 1898. Advertisements are of two kinds—those the publication of which is required by the advertiser to continue until countermanded, and those which are published for a definite period, and then either lapse or are renewed. The plaintiff alleged that, although his engagement with the defendants had terminated, he was by the custom of the trade still entitled to commission on all advertisements which might appear in the defendants' papers, if they had been obtained by him in the first instance; and it was contended that the custom applied to both kinds of advertisements, provided that, in the case of renewals, the renewal was made within a period of 12 months from the previous publication. For the defence it was denied that there was any such custom as alleged.

Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. W. T. Lawrance appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. T. E. Scrutton for the defendants.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff himself, Mr. Cunison, advertisement manager of the Daily News, Mr. Nott, advertisement manager of the London Echo, Mr. Macdonald, formerly advertisement manager of the Speaker, and Mr. Vernon, an advertisement agent, gave evidence in support of the custom. For the defendants the following witnesses were called:—Mr. Thame, advertisement manager of the Standard, Mr. Madge, manager of the Globe, Mr. Leslie, of the Pall Mall Gazette, and Mr. Edwards, assistant-manager of the Daily News. All these gentlemen stated that there was no such custom as the plaintiff contended for.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiff insisted that by the custom of the business he was entitled to the payment of commission in two cases—first, where the advertisements were inserted “until countermanded”; secondly, where advertisements originally procured by him were renewed with less than a break of 12 months, even though the renewal of the advertisement might have been obtained by the plaintiff’s successor. The question was whether the alleged custom had been proved. It had been laid down over and over again that the way to prove a custom was to show an established course of business, at first contested but ultimately acquiesced in. A number of witnesses had been called to prove the custom. First there was the plaintiff himself, who admitted in cross-examination that it might not be quite fair that the payment of commission should go on for more than three or four years, although he said that the custom justified him in saying that the commission was payable for all time if the publication of the advertisements continued. Several of the plaintiff’s witnesses were obliged to admit that they knew of no instance where the supposed custom had been acquiesced in by newspaper proprietors. Mr. Macdonald had made a claim against the Speaker, but there had been no dispute, the payment was made without question, and therefore that instance did not support this case. Then another witness, Mr. Vernon, had recovered commission in a case tried before Mr. Justice Wills. His Lordship was not aware what materials for a decision the learned Judge had in that case. He could in this case act only on the evidence which had been given before him, and he was of opinion that the evidence of the alleged custom was most unsatisfactory. The defendants’ witnesses said that vague claims were made from time to time, but they were always stoutly resisted. His Lordship held that the custom had not been proved, and gave judgment for the defendants with costs.

SYNGE V. SYNGE.*

Divorce—Judicial separation.

A wife seeking a divorce on the ground of adultery and desertion, failed to prove the desertion and was herself held to have deserted her husband; held, notwithstanding, that she was entitled to a judicial separation.

This was a suit in which Charlotte Granville Synge, née Stuart, who is known on the stage as Miss Granville, had petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage with Major Robert Follett Muter Foster Millington Synge, now adjutant of the provisional battalion at Shorncliffe, on the ground of his desertion and adultery.

*Reported by J. H. MURPHY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The issue of adultery was tried by a jury and was decided in favour of the petitioner (vide The Times, April 27 and 28 and May 2, 4, and 5). The issue of desertion was by consent heard before the Court itself, and the learned Judge held that the respondent had not deserted the petitioner (ante, p. 388). The wife’s petition for divorce was accordingly dismissed, but the petitioner having expressed the desire that a judicial separation should be granted to her the question was argued to-day.

Mr. Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Mr. Le Bas were for the petitioner; Mr. Grazebrook for the respondent.

Mr. DEANE said that on the finding of the Court and jury he had to ask that a decree of judicial separation should be granted to the petitioner.

Mr. GRAZEBROOK submitted that under section 31 of the Divorce Act, 1857, the granting of a decree was in the discretion of the Court in all cases where a decree of divorce was sought for if the petitioner had been guilty (inter alia) of desertion or conduct conducing to the respondent’s misconduct. Section 7 had substituted the granting of judicial separations for divorces a mensa et thoro. In sections 16 and 17 the use of the word “may” clearly indicated that a discretion was given to the Court in granting judicial separations. In “Duplany v. Duplany” ([1892] P., 53), which was the leading case on the subject, there had been no considered argument on behalf of the respondent, M. Marius, and the report showed that no cases were cited in support of his case. It was most material for the Court to consider the conduct of the parties when exercising its discretion, and in the present case it was now common ground that the respondent had not committed any matrimonial offence until years after his wife, by refusing to cohabit with him, had wilfully separated herself from him and thereby deserted him. The learned counsel then proceeded to cite the following cases:—“Smith v. Smith” (1 S. and T., 359); “Boreham v. Boreham” (1 P. and D., 77); “Otway v. Otway” (13 P.D., 141); “Butler v. Butler” (63 L.T., 256); “Mackenzie v. Mackenzie” ([1895] A.C., 384); and “Yeatman v. Yeatman” (1 P. and D., 489, and 2 P. and D., 187). In the present case the Court had held that the petitioner, Mrs. Synge, was “morally” responsible for her husband’s subsequent misconduct. All the cases showed that the invariable rule of the Court was that the party seeking for relief should come to the Court with clean hands. Mrs. Synge had without a reasonable excuse wilfully separated from her husband since 1892, and had therefore been guilty of the matrimonial offence of desertion.

The PRESIDENT.—Am I not in a sense bound by “Duplany v. Duplany”?

Mr. GRAZEBROOK.—With all respect I submit that that decision is wrong, and that if “Boreham v. Boreham” had then been cited to your Lordship the case would have been otherwise decided, for in that case a judicial separation was refused to a wife whose husband had been convicted of adultery. Under section 22 of the Divorce Act, 1857, the Court was “in all proceedings other than for divorce to proceed on principles and rules which shall, as nearly as may be, be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts acted,” and by that same Act desertion was made a matrimonial offence. The Court had found that Mrs. Synge had committed a matrimonial offence.

Mr. DEANE.—The Court did nothing of the kind.

The PRESIDENT.—I have not held that the wife’s conduct conducing to the husband’s adultery, and I did not think it necessary to do more than decide that the respondent had not deserted his wife; but I am now prepared to decide the question whether or not the petitioner deserted her husband.

Mr. DEANE.—I submit that your Lordship is functus officio.

The PRESIDENT.—On the question of divorce, yes; but not as to the question of judicial separation.

Mr. GRAZEBROOK.—In "Butler v. Butler" Lord Hannen refused to grant a judicial separation to a wife merely because her solicitor had been a party to a collusive document which was signed by the husband.

The PRESIDENT.—The question is whether the Ecclesiastical Courts would have refused to grant a divorce a mensa et thoro to a wife who had left her husband. I am bound by section 22 to act on the same principles as the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Mr. GRAZEBROOK.—Desertion was not formerly a matrimonial offence.

The PRESIDENT.—The Divorce Act does not make it a bar to judicial separation, though it does make it a discretionary bar to divorce.

Mr. GRAZEBROOK.—The Court is not bound hand and foot by section 22; the words are "shall follow as nearly as may be." It was not unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature, when creating a new offence, should intend it to be dealt with as though it had been an offence before the Act. I submit that desertion was engrafted by section 23 on to the powers of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and therefore the Court should refuse the present application.

Mr. DEANE.—The Court has held that no matrimonial offence has been committed by the petitioner, and under these circumstances it is idle to argue that she has deserted her husband. But, even if she had, it is no answer to a petition for judicial separation. Even conduct conducing is no answer, not being a matrimonial offence. My submission is that the Court has no discretion but to grant a judicial separation whether the petitioner had deserted her husband or not. My only reason for arguing this matter to-day is that my client wishes to appeal on the question of whether the respondent has been guilty of desertion or not, and if I do not take the point by asking for a judicial separation now it may not hereafter be open to me to do so.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that, although he had not previously formally ruled upon the question, he now held that the petitioner had deserted her husband in 1892 by separating from him without reasonable excuse. He (the learned Judge) had fully considered the point now raised in "Duplany v. Duplany." He knew of no authority for saying that the Ecclesiastical Courts would have refused a decree a mensa et thoro on the ground of desertion for the mere reason that desertion was not, until after the passing of the Divorce Act of 1857, a matrimonial offence. Possibly the Ecclesiastical Courts might have refused relief on the grounds indicated in "Boreham v. Boreham," because in that case stress was laid on the neglect having caused the misconduct, and it was not unreasonable to argue that under these circumstances relief would be refused. His opinion was now the same as when he decided "Duplany v. Duplany," and that was that he was bound to construe strictly the Act of Parliament, which had abstained from making desertion a discretionary bar to the granting of a judicial separation. Although he considered the wife was perhaps "morally" responsible for her husband's misconduct, that was a long step from actually conducing to it. A man had no right whatever to commit adultery merely because his wife refused to cohabit with him. In his view the wife had been guilty of desertion, but that was no ground for refusing her the relief she now sought. There would therefore be a decree of judicial separation. The question of the custody of the child would be reserved into Chambers.

THE CRIMDON.*

Admiralty—Practice—Caveat against arrest warrant—Personal undertaking given by solicitors—Arrest of ship—O. 29, rr. 11, 12, and 18.

A decision was given in an application in this case, which raised an important point of practice. The matter arose out of an action in which Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes on May 17 gave an award of £1,000 to the owners, master, and crew of the German steamship Helène Woermann for salvage services rendered by them to the steamship Crimdon, which broke down not far from Cape Finisterre in the Bay of Biscay, and was picked up by the Helène Woermann on March 23, and was towed into Plymouth on March 25. When the Crimdon arrived in Plymouth her owners were communicated with, and their solicitors on Monday, March 26, entered a caveat in the principal registry against the issue of a warrant for the arrest of their vessel under the provisions of Rules 11 and 12 of Order 29 of the Rules of the Supreme Court. In entering the caveat the solicitors gave an undertaking signed by themselves without any qualification to enter an appearance in any action that might be commenced in the High Court of Justice against the Crimdon, and also to give bail therein in a sum not exceeding the value of the ship, cargo, and freight. In the meantime a firm of solicitors at Plymouth had been instructed on behalf of the Helène Woermann, and they on the same day, March 26, issued a writ against the Crimdon and took out a warrant for the arrest of the ship, notwithstanding that the entry of the caveat was brought to their notice, the owners of the Helène Woermann declining to be satisfied with the undertaking of the defendants' solicitors. Under Rule 18 of Order 29 they were at liberty in the circumstances to take out the warrant, but that rule provides that the party at whose instance any property in respect of which a caveat is entered shall be arrested, shall be liable to have the warrant discharged and to be condemned in costs and damages unless he shall show to the satisfaction of the Judge good and sufficient reason for having so done. The Crimdon was arrested at Plymouth on the morning of March 27, just as she was about to proceed on her voyage. Application was made to Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in chambers on March 28 for the release of the ship, and he ordered the warrant to be discharged, but directed that the question of the liability of the owners of the Helène Woermann for costs and damages in respect of the arrest should stand over until after the hearing of the action.

Mr. SCRUTTON (Mr. Chaytor with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that the plaintiffs might fairly object to be content with the undertaking of solicitors merely, and that that amounted to good and sufficient reason within the meaning of the rule. He cited the case of "The Evangelismos" (Swa., 378).

Mr. ASPINALL, Q.C., for the defendants (Mr. Noad with him), cited the case of the "Johan Benjamin," referred to in Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, volume 1, page 370.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said there was no doubt that if there had been any breach of the undertaking the solicitors who gave it would have been personally responsible. He thought it was an erroneous position for the plaintiffs to take up when they said that their refusal to accept the undertaking of the solicitors constituted good and sufficient reason for arrest.

ing the ship within the meaning of the rule. The rules clearly contemplated that undertakings might be given by solicitors for the sake of avoiding the unnecessary expense which would be caused by arresting the ship. In a case like this, where adequate security was offered, the plaintiffs were not entitled to insist on the arrest. There were no grounds shown for objecting to the undertaking, and the plaintiffs must pay to the defendants the sum of £18 by way of damages, that being the proved loss to the defendants occasioned by the act of the plaintiffs, as well as the taxed costs.

HAWKINS V. JUSTICES OF BRIDGEWATER.*

Licence—Renewal—Objection to, what is—Licensing Act, 1872, sec. 42.

Case stated by the Court of quarter sessions for the county of Somerset.

On August 28, 1899, at the general annual licensing meeting for the borough of Bridgewater, the chief constable presented his annual report, containing the following clause :—" It is my pleasure to again report a decrease in the charges of drunkenness during the year and also that the licensed houses generally have been well conducted, but I respectfully ask that the renewal of the Mariners' Compass beerhouse, St. Mary-street, may be withheld until the adjourned meeting." The justices thereupon directed the matter to stand over till September 25, when they refused the licence. The question was whether the head constable's notice was an objection within section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, which was a sufficient justification for the justices to grant the adjournment. The Court of quarter sessions held that it was.

Mr. Foote, Q.C. (Mr. Weatherly and Mr. Haythorne Read with him), appeared for the appellants—the tenant, lessee, and owner of the house respectively ; Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. Douglas Metcalfe for the justices.

The COURT held that the decision of the Court of quarter sessions was right. The report had been given and acted upon by the justices as an objection, for the justices in fact adjourned. The report was read to the justices in open Court. The meaning of the head constable was that he objected. It would be frittering away the business of the thing to hold it was not an objection.

Appeal dismissed.

SLEIGH V. TYSER.†

Insurance—Marine—Policy on cargo—Unseaworthiness of ship—Cargo of cattle—Want of proper appliances for ventilation.

This case was heard before Mr. Justice Bigham on the 7th, 8th, and 9th inst., and was a claim against an underwriter on a loss of certain cattle intended to be shipped to Lorenzo Marques.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Robson, Q.C., Mr. Serutton, and Mr. F. D. Mackinnon appeared for the defendant.

In addition to those dealt with in the judgment the following cases were cited :—" Dickson v. Zirinia " (10 C.B., 602) ; " Toussaint v. Martinant " (3 T.R., 105) ; " Bigge v. Parkinson " (7 H. and N., 955).

At the conclusion of the arguments judgment was reserved.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM delivered a written judgment as follows :—This action was brought on a Lloyd's policy to recover from the defendant his proportion of the amount payable in respect of a loss of cattle shipped at Brisbane in the steamer Ningchow for carriage to Lorenzo Marques, in Delagoa Bay. The defense was that the ship was unseaworthy for the carriage of the cargo because of want of proper appliances for ventilation and because she carried an insufficient number of cattlemen to attend to the beasts. The reply to that defence consists of a denial of the unseaworthiness and of an allegation that the implied warranty of unseaworthiness was excluded by the express terms of the policy. The policy was dated February 10, 1899. It is in the usual form, but contains some special provisions which require to be noticed. The subject-matter of the insurance is described as " 500 cattle valued at £14 each." The premium was 15 guineas per cent., but to return 8 per cent. for no claim. The insurance was to cover " all risks of shipping, unloading craft, &c., until safely landed ; all risks including mortality and jettison arising from any cause whatever : animals walking ashore or when slung from the vessel, walking after being taken out of the slings, and landed, to be deemed arrived and no claim to attach to this policy on such animals. Each animal to be deemed a separate insurance." There is also a provision that the fittings and conditions of the cattle are to be approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor. The Ningchow had been chartered by the plaintiff under a time charter, which provided that the owners of the ship should allow the charterer to erect and secure stock and extra passenger fittings, and should provide accommodation for not exceeding 12 stock men, the charterer paying the owners 2s. per man per day for victualling the number carried. The shipments of the cattle began on February 20 and finished on February 22, 1899, 438 beasts being put on board. Of this number 88 were put on an orlop deck, which was laid at the bottom of the vessel ; 180 were put on the between decks and 170 on the main deck. Above the cattle on the main deck 1,000 sheep were carried on a temporary staging erected for the purpose. The animals were in charge of a body of about 14 stock men furnished by the plaintiff, a man named Monro being their foreman or captain. Before the vessel arrived at Lorenzo Marques practically all the cattle on the between decks had died, and over 30 per cent. of those on the orlop and main decks had met the same fate. Only 185 beasts out of the whole number were landed alive at the port of destination. This mortality (about 60 per cent.) is admittedly far in excess of what might reasonably be expected. The bulk of it occurred during the first part of the voyage when the ship was traversing Australian waters, where the carrying of live cattle is a common trade, and where the evidence shows that the mortality in ordinary circumstances seldom exceeds 3 per cent. To what was this exceptional mortality due ? On the one hand, the defendant says it was due to bad ventilation and insufficient attendance to the wants of the cattle. On the other hand, the plaintiff says it was due to the weather and the consequent rolling of the ship. I am satisfied that there was no weather to account for the loss. [His Lordship, after stating in detail the facts which led him to the above conclusion, proceeded.] The vessel, in my opinion, went to sea most insufficiently ventilated for the cargo she had to carry. Evidence was called before me which satisfied me that the ventilation on all three decks was insufficient. To this cause I attribute the abnormal mortality. I think also that the number of men, 14, put on board for attending to the cattle was not large enough to secure the carriage of the cattle in safety to their destination. I do not forget in coming to these conclusions either the certificate of Lloyd's agents' surveyor or the fact that certain statutory provisions had to be complied with, and are certified by a Government official as having been complied with in connexion with the accommodation for the cattle on board the vessel. I arrive at my conclusions notwithstanding this double certification. The insurance having been effected the cattle were hurriedly shipped without any proper care being taken to secure their safe arrival. Of course, the onus of proving the unseaworthiness is upon the defendant; but he fully discharged it. The question then arises whether insufficient ventilation and an insufficient supply of men constitute a breach of the implied condition of seaworthiness. I think they do. This implied condition in a policy on cargo is exactly the same as in a policy on ship—viz., that the ship shall be seaworthy for the adventure on which she starts; stating the condition with particular reference to a policy on cargo, it may be defined as a condition that the ship shall be fit for the proposed service; fit, that is, in respect of all those things which appertain to the safe carriage of the cargo in question to its destination. No doubt it is not usual for underwriters on cargo to rely on the defence of unseaworthiness; the underwriter usually pays the cargo owner and avails himself of the latter's rights against the shipowner, the benefit of which he obtains by subrogation (see McArthur, Contract of Marine Insurance, 2nd Ed., p. 15). But this is because of the supposed hardship of the law which makes innocent shippers of cargo responsible for the oversight or negligence of the shipowner. The practice does not modify the law, and in the present case the hardship out of which the practice has sprung does not exist, for the plaintiff had himself undertaken with the shipowner to provide both the ventilation appliances and the cattlemen. Then were proper ventilation and a sufficient number of men to attend to the beasts things which were required on board this vessel for the safe carriage of the cargo to its destination? Clearly they were. Many cargoes besides cargoes of living animals require ventilation if they are to be carried safely, and it cannot be doubted that a ship which put to sea without proper means of providing the necessary ventilation, or without sufficient men to utilize those means, would be unseaworthy for the service required. But it is said that in this case the implied warranty is gone by reason of the express words in the policy to which I have already referred, "the fittings and conditions of the cattle to be approved by Lloyd's agents' surveyor." They were in a somewhat halting way so approved; the certificate of the surveyor has been read, and it sufficiently complies with the requirements of the clause. It is argued for the plaintiff that his compliance with this express provision discharges him from further obligation. I do not think so. The certificate has nothing to do with the sufficiency of men shipped on board to attend to the cattle; with that matter the surveyor did not concern himself; and though ventilation appliances may well come within the meaning of the word "fittings" the question remains, Did the parties by this stipulation, that the fittings should be approved by the surveyor, intend to supersede the implied warranty of seaworthiness in respect of ventilation? I am of opinion that they did not. I think this stipulation was inserted in the policy for the benefit of the underwriter and was intended to be additional to and not in substitution for the important condition upon the basis of which all contracts of this description are prima facie made. It may be asked what additional advantage does the stipulation give to the underwriter? I think the answer is that it probably enables him to reinsure with greater ease, and it affords him some assurance that he will not find himself involved in an action such as this. To exclude the implied warranty of seaworthiness the words used must be express, pertinent, and apposite (per Lord Penzance in "Quebec Marine Insurance Company v. Commercial Bank of Canada," L.R., 3 P.C., 234). If I could find in these words sufficient to satisfy me that the parties intended that Lloyd's agents' surveyor should be put in the position of a sole judge to decide once for all whether the fittings were enough for the purpose required, I should probably come to a different conclusion as to the intention of the parties in introducing the stipulation relied on. But I do not find anything of the kind. The stipulation is, in my opinion, merely superadded for the benefit of the underwriter, and therefore does not exclude the implied warranty—"Mody v. Gregson" (L.R., 4 Ex., 49). A question was raised by me during the hearing of the case as to the effect of the clause in the policy by which each animal is to be deemed a separate insurance; but I think nothing turns on that clause. It is inserted with a view to qualifying the liability for particular average, and with that view only. The result is that there must be judgment for the defendant.

May 24.

FRANCIS, TIMES, AND COMPANY V. CARR.*

Foreign Judgment—Judgment in rem—Res judicata—Tort committed abroad—Authority and jurisdiction of foreign Court—Judgment not affecting status of goods—Notice of proceedings in foreign Court—Act of State.

The Court delivered judgment in this appeal, after having taken time for consideration. The arguments were heard on three days at the beginning of the present month, as reported in The Times of May 3, 4, and 5.

The appeal was brought by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham after the trial of the action with a special jury. The case in the Court below was reported in The Times of June 6, 7, 8, 9, 19, and 20 last. The plaintiffs were a firm of merchants trading in the East, and the defendant was Captain Carr, R.N., who, in January, 1898, was in command of H.M.S. Lapwing in or near the Persian Gulf. The action was brought to recover damages for the seizure of ammunition belonging to the plaintiffs on board the steamship Baluchistan in the Persian Gulf. It appeared that the plaintiffs had been in the habit of shipping arms to Bushire, a Persian port, and also to Muscat and Bahrein. Since 1881 there had been a nominal prohibition against the importation of arms into Persia, but in practice this prohibition had only been used to substitute an arbitrary import for a regular Customs duty. The Sultan of Muscat was an independent Sovereign. One of the partners in the plaintiffs' firm resided at Bushire. In the autumn of 1897 rumours became current that hostilities were about to break out between the Indian Government and the Afridis on the North-West Frontier of India, and in consequence the plaintiffs' shipments were marked "Bahrein via Bushire—optional Muscat," so that the consignments might be delivered at either of those ports. In November, 1897, the plaintiffs shipped arms and ammunition from London to the value of about £600 on board the Baluchistan marked as above. Between December 7 and 11, while the ship was on her voyage, the Persian Government, acting, it was said, at the request of the British Government, seized arms and ammunition at Bushire belonging to the plaintiffs to the value of about £30,000. A report of this fact appeared in The Times of December 15, and the plaintiffs, upon hearing of this, had the arms taken out of the ship at Port Said, but were unable to stop the ammunition. The captain of the ship upon instructions altered the destination of the ammunition to Muscat by obliterating the other marks. The ship was stopped on January 24, 1898, off Muscat by her Majesty's ship Lapwing, and the ammunition was seized. The seizure took place within two miles of the shore. It appeared that on January 13, 1898, the Sultan of Muscat, by a proclamation, gave permission to British ships of war to confiscate arms found in ships within the territorial waters of Muscat if it should appear that the arms were intended for Indian or Persian ports. The plaintiffs stated that they had never received any warning against sending arms or ammunition to Muscat until the Lapwing seized the ammunition now in question, that they had carried on their trade in arms and ammunition in a perfectly open manner, and that none of it had reached the Afridis. On April 15, 1898, a Muscat Court, consisting of the Prime Minister and the Commander-in-Chief, inquired into the seizure and held that it was valid. The jury found that the goods were for Muscat only, and not for Persia or India; that a reasonable man would have believed them to be for Persian or Indian ports; that the plaintiffs shipped the goods bona fide and in the ordinary course of business; that the trade was carried on with the knowledge of her Majesty's Government; that the words "Muscat optional" were added to the port marks before the ship left London; that they were added with the bona fide intention that the goods should be landed at Muscat, if desirable; that the plaintiffs were bound by the act of the ship's agents in altering the marks at Port Said; and that there was no evidence that the plaintiffs were notified of the proceedings of the Sultan's Court at Muscat. Upon further consideration, Mr. Justice Grantham held (1) that the proclamation of the Sultan of Muscat had the force and authority of a proclamation issued by a fully-constituted Sovereign Power; (2) that the defendant could rely upon it by way of defence if the seizure of the goods was contrary to the English law; (3) that the goods were not goods which were made liable to seizure under that proclamation; (4) that the Court of the Sultan of Muscat had jurisdiction entitling it to deliver a judgment in rem; (5) that the judgment or decree of the Court had the force of a judgment in rem; that (6) the onus lay on the plaintiffs to prove that no notice of the proceedings had been given to them, and that they had failed to prove it, they having a partner in Bushire, who would bear of the seizure, and a regular agent at Muscat; and he came to the conclusion that, even if the plaintiffs did not have direct notice, they did get notice, and did have an opportunity of appearing before the Court, and abstained from raising any objection to the seizure at Muscat, and could not now contend that the seizure was illegal or that the judgment was contrary to natural justice. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. F. W. Hollams were counsel for the plaintiffs; the Attorney-General (Sir Richard Webster), the Solicitor-General (Sir Robert Finlay), and Mr. R. B. D. Acland were counsel for the defendant.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read the judgment of the Court, allowing the appeal, as follows:— This is an appeal against a judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham's in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant for wrongfully depriving the plaintiffs of goods, arms, ammunition, &c. The plaintiffs are merchants carrying on business at Bushire, in Persia, and Muscat, in Arabia, and in London. The defendant at the time of the acts complained of was in command of H.M.S. Lapwing. The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiffs in November, 1897, caused to be shipped on board the steamship Baluchistan certain cases of cartridges to be carried to Bahrein via Bushire, and, for the purpose of enabling the plaintiffs to avail themselves of whichever might prove to be the most advantageous market, it was a term of the said shipment that the plaintiffs should have the option to land the said cases at Muscat, and the said cases were accordingly marked "Bahrein via Bushire, Muscat optional," and that the steamship Baluchistan sailed from London on November 26, 1897, and on or about January 24, 1898, was on the high seas several miles from, but making for, the harbour of Muscat, when H.M.S. Lapwing signalled to the said steamer to stop and fired a shot across her bows; the said steamer thereupon hove to, and the defendant then boarded her and took possession of the above-mentioned goods of the plaintiffs. The defendant by his defence denied that the plaintiffs in the month of November, 1897, or at any other time in the ordinary course of business or at all, shipped the cases of cartridges as alleged, and denied that the plaintiffs had the option alleged, or that the goods were marked as alleged. There were certain other formal traverses in the defence, but at the trial the denials above mentioned were the only statements in the statement of claim which were really contested. On the face of the bill of lading the receipt of the goods was acknowledged from J. Vandersluys, who was the shipping clerk of the plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs are not mentioned in the bill of lading. No consignees are named in the bill of lading, and the goods were made deliverable in the body of the bill of lading at the port of Bushire or to his or their assigns, but in the endorsement on the bill of lading of the port marks the words are written, "Bahrein via Bushire, Muscat optional." In the course of the voyage the plaintiffs, through Messrs. Strick, the ship's agents, directed the master to deliver at Muscat; and he, in blue pencil, struck out "Bushire" from the body of the bill of lading and substituted "Muscat," and struck out in the endorsement the words "Bahrein via Bushire" and the word "optional," leaving only the word Muscat. The manifest of cargo describes the cargo as shipped on board the steamship Baluchistan from London to Muscat. The defendant in addition to the traverses pleaded affirmatively that in the month of January, 1898, and prior to the acts complained of, the Sultan of Muscat proclaimed that all arms and ammunition found within the territorial waters of Muscat belonging to British, Persian, or Muscat subjects, and intended for Indian or Persian ports, would be confiscated, and such proclamation was valid and effectual by the law of Muscat; and the said Sultan, in accordance with the law of Muscat, on or about January 13, 1898, authorized and requested the commanders of all British and Persian men-of-war to search all vessels in the territorial waters of Muscat sailing under the British, Persian, or Muscat flag, and to confiscate all arms and ammunition found on board such vessels intended for Indian or Persian ports. The defendant, acting upon such authority and in compliance with such request and by the authority of her Majesty and not otherwise, searched the steamship Baluchistan, which was then within the territorial waters of Muscat, and, finding on board the said vessel the ammunition mentioned in the statement of claim intended for a Persian port, directed the captain to bring his vessel into the harbour of Muscat; and then, in the harbour of Muscat, acting upon such authority and in compliance with the said request and in accordance with the said proclamation, seized and landed the said ammunition; that subsequently proceedings were taken in the Court of the Sultan of Muscat to inquire into the legality of the said seizure, and it was thereupon determined and adjudged that the said arms, &c., were intended for Persian ports and were lawfully seized by the Lapwing in accordance with the said proclamation, authority, and request of the Sultan of Muscat; that all the acts complained of took place within the territories of an independent Sovereign, the Sultan of Muscat, and were lawful by the law of the country where they were committed, and have been adjudged to be so by the duly constituted Courts of that country; that the judgment of the Court of Muscat herein before-mentioned was a judgment in rem against the goods of the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs are, by the said judgment, estopped from alleging that the said goods were not lawfully seized and confiscated. The plaintiffs, by their replication, in addition to taking issue on the defence, say that the plaintiffs were not at any time prior to the alleged judgment served with any process or summons, and did not appear, and were not represented in the alleged proceedings, nor had they before the judgment any notice or intimation that the alleged proceedings were about to be held, or were being held, nor any opportunity of defending the same, and that it is contrary to natural justice that the said judgment should be binding on them. Mr. Justice Grantham left the following specific questions to the jury, and the jury answered as appears hereunder. 1. Were the goods for Persian or Indian ports when seized by Captain Carr?—Answer—For Muscat only. 2. When they arrived at Muscat, would a reasonable man believe them to be for Persian or Indian ports?—Answer—Yes. 3. Did the plaintiffs ship the goods in question bona fide in the ordinary course of business?—Answer—Yes. 4. Did that business have the knowledge of her Majesty's Government?—Answer—Her Majesty's Government knew of the trade. 5. Were the words "Muscat optional" added to the port marks before the ship left London?—Answer—Yes. 6. Were they added with bona fide intention that goods should be landed at Muscat if exigencies of trade made it desirable?—Answer—Yes. 7. Were the plaintiffs parties to the alteration of marks on board ship at Port Said?—Answer—They were parties to the re-marking, and the same as to altering the bill of lading. 8. Had the plaintiffs the opportunity of appearing and being heard in the proceedings at Muscat? Had they any notice of such proceedings? And had the public any notice of such proceedings?—Answer—That no evidence has been given before your Lordship that the Court at Muscat notified the plaintiffs of proceedings, and, with reference to the public, the same thing, no evidence. The jury added to their answer that the plaintiffs were parties to alterations of marks at Port Said, that they considered them bound by the action of the ship's agent. Now, these answers of the jury as to the questions of fact constitute a verdict in favour of the plaintiffs, and the Crown, who defend the action for Captain Carr, do not seek to impeach these findings, but the points of law raised by the defendant have to be dealt with. These points of law seem to be the following:—1. That a judgment in rem was obtained in Muscat which binds the plaintiffs and disposes in favour of the defendant of several of the matters as res judicata in respect of which the jury found in favour of the plaintiffs. 2. That, in order to maintain an action in the Courts of this country for a tort committed abroad, the act must be an act which is wrongful and actionable by the law of the country where it was committed and also by the law of this country, and that it is established that the act complained of by the plaintiffs in the present case was not wrongful and actionable by the law of the country where it was committed. This point is based on the case of "Phillips v. Eyre" (L.R., 4 Q.B., 225, and 6 Q.B., 1). First, as to the point which raises the defence of res judicata, this defence is based on a State document issued within the State of Muscat on April 15, 1898. Now, is this document, signed by the State officers of the Sultan of Muscat and approved under the hand and seal of the Sultan, a judgment in rem? And what was the nature of the proceeding in which it was issued? It is not suggested that this is a judgment in rem resulting from an action instituted in personam. The suggestion is that the action and judgment alike are in rem. Now, to constitute a judgment in rem, the judgment must be a judgment of a competent Court in respect of a res actually or constructively within the jurisdiction of the Court, and the judgment must determine the right to, or disposition of, such res in the control of the Court. The question in the present case, as to whether the res was so in the control of the Sultan of Muscat as to give jurisdiction to a competent Court in Muscat to dispose of or determine the title to it, seems to depend on whether the goods were seized within the dominions of the Sultan. There seems no doubt but that the goods were seized within "the three-mile limit." We assume that a ship within the three-mile limit bound for Muscat is within the territorial waters of Muscat, and as such within the jurisdiction of the Sultan and his Courts executing his delegated authority, although, if this case depended upon the truth of that assumption, it might be necessary to consider further the question whether by International law such a vessel must be considered within the jurisdiction of the Sultan for the purpose of legal proceedings. We think that no objection can be taken to the constitution of the Court. It seems to us plain that the Court was so constituted as to be competent to exercise any jurisdiction which the Sultan purported to delegate to it; and it seems to us that this delegation is defined by the document itself under the hand and seal of the Sultan. Assuming the res to be within the dominions of Muscat and the Court to be properly constituted, it remains to consider what is the authority of the Court, and what is its jurisdiction, what is the law to apply, and what is the effect in Muscat of that document. There is no evidence outside the document itself as to these matters. Foreign law must of course be proved as a fact, but to some extent a document under the seal of the Court may be evidence of, or raise a presumption of, foreign law. The document is stated on its face to be issued by a Court held by the order of the Sultan of Muscat for inquiring into the circumstances under which certain munitions of war ex steamship Baluchistan of Swansea were seized by the British man-of-war Lapwing in the territorial waters of his Highness the Sultan of Muscat. Thus far there is nothing to indicate that the inquiry is to be a judicial proceeding for the purpose of determining the disposition of, or the title to, the goods in question. The Court might well be a Court to report to the Sultan or his Government. The document then goes on:—"We find after full inquiry and deliberation:—(1) That the munitions of war ex steamship Baluchistan were seized by the British man-of-war Lapwing; (2) that the seizure was in every respect legal and in accordance with the permission given by his Highness the Sultan to British men-of-war at the request of the British and Persian Governments; (3) that these munitions of war were intended for Persian ports; (4) that the alteration in the port marks of destination on the cases took place during the stay of the steamship Baluchistan at Port Said, with the intention of misleading as to the true destination of those cases, but such alteration did not confer any immunity on them from seizure in accordance with the above-mentioned permission." These are the whole of the findings. The document contains no condemnation, no words of forfeiture, no words declaring the title of the owners to be divested, no interim order for a sale pendente lite, and no transfer to a purchaser under a sale by order of the Court, and no transfer whatever. For authority that a judgment in rem must in some one or other of these ways affect the movable res, see the opinion of the Judges delivered by Mr. Justice Blackburn in "Castrique v. Imrie" (4 H.L.C., 414), and section 592 of "Story on Conflict of Laws" cited with approval by him. Thus far there seems no alteration by the Court in Muscat of the status of the goods seized. There is a finding, it is true, that the seizure was in every respect legal and in accordance with the permission given by his Highness the Sultan to British men-of-war at the request of the British and Persian Governments, but this finding does not in terms affect the status of the goods, it does not in terms amount to an order condemning or confiscating the goods or divesting the title of any one or vesting the title in any one else than the owners. If the seizure declared to be legal is to be looked at as a seizure on behalf of the Sultan, which is a view which hardly seems to be manifested by the description of the seizure as a seizure made in accordance with the permission given by the Sultan to British men-of-war at the request of the British and Persian Governments, such seizure may have been a seizure similar to the arrest of the Admiralty Marshal for the purpose of a subsequent action in rem, and the destination of the goods may have been a condition precedent to the legality of the seizure, but we do not think that this would constitute a judgment affecting the status of the goods. If on the other hand the seizure is regarded as a seizure by the British Government, in accordance with the permission given by the Sultan to the British Government at its request, and not as the agents of the Sultan, we find no condemnation of the goods in favour of the British Government as captors. We do not think that one can construe a document, even though issued by a competent Court, as a judgment in rem by inference. See "Plummer v. Woodburne" (4 B. and C., 625). We think that you must find the judgment in rem in the express terms of the document, and we doubt whether you are entitled to look at any documents not expressly referred to in the alleged judgment; but it may be worth while to look at the document which, it is said, constitutes the permission to the British men-of-war to make the seizure. Now the documents in question are the notification and proclamation of January 13, 1898. The former document, after reciting the desire of the Sultan to prevent the introduction of munitions of war into India and Persia by export from Muscat and the agreement of the Sultan with Great Britain and Persia, goes on:—"We therefore warn that all munitions of war sent to those two countries (India and Persia) will be confiscated, and those engaged in this trade will be punished, as the introduction of such munitions into India and Persia is prohibited by the Governments of those two countries, and therefore illegal. In future our Muscat flag will be no protection to vessels carrying the said munitions from our dominions to India and Persia." This warning is in terms addressed to subjects of the Sultan of Muscat. It will be observed that the illegality is based on the prohibition by the Governments of India and Persia, and the statement that "our Muscat flag will be no protection" to vessels carrying such munitions prima facie looks like a statement that the Muscat flag will not protect the vessels from seizure by vessels bearing flags other than that of Muscat. Then comes the proclamation, which runs thus:—"Be it known to all who see it that we have given permission to British and Persian vessels of war to search vessels carrying their and our flags in our territorial waters and to confiscate all munitions of war in them, if those munitions are intended for India or Persia, if they are the property of British, Persian, or Muscat subjects. We have also given permission to those vessels of war to search Muscat vessels in Indian and Persian waters suspected to carry munitions for Indian and Persian ports and to confiscate the said munitions." This looks as if the confiscation was to be by the British men-of-war, and as if the legality of the confiscation ought to be decided by British Courts within the British dominions, as would be the case if a British vessel seized and sought to confiscate munitions intended for those at war with Great Britain even though the seizure took place in foreign territorial waters with the assent of the foreign Power. It may be that the proper inference is that the seizure was on behalf of the Muscat Government, and that a confiscation, if adjudged, would have had to be to the Sultan and not to the British Government as captors, but there is certainly no express adjudication to this effect; and on the evidence it looks as if the ammunition might still be in the hands of the British Resident who gave the receipt to Captain Carr, the defendant. For the foregoing reasons we are not satisfied that the document issued by the Muscat Court was an adjudication by a Court of justice determining the status or ordering the disposition of goods seized within Muscat territory; and we wish to add that, even if we were so satisfied, we should hesitate to hold that our Courts ought to give effect to a judgment as to which there is no evidence of any public notice of the intention to hold the inquiry which resulted in the judgment. But, quite apart from any replication impeaching the judgment as against natural justice, the onus of proving which would be on the plaintiffs, there seems to be no judgment in rem—first, because there is no sufficient proof that the document issued by the so-called High Court of Muscat was the act of a Court having judicial functions or acting judicially; secondly, because the so-called judgment does not include any condemnation or other finding affecting the status of the goods seized or the title thereto or disposition thereof by an order for sale or transfer to a purchaser or otherwise, but only declares the seizure to have been lawful as being in accordance with the permission given by the Sultan to British men-of-war. There is no confiscation validated at the instance of either the Sultan or the captors. As to the second point of law—that, in order to maintain an action in the Courts of this country for a tort committed abroad, the act complained of must be an act which is wrongful, i.e., an actionable wrong, by the law of the country where it was committed and also by the law of this country, and that it is established in the present case that the act complained of by the plaintiffs was not at the date of the issue of the writ in this action in this country wrongful, or at all events did not constitute an actionable wrong, in the Courts of Muscat—there is no dispute as to the principle, only as to the application of it. We know that by the law of Muscat at the time when the plaintiffs were deprived of their goods by the defendant, the seizure could not be justified, and was therefore unlawful; for the only seizure which was then lawful, if any, was that of munitions of war sent to India or Persia, which these goods were not. Where is the proof that this unlawful seizure subsequently became lawful by the law of Muscat? There is no judgment in rem. There is no evidence of the law of Muscat beyond the certificate of Lord Salisbury that Muscat is an independent State, and that the Sultan is the sovereign ruler thereof; so that for proof that the wrong complained of has ceased to be an actionable wrong, the onus of which is on the defendant, the defence can only rely on the document of April 15 plus the fact that the Sultan is a sovereign ruler, whatever that may mean. There are two suggestions which have been made in argument to support the proposition that the document of April 15 has legalized that which was unlawful when done, and so divested it of its tortious character as to afford immunity to the wrongdoer in respect of it. First, it is said that the document of April 15 is legislation by an autocratic, absolute Sovereign. There is no evidence to support this proposition and, even if there could be such legislation according to the law of Muscat, what is the suggested character of the legislation? It does not purport to alter the law. It is not an act of indemnity, because it assumes that the seizure which it declares to be lawful does not require an act of indemnity. In short, it is manifest it is not legislation legalizing a past wrongful act. Then it is suggested that, if the document of April 15 is not legislation, it is an act of State ratifying the seizure, which was in excess of authority when it was made, and that therefore the seizure would not be actionable in the Courts of Muscat according to the principle of the decision in "Buron v. Denman" (2 Exch., 167). Now, assuming that without evidence we ought to take it for granted that the law of Muscat recognizes the principle of "Buron v. Denman," yet how can that principle be applied to these facts? The document of April 15 recites or finds that the munitions were seized by a British man-of-war, and that the seizure was in accordance with the permission given to British men-of-war at the request of the British and Persian Governments. It seems, therefore, that the act done did not purport to be done on behalf of the Sultan, but only by his permission. We do not think that such an act, even though coupled with subsequent approval by the Sultan, falls within the principle of "Buron v. Denman," and can be treated as an act of State. The seizure was not, in fact, made under circumstances falling within the terms of the proclamation of January 13; and, even if it had been, it ought not to be assumed that the law of Muscat is different from our own law as laid down in "Walker v. Baird" ([1892] A.C., 491). The permission was not, nor was the seizure thereunder, an act of war or reprisal or embargo or a preliminary of war. It was something done by permission of the Sultan for the purpose of carrying out an agreement made by the Sultan with a foreign Government. The second point of defence, in our judgment, also fails. It only remains to deal with a point based on inferences of fact drawn by Mr. Justice Grantham. The learned Judge says:—"In my opinion the plaintiffs have failed to prove that no notice was given to them, or that they had no opportunity of appearing before the Court, though they had every opportunity of doing so (that is, of giving such proof), and as the jury were unable to answer the question definitely, we must look to admitted facts to see whether or not the plaintiffs had proved any presumption of want of notice or knowledge that the Court would sit or was sitting. The plaintiffs themselves are silent on the matter." What the learned Judge means by this statement is not quite clear. He had asked the jury this question—Had the plaintiffs an opportunity of appearing and being heard in the proceedings at Muscat; had they any notice of such proceedings, and had the public any notice of such proceedings? The answer of the jury was that "no evidence has been given before your Lordship that the Court of Muscat notified the plaintiffs of the proceedings." Mr. D. E. Dkarwar, a partner in the plaintiffs' firm, was called as a witness, and states in answer 158 that he had no notice of any proceedings in Court; and Mr. Charles Times, the London partner of the firm, in answer to question 740, "Had you any notice at all of any legal proceedings at Muscat?" answered, "No; none whatever." The learned Judge goes on to suggest that notice might have been given to the plaintiffs' agent at Muscat, Damodhar Dharamsey, or to the ship's agents, Messrs. Towell and Co.; but this was not suggested to the plaintiffs in cross-examination, when they stated that they had no notice whatever of the proceedings. Then the learned Judge refers to a letter of April 9, 1898, of Damodhar Dharamsey to the plaintiffs, but it seems to me that in the passage of the letter referred to he only says that the British Resident had pressed the Sultan to hold a meeting in his own palace and declare that the "confiscation" of Baluchistan cargo was done by his order and wishes, "to which I am told that the Sultan did not agree, so the British agents are not on good terms with him, and they did not give him his monthly subsidy." This letter does not seem to me to be any evidence that the plaintiffs' agent at Muscat had any notice that a judicial proceeding was going to be held, or even that a meeting in the palace was going to be held. On the contrary it seems rather notice that the Sultan had refused, and there is no evidence of the scope of the agency. If it were proved that the proceeding which took place was a judicial proceeding, the onus would be on the plaintiffs to show that they had no notice or knowledge, but the answer of the plaintiffs denying that they had notice does not seem to me to be limited to a denial that they had formal notice, and I think it was on the defendants to suggest on cross-examination that the plaintiffs had notice by knowledge, either personally or through their agents; but the point is of no great importance as, in our judgment, there was no judgment in rem, and admittedly there were no proceedings in personam. The learned Judge further finds that the plaintiffs wilfully or deliberately abstained from raising any objection to the seizure at Muscat, and cannot, therefore, now contend that the seizure was illegal or that the judgment was contrary to natural justice, and says that if any authority for such finding were necessary "Cornish v. Abingdon" (4 H. and N., 549), and other cases of a similar class will be ample justification for so finding. Now the decision in "Cornish v. Abingdon" was based upon the principle that when a person by a representation by words or conduct induces another to alter his position he cannot afterwards deny the truth of the representation. It is not easy to see how the fact that the plaintiffs wilfully or deliberately abstained from raising any objection to the seizure at Muscat could, even if proved (which, in our opinion, it was not) be said to have induced the defendant to alter his position or the Court of Muscat to have altered its position. There is no evidence that the plaintiffs or their agents were present at the time of the seizure, and the condition of the port-marks, of the bills of lading, or the ship's manifest, can hardly amount to a representation that the goods were going to a Persian or Indian port via Muscat, although it may have been reasonable, as the jury say it was, to believe that the goods when they arrived at Muscat were intended for a Persian or Indian port. The appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs. The inquiry as to damages we believe has been arranged.

HOGARTH AND CO. V. WALKER.*

Insurance—Marine—Time policy—Loss, whether covered.

The dunnage mats and separation cloths of a grain ship held to be part of her "furniture" within the meaning of a policy.

Decision of Bigham, J. (15 The Times L.R., 467), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, reported 15 The Times L.R., 467; [1899] 2 Q.B., 401. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Felbridge, and the defendant was an underwriter. The action was brought to recover a loss under a time policy of marine insurance, in the ordinary Lloyd's form, for 12 months, "at all times, in all places, and on all occasions, services, and trades, whatever and wheresoever," on the "body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munitions, artillery, boats, and other furniture of and in the good ship or vessel" Felbridge. The question was whether the policy covered a loss of dunnage mats and separation cloths, the property of the plaintiffs, which were used in connexion with the carriage of grain cargoes, the Felbridge being usually engaged in the grain trade. It was the custom for ships engaged in the Black Sea grain trade to carry dunnage mats and separation cloths, the mats being placed underneath the grain, and the cloths being used to separate the different parcels in which the grain was usually shipped by the different shippers. In the American grain trade separation cloths were never used, as the grain was always shipped in one parcel, and wooden battens were used instead of dunnage mats. During the currency of the policy the Felbridge was on a voyage from America with a cargo of grain, and the mats and cloths were not in use, being stowed away in the forepeak. The dunnage mats and separation cloths having been damaged on the voyage by a peril of the sea, the underwriters contended that they were not liable under the policy. Mr. Justice Bigham held that the loss was covered by the policy, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. J. A. HAMILTON (Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), for the defendant, contended that the dunnage mats and separation cloths were not part of the ship as a ship, but were used solely for the convenience of the shippers of the cargo to separate the different parcels of the cargo. The absence of them would not make the ship unseaworthy. The mats and cloths were not covered by the policy on ship and furniture. "Hoskins v. Pickersgill" (3 Dougl., 222); "Robertson v. Ewer" (1 T.R., 127); "Brough v. Whitmore" (4 T.R., 206); "Hill v. Patten" (8 East, 373); "Gale v. Laurie" (5 B. and C., 156) were referred to.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, in his opinion, the learned Judge was right. The policy covered as wide a power of trading as possible. There was evidence that in the Black Sea grain trade dunnage mats and separation cloths were always required. They were necessary for the trade upon which the ship was entitled to go. They therefore formed part of the furniture of the ship. The learned Judge had said that he could see no distinction between the dunnage mats and separation cloths and movable bulkheads, which, it was admitted, would form part of the ship's furniture. In his (the Lord Justice's) opinion, the learned Judge was right.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed. In his opinion, such a time policy as they had in the present case included fittings and things in the nature of fittings, though not fixed, provided by the shipowner for the purposes of the ship, and reasonably necessary to carry the ordinary kind of cargo for the ship, even though they were not actually in use at the time when the loss occurred.

KING V. SMITH AND PICKER.*

Mortgage—Validity—Fraud by solicitor—Signature fraudulently obtained—Estoppel.

This action raised the question as to which of two innocent parties should suffer for the fraud of a third.

Mr. Hugo Young, Q.C., and Mr. Johnston Edwards appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. George Henderson for the defendants.

The plaintiff, Joseph King, before the year 1894, had frequently employed one Vincent Joseph Eldred, of the firm of Eldred and Bignold, solicitors, to act for him in the purchase of small properties. The plaintiff is not a man of much education, and he gave evidence to the effect that he had been in the habit of signing such documents as Eldred put before him without inquiry. In April, 1894, Eldred induced the plaintiff to execute an indenture purporting to be made between the plaintiff of the one part and the defendants of the other part and to be a mortgage of a piece of land belonging to the plaintiff, to secure the sum of £300 and interest thereon at 5 per cent. per annum. The plaintiff alleged that he did not know that the indenture was a mortgage and that he never intended to mortgage the said piece of land. The defendants, who invested the £300 as trustees, paid the sum by cheque to Eldred on the day that the deed was executed. Eldred cashed the cheque on the same day and kept the money for his own purposes and never furnished any account to the plaintiff. The plaintiff now claimed a declaration that the indenture of mortgage was void and ought to be set aside, and delivery of the title deeds of the property by the defendants.

Mr. YOUNG argued, first, that the deed was not valid, because it was obtained by fraud. In the second place, though Eldred had previously acted as solicitor for the plaintiff, he was not the plaintiff's solicitor in this particular transaction, because the plaintiff had not instructed him to mortgage the property, and consequently he had no authority to receive payment on the plaintiff's behalf. Lastly, the money was made by cheque, and that was not a good payment.

Mr. HUGHES, on the question of validity of the deed, referred to "Hunter v. Walters" (7 Ch., 75). There was a receipt for the consideration money in the body of the deed, and that was a sufficient discharge by virtue of section 54 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. H. PORTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Moreover, the defendants were protected by section 56 of the same Act, which provided that "where a solicitor produces a deed having in the body thereof . . . a receipt for consideration money . . . the deed being executed . . . by the person entitled to give a receipt for that consideration, the deed shall be sufficient authority to the person liable to pay or give the same for his paying or giving the same to the solicitor, without the solicitor producing any separate or other direction or authority in that behalf from the person who executed or signed the deed or receipt."

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in giving judgment, said that it was one of those unfortunate cases where one or other of two innocent parties had to suffer for the fraud of a third, but he could not allow his sympathies to interfere with the operation of the law. The plaintiff had for many years employed Eldred both as his solicitor and as a sort of banker. He used to deposit sums of money with him, on which Eldred allowed him 10 per cent. The plaintiff was also in the habit of buying small properties and leaving Eldred to pay the purchase-money, which was secured by promissory notes. It was clear that the plaintiff trusted Eldred implicitly and signed whatever he told him to sign. The plaintiff never read deeds and did not understand anything about them. In 1894 the defendant Smith, who had known Eldred for some time, was told by him that he knew of a good mortgage, and he and the other defendants agreed to advance £800 on the security. A mortgage was prepared and executed by the plaintiff without any knowledge of its contents, and the deed was produced to Smith containing a receipt for the consideration money in the body of it. The money was paid by cheque and kept by Eldred. Now it was argued that the deed was invalid because it was obtained by fraud. On that point he took the law as laid down by Lord Justice Mellish in "Hunter v. Walters," at page 86:—"Now, I am of opinion that there is evidence that both Hunter and Darnell were induced by the fraud of Walters to execute that deed, but the mere circumstance that they were induced to execute it by fraud does not make it a void deed in point of law"; and at page 88:—"Where a man knows that he is conveying or doing something with his estate, but does not ask what is the precise effect of the deed, because he is told it is a mere form and has such confidence in his solicitor as to execute the deed in ignorance, then, in my opinion, a deed so executed, although it may be voidable upon the ground of fraud, is not a void deed." While he accepted the plaintiff's statement that he never intended to mortgage the property, still the plaintiff knew that he was doing something with his property, and consequently he must hold in the circumstances that the deed was valid as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff had absolute confidence in Eldred, and had, at his request and without inquiry, previously executed deeds dealing with his property. Then section 56 of the Conveyancing Act had to be considered, and it had been argued that Eldred had no authority to receive the money from the defendants. That Act contained provisions for the convenience of business, and gave a statutory power to solicitors in certain cases to give a good discharge. He need not determine what was the precise meaning of "a solicitor." It was sufficient for him to say that, in his opinion, the plaintiff was estopped by the same circumstances as rendered the deed valid from denying that Eldred had authority to receive the money. The plaintiff could not be heard to say that it was not his solicitor who produced the deed duly executed. Then it had been argued that the payment by cheque was not a good payment. But the cheque was cashed on the same day, and, as the law made no distinction between hours of the same day, it was enough that the money was paid on the same day as the deed was produced to the defendants. The plaintiff, therefore, failed in his action, and he must order him to pay the costs, the defendants being trustees.

MARKEY AND ANOTHER V. TOLWORTH JOINT HOSPITAL DISTRICT BOARD.*

Limitation of Actions—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, sec. 1—Action to be commenced within six months.

This case came before the Court on a point of law raised on the pleadings. The action was brought under Lord Campbell's Act by the widow and child of a man who died while under treatment at the Tolworth Joint Hospital, of which the defendants had the management and control, to recover damages on the ground that the man's death was caused by the negligence of one of the nurses employed at the hospital. It appeared that the deceased, William Markey, was admitted into the Tolworth Joint Hospital on October 27, 1898. On October 31 following he died, in consequence, as it was alleged, of the negligence of a nurse in administering to him an overdose of opium. The action was commenced on May 19, 1899, more than six months, therefore, after the death of the deceased. Section 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 61), provides as follows:—"Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of such Act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect:—(a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of, or, in case of a continuance of injury or damage, within six months next after the ceasing thereof. . . ." The defendants are a body constituted by virtue of the Local Government Board Provisional Orders Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict., c. LXXXII.), for the purpose of the provision, maintenance, and management of the Tolworth Hospital for the use of the inhabitants of six districts formed by the same Act into a united district. It was admitted that the defendants were a public authority and that the alleged act of negligence was done by them in the execution of the above-mentioned Act of Parliament.

MR. WILBERFORCE, on behalf of the defendants, contended that they were entitled to judgment on the ground that the action was barred by the Public Authorities Protection Act.

MR. F. WATT, with whom was Mr. F. J. Coltman, jun., on behalf of the plaintiffs, contended that the injury or damage suffered by the plaintiffs was their cause of action, that that injury or damage did not arise until after the death of the deceased, when they began to feel the deprivation of the subsistence they formerly derived from him, and that it continued so long as they were so deprived, and he argued that this was, therefore, a case of "a continuance of injury or damage" within the Public Authorities Protection Act, and that the time of limitation prescribed by the Act had not yet begun to run. He cited "Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell" (11 App.Cas., 127) and "Crumbie v. Wallsend Local Board" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 503) in support of the proposition. He also contended that, inasmuch as Lord Campbell's Act had itself provided a period of limitation of actions—namely, one year—the later Act should not be construed as interfering within that period of limitation, there being no express words repealing the provision of the earlier Act. He cited "Seward v. Vera Cruz" (10 App.Cas., 88).

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The COURT gave judgment for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that if the argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs were pressed to its logical conclusion they would be bound to hold that the right of action continued until six months after the death of the widow or other relative of the deceased. It did not appear to him that the words on which the learned counsel relied applied to actions under Lord Campbell's Act at all. Lord Campbell's Act contemplated a right of action in the deceased person, and provided that as he was dead and could not take advantage of his right the legal remedy should be transferred to certain of his relatives. There could be no continuance of the injury or damage to the person to whom the injury was done because he was dead, and, the injury or damage in respect of which the relatives had a remedy under the Act being the injury of the deceased, the time from which the six months' limitation must be calculated must be the date of the injury—that was to say, in this case, either the date when the opium was administered or the date when the evil effect of it occurred. Dealing with the second point raised on behalf of the plaintiffs, he said that the Public Authorities Protection Act was an Act passed in favour of certain specified persons and did not interfere with the period of limitation provided in Lord Campbell's Act, except in regard to those persons. He did not, therefore, agree with the contention of the plaintiffs' counsel on this point either.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL gave judgment to the same effect.

HOLMES V. GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—Accident arising "out of and in the course of employment."

This was an appeal from an award of the Judge of the Clerkenwell County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was the mother of a workman who had died in consequence of accidental injury sustained by him in the course of his employment. The deceased workman was an engine-cleaner in the employment of the Great Northern Railway Company, and up to Saturday, November 4, 1899, he was engaged on work at King's-cross. A new engine-shed having been erected by the company at Hornsey, about four miles from King's-cross, the deceased was directed by his foreman to go there on the following Monday, November 6, for the purpose of cleaning the engines in the new shed. No particular instructions were given him by the foreman as to how he was to get to Hornsey, but, as he lived near King's-cross, he travelled by one of the company's trains from there to Hornsey. His time for beginning work was 6 a.m., and he arrived at Hornsey about 5.45 a.m. Not knowing where the engine-shed was, he went in a wrong direction, but on inquiry was shown a way which was not the most direct. He, however, reached the engine-shed and did his day's work. It did not appear by what way he returned home that evening. On the following morning, Tuesday, November 7, he and some other men, who were also engine-cleaners, proceeded from King's-cross to Hornsey as before, and reached the latter place at 5.45. None of them had tickets, and it did not appear that they would be expected to take tickets, and in fact they were not asked for them. On arriving at Hornsey the deceased and the other men proceeded to cross the lines of railway in front of the engine, which was then blowing off steam, when an express train coming from King's-cross on the main line caught him and injured him so much that he died on the following day. It appeared that there was a foot-bridge across the lines, and also a subway, by either of which the deceased might have proceeded to the other side, but he and the others crossed the lines on the level, as being the shortest way. The sole contention raised on behalf of the employers was that the injury to the deceased did not arise out of and in the course of his employment, and the case of "Holness v. Mackay" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 319) was relied on to show that the employment did not commence until the hour of actual work had arrived and the deceased was upon that part of the employers' premises where such work was to be performed. The County Court Judge was of opinion that the accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased man's employment—viz., whilst he was carrying out the orders of his superior officer and proceeding to the particular place upon his employers' premises where he was directed to go. He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant for £150. The employers appealed.

MR. MONTAGUE LUSH and MR. A. CLUTTON BROCK appeared for the employers, and contended that the accident did not arise out of and in the course of the deceased's employment. He was not crossing the line for purposes of his masters. He was not under an obligation to cross the line at all. He selected a dangerous route, when he had the alternative of two safe ones. His employment did not begin till he reached the engine-shed. He might have gone by any train he liked. While he was travelling by train, and until he reached the shed, he was his own master, and he was not acting as the servant of the company at all.

MR. W. H. DUCKWORTH appeared for the applicant.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the applicant, dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said the only question the Court had to consider was whether there was any evidence to support the conclusion of the County Court Judge that this accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased's employment. It seemed to him that there was an implied contract between the masters and the man that if he would get into a train at King's-cross they would take him by their line to his work and bring him back again. There was a difference between the beginning of employment and the beginning of work. In his opinion the employment in this case began at King's-cross, and the workman was in the course of his employment when the accident happened. He thought that the judgment of the learned County Court Judge was quite correct, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

REGINA V. MARY BAINES AND OTHERS.*

Criminal Law—Receiving stolen goods—Husband and wife—Separate receiving by wife—Joint indictment—Conviction, validity of.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved by the Deputy-Chairman of the Liverpool County Quarter Sessions, as follows:—(1) The prisoner, Mary Baines, together with Michael Baines, her husband, and two other prisoners named Godfrey and Toner, were tried at the quarter sessions holden at the Sessions-house, Islington, Liverpool, on the 17th day of April, 1900, on an indictment charging them with breaking and entering a dwelling-house at Rainhill, and stealing therein a quantity of property belonging to one William Holland (Owen). (2) The indictment contained a second count charging all of the said prisoners with receiving the property set out in the first count of the indictment well knowing the same to have been feloniously stolen. (3) The prisoner Toner pleaded: "Guilty" to the first count contained in the indictment and the other prisoners "Not guilty" to both counts. (4) Evidence was given of a breaking and entering of the premises described in the indictment on the 22nd day of January, 1900, and of property to the value of £80 having been stolen therein. (5) Evidence was also given that on the 6th day of February the prisoner Toner, who is the uncle of the male prisoner Baines, left at the house of the said prisoners Michael and Mary Baines in Westmoreland-street, Rainhill, in the county of Lancaster, some of the property referred to in the indictment—to wit, a silver lamp and a cigar box containing broken silver, and that the said silver lamp and cigar box were given to the prisoner Mary Baines by the prisoner Toner. (6) It was further proved in evidence that the detective, Albert Taylor, who made a search of the house, followed the prisoner Mary Baines to a house close to; that she went into this second house and came out with the silver lamp referred to in the previous paragraph. (7) The prisoner Godfrey was acquitted, but the prisoners Michael and Mary Baines were convicted of feloniously receiving on the second count of the indictment, and a sentence of three months' imprisonment was passed upon each of them. (8) Counsel for the prisoner Mary Baines thereupon submitted on the authority of "Reg. v. Archer and others" (1 Mood. C.C., p. 143) that the conviction was bad, inasmuch as the charge being a joint one no question of a separate receiving by the wife (the prisoner Mary Baines) had been left to the jury. (9) The point raised on behalf of the prisoner Mary Baines was argued by her counsel, who submitted that it was too late after sentence to cure the previous verdict by asking the jury whether the prisoner Mary Baines was guilty of a separate receiving. (10) After hearing counsel for the prosecution the Deputy-Chairman overruled the objection, and after reading over the evidence to the jury asked them whether or not the prisoner Mary Baines was guilty of a separate receiving. (11) The jury found that Mary Baines was guilty of a separate receiving, and her counsel then applied for a case, which was granted, the prisoners being admitted to bail pending the appeal. (12) The questions for the opinion of the Court are—(i.) whether a husband and wife being jointly indicted for receiving stolen goods can both be convicted, although the jury found a separate receiving on the part of the wife; (ii.) whether the Deputy-Chairman under the circumstances of this case was acting legally in putting the question to the jury as to the separate receiving at that stage and after verdict.

Mr. V. D'ARCY appeared for the prosecution, and submitted that the conviction was good. He cited "Reg. v. John" (13 Cox, 100); "Reg. v. Cohen" (11 Cox, 99); and 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 96, s. 94.

The prisoner Mary Baines was not represented.

The COURT upheld the conviction.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of ENGLAND (Lord Russell of Killowen), in the course of his judgment, said:—In this case, so far as is necessary to deal with it, we are concerned with that portion of the indictment in which Mary Baines and her husband are jointly indicted for receiving the goods knowing them to have been stolen. The evidence as regards the husband is not set out in the case, but apparently there was evidence that he had received a portion of the stolen goods. There is no reason why we are not to presume that the Chairman rightly directed the jury on the general law, but the point is raised that he did not specifically put to them the question whether there was a separate receiving by the female prisoner. That there was ample evidence of a separate receiving by her cannot be doubted, having regard to paragraphs 5 and 6 of the case. There is no question that she had received some portion of the stolen property, and that she was not then acting under the influence of her husband. In such a state of facts the Judge ought to tell the jury that the mere fact of the marital relation does not raise any presumption of the husband's control. Further, even if the husband was in the neighbourhood it is a question for them whether the wife was taking an independent part. "Brown v. Attorney-General for New Zealand" ([1898] A.C., 234) is an authority for that proposition. Any remaining difficulty as to whether each act of receiving is to be regarded as a separate crime is removed by section 94 of 24 and 25 Vict., cap. 96. Finally, as to the second question it is enough to say that it is not necessary to consider it for the purposes of the present case. If it were, I should hesitate for a long time before I could arrive at the conclusion that the course taken was a proper one. We see no reasonable cause to doubt that the prisoner Mary Baines was properly convicted.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said:—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to add that it seems likely that the Chairman put the second question to the jury, not as part of the procedure, but in order to satisfy himself whether there was any ground for reducing the sentence.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL and MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

THE DUKE OF ATHOLL AND OTHERS V. THE GLOVER INCORPORATION OF PERTH AND OTHERS.*

Fishery—Salmon fishing—Fixed engine—"Toot-and-haul" nets—"Hang nets."

The use of "toot-and-haul" nets and hang nets for catching salmon on the river Tay held illegal.

The same counsel appeared in both appeals, the appellants' counsel in the first being for the respondents in the second, and vice versa. The case is reported in 36 Scottish Law Reporter, 481. The appeal was from a decision of the First Division (the Lord President and Lords Adam, McLaren, and Kinnear), dated March 3, 1899, affirming interlocutors of Lord Low, dated November 5, 1897, and of Lord Stormonth Darling, dated May 18, 1898. In the first of these two appeals the question was of the legality of fishing for salmon with nets known as "toot and haul" nets or other nets of a similar kind. In the second it was whether it is lawful to fish with what are known as hang nets. Their Lordships have held both methods to be illegal. They are described in the judgment of Lord Brampton.

*Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The counsel were the Dean of Faculty (Mr. Asher, Q.C.), Mr. Dundas, Q.C., and Mr. Blackburn (all of the Scotch Bar), for the appellants in the first appeal; and the Lord Advocate (Mr. Graham Murray, Q.C.), the Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Dickson, Q.C.), and Mr. C. N. Johnston (of the Scotch Bar), for the respondents.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—In both these cases the question is whether the mode of catching salmon in the Tay pursued by those who are described in the two cases as fishing is a mode which may be lawfully pursued. I am of opinion that both modes are unlawful. The case known as the "Bermondsey Boat" case brought to a definite issue of principle what is or is not lawful in the use of a net, and I think the distinction may be compendiously stated and is that a fixed net is unlawful, while a net used by a fisherman in the act of fishing is lawful. I cannot help thinking that some ingenious person has carefully considered the exact words used by Lord Westbury in the case in question and has sought to evade the pressure of his words by colourable alteration of the method in which the net is treated, but qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice. The nets in both these cases seem to me to be fixed engines. The mode in which they operate is not an act of fishing at all. It is a wall of net suspended across the stream, not to operate to catch a fish in the ordinary mode in which a net is used, but fixed and operating as an obstruction through which the fish attempts to get and entangles itself in its efforts and so is caught. This, doubtless, is the way when herring nets in some places are put into the sea, but such an operation is not to my mind an act of fishing at all, and undoubtedly by the mode in which a succession of nets is used in this way all up the stream an enormous obstruction to the ascent of the fish is created, and undoubtedly this is one of the reasons which led the Scottish Parliament to enact that fixed engines were unlawful. Of course a net, however used, is in itself an obstruction, but there is all the difference in the world between the temporary use of a net in the act of catching a fish and what I have described as a wall of net remaining and intended to remain for a considerable time motionless, and in that sense fixed. And it appears to me that by a long line of decisions the broad distinction has been insisted upon, and, to my mind, unanswerably concluded, by the judgment in "Hay v. the Lord Provost of Perth" (4 Macq., 535). The quality which Lord Westbury attributed to the mode of fishing which he held to be lawful, and which he said came within the principle of ordinary net or coble fishing, was that it was a mode of fishing which exists only and takes the fish only while the net is kept in motion, and which preserves all the distinctive peculiarities of fishing by net and coble—namely, taking a grasp of a portion of the river during such time only as is required for the boat to run round the net. And Lord Chelmsford in the same case described the decisions which had been quoted to him as establishing that contrivances for the purpose either of preventing the fish from passing up the river or of catching them by fixed nets were illegal. The principle is, I think, established also by the judgment of the Lord President in the earlier stages of the same case. One passage seems to me to put the matter very clearly. The judgment of the House of Lords is quite clear as to the stent nets. Then in the case of "The Duke of Queensberry v. the Marquis of Annandale" it was fixed nets for obstructing the passage of the fish used (as the judgment states) not for the purpose of catching fish, but for preventing or obstructing them from passing up the river, and I therefore find that the methods used of stenting nets across the river, either reaching altogether from side to side or overlapping each other in the manner mentioned in the proof, &c., are illegal. Fixed nets which would prevent altogether the passing of the fish I hold to be unlawful, whether the engine be a fixed net or fixed stakes stationary in the water. In the case of "Dirom v. Littles" it was a hang net; in the Searle case it was a stake net; in "The Duke of Atholl v. Wedderburn" it was toot nets and stake nets and tent nets alleged to be of the nature of stake nets. Then in the case of "Cunningham v. Taylor" it was a dyke erected; in the case of "Mackenzie v. Houston" it was the case of stent nets, the one end of the stent net being fixed by an anchor in the stream and the other end on shore, and the net so fixed was left standing stretched into the river, a fixed engine for catching the fish. Now it seems to me that both the hang nets and the toot and haul nets are illegal within the principles laid down by all the cases. In neither case is it an act of fishing. It is a fixed net, and, although fixed but for a time, its operation is that of an obstruction. It remains, as nearly as the person managing it can procure it to do, perfectly still, and its operation when thus still is simply obstruction. When a fish strikes it, it is true the fisherman then does something to catch the fish, most commonly by gaff; but its operation is what I have said. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the use of these nets in both the cases and upon the admitted facts is illegal, and I accordingly move your Lordships that the judgment in the first case should be affirmed and in the second case be reversed, with the usual result as to costs in each.

LORD MACNAGHTEN concurred; LORD MORRIS, who was absent, had expressed his concurrence; and LORD DAVEY concurred in the motion in the second case.

LORD BRAMPTON, in the course of his judgment, said,—The Duke of Atholl and others, proprietors of salmon fishings in the River Tay, sought in this action to obtain a decree against the defenders, who are proprietors or leasees of fishing on the estuary of that river below the fishings of the pursuers, to restrain them from fishing for salmon with nets known as "toot and haul" nets, or other nets of a similar kind. The Lord Ordinary pronounced such decree in favour of the pursuers. On appeal to the First Division of the Court of Session the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was unanimously affirmed, upon the ground that the Court was bound by the principle and rule of law enunciated by Lord Chancellor Westbury, and concurred in by Lord Chelmsford in this House, in the case of "Hay v. the Magistrates of Perth" (4 Macq., 535). In this view I entirely agree; and, applying that principle to the present case, I find it impossible to escape from the conclusion that the use of the toot and haul net in the manner described both by the pursuers and the defenders was and is illegal. The essence of Lord Westbury's judgment consists in those words, "It is illegal to fish for salmon with any net or with any species of engine or machinery devised or constructed for catching fish which is a fixture, which is at all fixed, or permanent even for a time in the water;" and he went on to say, "and if I were asked to define the conclusion which I should derive from the statutes and the decisions, it would be this, that it was not legal to fish with a net unless when the net continued in the hand of the fisherman. The net must not quit the hand, and the net must be in motion during the operation of fishing." It is somewhat difficult to assign to the toot net its true office. In the appellants' case it is "admitted that the toot and haul nets are adapted for and have been used by the defenders for the purpose of catching salmon and fish of the salmon kind;" but I find this passage:—"The most important point about the action of this net is, the appellants maintain, that it does not capture fish while in its stationary position. If left in the water unattended, it would neither catch nor obstruct fish. There is nothing to prevent fish swimming round the net just as they may and frequently do swim round or back from the sweep net; and they are caught by being surrounded by the net after it has been cast loose and hauled on shore by the fisherman." Now it cannot be denied that per se the toot net, the use of which is objected to, is not, when extended and stationary, adapted for capturing salmon, for it has no bag or trap attached to it into which the salmon might enter in trying to clear the net, but from which, once in, it could not extricate itself. During such time it could only operate as an obstruction to check the fish in its onward progress up the stream, until such time as the net should be freed from the boat and hauled on shore. It is very obvious that such was the purpose for which it was designed; the hook or cleet very much assists the attainment of this object, for if a fish obstructed by the extended net at right angles with the shore attempted to make its way round the end of the net, instead of finding its way clear it would find its progress impeded by the hook or cleet and held within the ambit of the net until the haul was made. This to my mind is very strong evidence that the sole object of the stationary extended net is to obstruct, and the keeping the extended net stationary across the flow of the river for three or more hours waiting for a fish to come is confirmation irresistible that obstruction was the object—that is, to keep the fish below the line occupied by the net, and to capture him by releasing the net from the boat, and so then converting it into a sweep or drift net from below that line until the fish was landed on the shore. I cannot entertain a doubt of the soundness of the judgments of the Courts below. I think therefore that this appeal should be dismissed with costs. As to the second case, the noble and learned lord continued:—"This is an appeal from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, declining to declare the illegality of fishing for salmon with what are known as hang nets in the river or estuary of the Tay, following the decisions of the First and Second Divisions in the cases of 'The Masters of Allan's Mortification v. Thomson' (7 Rettie, 221) and 'The Earl of Wemyss v. the Earl of Zetland' (18 Rettie, 126), which the Court felt were binding upon it. I can see no substantial distinction between this case and that of 'Wedderburn v. the Duke of Atholl,' just decided by this House. The hang net and the method of using it may, I think, be thus described with practical accuracy. The net itself is an oblong net made of very light material, from 80 to 150 yards long, and from five to six yards deep, fitted on the upper side throughout its length with a light cord and floats to keep it up to the level of the surface of the water, and on the lower side with a thick rope sufficiently heavy to sink it when used for the purpose of fishing as low down in the water as the net is deep. It is paid out for its full length from an ordinary cable boat at a right angle across the current, and when so paid out forms to that extent a perpendicular barrier of network across the current. There is nothing required beyond the weight of the rope to fasten the net either to the bottom or the side of the river. It hangs freely in the water floated and weighted as I have described. No doubt the action of the current upon the net is calculated more or less to shift the position of it, and so from time to time to make it necessary to gather it up and reshoot it, to restore it to its perpendicular position, which is the object of the fisherman, for so long as it can be maintained in that position it is a continuous slowly floating barrier at a right angle with the current, offering quite as effective and serious an impediment to fish proceeding upwards as if it were stationary, keeping many of them below the line of the net in the stream, so that they may be captured from the boat, which remains in attendance on the net, in their endeavours to get beyond it, or be secured by the gaff, which is mostly used, and the use of which for such purposes is illegal. I do not say that there is any absolute obstruction which would render it impossible for a fish to proceed upwards or downwards beyond the net, for there is mostly space between the bottom of the net and the bed of the river if the fish should chance to be swimming low down, or perchance it might find its way to the side of the net so as to get round it. The object of the fisherman, however, is to do that which the perpendicular net is calculated to do—namely, to arrest the progress of fish, whether going up or coming down the river—so as to afford the fisherman an opportunity of landing them with a gaff into the boat. If I had before me simply the evidence of Maxwell, one of the defender's witnesses, I could come to no other conclusion than that the object of the hang net was not to capture fish in the ordinary mode as by net and coble, but to impede the progress of the fish whether going up or down the river, to keep them on that side of the net they might chance to be approaching until they became unable to escape from the gaff, whether they previously had become entangled in the net or not. I can discover no satisfactory distinction between the use of the hang net and the operations complained of in the cases of 'The Duke of Queensberry v. the Marquis of Annandale' and 'Dirom v. Littles' ([1797] Mor., 14,282), referred to in the appellant's case in 'Wedderburn v. the Duke of Atholl'; and I think it falls within the principle and rule of law laid down by Lord Westbury in the case of 'Hay v. the Magistrates of Perth,' with the concurrence of Lord Chelmsford, "that it is illegal to fish for salmon with any net which is a fixture, which is at all fixed or permanent even for a time in the water," a decision which met with the approval of Lord Blackburn in 'The Duke of Sutherland v. Ross' (3 App. Cas., 746), for although it may be said that the net in this case is not stationary in one spot for any length of time, still, used as it is chiefly in slack water, it is in a perpendicular position when first paid out, and is retained in that position for as long a time as is possible; and so long as it so floats gradually down the current it remains a continuous obstruction. I think this brings it within the spirit of the decision, having regard to the mode in which the capture of fish is effected. I think, then, that the use of the hang net as described is illegal, and that the judgment appealed against should be reversed with costs.

GRANT V. LANGSTON.*

Revenue—Inhabited house duty—House occupied

*Reported by J. EYRE THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

partly as a dwelling-house and partly as business premises—Exemptions from payment of duty—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13 (1) and (2)—57 Geo. III., c. 25, sec. 1—5 Geo. IV., c. 44, sec. 4.

The exemptions in the above statutes from payment of inhabited house duty as regards a house, or part of a house, occupied as trade or business premises apply to an entire house occupied by the owner partly as a dwelling-house and partly as business premises.

This was an appeal involving a very important question of house duty, on which the arguments were heard on March 29 last, from a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, sitting as a Court of Exchequer, dated June 24, 1898. The appendix, which in House of Lords appeals sometimes equals the bulk of "Liddell and Scott," was a model which one would like to see more frequently followed, as it consisted simply of a plan of the premises the subject of taxation. The action arose on a stated case, dated April 6, 1898, and the hearing below is reported 25 Ct. of Session Cases, 4th series, 1,040. The case was as follows:—"Mr. John Grant, licensed retailer of spirits, appealed against an assessment of £3 5s. 6d., being the inhabited house duty charge under 14 and 15 Vict., cap. 36, and Rule III. of 48 George III., cap. 55, Sch. B., and the Finance Act, 1897, for the year ended May 24, 1898, at the rate of 6d. in the pound on £131, the cumulo value of a dwelling-house and licensed premises situate in Bath-street, Portobello, and claimed that the premises did not fall within the said rule, and that the duty should be confined to that portion of the premises occupied as the dwelling-house. The following are the facts found and admitted:—1. The premises in question consist of a building of two storeys under one roof, of the whole of which the appellant is both owner and occupier. 2. The ground floor, No. 49, Bath-street, is used by the appellant for the purpose of carrying on the trade of licensed retailer of spirits, and the upper storey, No. 47, Bath-street, is occupied by him as his dwelling-house. The terms of his publichouse certificate, which is in the form of Schedule A, No. (2), appended to the Public-Houses (Scotland) Act, 1862, are that he is authorized and empowered 'to keep a publichouse at 49, Bath-street, Portobello . . . for the sale in the said house, but not elsewhere . . . of spirits, wine, porter, ale. . . ' 3. The only access to the dwelling-house is by the door opening from the street, No. 47, Bath-street, to the staircase leading to the upper storey, and for the appellant to enter his licensed premises from his dwelling-house he has to descend the stair, come into the public street, and enter by the public door, No. 49, Bath-street. 4. The dwelling-house is not included in the premises licensed for the sale of exciseable liquors, and they are separately entered in the valuation roll of the city of Edinburgh, the annual value of the house being entered as £33 and of the licensed premises as £98. 5. The licensed premises were formerly occupied by a tenant who was not tenant or occupier of the dwelling-house. No person resides in the licensed premises, as the magistrates of Edinburgh, being the licensing authority within whose jurisdiction Mr. Grant's house is situate, have made it an unwritten condition that Mr. Grant should not reside in his licensed premises. We, the Commissioners, being of opinion that no liability to inhabited house duty existed in respect of the business premises, No. 49, Bath-street, Portobello, sustained the appeal, and restricted the assessment to the duty on £33, the annual value of the dwelling-house, No. 47, Bath-street, Portobello. Whereupon the surveyor of taxes, Mr. F. W. Langston, expressed dissatisfaction with our decision as being erroneous in point of law, and having required us to state a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, it is hereby stated and signed accordingly.—JAMES H. GIBSON CRAIG, WM. WHITE-MILLAR, Commissioners." The Court of Session (the Lord President, Lord Adam, Lord M'Laren, and Lord Kinnear), on February 24, 1898, reversed the determination of the Commissioners and held that the appellant was liable for inhabited house duty for the publichouse.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., Mr. Roskill, and Mr. F. T. Cooper (of the Scottish Bar) were for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir R. E. Webster, Q.C.), the Lord-Advocate (Mr. Graham Murray, Q.C.), and Mr. A. J. Young (of the Scottish Bar) for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I think this is one out of many similar cases in which the difficulty of construction arises from an alteration in things which, notwithstanding alteration, retain their original name, while the Legislature in retaining the original name in a statute legislates by using words in a wholly artificial sense. A hundred years ago there was not much difficulty in saying what was a house, but builders and architects have so altered the construction of houses, and the habits of people have so altered in relation to them, that the word "house" has acquired an artificial meaning and the word is no longer the expression of a simple idea; but to ascertain its meaning one must understand the subject-matter with respect to which it is used in order to arrive at the sense in which it is employed in a statute. With the most sincere respect for the authority of Sir George Jessel, I cannot help thinking that his reasoning in the Westminster case is unsatisfactory. No one will doubt the soundness of the maxim which he quotes as the basis of his judgment, but, as usual, it is the application of it which raises the difficulty. Indeed, I think it is true to say that the judgment to which I refer proves too much for the purpose of the final conclusion. It establishes undoubtedly that the word "house" is an ambiguous word. It shows that you must seek otherwise than in the word itself what is the meaning in which the Legislature has used it, since a natural and ordinary meaning of an ambiguous word cannot be ascertained without the context. Now, the instances to which the learned Judge referred, such as the two Temples constituting one house, or to such houses as Christ Church, Oxford, have as little to do with structure, architecture, or forms of building or occupation as with the complexion of the inhabitants. House, in one sense, means simply a community, ecclesiastical or secular, having common revenues, objects, and, in pre-Reformation times, vows or obligations common to those who joined it; and accordingly the word "house" has no common or ordinary meaning fixed and definite so that by the mere use of the word you can determine in what sense the Legislature has used it. I think the original idea of an inhabited house was that of a building inhabited by one person responsible for the tax who was himself the inhabitant of the whole of the house, but very soon questions began to be raised as to what constituted the unity of a house. One side of a whole street is in one sense structurally one building, and the separate unity of each of the structures would in all its arrangements for occupation for one family and its head be, of course, recognized as a house separately liable for the tax. Even detached houses were always recognized as two houses, although they were structurally one and protected by one roof, but controversies have arisen in respect of rating for the poor for purposes of taxation and for the franchise, and decisions have been arrived at not always satisfactory or reconcilable with each other. An outer door and a common or separate staircase have been most commonly the tests applied, and I am not myself able to see how the case of chambers in an Inn of Court and the decision of the Westminster case are reconcilable with each other. But the Legislature went further in respect of artificially creating more houses than one out of a house, which was in every ordinary sense one taxable house, by giving from time to time exemptions from taxation to parts of structures which were in every sense structures adapted and probably intended originally for the occupation of one inhabitant as the head of a family, but Sir George Jessel himself said in "Yorkshires v. Clayton" that in modern times a practice has grown up of putting separate houses one above the other. They are built in separate flats or houses; but for all legal and ordinary purposes they are separate houses. Now it appears to me that apart from the exemption created by the Act 41 and 42 Vict., c. 15, section 13, I should have great difficulty in holding this building to be one inhabited house within the various alterations which the Legislature has introduced into what it has for fiscal purposes called a house. It appears to me that in the language of Sir George Jessel there are two houses built one above the other. I suppose no one would dream of calling them one house if the same conditions which are found to exist here were found to exist in the same structures not built side by side and not one above the other, and if it is possible to have one house built over another house then all that has been held to constitute a separate house exists here. There is nothing which is held in common; the one house is superposed upon the other, and that is all. With respect to the exemption, I do not think what has been said by the Lord President can be made clearer. In "Coutts v. Russell," to use his own words, the word tenement in the statute means "part of a house so structurally divided and separated as to be capable of being a distinct property or a distinct subject of lease." There is no doubt that if this is right, and I am by no means prepared to say it is wrong, the house which is here described is undoubtedly capable of being a separate property or separately leased, but I have more difficulty in seeing that it is structurally divided if I assume that the whole building is one house. If, as some of your Lordships seem to think, the exemption was introduced so as to alter the law, as it was declared to be in the Westminster case, I cannot think it was very happily done. I am not sure that I know what is a tenement as applied to such a subject-matter, though, as I have said, I am not prepared to differ with the Lord President. Nor is it, perhaps, very material to consider it further since for the reason I have given I think this—i.e., the ground-floor house—is not an inhabited house within the statute, and therefore I agree with your Lordships that this appeal should be allowed and the decision of the Commissioners restored.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I think the claim of the Crown cannot be sustained. The question seems to me to depend entirely upon the true construction of subsection 2 of section 13 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878. The argument on behalf of the Crown, as I understand it, was that subsection 2 was to be treated for all practical purposes as part of subsection 1; that the purpose of subsection 2 in substance was to provide that in the case of premises used for professional purposes, as well as in the case of trade premises, the mere circumstance that a caretaker resided therein should not make the building liable to taxation as a dwelling-house, and that the effect of reading the two subsections together was to limit the application of subsection 2 to buildings chargeable as an entire house or divided into tenements, being distinct properties. I think the two subsections are quite independent, distinct in origin, and diverse in operation. The object of subsection 1 was to remedy the hardship exemplified in the case of "The Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association" ([1876] 1 Ex. D., 469). The association had erected blocks of buildings structurally divided into separate tenements for suites of apartments. Some had been let for residential purposes, some as offices or chambers, while others were still unlet. Under Rule VI. of the Act of 1808 the association was held to be chargeable as the occupier of these buildings, and liable for duty in respect of all the separate tenements or suites of apartments, whether let or unlet. The evolution of subsection 2 was a more gradual process. It was marked by successive relaxations in favour of trade. Rule III. of the Act of 1868 provided that all shops which were attached to the dwelling-house or had any communication therewith should be valued with the dwelling-house. If that rule had remained unaltered there could have been, according to the decided cases, no doubt as to the appellant's liability. The first change was made in 1817. The Act of that year (57 Geo. III., c. 25, section 1), takes note of the fact that it had become usual for tradesmen and shopkeepers to carry on their business in one house and to reside in another. It enacts that tenements or buildings, "or parts of tenements or buildings," previously occupied as dwelling-houses by persons who since had gone to reside in taxable dwelling-houses elsewhere, should be discharged from assessment when used wholly as houses for trade or as warehouses for goods or as shops or counting-houses. The Act of 1824 (5 Geo. IV., c. 44) extended this exemption to persons using any house, tenement, or building, "or part of a tenement or building," for the purpose of any profession, vocation, business, or calling by which they seek a livelihood or profit. A further concession was made in 1867. By section 25 of the Inland Revenue Act of that year (30 and 31 Vict., c. 90) it was enacted that in order to entitle the occupier of "any tenement or building or part of a tenement or building" to exemption on the ground of such premises being occupied for trade purposes only, it should not be necessary to prove, nor should proof be required, that such occupier resided in a separate and distinct dwelling-house or part of a dwelling-house chargeable with the said duties. Section 11 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 14, section 11), provided that any "tenement or part of a tenement" occupied as a house for the purposes of trade only should be exempt, although a caretaker dwelt in it for the sake of protection. So far, the relaxations in favour of trade introduced by the Acts of 1867 and 1869 had not been extended to premises used for professional purposes. But in 1878, when the Legislature dealt with the house tax for the purpose of remedying the hardship which occurred in the case of the Westminster Chambers Association, occasion was taken to put premises used for professional purposes precisely on the same footing as premises used for trade purposes, and section 11 of the Act of 1869 was then repealed. It is to be observed that while section 11 of the Act of 1869 is repealed, section 25 of the Act of 1867, though apparently superseded, is not repealed. Now the Act of 1867, following the language of the earlier Acts, speaks of "any tenement or building, or part of a tenement or building." The Act of 1878, section 13, subsection 2, uses the expression "house or tenement." I do not think that it could have been intended to cut down or narrow the concession introduced by the Act of 1867. The more compendious phraseology to be found in the Act of 1878 was, I suppose, adopted because the previous subsection shows that the word "tenement" is used as meaning a division or part of a house.

In the present case it is not necessary to consider whether there must be a structural division or physical separation when exemption is claimed for part of a building as being used for trade or professional purposes only, because the two portions of the building belonging to the appellant are divided so completely that, in fact, they form separate houses. It is said they are not "distinct properties." That is true. But there is not in subsection 2 of section 13 of the Act of 1878, any more than in section 25 of the Act of 1867, anything requiring that when a tenement or part of a house used for trade purposes only is a portion of a building, the rest of which is used as a dwelling-house, the two portions must be "distinct properties" in order to enable the occupier of the trade premises to claim exemption. And certainly there is no reason why such a condition should be introduced if it is not prescribed in terms by the enactment. I am therefore of opinion that the claim of the appellant ought to be allowed. In coming to this conclusion your Lordships will not, I think, be differing from the opinion of the learned Judges of the Court of Session, although, in deference to previous rulings, the actual decision was the other way. My noble and learned friend Lord Morris desires me to express his concurrence.

LORD DAVEY.—If the question on this appeal depended only on the proper construction of the rules contained in Schedule B to the Act 48 Geo. III., c. 55, I should have some difficulty (having regard to the cases already decided on these Acts, both in England and Scotland) in avoiding the conclusion that this entire building is liable to be assessed to the inhabited house duty as one dwelling-house. There is this difference between the circumstances of the case decided in the English Court of Appeal in "Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association" (1 Ex. D., 469) and the present one—viz., that in the Westminster case there was one door opening on the street and one staircase common to the occupiers of all the suites of rooms into which the building was divided, whereas in the case before your Lordships each portion of the building has a separate entrance from the street and no part of the building is used in common by the occupiers of the ground floor and the first floor. Whether that difference is sufficient to make any real distinction, or whether I should have decided the Westminster case in the same way as it was decided by the Court of Appeal it is not necessary for me to say, because I think that the case falls within the exemption contained in subsection 2 of section 13 of 41 and 42 Vict., c. 15. The first subsection applies to a house being one property which is divided into and let in different tenements. Two conditions are required. It must be both divided into and also let in different tenements. It has been decided in England that there must be a physical division of the house into different tenements, and that the word tenement is used in order to comprise the different kind of things (such as shops, warehouses, or offices) into which a house may be divided—"Yorkshire Insurance Company v. Clayton" (8 Q.B.D., 421), and see "Chapman v. Royal Bank of Scotland" (7 Q.B.D., 136). In the Scotch case of "Russell v. Coutts" (9 R., 261) the Lord President says, "Tenement in this statute means a part of a house so structurally divided and separated as to be capable of being a distinct property or a distinct subject of lease"; and Lord Shand says, "The line must simply be drawn by looking at the particular premises and ascertaining whether they are so structurally shut off from the rest of the building occupied as to form an entirely separate tenement of themselves." My Lords, I agree with this definition of the word "tenement" in this section of the Act, and I think it must have the same meaning in subsection 2 as it has in subsection 1.

The second subsection exempts every "house or tenement which is occupied solely for the purposes of any trade or business or of any profession or calling by which the occupier seeks a livelihood or profit," and it also provides that the exemption shall take effect although a caretaker may dwell in such house or tenement. The words are perfectly general. There is nothing about letting. The owner may be the occupier of the tenement. It was argued that the words "house or tenement" are used pleonastically because it was said these are so used in a section of an earlier Act. But it is a sound rule of construction that you must give to each word used in an Act of Parliament its significance if you can do so without violating other provisions of the Act. It was also said that the word "tenement" should be confined to the case when a tenement is separately assessable under section 14 of 48 Geo. III. I see no reason for cutting down the generality of the words in that manner. If that had been the intention it would have been easy to have expressed it. No difficulty is suggested in applying the words of the subsection according to their literal meaning, and I think that the Legislature intended to exempt from the tax every "tenement" (in the sense which that word bears in this section) used for the purposes of trade or business, or professionally. This publichouse is, in my opinion, clearly either a separate house, as some of your Lordships think, or a separate tenement within the meaning of the subsection to which I have referred, and I, therefore, think it should be declared that it is exempted from the tax.

LORD BRAMPTON read a judgment to the same effect. [Solicitors—Godden, Son, and Holmes, for the appellant; F. C. Gore, for the respondent.]

HAY V. NORTHCOTE.*

International Law—Lex loci contractus—Lex domicilii—Marriage abroad valid by English law held to be null and void by foreign Court—Marriage settlement—Validity.

This action raised a question of private international law. By an indenture dated July 20, 1880, made between Edmund Tyrwhitt (since deceased) of the one part and George Burges (since deceased) of the other part, after reciting that previously to the marriage of Louis Alphonse Duperrel with the defendant Louisa Harriet Tyrwhitt, a daughter of the said Edmund Tyrwhitt, the said Edmund Tyrwhitt agreed to assign the two policies of assurance thereafter particularly described upon the trusts thereafter declared concerning the same, and also to enter into a covenant for the payment of an annual sum of £40 in the manner thereafter provided, and that the marriage of the said L. A. Duperrel and the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt was duly solemnized on May 25, 1880, for effectuating the said agreement, and in consideration of the promises the said Edmund Tyrwhitt assigned the two policies of assurance therein particularly described unto the said George Burges, his executors, administrators, and assigns to hold the same upon trust, to receive and invest all moneys assured by, or to become payable under, the said policies, and to pay the income thereof to the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt during her life and after her decease upon trust for all the children of the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt by the said L. A. Duperrel or any future husband, and it was thereby declared that if there should be no issue in whom the trust funds should become absolutely vested then the trustee should hold the said funds upon trust for the next-of-kin of the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt, and the said Edmund Tyrwhitt covenanted to pay during the joint lives of himself and the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt the annual sum of £40 to the said George Burges for the benefit of the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt. The ceremony of marriage between L. A. Duperré and the defendant L. H. Tyrwhitt took place before the British Consul at Bordeaux on May 24, 1880. By a judgment of the tribunal of first instance of Bordeaux, pronounced on March 15, 1882, the tribunal declared the said marriage to be null and void, and thereupon Edmund Tyrwhitt ceased to pay the £40 a year which by the marriage settlement he had covenanted to pay, but the policies of assurance remained in the hands of the trustees and the premiums were duly paid by Edmund Tyrwhitt. Edmund Tyrwhitt died on July 21, 1899, and his will was duly proved by the plaintiff and the defendant, George Russell Northcote, the executors. The defendants Gordon Stafford Northcote and George Russell Northcote are the present trustees of the indenture of settlement of July 20, 1880, and since the death of Edmund Tyrwhitt have received the moneys payable under the two policies of assurance. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the said indenture of settlement was not binding on the estate of Edmund Tyrwhitt and ought to be delivered up, and an order to the defendants G. S. and G. R. Northcote to transfer and pay the trust funds to the executors of the will of Edmund Tyrwhitt.

Mr. BRAMWELL DAVIS, Q.C. (Mr. E. S. Ford with him), contended that the French Court was competent to declare the marriage null and void, and its judgment should be followed in this country. The consideration for the settlement therefore failed entirely, and the settlement was thereby rescinded. The settlement could not be regarded as a voluntary settlement upon the children of another marriage. In the alternative both parties thought there had been a valid marriage, but that proved to be a mistake, and therefore the settlement failed. He relied on the following cases—"Pemberton v. Hughes" ([1899] 1 Ch., 781), "Chapman v. Bradley" (4 De G., J., and S., 71), "Bond v. Walford" (32 Ch. D., 238), "Manning v. Gill" (20 W. R., 357).

Mr. BADDOCK, Q.C. (Mr. A. F. Peterson with him), argued (1) that the consideration had not failed. By 12 and 13 Vict., c. 68, a marriage celebrated before a British Consul abroad was as valid as if it had been solemnized in her Majesty's dominions and could not, therefore, be annulled by a French Court ("Simonin v. Mallac," 2 S. and T., 69). (2) Even if the consideration had failed, the settlement was still good as a voluntary settlement on the children of another marriage ("Paul v. Paul," 20 Ch. D., 742; "Smith v. Smith and Graves," 12 P. D., 102).

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in giving judgment, said that it was contended that, the marriage having been declared null and void by a French Court, the consideration for the settlement failed, and therefore the executors of the settlor were entitled to the policy moneys now in the hands of the trustees. The first question which he had to decide was—Was the marriage null and void in England? The marriage was between a Frenchman and an Englishwoman, and was covered by section 1 of 12 and 13 Vict., c. 68, which enacted as follows:—"All marriages (both or one of the parties thereto being subjects or a subject of this realm) which from and after the passing of this Act shall be solemnized in the manner in this Act provided in any foreign country or place where there shall be a British Consul duly authorized to act in such foreign country or place under this Act shall be deemed and held to be as valid in the law as if the same had been solemnized within her Majesty's dominions with a due observance of all forms required by law." He took that provision to mean that for the purposes of the Act a British Consulate was to be regarded as part of her Majesty's dominions. He had therefore a marriage solemnized in the British dominions, a settlement made in this country with an English trustee, and he was asked to hold that in consequence of a judgment pronounced by a French Court the marriage was null and void in England. The case seemed to him to be governed by "Simonin v. Mallac," in which it was decided that a person having entered into a contract in this country was subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country in respect of the personal status resulting from such contract, and that the personal status resulting from such contract was to be ascertained by the law of this country, in which the contract was made, and not any special law of the country of the domicile of the parties to the contract. In his opinion, therefore, he was not bound by the judgment of the French Court. Consequently the marriage being valid by English law, the consideration for the settlement had not failed, and he need not consider the point whether the settlement would have been good as a voluntary settlement. The plaintiff's action must be dismissed.

OVERSEERS OF DALTON AND OTHERS V. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Highway—Rate—Exemption—Liability to repair ratione tenuræ—Highway Act, 1835 (5 and 6 Will. IV., c. 50), s. 38—Highway Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict., c. 61), s. 35.

Persons liable to repair a highway ratione tenuræ, who have paid a capital sum, even though of nominal amount, under s. 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, in full discharge of such liability, are not liable to highway rates. Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times L.R., 346) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal (Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Vaughan Williams, and Romer), dated May 3, 1899, reversing the decision of May 16, 1898, of the Queen's Bench Division (Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Kennedy). The case below is reported—15 The Times L.R., 346; [1899] 1 Q.B., 1,026; 68 L.J., Q.B., 640. The arguments were heard on April 3, when their Lordships reserved judgment.

The action was on a case stated by the Quarter Sessions for the North Riding of the county of York on October 22, 1897, upon the hearing of an appeal by the North-Eastern Railway Company against a rate made for the relief of the poor in the parish of Dalton in the said Riding, and for other purposes chargeable thereon upon June 7, 1897. It appeared from the case that (1) prior to the making of an order by the Quarter Sessions for the North Riding of Yorkshire at Michaelmas, 1880, constituting the hamlet of Islebeck a separate highway parish, and annexing such parish to the Birdforth Highway District the said hamlet formed part of the township of Bagby in the said district, and was a place in which all the highways were repairable by the occupiers ratione tenuræ and in which no highway rates were leviable by reason of the exemption contained in section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835. The hamlet continued to form part of the township of Bagby until June 1, 1886. (2) The North-Eastern Railway Company was, prior to the making of the said order, and still was in occupation of lands in the said hamlet and was, prior to the making of the order next hereinafter referred to, liable ratione tenuræ to repair a portion, to wit 84 yards or thereabouts, of a certain highway in the said hamlet. (3) Upon April 11, 1881, an order was made under section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, whereby it was ordered that all the highways within the hamlet of Islebeck should become and for ever thereafter be parish highways and be repaired and maintained by the Birdforth Highway Board, and whereby the sums to be paid by the respective occupiers of lands within the said hamlet previously liable to the repair of the said highways in full discharge of all claims thereafter in respect of the repair and maintenance of the said highways or any of them or any part thereof were fixed. (4) On August 22, 1881, the North-Eastern Railway Company was rated and assessed in respect of its said lands to a rate for the expenses incurred by the Birdforth Highway Board in repairing and maintaining the highways within its district including the highways within the hamlet of Islebeck and for other expenses legally incurred by the board. An appeal, however, against the rate by the company to the said Quarter Sessions at Michaelmas, 1881, was allowed. (5) By an order of the Local Government Board dated June 1, 1886, and confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (Poor Law) Act, 1887, the hamlet of Islebeck was detached from the township of Bagby and was amalgamated with the township of Dalton in the Birdforth Highway District. (6) On June 7, 1897, a rate for the relief of the poor in the said parish of Dalton and for other purposes chargeable thereon was made, in which the North-Eastern Railway Company was rated and assessed in respect of its occupation of its said lands in the said hamlet of Islebeck. Such rate was levied (inter alia) in respect of expenses incurred or to be incurred by the Rural District Council of Thirsk, which council is the successor of the said Birdforth Highway Board, in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways within the said rural district, including the portion of the said parish of Dalton which was or is comprised in the said hamlet of Islebeck. (7) The North-Eastern Railway Company duly gave notice of appeal against the said rate, and entered an appeal against such rate at the midsummer quarter sessions of the said Riding, which appeal was duly respite until the following quarter sessions, when it was heard. (8) The appellants admitted that, subject to the matters contained in paragraph 9 hereof, the said rate had been duly laid and demand therefor had been made. (9) On behalf of the company it was contended—(a) That, it having been decided in the appeal to the quarter sessions for the North Riding of the county of York holden at Michaelmas, 1881, that the company was not liable to contribute towards the repair and maintenance of the highways in that portion of the parish of Dalton which was formerly the hamlet of Islebeck, the question was res judicata, and the quarter sessions was precluded from deciding otherwise in the present appeal; (b) that the company, having been liable to maintain the highways in the said hamlet of Islebeck ratione tenuræ, was exempted by section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, from liability to rates levied in respect of the repair and maintenance of such highways, and had continued to be exempt ever since; and (c) that the company, having complied with the requirements of the order of petty sessions referred to in paragraph 3 of this case, was by virtue of section 35 of the Highway Act, 1862, discharged of all claims thereafter in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways, or portions of highways, in the said hamlet of Islebeck, or any part of such highways, and was therefore not liable to pay the said rate. (10) On behalf of the respondents it was contended—(a) That the said decision of the quarter sessions on October 19, 1881, was final only for its proper purpose and object, which said purpose and object was that the North-Eastern Railway Company was not liable to pay a rate of 5½d. in the pound laid on August 22, 1881, for the purpose of raising moneys payable under a precept of the said Birdforth Highway Board, and that the said decision was not conclusive evidence of the matters set out in paragraph 9 (b) and (c) hereof, which said matters only came (if at all) collaterally in question before the said sessions, or were only incidentally cognisable, or were at most only matters to be inferred by argument from the said decision; (b) that the exemption from the payment of highway rates conferred by section 33 of the Highway Act, 1835, continued only so long as the liability of the said company to repair the said 84 yards (or thereabouts) of the said highway ratione tenuræ lasted, and that, therefore, the exemption determined on the said April 11, 1881, when by virtue of the said order of the said justices the said portion of the said highway became a parish highway; (c) that the said order, dated April 11, 1881, only operated to discharge the said company from all the claims from the said date by the said Birdforth Highway Board or its successors in respect of the repairs and maintenance of the said 84 yards (or thereabouts) of the said highway then ordered to be made repairable by the parish, and in no way affects the liability of the said company in respect of its occupation of property within the district of the said Thirsk Rural District Council and otherwise by law liable to be rated from paying rates for expenses incurred by the council of the said rural district in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways within the said rural district. The county quarter sessions held that the question was not res judicata, and that they were not bound by the decision in the appeal to the quarter sessions in 1881. And that the North-Eastern Railway Company was not exempt from payment of any portion of the said rate. The questions for the opinion of the Court were—(1) Were the quarter sessions precluded by their previous decision at Michaelmas, 1881, from holding that the North-Eastern Railway Company was liable to be rated in respect of its occupation of lands within the said hamlet of Islebeck for expenses incurred by the rural district council of Thirsk in relation to the highways within the said rural district? (2) Was the North-Eastern Railway Company exempt from payment of so much of the said rates as was levied in respect of the repair and maintenance of the highways in the said hamlet? The decision of quarter sessions was affirmed by the Divisional Court.

Mr. Marshall, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Gawan Taylor were counsel for the appellants; Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. R. Cunningham Glen for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment, said:—By section 35 of 25 and 26 Vict., c. 61, a person liable to repair a highway ratione tenuræ was enabled, by a process described in the section in question, to apply for an order relieving him from the responsibility of repairing in future, and the justices were authorized in this form of procedure to make an order by which they fixed a certain sum to be paid by the person so applying in full discharge of all claims thereafter in respect of the repair and maintenance of such highway. The language of the statute seems very plain, and it is not denied that the proper procedure was followed; but, for some reason which does not very clearly appear, the justices fixed a merely nominal sum, and for a considerable time the order thus made has been pursued. I know of no reason in the absence of fraud why the bargain thus made under statutable authority is to be set aside simply because the magistrates did not fix, as they should have done, a capital sum such as in their judgment would have been adequate payment in respect of the liability of which they were relieving the proprietor of the land. I do not know what led to this strange result. It may have been an honest blunder as to what was the meaning of the Act of Parliament, but, whatever it was, it is impossible now to treat what was done under the powers of the statute as if it was of no avail. I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

ANDERSON V. VICARY.*

Landlord and Tenant—Game—Occupying owner
—Lessee of sporting rights—Ground Game Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict., c. 47).

The Ground Game Act, 1880, applies to the occupying owner of land, where the right of shooting is separated from the occupation, and the Act is not limited to an occupying tenant.

Therefore where the owner of land let the sporting rights over it, including a farm in the occupation of a tenant, to the plaintiff, and the owner subsequently conveyed part of the land, including that farm, to the defendant, who took a surrender of the tenant's lease of the farm, the defendant was held entitled to the ground game under the Act of 1880 as against the lessee of the sporting rights.

Decision of Wright, J. (15 The Times L.R., 496), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Wright's at the trial of an action without a jury, reported 15 The Times L.R., 496; [1899] 2 Q.B., 486. The action was brought by Mr. Frank Herbert Anderson against Mr. William Vicary for damages for trespass to sporting rights held by the plaintiff over land known as the Plumley estate, at Bovey Tracey, in the county of Devon. The defendant, who had trapped rabbits upon that portion of the Plumley estate of which he was the owner and occupier, pleaded that he was entitled to do so by virtue of the Ground Game Act, 1880. It appeared that on January 18, 1893, Mr. John Harris, who was then the owner of the whole of the Plumley estate, let a portion of it to Mr. William Wreyford for a term of 21 years, reserving to himself, subject to the Ground Game Act, 1880, the right to kill game and rabbits. On August 31, 1895, Harris let to the plaintiff Plumley-house, together with the sporting rights over the whole of the Plumley estate, for five years from January 1, 1896, reserving, however, to his remaining tenants in common with the lessee and subject to the Ground Game Act the right of hunting for and killing rabbits. In January, 1898, Harris sold the land comprised in Wreyford's lease, together with Northcombe-wood, which adjoined it, to the defendant, and in May of the same year the defendant, having obtained from Wreyford a surrender of the land, of which he was the tenant, entered into occupation and farmed the land himself. The defendant then began to trap rabbits in Northcombe-wood and in the hedgerows between it and the land lately let to Wreyford, and the plaintiff, who continued to be the lessee of the sporting rights over the estate, complained, asserting that the defendant had no right to trap rabbits where he did. The question was whether a person who, like the defendant, was the owner as well as the occupier of land was one in favour of whom the Ground Game Act applied, and whether such a person was at liberty to kill rabbits, notwithstanding that his predecessor in title had conveyed away the sporting rights. Mr. Justice Wright was of opinion that the intention of the Act was that there should be no land over which the occupier should not have the right to kill ground game, and that, as far as this right was concerned, an occupying owner was to be treated like any other occupier. He therefore gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. Bodilly appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Foote, Q.C., and Mr. Clavell Salter for the defendant.

The COURT dismissed the appeal, Lord Justice A. L. Smith dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that though he was in the minority he had a very strong opinion about this case, and it would be useless for him to take time to consider whether he could not agree with his learned brethren. With all submission to them he thought that this appeal ought to be allowed. The action was brought to recover damages for trespass to shooting rights, and it was brought against a landowner who was farming his own land. The defendant justified under the Ground Game Act, 1880. An important question was thus raised—viz., whether the Ground Game Act was passed in the interests of landlords as well as of tenants. Speaking for himself he had no doubt that it was passed for the purpose of protecting tenants against landlords, and not for the purpose of protecting landlords against tenants. The original owner of the land in question was Harris, and he, having granted the right of shooting over the land by lease to the plaintiff for five years, sold the land in fee to the defendant subject to the lease of the shooting rights. The defendant went into occupation, and he claimed to be entitled to kill and take rabbits by virtue of the Ground Game Act. Did the Act apply to a landlord who had no tenant? In his opinion, the statement that the Act was passed in the interests of landlords as well as of tenants was absolutely without any foundation. Nothing could be more absurd than to suppose that in 1880 landlords required the protection which this Act was intended to afford. Landlords then had everything in their own hands. The Act was passed for the purpose of protecting tenants whose property was being eaten up by ground game in consequence of their landlords failing to keep the ground game down. It was entitled "An Act for the better protection of occupiers of land against injury to their crops from ground game." It was clear that, if a landlord had no tenant, he was completely dominus of the whole of his land and was not in need of any protection, and in his opinion the word "occupiers" in the title must mean tenants. Then the preamble was as follows:—"Whereas it is expedient in the interests of good husbandry, and for the better security for the capital and labour invested by the occupiers of land in the cultivation of the soil, that further provision should be made to enable such occupiers to protect their crops from injury and loss by ground game." There again it seemed clear to him that "occupiers" must mean tenants. Then section 1 enacted that "every occupier of land shall have, as incident to and inseparable from his occupation of the land, the right to kill and take ground game thereon, concurrently with any other person who may be entitled to kill and take ground game on the same land." There, again, "occupier" must mean tenant; for a landlord who occupied his own land and had no tenant did not require the protection of any such enactment. The provisos contained in subsections 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, and the provisions of the following sections all seemed to be applicable to tenants exclusively, and could not be aimed at a landlord who had no tenant under him. Reference had been made to the case of "Smith v. Hunt" (54 L.T., 422), a decision on section 6 of the Act. Whether that case was rightly decided or not, he thought it clear that the Act generally was drawn in the interests of tenants, and that it was only to be brought into play where there was both a landlord and a tenant.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he had come to a different conclusion, and he thought that the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright was correct. The question was to find out the meaning of the words "occupier of land" in the Ground Game Act. He did not think it necessary to limit the meaning of those words. In his judgment they ought to be taken as meaning what they naturally meant—viz., the occupier of land. He did not at all say that the Act was passed for the protection of landlords, but neither did he know that it was only passed for the protection of tenants. He thought it was passed to prevent the separation of the right of shooting, so far as ground game was concerned, from the right of occupation of land. The Act provided that every occupier of land should always have the statutory right mentioned in section 1—viz., the right to kill and take ground game, inseparable from his occupation of the land. In his view the language of the Act was wide enough to cover the case of an occupier who was the landowner as well as an occupier who was a tenant. He wished to say plainly that there was nothing in his judgment which involved the proposition that, where a landlord was in occupation and there had been no separation of the rights of shooting, this Act would have any operation. In such a case he thought it had no operation.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said he thought that the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright should be affirmed. In his opinion the policy of the Ground Game Act was to ensure that all occupiers of land should have the right to kill and take ground game; and the object of the Act was to give that right to all occupiers of land who would not have it independently of the Act. Subject to that the Act seemed to contemplate occupiers of all sorts. Occupiers of every kind, if they were not able otherwise to keep down the ground game on their land, had that right given to them by the Act. It was said that an occupier within the Act must only have a chattel interest in the land. But he could not see why. The policy of the Act applied as much to an owner in fee as to a tenant for a long term. There was nothing to justify the distinction that was sought to be drawn, and the suggested reason could not be found in the Act itself. If such a distinction were to be drawn, it would cause injustice in the working of the Act. For instance, if a landlord with an agricultural tenant granted a lease of shooting rights, the tenant of the shooting rights could not interfere with the right of the agricultural tenant under the Act. If then the agricultural tenant absconded, and the landlord went into possession, according to the contention of the appellant the landlord would be obliged to work the farm subject to the right of the lessee of the shooting to let the ground game multiply. Yet why should the rights of the tenant under the shooting lease be thus enlarged? Again, a young farmer might be lessee to his father of a small farm over which the rights of shooting might be let. If the father died, and the son succeeded to the freehold, according to the appellant the son would lose his statutory right and the shooting tenant would acquire a right which he had not before. In his opinion the Act ought not to be cut down so as to shut out any occupier, so long as independently of the Act he had no right to kill and take ground game.

CORNWALL V. HENSON.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Delay on part of purchaser—Abandonment of contract—Damages.

Held, upon the facts, that the plaintiff, the purchaser, had not, by his delay in paying the last instalment of the purchase money, abandoned the contract, and was therefore entitled to damages for the way in which the defendant, the vendor, had dealt with the property.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (15 The Times L.R., 544), reversed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's reported in 15 The Times L.R., 544). By an agreement dated August 11, 1892, and made between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff agreed to buy 5½ acres of land at Pitsea, in Essex, for £150. Clause 2 was as follows:—"The purchaser has already paid to the vendor the sum of £40 on account of the said purchase-money of £150, and will pay the balance by equal quarterly instalments of £9 3s. 4d. each on the 29th day of September, the 25th day of December, the 25th day of March, and the 24th day of June in every year, the first of such quarterly payments to be made on the 25th day of December, 1892. The purchaser will also pay to the vendor with each such quarterly payment on account of principal such a further sum as shall be equivalent to interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum on the amount of principal remaining unpaid for the quarter then past, but if the purchaser shall make default in payment of any of such instalments of principal or interest or any part thereof for 30 days after the same shall have become due the whole of the unpaid instalments of the said purchase-money with the interest thereon shall become immediately due and payable." Thus far the clause was in print, but the following words were added in writing:—"I agree to grant a further extension on application of the purchaser at an increase of interest as shall be determined by both parties." The purchaser was by Clause 3 to have possession as on July 1, 1892, and he was by Clause 6 to make and maintain certain boundary fences and hedges, and also to complete and repair part of a road abutting on the land. By Clause 8 the vendor, in the event of default being made for 30 days in payment of the whole of the unpaid instalments with interest, was to be at liberty to resell and to retain out of the proceeds of sale unpaid instalments with interest, and the net balance of the proceeds was to be paid by the vendor to the purchaser. The plaintiff entered into possession and cultivated the land for a considerable time, but he did not make it profitable. He was generally in arrear with his instalments, and from time to time the defendant allowed a postponement, interest being charged and paid at 25 per cent. The last instalment paid by the plaintiff became due on June 24, 1895, and was paid with interest on August 27, 1895. This left only one instalment remaining due, but from August, 1895, no further payment was made by the plaintiff to the defendant. Much correspondence took place, in which the defendant called upon the plaintiff to pay, and on October 23, 1896, the plaintiff wrote a long letter to the defendant asking him to reply to a particular address in Jamaica-road, Bermondsey. Shortly after that date the plaintiff disappeared, and letters addressed by the defendant to him at Jamaica-road were returned through the Dead Letter Office. Inquiries made by the defendant at former addresses and from his relations led to no result. The field was in a derelict state, the fences were broken down, nothing was produced by the land, the road was not made, and rates and tithe were unpaid, the tithe being ultimately paid by the defendant. The land was not worth the total amount of the instalments paid by the plaintiff. Under these circumstances the defendant took possession and advertised the property for sale, and, not being able to effect a sale, he on March 7, 1898, agreed to let the property to a Mr. Burns, with liberty to erect a house, and with the option to purchase at any time during the term. Burns accordingly erected a house, and was still in possession at the trial of the action. The plaintiff again appeared upon the scene, and on June 13, 1898, he wrote to the defendant that he was prepared to "make the final instalment and settlement of the ground purchased." Correspondence took place, but nothing resulted from it, and on July 13, 1898, this action was commenced, the plaintiff claiming specific performance of the agreement of August, 1892, and damages instead of or in addition to specific performance, or alternatively damages for breach of contract or repayment of the purchase-money with interest. It was admitted at the trial that the plaintiff could not obtain specific performance of the contract, he himself not having been always ready and willing to perform his part of the bargain, and the learned Judge held that there was no legal foundation for the plaintiff's claim for damages, or for the return of the instalments which he had paid. His Lordship therefore dismissed the action, but without costs. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Harry Greenwood were for the plaintiff; Mr. Frederic Thompson was for the defendant.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy came to the conclusion on the facts that the plaintiff had by his conduct shown that, in October, 1896, he had in fact abandoned the land and repudiated the contract, and that the defendant was entitled to treat the contract as at an end. If his Lordship (the Master of the Rolls) could come to that conclusion of fact, he should think that the judgment was right. But, with the greatest respect to the learned Judge, he was unable to agree in that conclusion. It was not necessary to decide whether Clause 8 of the contract was entirely optional in favour of the vendor, and that he had lost all his rights independently of that clause, for, in his Lordship's view of the facts, the defendant was not justified in treating the plaintiff as having abandoned his contract. It was quite plain that the defendant never brought it to the mind of the plaintiff, so long as they were in communication, that, if he did not pay the last instalment, the defendant would treat the contract as abandoned. Indeed, months after the last instalment had become due, the defendant wrote letters to the plaintiff on the basis that the property still belonged to the plaintiff. His Lordship could not find any intention on the part of the plaintiff to abandon the contract, or any sufficient notice by the defendant to the plaintiff that, if the last instalment (less than £10) were not paid within a specified time, the contract must be treated as at an end. The way in which the defendant had dealt with the property was not justified, and he was liable in damages. The Court had been asked to assess the damages, and his Lordship thought substantial justice would be done by awarding the plaintiff £125. He must have his costs in both Courts.

Court of Appeal (Webster, M.R.,) 1900.

ELKINS V. THE CAPITAL GUARANTEE SOCIETY.*

Company—Winding up—Trust fund—Balance unclaimed by bondholders.

The balance of a fund set apart for the payment of bondholders in a company in liquidation, the bonds not becoming payable until 1950, not having been claimed for over 10 years in answer to advertisements, the Court refused to make an order that the unclaimed balance should be handed over to the liquidator on behalf of the shareholders.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Stirling's (reported in The Times of June 14 last). The action arose out of the failure of a company which was formed to carry out a scheme of a somewhat curious nature. The company was incorporated in 1874 with the object of collecting and investing at compound interest the small discounts usually allowed by tradesmen to their customers in respect of cash purchases, and to secure the accumulated amount to the customers, out of whose discounts the fund had arisen. The course of dealing of the company was as follows:—The company appointed certain tradesmen as "trade members," who agreed to give to all their cash customers coupons issued by the company of the full nominal value of the amount of the customer's purchases. The tradesmen paid the company 5s. for every £5 worth of coupons, which was to them equivalent to giving the customer 5 per cent. discount for cash. The customer paid nothing for the coupons, but took them in lieu of the usual cash discount. When a customer had received or accumulated coupons of the nominal value of £5 the company gave in exchange for those coupons a bond or promissory note, under which they became bound to pay that amount to the holder within a given number of years (ranging in the different series of bonds from 67 to 90), or whenever the bond should be drawn for payment, the drawings being half-yearly by ballot. By investing and accumulating the money received from the tradesmen in respect of the purchase of coupons it was calculated that the company would be able to provide a fund sufficient to pay the bonds when due or drawn for payment. The business of the company flourished for some years, but ultimately the company were advised that the provision for the half-yearly drawings of the bonds was illegal as a violation of the Lottery Act. This part of the scheme was thereupon abandoned, with the result that the business fell off, and ultimately the company went into voluntary liquidation. The funds which had been set aside to meet the bonds at maturity amounted to about £24,000, and a considerable proportion of that amount is still in Court, representing the security for bonds outstanding and unclaimed. The action was commenced in April, 1883, the plaintiff, who sued on behalf of himself and all the other bondholders, claiming to have the fund distributed under the direction of the Court. The total nominal value of the bonds outstanding at that time was £507,590. By the direction of the Court inquiries were prosecuted and advertisements issued inviting bondholders to come in and receive their proportion of the fund in Court, and as the result of these proceedings about three-fifths of the bondholders had come in and received dividends, but there still remained a considerable sum in Court. An application was made by the liquidator asking that the balance of the fund might be paid over to him on behalf of the shareholders of the company, on the ground that the time had now come when it must be presumed that those bondholders who had not come in had released their claims, and that the proceedings ought to be closed. It was contended by the plaintiff, on the other hand, that as the remaining bondholders might still come in (and it was shown that some had, in fact, come in quite recently) it would be unjust to shut them out from participation in a fund which really belonged to them. Mr. Justice Stirling said that he could only make an order in favour of the liquidator on the assumption that the bondholders, who had not come in, had released their claims. His Lordship could not make that assumption, and he could not at this stage make any order in favour of the liquidator. The inquiry as to the persons who were entitled to the outstanding bonds must therefore be continued. The liquidator appealed.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. A. H. Jessel were for the liquidator; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Manby were for the plaintiffs.

The appeal was heard on the 10th and 14th inst., when the Court reserved their judgment.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY now read the following judgment of the Court:—This is an action for the administration of the trusts of certain trust funds, which have been transferred or paid into Court, and which, with the investments and accumulations thereof, less certain portions applied under orders of the Court in payment of costs were standing in Court at the date of the order on further consideration made on July 12, 1889, hereinafter mentioned. Orders had from time to time been made directing inquiries, and certificates of the result of those inquiries had also been made, but it does not seem necessary to go further into the details of those inquiries and certificates than is hereinafter stated. The trust funds were the result of investments made by the Capital Guarantee Society (now in liquidation under a voluntary resolution passed after the commencement of the action and followed by a supervision order). The trust funds, known collectively as the "Redemption Fund," were to secure payment, at very remote periods, of bonds, or, alternatively, promissory notes, given by the company and made payable to bearer. The bonds or notes were divided into series according to the year in which they were issued, the first series being payable on demand within three years from the year 1850, and the other series within a similar period from later years extending at intervals up to 1970. There were in all nine such series, but as it appears that the security for each series was entirely independent of that of every other, it is only necessary to fix attention upon one of them, as what has been or is decided with reference to one will apply equally to the rest. The plaintiffs are bondholders, suing on behalf of themselves and all other the creditors entitled to the benefit of the respective securities included in the Redemption Fund, and, in addition to the substantial relief sought in the action—viz., the administration of the trust funds under the control of the Court, they have from time to time raised, and pressed with more or less force, some contentions which it may be convenient to state, in order to show that they have not been overlooked. These contentions are (a) that the company failed in the investment of the full amount of trust funds which they ought to have invested according to their contracts; (b) that the company, having begun in accordance with their contract by half yearly drawing by ballot of a proportion of the bonds for immediate payment, ceased to continue those drawings, whereby the value of the security intended for the bondholders was seriously diminished; (c) that in no case have the company paid to bondholders even the full present value of their bonds. Whatever may have been or may yet be the worth of such contentions, they may, we think, be entirely dismissed from consideration in dealing with the actual trust funds to be administered in this action, as at most they would establish claims sounding in damages, which ought to have been, or perhaps might yet be, established against the company in the liquidation, with which we have no concern. The real question seems to turn upon what was the true effect of the order on further consideration of July 12, 1889. There have been subsequent orders on further consideration, applying the principle of that order, but in no respect departing from it. These need not be further referred to. At the date of the order of July 12, 1889, in answer to advertisements directed in the action, very numerous bondholders had established claims as bondholders, and those claims had been certified, but very many remained outstanding, no claims in respect of them having been brought in, still less certified. Subsequent advertisements have been issued at very great expense, but comparatively few claimants have come in in answer thereto, and no advertisements have been issued since 1895. To go back to the time of the order of 1889. In round numbers it may be stated that the whole amount of these bonds of all the series issued by the company, entitling the holders to the benefit of one or other of the trust securities constituting the Redemption Fund, was ascertained to be £500,000. In respect of about £300,000 out of this sum claims had been certified in this action. In respect of the remaining £200,000, though it was certain that claims in respect of them had existed, no claims had been brought in. In other words, three-fifths of the whole number of secured creditors were before the Court, and two-fifths were not before the Court. The three-fifths and two-fifths are ascertained by lumping together all the nine series. In each series, taken separately, the proportions would differ somewhat, but those differences need not be noticed. The trust funds could only be augmented by way of accumulation. If all the secured bondholders had been before the Court they might, at any rate with the consent of the company, have forestalled the time for payment of their bonds, have taken such dividends as would be forthcoming from the proceeds of sale of the securities, and proved in the liquidation for the balance (if any) of the present value of their bonds. The three-fifths elected to have the trust funds divided, taking three-fifths to divide among themselves in proportion to their respective claims as certified, and leaving two-fifths to answer the claims of those who had not come in, and, as this was consented to by the company, and was, apparently, not unfair to the bondholders who had not claimed, it was sanctioned by the Court, and the necessary result embodied in the order of July 12, 1889. What was the meaning of this transaction? The three-fifths, in effect, said, "We prefer to sever the joint interest in the Redemption Fund which we have down to this time had with the bondholders of our respective series who have not claimed, and to withdraw for division among ourselves the whole of the trust funds upon which, after the severance, we have any claim." They got precisely what they would have had if the whole five-fifths had come in and claimed, and it seems to us that they can have no possible claim against the funds appropriated for the benefit of the two-fifths. Any further claim must have been a claim against the company for unpaid debt or damages. They admit, indeed, that they cannot establish any claim until the outstanding two-fifths have been satisfied, but they urge that after all who come in have been satisfied they have a right to come upon the trust fund in priority to the company. This would be a very special and peculiar security which could be created only by agreement, and we can find no trace of any such agreement. Mr. Justice Chitty, the learned Judge who made the order, could see no ground for any such claim, though, as the question was not directly in issue before him, he declined to decide it. If the bondholders who have proved and received dividends cannot, as we think they cannot, establish any claim to the two-fifths of the trust funds carried over for the benefit of the bondholders who have not claimed, it seems to us that those funds must be held upon the same trusts as they would have been held upon if the two-fifths of the bondholders had been the whole number of the bondholders—that is, to satisfy those bondholders, and, subject to the full satisfaction of their claims, for the company in liquidation. We should see no difficulty in arriving at this conclusion but for the doubt expressed by Mr. Justice Chitty whether the liquidator could take anything. That question did not arise for decision before him, and was in express terms left open. It may, however, be shown to have proceeded upon a misapprehension of the exact terms of the order of July 12, 1889, and the separate accounts to which the different moneys and funds were thereby directed to be carried over. The hypothesis which would exclude the liquidator could only be correct if the sum carried over to represent the share of the bondholders whose claims were not certified had been divided among them as tenants in common, as was done with those whose claims were certified. This could not properly be done, as no bondholder could, without his consent, have been compelled to take an immediate instead of a postponed share according to the contract. But it was not expressed to be done by the order. That order declared that the amount of the redemption fund applicable to the securities of each series ought to be divided into two parts, bearing the same proportion to each other as the amount of the bonds and other securities of such series, held by the persons certified to be the holders, bore to the amount of the securities of the same series the holders whereof were not certified, and that the sum certified to be applicable to the first mentioned of such proportions ought to be divided between such persons so certified, or other the then holders rateably and in proportion to the nominal amount of the securities held by them respectively. Directions for giving effect to this declaration were contained in the order, and the persons entitled were duly paid. But no declaration was made as to the sum to be certified as applicable to the securities the holders whereof were not certified, but directions were given to carry over the amount certified to be applicable to their securities on separate accounts entitled "balance of redemption fund, first series," and so on. The present appeal is brought from an order made on a summons of the liquidator, taken out as long ago as 1894, and asking, first, that the inquiry as to holders of bonds may be closed, and, secondly, that out of the funds set apart to meet the claims of the bondholders who have not claimed a sum of money may be paid to the liquidator. To no such relief is the liquidator entitled. The Court has no power to deal with the rights of absent bondholders, nor has it any materials on which it could ascertain that there is now, or will be in the future, any sum payable to the liquidator. By the terms of the contract with the bondholders they are not entitled to payment until after 1950, and are in no way in default in not coming in, and cannot be compelled to come in earlier. The inquiry, therefore, must be kept open. It would be a distinct breach of contract if the liquidator were to interfere in any way with the funds before 1950, and this cannot be allowed. It may be inconvenient to wait for the time mentioned in the contract, but this cannot be avoided. The company chose to make a very extraordinary contract, and it is not strange that inconvenience should follow from it. It was argued that because counsel for the liquidator, when the summons taken out by him came before Mr. Justice Stirling in 1897, thought that he could show that the three-fifth bondholders who had proved had been paid the full present value of their bonds, and obtained time for evidence to be gone into on that point, with a direction from the Judge to the master to take the evidence, he is now estopped from denying that they can receive more out of the two-fifths, if it should turn out that they have received less than the full present value. We do not think that any such estoppel arises, but at most his demand that the evidence should be gone into might have some effect upon costs. Mr. Justice Stirling, in his judgment of 1899, quoted and approved what was said by Mr. Justice Chitty in 1889, to the effect that he could not understand how those who had come in (the three-fifths) would ever be able to get any part of the two-fifths of the redemption fund belonging to those who had not come in, and then said, "No claim is now put forward on the part of those who have come in." It seems plain, therefore, that, notwithstanding all that had taken place in and subsequently to 1897, as to ascertaining the actuarial value of the bonds, he did not consider the liquidator to have given up any of his rights. Mr. Justice Stirling also said, "It may be that at a distant period you (the liquidator) will be able to make a claim. I say nothing one way or another about that." The result is that Mr. Justice Stirling, while approving of the opinion of Mr. Justice Chitty, that the bondholders for three-fifths could not claim against the funds in Court, avoids saying a word in favour of the other opinion, that the liquidator could not claim. That opinion the learned Judge (Mr. Justice Chitty) must not be deemed to have imported into his order, since he expressly leaves the question open. We agree with the conclusions of law put forward by Mr. Justice Stirling. In the result, we think that we may now conveniently make the declaration asked for by the liquidator as to his rights, in the event of there being any ultimate balance subsequent to the year 1953 of the redemption funds, applicable to the bonds of any series. We think, therefore, that this declaration may be made. We think, however, that the order as to costs made by Mr. Justice Stirling should not be disturbed, and further, that the liquidator ought to pay the costs of the appeal.

EVANS V. JUSTICES OF CONWAY.*

Licensing Acts—Licence—Refusal to renew—Appeal to quarter sessions—No evidence offered—Jurisdiction to refuse renewal—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61, s. 27)—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42.

At the general annual licensing meeting the justices, upon an objection raised, refused to grant the renewal of a licence. Upon appeal to quarter sessions the appellant proved the service of the notice of appeal, but no evidence was given on the merits. The appellant thereupon contended that he was entitled to have the licence renewed. The quarter sessions refused the renewal and dismissed the appeal.

Held, that, as no evidence was given at quarter sessions in support of the objection to the renewal, the quarter sessions had no power to refuse to renew the licence.

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 190) reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Channell and Mr. Justice Bucknill, on a special case stated for the opinion of the High Court by the justices of Carnarvonshire, reported ante, p. 190. The appellant, William Evans, appealed to the Carnarvonshire quarter sessions against a decision of the licensing justices, sitting at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting held at Conway, in the county of Carnarvon, on September 25, 1899, refusing to renew the licence of the Royal Oak Inn, Conway. The appeal to quarter sessions came on for hearing on October 19, 1899. It was proved or admitted that the appellant was the holder of a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors in respect of a house known as the Royal Oak Inn, Conway. The appellant appeared by counsel in support of the appeal and to apply for the renewal of the licence. No one appeared on behalf of the justices who sat at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting. A solicitor appeared for the Rev. T. Gwynedd-Roberts, who had objected to the renewal of the licence at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the solicitor for the Rev. T. Gwynedd-Roberts had no locus standi and that, as no one appeared on behalf of the justices, the appellant was entitled to have his appeal allowed and his licence renewed. The Court of quarter sessions overruled these contentions, and decided to hear the appeal; thereupon counsel for the appellant, having formally proved that due notice of the appeal had been served upon all the justices who sat at the adjourned general annual licensing meeting, and that the appellant, together with two sureties, had duly entered into the required recognizances, applied for the renewal of the licence; the Court thereupon, without hearing any evidence on behalf of the respondents or in opposition to the renewal of the said licence, dismissed the appeal and refused to renew the said licence. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the Court of quarter sessions were right. The Divisional Court were of opinion that the Court of quarter sessions had dealt with the matter rightly, and affirmed their decision. The appellant now appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. J. A. FOOTE, Q.C., and Mr. TREVOR LLOYD appeared for the appellant, and contended that the quarter sessions had no power to refuse a renewal in the circumstances of the case. The licensing justices were the only persons who were entitled to appear as respondents on the appeal to the quarter sessions ("Boulter v. Kent Justices" [1897], A.C., 556; "Tynemouth Corporation v. Attorney-General" [1899], A.C., 293). If they did not appear on the appeal the person who asked for a renewal of the licence was entitled to succeed. The Court of quarter sessions overruled the contention that the person who had objected to the granting of a renewal before the licensing justices had no locus standi on the appeal, and then decided against the applicant without hearing the objector. That was inconsistent. The objector ought at least to have been heard as a witness. The quarter sessions had no right, when the licensing justices did not appear, to refuse to grant a renewal without having evidence in support of the objection. The burden of proof was on the objector both before the licensing justices and before the quarter sessions ("Sharp v. Wakefield" [1891], A.C., 173; "Whiffen v. Malling Justices" [1892], 1 Q.B., 362). They referred to section 27 of the Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61), and section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Mr. ASQUITH, Q.C., and Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH, for the justices, argued that it was clear, from the cases of "Sharp v. Wakefield" and "Boulter v. Kent Justices," that the holder of a licence had no vested right to obtain a renewal. The licensing justices had as much discretion to refuse a renewal as to refuse an original application for a licence. The licensing meeting was not a Court; the proceeding before it was not a litigious proceeding at all. When the applicant came by way of appeal from the licensing justices to the quarter sessions, the quarter sessions had the same discretion as the licensing justices had as to whether they should grant a renewal. The quarter sessions were no more a Court, when dealing with applications for renewals, than the licensing meeting was ("Regina v. Staffordshire Justices" [1898], 2 Q.B., 231). The rules which governed proceedings before judicial tribunals did not apply. The doctrine of the burden of proof did not apply so as to bind the quarter sessions in any way, and there was no presumption in the applicant's favour.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, allowing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment of the Court:—The Queen's Bench Division in this case has held, with very great doubt and inviting an appeal to this Court, that when a publican appeals to a Court of quarter sessions, which he is clearly entitled to do under section 27 of the Licensing Act of 1828, against the refusal of a licensing meeting to grant him a renewal of his licence, the Court of quarter sessions can refuse to grant him such renewal without any evidence whatever being given as to why such renewal should not be granted. It was argued by Mr. Asquith on behalf of the justices that the cases of "Sharp v. Wakefield" ([1891] A.C., 173), "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" ([1897] A.C., 556), and "Tynemouth Corporation v. Attorney-General" ([1899] A.C., 293) show that the Court of quarter sessions can do so. We will deal with these cases hereafter. It seems to us that, apart from these cases, a Court of quarter sessions cannot do so. The facts are these:—Evans, the publican, applied to the general annual licensing meeting for the renewal of the licence which he then held for the sale of intoxicating liquors in respect of a house known as the Royal Oak Inn, Conway, and the Rev. Mr. Roberts then appeared and objected to the renewal of the licence. It is not stated in the case submitted to the Court upon what grounds he objected, but the justices at the licensing meeting refused to grant the renewal; nor is it stated upon what ground the licensing justices refused. But it was said at the Bar that he objected upon the ground, first, that the house was not necessary for the requisites of the neighbourhood, and, secondly, upon the ground that the premises were incapable of effective police supervision; and it was also stated that it was thought that upon the latter ground it was that the licensing justices refused the renewal. The publican then appealed to quarter sessions against this refusal. It was there proved on his behalf that due notice of appeal had been given and that he had entered into the required recognizances. The licensing justices did not appear at quarter sessions to oppose, nor was any evidence given in support of any objection to the renewal, and thereupon the Court of quarter sessions, without hearing any evidence, refused to renew the licence. Now, unless the provisions of section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict., c. 94), both as to the notice of objection which must be given and as to evidence which must be forthcoming, are complied with, it cannot, we think, be doubted that a renewal of a licence cannot be refused by licensing justices at a licensing meeting (see the observations upon this section by Mr. Justice Blackburn in "Reg. v. Farquhar," L.R. 9, Q.B., 258); and it has been held by Mr. Justice Hannen and Mr. Justice Quain that the requirements of this section apply equally to the Court of quarter sessions when a publican appeals thereto against the refusal of the licensing justices to renew his licence as to a licensing meeting ("Ruddick v. Justices of Liverpool," 42 J.P., 406). Apart, therefore, from the cases cited by Mr. Asquith, the Court of quarter sessions could not, in our judgment, without hearing some evidence, have done what they have done and refused offhand the renewal of the publican's licence. It was held in the case of "Whiffen v. Malling" ([1892] 1 Q.B., at page 368) that an appeal to the Court of quarter sessions against the refusal of licensing justices to renew a licence amounts to a rehearing, and not to a simple appeal; and, as was stated by Lord Bramwell in "Sharp v. Wakefield" ([1891] A.C., at page 184), "where an appeal is against a refusal of a first licence, the appellant (at quarter sessions) begins, the burden of proof is on him, he has to make out that he ought to have a licence. Where, on the other hand, the appeal is against a refusal to renew a licence, the respondents begin, the burden of proof is upon them, they have to make out that he ought not to have a licence, practically that his licence should be taken from him." And it is admitted that it is the practice of the Conway quarter sessions, in an appeal against the refusal of the licensing justices to renew a licence, for respondents to begin. If no one is at quarter sessions to give evidence upon an appeal against the refusal of the licensing justices to renew a licence, how is the burden of proof satisfied? It appears to us that it is not. My brother Channell says that a man who has a licence has a prima facie right to have it renewed. In this we agree. But he says that the Court of quarter sessions may take away this right if they know that the licensing justices have refused to renew the licence. In this we cannot agree, for, if so, what is the use of the appeal which is clearly given to the publican by section 27 of the Act of 1828? Apart from the cases relied on by Mr. Asquith, in our judgment some evidence must be forthcoming to justify the Court of quarter sessions in refusing the appellant a renewal of his licence. Now "Sharp v. Wakefield," the first case relied upon by Mr. Asquith, no doubt decided that justices had a discretion to refuse the renewal of a licence, though that discretion was to be exercised judicially (not according to private opinion); and Lord Herschell, at pages 185 and 186, points out that the procedure provided by section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, is still in force, and subject to its provisions being complied with the justices may exercise the discretion which the House of Lords held that they had. When the case of "Boulter v. Justices of Kent" is carefully read, it will be seen that it decided two things, and two things only—first, that a licensing meeting was not a Court of summary jurisdiction, so that a Court of quarter sessions, upon appeal by a publican thereto against the refusal of a licensing meeting to grant him a renewal of his licence, could not mulct an objector in costs, because it was only in cases of appeals from a Court of "summary jurisdiction" that the Court of quarter sessions had this jurisdiction, and that a licensing meeting was not such a Court; and, secondly, that an objector to the renewal of a licence was not a party to the proceedings. It is a mistake to say that this decision in any way decided that a Court of quarter sessions was not a Court with all the incidents of a Court both as regards evidence and onus of proof. It did not touch this question at all; it left it just where it was before. What it did decide, as before stated, was that a licensing meeting was not a Court of summary jurisdiction, and therefore the Court of quarter sessions could not condemn an objector in costs, and that an objector was not a party to the proceedings. The third case cited by Mr. Asquith was that of "Tynemouth Corporation v. Attorney-General," which decided that a borough fund with no surplus could not be charged with the costs incurred by the chief constable opposing an appeal to quarter sessions by a publican against the refusal of licensing justices to renew his licence. The decision, in our judgment, has no application to the present case; but there are two passages, one in the judgment of Lord Morris and the other in Lord Davey's judgment, which are pointed to by Mr. Asquith. Lord Morris says "Boulter's case decided that the chief constable had no right to appear as a party," and Lord Davey says "that an objector does not become a party to the proceedings and has no right to appear and be heard on the appeal to quarter sessions. The only proper respondents are the licensing justices themselves, and if the objector be heard it is as amicus curie." How does this show that a Court of quarter sessions can refuse the renewal of a licence, or, as Lord Bramwell puts it, that the publican's licence could be taken from him, except upon evidence? In our judgment neither "Sharp v. Wakefield," nor Boulter's case, nor the Tynemouth case applies to the present case; and Lord Davey in the Tynemouth case certainly was not dealing with the question we have now to decide—viz., whether the Court of quarter sessions can refuse the renewal of a licence without hearing any evidence at all. In our opinion it cannot do so. It follows, therefore, that the question which is left to us must be answered thus—that the Court of quarter sessions was wrong and that the licence must be renewed. For the reasons above given this appeal must be allowed.

IN RE FENNINGS—BAILEY V. BEAVEN.*

Executor—Envelopes containing bank notes addressed to different persons.

This was a summons by executors for partial administration of and directions as to matters arising under the will of the late Mr. Alfred Fennings, of Salus Villa, West Cowes, manufacturer of proprietary medicines. The estate is a very large one; it comprises the goodwill of the businesses of making and selling a number of medicines professing to cure several human ailments, the most profitable of which seems to be one called "Fennings' Stomach Strengtheners." After giving annuities and legacies the testator gave the goodwill and benefit and also all his recipes, capital, and property employed in, belonging to, and accruing and resulting from his several proprietary medicines known as "Fennings' Children's Cooling Powders," "Fennings' Lung Healers," and three other specified medicinal powders to his executor and trustees, with the stock of those medicines in hand, and also the copyright and property belonging to his books "Fennings' Everybody's Doctor" and "Every Mother's Book" on trust to pay a number of annuities and to pay the balance to his two sisters, who are both dead, for life, and after the death of the survivor to pay the balance in perpetuity to the treasurer for the time being of the National Refuge for Homeless and Destitute Children, Shaftesbury-house, Shaftesbury-avenue, upon certain conditions, including a condition that the children provided for by his bounty should not be trained for a seafaring life, he gave his property connected with two other medicines to his executors, subject to a life interest given to George Augustus Beaven, and the interest to pay the income to the treasurer of the same society, and gave his property connected with "Fennings' Stomach Strengtheners" for the benefit of the same society, subject to certain life interests. He gave his residence to his two sisters; in consequence of their death it was undisposed of. The testator had directed envelopes to the number of some 126 to various persons, some of them open and some sealed; those that were open contained cheques in favour of the persons to whom the envelopes were addressed, those that were closed were supposed to contain cheques and bank-notes. The executors asked, for their own protection, directions as to these envelopes and their contents and other matters.

His LORDSHIP declared that the contents of the open envelopes were part of the testator's estate, there having been no complete gift thereof. He said the executors were the proper persons to open the closed envelopes. He gave liberty to the executors to carry on the various proprietary medicine businesses, and directed certain inquiries.

Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. T. L. Wilkinson were for the executors, the plaintiffs; Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Sargent for the next of kin who were entitled to the residue; Mr. J. G. Wood for the treasurer of the National Refuge for Homeless and Destitute Children; Mr. Micklem, Q.C., Mr. Elgood, and Mr. C. P. Sanger for other parties.

SANDERS CLARK V. GROSVENOR MANSIONS COMPANY (LIMITED) AND GUGLIELMO D'ALLESANDRI.*

Nuisance—Heat and smell—Unreasonable user of premises.

The defendant was the occupier of premises underneath a residential flat, and he turned the premises into a restaurant and thereby caused a nuisance by heat and smell to the occupier of the flat above.

Held, that the alterations made by the defendant were not reasonable as regards his user of the premises, and he was liable for the nuisance.

The plaintiff, the wife of Mr. Herbert Sanders Clark, was the lessee of a flat, No. 10, Grosvenor-mansions, and the defendant, Mr. Guglielmo d'Allessandri, was the lessee of premises comprising the basement and entresol beneath the flat and occupied as a restaurant. The action was for an injunction to restrain the use of the restaurant in such a way as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiff. The three heads of complaint were heat affecting the plaintiff's flat by means of the adjoining flue, smells from cooking, and noise. The heat had been remedied before the trial, and the only questions remaining for disposal were—whether there was a nuisance by noise or smell, or both; and as to the costs of the action. The action had been discontinued as against the Grosvenor Mansions Company (Limited).

Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Bryan Farrer were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Ingpen, Q.C., and Mr. T. H. Attwater for the defendant d'Allessandri.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKLEY, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiff complained of nuisance caused by the defendant, d'Allessandri, in three ways—viz., by noise, heat, and smell. There had, no doubt, been a certain amount of noise, caused by plates and dishes, but it did not follow that that was a legal nuisance. It had been laid down by Lord Selborne in "Gaunt v. Fynney" ([1872] L.R., 8 Ch., 8, 12) that a nuisance by noise was emphatically a question of degree, and that to offend against the law the acts complained of must be done in a manner which beyond fair controversy ought to be regarded as excessive and unreasonable. In the present case the noise had not been excessive or unreasonable, although very likely it had been an annoyance. It must be borne in mind that the defendant himself would endeavour to prevent noise for fear of injuring his business. The plaintiff's case, therefore, failed on the first point. On the question of heat the evidence showed that the defendant's premises had been altered; that a large cooking-range had been put up instead of a small grate opening into a flue which was not large enough for the purpose. The result was an excessive and alarming amount of heat. After the action was brought the Grosvenor Mansions Company thought it necessary to take steps to remedy this by thickening the walls of the flue, and the nuisance had thus been removed. But the defendant had exposed his neighbour to an annoyance which she ought not to have been called upon to bear, and he was liable for that. In "Ball v. Ray" ([1873] L.R., 8 Ch., 467, 469) Lord Selborne said:—"In making out a case of nuisance of this character there are always two things to be considered—the right of the plaintiff, and the right of the defendant. If the houses adjoining each other are so built that from the commencement of their existence it is manifest that each adjoining inhabitant was intended to enjoy his own property for the ordinary purposes for which it and all the different parts of it were constructed, then so long as the house is so used there is nothing that can be regarded in law as a nuisance which the other party has a right to prevent. But, on the other hand, if either party turns his house, or any portion of it, to unusual purposes in such a manner as to produce a substantial injury to his neighbour, it appears to me that that is not according to principle or authority a reasonable use of his own property; and his neighbour, showing substantial injury, is entitled to protection." In "Reinhardt v. Mentasti" ([1889] 42 Ch.D., 685, 690) Mr. Justice Kekewich was reported to have said that, "notwithstanding some passages in some judgments to the contrary, the application of the principle governing the jurisdiction of the Court in cases of nuisance does not depend on the question whether the defendant is using his own reasonably or otherwise." His Lordship (Mr. Justice Buckley) only referred to that case for the purpose of saying that he preferred to guide himself by the judgment of Lord Selborne to the effect that the Court must have regard to whether the defendant was using his property reasonably or not. If he was using it reasonably, there was nothing which at law could be considered a nuisance; but if he was not using it reasonably, but was using it for purposes for which the building was not constructed, then the plaintiff was entitled to relief. In "Ball v. Ray" Lord Justice Mallish said:—"I entirely agree with what has been said by the Lord Chancellor—that when in a street like Green-street the ground floor of a neighbouring house is turned into a stable we are not to consider the noise of horses from that stable like the noise of a pianoforte from a neighbour's house, or the noise of a neighbour's children in their nursery, which are noises we must reasonably expect and must to a considerable extent put up with." In this case the alterations made by the defendant were not reasonable. He had used his premises for a purpose for which they were not intended, and he was, therefore, liable in respect of the second ground of complaint. On the question of smell his Lordship held that the defendant had unnecessarily, by altering his window, exposed the plaintiff to the smell from the restaurant. That was unreasonable, and was a substantial interference with the plaintiff's comfort. The defendant undertaking to carry out certain alterations which had been suggested by the plaintiff and embodied in a letter, there would be no order, except that the defendant must pay the plaintiff's costs of the action.

THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL COMPANY V. THE MANCHESTER RACECOURSE COMPANY (LIMITED) AND TRAFFORD PARK ESTATES (LIMITED).*

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract for sale—Option to purchase—Agreement scheduled to Act of Parliament.

An agreement giving the plaintiffs the first option of purchasing certain land was scheduled to an Act of Parliament. A clause in the agreement would otherwise have been void for remoteness.

Held, that the Act made the clause valid.

In this action the plaintiffs sought a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to enter into any contract for the sale and purchase of the Manchester Racecourse with any person or corporation other than the plaintiffs without first complying with a certain agreement made between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the Manchester Racecourse Company, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying out any contract for the sale and purchase of the said racecourse in violation of the said agreement.

Mr. Fletcher Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Leigh-Clare appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. A. L. Ellis for the Manchester Racecourse Company; and Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith for the Trafford Park Estates Company.

The plaintiff company was incorporated by the Manchester Ship Canal Act, 1885, for the purpose of making a canal between the Mersey at Eastham and Manchester, and for the construction of docks, railways, and subsidiary works. At the Manchester end the canal and the docks lie in part between the racecourse belonging to the defendants, the Manchester Racecourse Company, and the land of the other defendants, who purchased the Trafford Park Estate for development purposes in 1897. Before 1893 there had been various disputes and differences between the plaintiffs and the Racecourse Company, and in order to settle and determine such disputes an agreement, dated March 7, 1893, was entered into between the plaintiffs and the Racecourse Company. By section 10 of the Manchester Ship Canal (Surplus Lands) Act, 1893, the said agreement, which was set forth in the schedule to the Act, was confirmed and declared to be valid and binding on the parties thereto. By Clause 3 of the said agreement it was provided:—

"If and whenever the lands and hereditaments belonging to the Racecourse Company and now used as a racecourse shall cease to be used as a racecourse, or should the aforesaid lands and hereditaments be at any time proposed to be used for dock purposes, then and in either of such cases the Racecourse Company shall give to the Canal Company the first refusal of the aforesaid lands and hereditaments en bloc." The plaintiffs alleged that on August 10, 1899, the Racecourse Company were expressly notified of the intention of the plaintiffs to apply to Parliament for power to acquire the racecourse for dock purposes, and that before that date the Racecourse Company had not negotiated with any other person or corporation with a view to the sale of their racecourse. Negotiations then followed between the plaintiffs and the Racecourse Company, which need not be set out in detail, and on October 20, 1899, the chairman wrote the following letter on behalf of the Racecourse Company to the plaintiffs:—"Referring to the overtures lately made by you through your agent, Mr. Wallis, for the purchase of our property at New Barns, Salford, at present used as the Manchester Racecourse, and to the interviews which have recently taken place between Mr. Wallis and myself as the chairman of the Racecourse Company, in which your desire to purchase the property subject to certain conditions has been expressed by Mr. Wallis, my company think it well to repeat in writing the terms already stated by me to Mr. Wallis on which we are willing to sell to you the property. The conditions which I understood Mr. Wallis to accept as the basis of negotiations are (1) that we should have reasonable time within which to prepare for the continuance of our racing business on the site belonging to us at Castle Irwell and (2) that the sale should be subject to the necessary licence being obtained for that purpose from the Jockey Club. Subject to the above two conditions we are prepared to sell to you the fee simple of our property at New Barns containing a little over 99 acres for the sum of £350,000. I shall be obliged by your informing me within one week from this date whether or not the offer is accepted and if not accepted by your stating what is the highest sum you are prepared to give for the property subject to the above-mentioned conditions." The plaintiffs alleged that when this offer was made the Racecourse Company were in negotiation for the sale of the property to the Trafford Park Company on other terms than those mentioned. On October 27, 1899, the plaintiffs replied to the following effect:—"You have been informed of the intention of this company to apply to Parliament forthwith for compulsory powers to acquire your company's property at New Barns, Salford, at present used as a racecourse; but in view of your suggesting that the negotiations for the purchase of the property should be continued we venture to hope that a satisfactory price will be arrived at in a friendly spirit and that there will be no need to have recourse to compulsory process in arranging terms between the parties." This letter was answered on October 30 by the chairman of the Racecourse Company in these terms:—"My letter was written not with a view that the negotiations should be continued, but that they should result in an agreement or come to an end as my company have other applications for the property. As, therefore, you have not accepted our offer or made any counter proposal, I now write to say that my company feel at liberty to deal with their property as they may think fit." On November 8, 1899, the plaintiffs issued a formal notice of their intention to take the racecourse for dock purposes. The defendants admitted that on December 22, 1899, they had entered into an agreement by which the Racecourse Company was to sell the racecourse to the Trafford Park Company for £280,000 cash, but they pleaded that the said agreement was expressed to be subject to the rights of the plaintiff company under the agreement of March 7, 1893, and, further, that it was provided that the vendors should have the right to continue in occupation of the racecourse, free of rent, until December 31, 1909, and also that the Racecourse Company should have the option of acquiring a racecourse on the property of the Trafford Park Company, an option which the defendants alleged to be of great value. Both the defendants contended that Clause 3 of the agreement of March 7, 1893, was void for remoteness and for uncertainty, and that, if it was enforceable, neither of the events mentioned had happened, or, in the alternative, that the plaintiffs had been given the first refusal of the property and had not accepted the offer.

Mr. MOULTON, for the plaintiffs, contended that, though Clause 3 of the agreement might otherwise be void, the Act of Parliament had declared the agreement to be valid and binding. Under the agreement the plaintiffs had an interest in the land referred to—"Willmott v. Barber" (15 Ch.D., 96), and "London and South-Western Railway Company v. Gomm" (20 Ch.D., 562); they had a right to purchase the land at an ascertainable price—viz., the price offered by any other would-be purchaser. The defendants could not possibly contend that the plaintiffs had not fulfilled one of the conditions precedent by proposing to take the racecourse for dock purposes. Having fulfilled the condition, the plaintiffs had not been given the first refusal of the property, which meant the refusal of the property at the price offered by some one else.

Mr. WARMINGTON, for the Racecourse Company, argued that because an agreement was scheduled to an Act of Parliament and declared to be binding and valid it did not follow that the agreement thereby became a part of the Act—"Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company" (L.R. 2, H.L.Sc., 347), "Regina v. Midland Railway Company" (19 Q.B.D., 540), "Great Western Railway Company v. Halesowen Railway Company" (52 L.J., Q.B., 473). The agreement must still be construed as if it had not been so scheduled, and Clause 3 of the present agreement was clearly void both for remoteness and uncertainty. Moreover, the Racecourse Company had agreed to sell the racecourse to the other defendants subject to the rights of the plaintiffs.

Mr. UPJOHN, for the Trafford Park Company, said that the plaintiffs had not proved that one of the conditions precedent had been fulfilled. It was clear from the terms of the agreement that the only persons who could propose to use the racecourse for dock purposes were the owners, their successors or assigns. The plaintiffs had no jus in rem—"Haywood v. Brunswick Building Society" (8 Q.B.D., 403). They would not buy themselves and they asked for an injunction to restrain the Trafford Park Company from buying. There was absolutely no evidence of want of bona fides on the part of the defendants.

Mr. Howard Martin, a surveyor, was called by Mr. UPJOHN and gave evidence as to the value of the option to purchase a racecourse acquired by the Racecourse Company.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, in giving judgment, said that he had first to consider the effect of the private Act of Parliament to which the agreement of March 7, 1893, was scheduled. It had been argued that the Act merely gave the two companies a contracting capacity irrespective of the terms of the contract contained in the schedule. He could not accept that view. It would be a reductio ad absurdum, if the contract itself was void. It was also contended that, though the agreement as a whole was valid, there might be a clause which was void. He could not accept that argument either. He took the Act to mean what it said, and it said that the agreement was valid and binding. The Legislature could do what it liked, it could make that legal which otherwise would be illegal, and he would follow what Sir George Jessel had said in "Sevenoaks, &c., Railway Company v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company" (11 Ch.D., 625). On the face of it Clause 3 of the agreement was void for remoteness and also, he thought, for uncertainty, but the Legislature had said it was valid, and he was not going to say that the Legislature was inops consilii. Unless the words were absolutely senseless, the Court was bound to find some meaning in them. In the Caledonian Railway case and other cases that had been cited the problem before the Court was quite different—viz., whether the Court was bound by a statutory enactment that the agreement should be made effective by the parties to it. When the Legislature said "you shall do it," there was something over and above the agreement which was made valid by the Act. He had, therefore, now to construe the agreement. The wording of Clause 3 was doubtless inartistic, but on the strength of "London and South-Western Railway Company v. Gomm" he thought the clause gave the plaintiffs an interest in the land. In his opinion the price also was ascertainable—it was to be the same as that offered by any other person or company. There were two conditions precedent mentioned in the clause. The first had obviously not been fulfilled. The second was "If and whenever the land should be proposed to be used for dock purposes." It had been argued that this meant proposed by the Racecourse Company, its successors, or assigns. But the clause was in general terms, and the proposal, in his opinion, might be made by the plaintiffs, and he found as a fact that the plaintiffs had proposed and did propose so to use the land. Moreover, it was clear from the petition presented against the plaintiffs' Bill that the Trafford Park Company had also proposed to use the racecourse for dock purposes. One of the conditions precedent had, therefore, been performed. Then came the consideration of what was meant by "first refusal." Refusal implied an offer, and the offer contemplated by the agreement was an offer at a cash price which some one else was willing to give. He found that no such offer had ever been made to the plaintiffs. The offer made by the Trafford Park Company could not have been made by the Racecourse Company to the plaintiffs. There were conditions which would have made it impossible of acceptance, and he could not accept the view of the Trafford Park Company that their offer was really worth a great deal more than £280,000. Mr. Upjohn had argued that the Court had nothing to do with his clients, but, as the plaintiffs had an interest in the land, the Court had jurisdiction to interfere. He would grant injunctions (1) to restrain the Racecourse Company from selling the racecourse to any person or company without first offering it to the plaintiffs at the same cash price as the intending purchaser was willing to give, and (2) to restrain the defendants from carrying out their agreement until this had been done. There was no ground, however, for the charge of mala fides against the defendants, and therefore there must be a set-off in the matter of costs.

ALEXANDER V. MANSIONS PROPRIETARY (LIMITED).*

Landlord and Tenant—Implied covenant—Residential flats—Common scheme.

Held, that the conversion of flats in a building into an hotel was a departure from the scheme in accordance with which the building was to be managed, namely, as residential flats suitable to the convenience of all persons who should be tenants of the flats.

This case was of some interest to tenants of flats in residential mansions, of which there are now so many in London. It raised the question whether a tenant of such a flat, under an agreement entered into at a time when the premises formed part of a block of mansions intended for private residential purposes, was entitled to any and what remedy in the event of the business carried on in the buildings being so altered as to convert what was originally a flat in a private residential mansion into a set of rooms in a public hotel. The plaintiffs, Colonel and Mrs. Alexander, in March, 1896, became tenants of a flat in St. Ermin's-mansions, Westminster, under an agreement for three years with an option at the expiration of that period of renewing the tenancy for a further term of three years. This option was duly exercised by the plaintiffs. The original agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, from whom the defendant company subsequently acquired the property. It was on a printed form and contained various stipulations binding the landlord to keep the building properly supplied with water, and to cleanse and light and keep in proper condition the entrance, staircases, and lifts, and provided that the passenger lifts were intended for the use of the tenants and their families, friends, and visitors, and not for servants or messengers, nor for any kind of luggage whatsoever, and that the landlord should keep on the premises hall porters to be in attendance at all reasonable hours. The plaintiff alleged that down to March, 1899, the whole block of buildings in which their flat was situated had been occupied as flats, but in that month most of the tenants gave up possession of their flats to the defendants, who had since, without the consent of the plaintiffs and contrary to the general scheme under which they contended the whole of the mansions were originally occupied, commenced to treat and deal with the building as an hotel. The plaintiffs further alleged that the terms of the agreement with regard to the use of the lifts and the attendance of the porters had been broken by the defendants, and also that certain structural alterations had been made in the buildings which deprived some of their windows of light and air which they had previously enjoyed. Upon these and other grounds they claimed (inter alia) an injunction to restrain the defendants from using the premises as an hotel, or otherwise than as residential flats, and from interfering in any way with the light and air and the privacy and enjoyment of the plaintiffs of their said flat. There were various minor subjects of complaint on the part of the plaintiffs, relating to alleged obstruction by the defendants of the plaintiffs' right of ingress and egress, and other matters. The defendants' case, as disclosed by their pleadings, was that there was never any general scheme under which the whole of St. Ermin's-mansions were occupied as residential flats. They alleged that, since September, 1896, the defendants had, so far as they could consistently with the rights of tenants of flats, including the plaintiffs, conducted the management of St. Ermin's-mansions as a residential hotel without any objection by any of the residents or tenants of flats other than the plaintiffs. They further alleged that before September, 1896, their predecessors in title had provided common rooms for the residents and had acted as general caterers for them, and the business now carried on by the defendants was merely a continuation of the same thing on an improved and more extensive scale and for the greater accommodation of residents and their visitors. At the hearing it was suggested by the defendants that the plaintiff had acquiesced in the alteration in the management of the mansions, and in support of this suggestion it was endeavoured to show in cross-examination of the plaintiff that he himself had been a member of a club which was formed by the management for the convenience of residents. The plaintiff, however, gave evidence to the effect that, although he had at one time been on the committee of the club, he and a number of other gentlemen had resigned when it was discovered that from the mode in which the club was carried on it was in fact a bogus club. The managing director of the defendant company in cross-examination admitted that in the management of the club members were frequently elected for one night on payment of 10s., which was returned to them the next day. He further stated that he had had interviews upon the question of the club management with certain police officials and officers of Excise, and that it was upon their advice that the system of management was adopted. It appeared that the premises were now licensed as an hotel, and that the club had practically ceased to exist. The case occupied the time of the Court for a considerable number of days, and his Lordship now delivered his reserved judgment.

Mr. Abel Thomas, Q.C., Mr. C. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. E. S. Ford appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., Mr. Ingpen, Q.C., Mr. Kirby, and Mr. Stokes for the defendant company.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING said that the plaintiffs complained of four different matters, two of which might be described as breaches of express terms in the agreement of tenancy, while the other two were in the nature of infringements of implied terms, or acts in derogation of rights granted by the agreement. St. Ermin's-mansions consisted of six blocks of buildings, numbered 1 to 6. The blocks numbered 1 to 4 opened on the same courtyard. They had separate entrances, but were now more or less connected internally, so that access might be gained from one block to another. The plaintiffs first went to reside there in 1892, when they became tenants of a flat, No. 66. In 1895 they became tenants of their present flat, No. 67. At that time the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were the landlords. His Lordship then referred to the terms of the agreement, remarking that it was in accordance with a printed form, and continuing, said that in December, 1896, St. Ermin's-mansions passed into the ownership of the defendant company. At that time the majority of the flats in the blocks numbered 1 to 4 were let to tenants under similar agreements. All the flats in No. 4 were so let, with the exception of one flat on the ground floor, the rooms in which were used as dining-rooms and other public rooms for the general benefit of residents. Soon afterwards the directors of the defendant company, of whom the most active was Mr. Harry Richardson, the managing director, began, as the tenancies of flats fell in, to cease re-letting the same as such, and to furnish the rooms and let them to persons occupying them for longer or shorter periods, and in this way gradually to convert the mansions into an hotel. In March, 1897, an application was made by the defendant company for a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, but was refused. On April 1,

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1897, a company called the St. Ermin's Club (Limited) was formed under the Companies Acts with a capital of £1,000, divided into 2,000 shares of 10s. each, 1,500 of them being preference shares entitled to a dividend of 5 per cent., and 500 being ordinary shares. The main object of the company was to establish and maintain a club for the accommodation of members of the company and their friends. The directors of the club company were Messrs. Richardson and Blanckensee, who were also directors of the defendant company, to which all the ordinary shares in the club company belonged. The plaintiff, Colonel Alexander, became a member and chairman of the club committee; but in October, 1897, he and the members of the committee, except Richardson and Blanckensee, resigned their offices. The plaintiff, Colonel Alexander, gave his reasons for this step in cross-examination. He said that the committee had no power to elect members and it looked like a bogus club, members being elected one night, paying 10s., and having that sum returned to them next morning. "That," he said, "was a subject of discussion at the committee. I was informed the thing was done; it was open to the objection that a hotel business was being carried on under the guise of a club." It was admitted by Richardson that notwithstanding the resignation of the committee, the club was continued under the management of himself and Blanckensee; and that it was their practice to issue a share in the club company on one day to any person temporarily residing in the mansions, receiving from him 10s. as the price of the share, and to repay that sum next morning if he left and applied and signed a transfer of his share to the secretary of the company. "We wanted the club," he said, "for the purpose of not infringing the Excise laws, for supplying visitors and guests with wine, tobacco, and billiards." It was stated by Richardson that he was advised by counsel, and by the police and Excise authorities, that the course thus pursued was legal. Whether such advice was given on a full disclosure of the facts as they now appeared in evidence his Lordship was not satisfied. In March, 1899, the defendant company obtained a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and having by that time converted the great majority of the flats into separate furnished rooms under their own management, the directors carried on a regular hotel business, and the name St. Ermin's Hotel was put up on the building, and it was advertised as such. On December 24, 1898, the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendant company that they exercised the right of renewal under their agreement, and they thus became tenants of the defendant company for the term of three years from Lady-day, 1899. Early in 1899 complaints were made by the plaintiffs as to the improper use of the passenger lift which by the agreement was intended for the use of the tenants and their families, friends, and visitors, and not for servants or messengers, and not for any kind of luggage whatever. The plaintiffs alleged that it was used for servants and for luggage. His Lordship then considered the evidence upon that point, and also upon the point whether the plaintiffs had been hindered in the exercise of their rights of ingress and egress to and from the mansions, and came to the conclusion that sufficient attendance at the hall door had not been provided as regarded Block 4 on certain specified occasions, but that the right of ingress and egress had not been interfered with except to that extent. Under those circumstances the remedy of the plaintiffs was not by way of injunction, as was established by "Ryan v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Association" ([1893] 1 Ch., 116). The plaintiffs were however entitled to damages in respect of this matter which his Lordship assessed at £1. With regard to the use of the lifts, there was no doubt that the passenger lift had been used in contravention of the agreement, and in accordance with the principle laid down in "Lumley v. Wagner" (1 D.M. and G., 604), and more recently explained in "Whitwood Chemical Company v. Hardman" ([1891] 2 Ch., 416), the plaintiffs had a remedy by way of injunction. His Lordship next came to a more difficult subject—viz., that arising out of the use of the property as an hotel. At the time when the property passed into the hands of the defendant company, it was let out under tenancy agreements, all substantially in the same form. From these his Lordship drew the same conclusion as was drawn by Mr. Justice North in "Hudson v. Cripps" ([1896] 1 Ch., 265)—viz., that there was a scheme for the general management of the building, composed of several flats, in such a way as to be suitable to the convenience of all the persons who should be tenants of the respective flats. Then the question arose whether the scheme had been departed from. It was said that the scheme in this case differed from that in "Hudson v. Cripps." There were in this case provisions for attendance, meals, and public rooms, which went quite beyond anything in "Hudson v. Cripps." It was urged that no definite line could be drawn between the occupation of a building in flats and its use as a boarding house or an hotel; and no doubt it was difficult to say when the building ceased to be used as residential flats and when it began to be used as an hotel, but it did not follow that it was impossible to say that the original scheme had been departed from. It was observed in a recent case—"A.G. v. Brighton and Hove Corporation" ([1900] 1 Ch., 276)—by Lord Lindley, then Master of the Rolls, "Nothing is more common in life than to be unable to draw the line between two things. Who can draw the line between plants and animals? And yet who has any difficulty in saying that an oak tree is a plant and not an animal?" So here, his Lordship had no difficulty in saying that the use of this building as an hotel was a distinct departure from the scheme in accordance with which the building ought to have been managed. Having regard, however, to a certain amount of delay on the part of the plaintiffs and to all the facts of the case, his Lordship thought he might, in accordance with the law as stated in "Sayers v. Collyer" (28 Ch.D., 103), exercise his discretion by saying that justice would best be done by directing an inquiry as to damages. His Lordship lastly considered the question of destruction of the access of light and air to the plaintiffs' rooms, as to which there was considerable conflict of evidence, and came to the conclusion that some damage had been done to the plaintiffs by the acts of the defendant company. Having regard to all the facts of the case, however, he thought he ought not to grant an injunction, but he gave the plaintiffs damages to the extent of £10, and directed the defendant company to pay the costs of the action except those of the inquiry as to damages, which would be reserved.

SHERARD V. GASCOIGNE.*

Landlord and Tenant—Game—Agreement to leave ground game unshot—Validity—Ground Game Act, 1880, s. 3.

The plaintiff became tenant to the defendant of a farm, and during the negotiations for the letting the defendant's agent promised that, in the event of the plaintiff leaving the ground game on the farm unshot and undisturbed, the defendant would compensate the plaintiff for all damage done to the crops by the ground game. The plaintiff accordingly left the game unshot and undisturbed, and the crops were thereby damaged.

Held, that the agreement was void under s. 3 of the Ground Game Act, 1880.

This was an action brought by a tenant against the landlord to recover compensation under an agreement whereby, as it was alleged, the landlord agreed to compensate the tenant for damage done to his crops by ground game. The action was referred to this Court to decide a point of law raised upon the pleadings. The statement of claim alleged that in January, 1895, the plaintiff (Mr. Paul Sherrard) became and had since continued to be the tenant to the defendant (Major Frederick Gascoigne), of Huddlestons Farm and Newthorpe Farm in the West Riding of Yorkshire; that during the negotiations for the tenancy the defendant's agent represented to the plaintiff that the defendant was devoted to shooting and, with a view to induce the plaintiff to leave the ground game on the said farms unshot and undisturbed for the defendant's benefit, the defendant's agent, on his behalf, promised that, in the event of the plaintiff's so doing, the defendant would compensate the plaintiff for all damage done to the plaintiff's crops by such ground game; that the plaintiff was induced by such promise to accept the tenancy and during the year 1898, in reliance upon and induced by such promise, allowed the ground game on the farms to go unshot and undisturbed for the benefit of the defendant, who ultimately shot over the farms; and that the growing crops of the plaintiff were damaged by such ground game. The plaintiff claimed £178 15s.

Mr. SCOTT FOX, Q.C. (with whom was Mr. H. T. Kemp), on behalf of the defendant, admitting the alleged agreement and the alleged damage for the purposes of argument only, contended that the agreement was void by virtue of the Ground Game Act, 1880, section 1 of which declares that "every occupier of land shall have as incident to and inseparable from his occupation of the land the right to kill and take ground game thereon, concurrently with any other person who may be entitled to kill and take ground game on the game land," and section 3 of which provides that "every agreement, condition, or arrangement which purports to divest or alienate the right of the occupier as declared, given, and reserved to him by this Act, or which gives such occupier any advantage in consideration of his forbearing to exercise such right, or imposes upon him any disadvantage in consequence of his exercising such right, shall be void." The learned counsel cited "Anderson v. Vicary" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 436).

MR. JUSTICE DARLING.—It appears that the friends of the tenant in 1880 took too great care of him.

Mr. C. WALSH (with whom was Mr. Macaskie) for the plaintiff, contended that though the plaintiff's agreement to forbear from shooting or disturbing the ground game was bad, yet the defendant's promise to compensate the plaintiff for damage done by ground game was good, because it was not made in consideration of the plaintiff's forbearance to shoot or disturb the ground game, but in consideration of the reservation to the defendant in the lease of the concurrent right to shoot the ground game.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that the agreement alleged in the statement of claim was an agreement which purported to alienate the right of the occupier to kill and take the ground game, and it also purported to give him an advantage in consideration of his forbearing to exercise such right. He was of opinion, therefore, that the whole agreement was absolutely void, and, the plaintiff having shown no claim against the defendant, the action would be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

LONDON AND NORTHERN BANK (LIMITED) v. GEORGE NEWNES (LIMITED).*

Practice—Particulars—Libel imputing insolvency to bank—Run on bank—Liquidation.

The plaintiffs were ordered to give particulars of the branches on which the run was made, and the period of the continuance of the run, but not particulars as to whether the run was made by depositors or ordinary customers, nor as to the quantum of damages claimed and how it was made up.

This was an appeal by the defendants from an order made by Mr. Justice Day at Chambers. The action was for libel. The statement of claim alleged that the plaintiff bank was, at the time of the matters complained of, carrying on business in the City of London, and having branches at Forest-hill, Greenwich, Birmingham, Harrogate, Huddersfield, Leeds, Peterborough, Scarborough, Sunderland, and York; that the defendants were the proprietors and publishers of a paper called the Money Maker; and that they printed and published of the plaintiffs in the issue of that paper for December 9, 1899, the following:—"List of contributories.—Dr. D. T. Jones, of Sheffield, has had a narrow escape from being saddled with a liability of £10,000 in the London and Northern Bank, now in liquidation." The statement of claim went on to allege that in consequence of the above publication there was a run upon the plaintiff bank, and it had been forced to go into voluntary liquidation. The plaintiffs claimed damages. The defendants took out a summons for particulars. Mr. Justice Day refused the application. The defendants appealed.

MR. MONTAGUE LUSH, for the defendants, said that the defendants published in a paper owned by them a paragraph which had been sent to them, and the words "now in liquidation" unfortunately appeared in the paragraph. The bank was not then in liquidation. When the defendants found out the mistake they published an apology, and did what they could to stop the publication. The defendants had no defence to the action. The only question was the amount of the damages. The defendants would have to pay money into Court, and they were entitled to have some particulars to enable them to judge how much they should pay in. The plaintiffs claimed damages generally without stating any amount. The defendants were entitled to know the quantum of damages claimed, and how it was made up. They were also entitled to know upon what branch of the bank the run was made, whether the withdrawals were made by the depositors or by the ordinary customers, and the period during which the run lasted.

MR. J. E. BANKES, for the plaintiffs, said that they were willing to give particulars as to the branches upon which the run was made and the period during which the run continued, but they objected to give the other particulars asked for.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said that the defendants could have particulars of the branches upon which the run was made, and the period during which the run continued, but they were not entitled to particulars of the quantum of damages claimed.

Mr. MONTAGUE LUSH.—Will your Lordships direct the plaintiffs to specify in the statement of claim the amount they claim as damages?

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS.—No, you are not entitled to that.

The COURT accordingly made the following order :—Appeal allowed by directing the plaintiffs to give particulars of the name or names of the branch or branches on which the run is alleged to have taken place and the period of the continuance of the run. Costs here and below to be costs in the cause.

WILLIAMS V. INGRAM.*

Practice—Discovery—Production of documents—Action against directors of company—Books of company.

In an action against two directors of a company, there being other directors, the Court refused to order the defendants to produce the books of the company in the absence of a consent by the company to their production.

This was a summons by the plaintiffs for discovery. The plaintiffs were the five daughters of the late Mr. Herbert Ingram, the founder of the Illustrated London News, and the defendants were Sir William J. Ingram and Mr. Charles L. N. Ingram, being the two surviving sons of Mr. Herbert Ingram, and there were also joined as defendants certain trustees. On Mr. Herbert Ingram's death his widow became solely entitled to the Illustrated London News, and it appeared that, by an agreement made in 1882, Mrs. Herbert Ingram (afterwards Lady Watkin) assigned the newspaper business to the two defendants upon certain terms, by which she was entitled to one undivided moiety and the defendants to the other. In July, 1887, Lady Watkin, who had then parted with one-fourth of her moiety, transferred the remaining three-fourths upon trusts as to two-fourths for herself and as to the remaining one-fourth (or one-eighth of the whole business) upon trusts, under which in the event which had happened the plaintiffs had become absolutely entitled. In February, 1892, a private company was formed, under the name of the Illustrated London News (Limited), with a capital of £300,000, divided into 15,000 preference shares and 15,000 ordinary shares of £10 each, Lady Watkin and the plaintiffs being entitled to 5,625 of each class of shares. The first directors were Sir Edward Watkin, Mr. E. Watkin, and the defendants Ingram. The defendants Ingram were appointed managers of the company. The plaintiffs stated that negotiations subsequently took place between Lady Watkin and the plaintiffs and the defendants Ingram for the purchase of Lady Watkin's and the plaintiffs' shares and interest in the business, and in June, 1895, it was agreed that the defendants Ingram should purchase such shares and interest in consideration of an annuity of £4,500, the annuity to be secured by a charge on the said shares. The plaintiffs stated that this purchase was on a basis that the then existing annual profits of the business were only £20,000, and their case was that a mistake had occurred, or there had been some mismanagement, inasmuch as the defendants Ingram had in 1899 sold the company to a new company—namely, the Illustrated London News and Sketch (Limited)—for a total sum of £1,042,500, and by the prospectus of the new company it appeared that the profits had jumped up to quite £60,000 a year. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the agreement for sale of June, 1895, was not binding and should be set aside and an inquiry and an account. The defendants Ingram denied the statements and allegations of the plaintiffs and generally traversed their case. The present application by the plaintiffs was for an order for the production and inspection of the books, &c., of the Illustrated London News (Limited) and the Illustrated London News and Sketch (Limited). The defendants, by their affidavit, stated that they had the books in their possession and power, but objected to produce them because they were the property of the companies of which they were directors, but not the only directors, and that they had no property in or power to produce the same, and that the books were in their possession or power only in the sense that they had access thereto as directors of the companies and for the purposes of the business of the companies; and also because the ownership of the books relating to the Illustrated London News (Limited) had changed to that of the Illustrated London News and Sketch (Limited). The companies were not parties to the action, but appeared on the present application.

Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Mark Romer appeared for the plaintiffs in support of the application; Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Martelli appeared for the defendants Ingram; and Mr. Ward Coldridge for the companies.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE, after hearing counsel for the applicants, asked counsel for the companies whether they objected to the production asked for, and, having received an answer in the affirmative, delivered judgment without calling on the defendants. His Lordship said that in the case of "Walburn v. Ingilby" (1 M. and K., 61 and 79), which was relied on by the applicants, and which was a case where the respondent to an application for discovery had only a joint right and common interest with others in the documents sought to be inspected, Lord Chancellor Brougham came to the conclusion that the defence had the appearance of a contrivance to evade or defeat the jurisdiction of the Court, and therefore declined to set aside an order which had been made for production without the consent of the parties not before the Court. In the present case he (Mr. Justice Byrne) could not say that he was satisfied that there was any contrivance to defeat the course of the Court such as would justify him in making an order of the kind here asked for. He therefore refused the application, with costs.

Leave to appeal was given.

MASON V. COWDARY.*

Adulteration—Analysis—Dividing article into three parts—Sale of six bottles—Division of bottles into three parts—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 14.

Where six small bottles of camphorated oil were purchased for analysis, and the purchaser did not open the bottles, but divided the six bottles into three parts, each part containing two bottles: held, not a compliance with s. 14 of the Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

This was an appeal by case stated from the decision of justices of Bedfordshire dismissing an information under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, preferred by the appellant, an inspector under the Act, against Ellen Cowdary, the respondent, charging her with selling, to the prejudice of the appellant, a drug, to wit, camphorated oil, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the drug demanded. The question in the case arose under section 14 of the Act, which provides as follows:—"The person purchasing the article with the intention of submitting the same to analysis, shall, after the purchase shall have been completed, . . . offer to divide the article into three parts to be then and there separated and each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in such manner as its nature will permit, and shall, if required to do so, proceed accordingly, and shall deliver one of the parts to the seller or his agent." It was proved before the justices that on November 16, 1899, the appellant purchased from the respondent, who keeps a small general shop, six 2d. bottles of camphorated oil. The oil was exposed for sale in bottles which were not, apparently, prepared by the respondent, but each of them bore a label with the name of a chemist in the neighbouring town of Luton upon it. There was no evidence whether the bottles were identical in character or appearance or whether or not the labels on all the bottles bore the name of the same chemist. The six bottles were all purchased at the same time. The appellant, having notified that he intended to have the oil analyzed, divided the six bottles into three lots of two bottles each, sealing each separate lot of two bottles in a separate bag. He handed one of the sealed bags to the respondent, taking away the other two sealed bags, one of which he subsequently forwarded to the public analyst, who found that the two bottles contained only 17.5 per cent. of camphor, whereas camphorated oil should contain at least 20 per cent. of camphor. The appellant did not open any or either of the bottles of camphorated oil or mix or divide the contents, and the two bottles handed to the respondent were in exactly the same state as when purchased. The justices were of opinion that the division of the bottles as described was not in compliance with section 14, and they were not satisfied that the contents of the two bottles analysed were identical with the other two lots of bottles in the hands of the appellant and respondent respectively.

Mr. BONSEY, for the appellant, contended that the article purchased by the appellant was the six bottles of camphorated oil, and that the method of division which he had adopted was, therefore, in compliance with section 14. It was the only practical method of division. The bottles contained so small a quantity of oil that the division of one bottle would not have produced a quantity of oil sufficient for the purposes of analysis. Nor would the mixture of several bottles of a drug of this kind into one for the purpose of division be practical, because some of the drugs which would have to be so treated were volatile, and liable to change their character on exposure to the air, and the operation of making a division in this manner would consequently require great care. In the case of seidlitz powders, which were sold in parcels containing several packets, the method of division adopted had been to divide the parcels into three portions of so many packets each. That was the fairest method of division in that case, and it was also the fairest method in the case of the bottles in question. It was important to obtain a decision as to the proper course to adopt in these cases.

The COURT, without calling upon Mr. Muir, who appeared for the respondent, to argue, dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that what the appellant did was to buy six articles and then to divide those six articles into three. In his opinion each of the bottles purchased was an article within the meaning of section 14, for it did not matter for the purposes of the Act how small the article was. As the appellant did not divide any one of the bottles into three parts, he did not comply with the provisions of the statute.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

REGINA V. HORROCKS AND ANOTHER (EX PARTE BOUSTEAD).*

Local Government—Nuisance—Order of justices to abate—Omission to specify requisite works—Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 96, 105.

An order of justices requiring a person to abate a nuisance must specify the works to be done for that purpose, whether the proceedings are taken by a private individual or by the inspector of nuisances. Part of the order of justices, prohibiting a recurrence of the nuisance, held good.

"Reg. v. Wheatley" (16 Q.B.D., 34) followed.

In this case cause was shown against a rule for a writ of certiorari to bring up and quash an order of two justices of Cumberland. On March 20 last a complaint was made to the justices under section 105 of the Public Health Act, 1875, by Mr. Alfred Hope, that on the premises of Mr. Samuel Boustead, at Shield-house, there existed a nuisance caused by his act or default, and consisting of an accumulation of slaughter-house offal and filth, so as to be a nuisance on the fields at and adjoining Petheril-bank, the residence of Mr. Hope, whereupon the justices made the order now sought to be quashed, the effective portion of which was as follows:—"We, in pursuance of the said Act, do order the said Samuel Boustead within one calendar month from the service of this order, or a true copy thereof according to the said Act, to take such steps as may be necessary to abate the said nuisance so that the same shall no longer be a nuisance or injurious to health as aforesaid, and to pay the sum of 35s. for costs to Mr. David Mans, the solicitor acting for the complainant. And we, being satisfied, notwithstanding the said cause or causes of nuisance may be removed under this order, the same is or are likely to recur, do therefore prohibit the said Samuel Boustead from doing any such acts as may lead to a recurrence of the said nuisance." The rule was obtained upon the ground that the order was bad in not specifying the works or things required to be done in order to abate the nuisance as required by section 96 of the Public Health Act, 1875, as interpreted in "Reg. v. Wheatley" (16 Q.B.D., 34). Section 96 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides that, upon default being made by a person upon whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served and upon complaint made by the local authority to the justices, such justices "shall make an order on such person requiring him to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice, or otherwise to abate the nuisance within a time specified in the order, and to do any works necessary for that purpose; or an order prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance and directing the execution of any works necessary to prevent the recurrence; or an order both requiring abatement and prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance." Section 105 provides that complaints may be made by any person aggrieved by a nuisance, and "thereupon the like proceedings shall be had with the like incidents and consequences as to making orders" and otherwise as in the case of complaint made by the local authority.

Mr. L. SANDERSON, in showing cause, contended that where the proceedings were taken by a private individual "Reg. v. Wheatley" did not apply, and that there was no necessity for the order to specify the works or things required to be done to abate the nuisance. In the present case no work within the meaning of the Act were required (see "Millard v. Westall" [1898] 1 Q.B., 342). It would have been quite sufficient if the justices had simply ordered Mr. Boustead to abate the nuisance. Even if the first part of the order was bad, the second part, prohibiting the recurrence of the nuisance, was good (see "Mayor, &c., of Scarborough v. Rural Sanitary Authority of Scarborough," 1 Ex. D., 344).

Mr. MACASKIE, in support of the rule, relied on "Reg. v. Wheatley," arguing that the person against whom such an order as this was made was entitled to know what were the steps the justices thought necessary to be taken by him to abate the nuisance. In the present case it might have been sufficient to cover the offal with earth, or it might have been necessary to remove it altogether.

The COURT quashed the order as to the abatement of the nuisance and confirmed it as to the prohibition of the recurrence of the nuisance.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that he did not agree with Mr. Sanderson's contention that different principles applied when the complainant was a private individual to those which applied when the local authority were the complainants. In his opinion the orders were to be made with the same particularity in each case. The order in this case did not follow the statute. It only said that Mr. Boustead must take steps to abate the nuisance, and did not specify the things or works which he was to do in order to abate it. That put him in a difficulty. He would not know what the justices intended him to do, and, having done what he himself thought to be sufficient to abate the nuisance, he would nevertheless be again liable to be proceeded against. The part of the order, therefore, which dealt with the abatement of the nuisance was bad. But the part dealing with the prohibition of a recurrence of the nuisance was good, for in preventing the recurrence of the nuisance there was no need to do any works at all. The prohibition in this case simply amounted to saying "Don't again accumulate offal or filth on this land."

MR. JUSTICE BUCKNILL concurred.

LEVITT AND THORNTON V. HAMBLET.*

Stock Exchange—Failure of broker—Liability of broker's client to jobber—Privity of contract.

Held, on the evidence, that the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs to take up shares bought for him from the plaintiffs, jobbers on the London Stock Exchange, by a broker, who subsequently failed.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs, who are a firm of jobbers on the Stock Exchange, against the defendant, who is an outside broker, to recover £154 18s. 11d. damages for not taking delivery of 300 Southern Preference railway shares. The shares had been bought from the plaintiffs by E. Preston and Co., a firm of brokers on the Stock Exchange acting on behalf of the defendant, at 57. On December 15 E. Preston and Co. were declared defaulters, and thereupon the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, in accordance with Rule 177, declared the "hammering price" for Southern Preference shares to be 57. The plaintiffs at once ascertained that the defendant was the client on whose behalf E. Preston and Co. had bought these 300 shares. A member of the plaintiff firm had an interview with Mr. Detmold, the defendant's manager, on December 16, and asked him whether the defendant would close the shares or have them taken up by another broker. Mr. Detmold replied that the bargain was closed at the hammering price. At a subsequent interview on the same day the plaintiffs requested Mr. Detmold to give them a written memorandum that the stock was closed at the hammering price. He refused this, but repeated that the bargain was closed at the hammering price. On December 20 the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendant that they looked to him to pay for the shares on December 29, the settling day, and requested him to put them in communication with another broker if he desired to have the settlement effected by him. The defendant's solicitor replied that the proper course was for the official assignee of the Stock Exchange to render to the defendant an account of differences due on either side, according to the hammering price under rule 177 of the Stock Exchange Regulations; and added that in any case there was no privity of contract between the defendant and the plaintiffs. On December 29 the plaintiffs tendered the shares to the defendant, and they were refused. The plaintiffs then sold the shares in the market at 54½, and the present claim was for the loss incurred upon such sale. Between December 15 and December 29 there was considerable fluctuation in the market for these shares, which fell as low as 50. The chief question between the parties was whether by the usage of the Stock Exchange, upon the default of E. Preston and Co., the defendants had an option to close the bargain with the plaintiffs at the hammering price. The defendants further contended (1) that the plaintiffs offered the defendant an option of closing at the hammering price, which was accepted by Mr. Detmold, so that the case was covered by "Hartass v. Ribbons" (22 Q.B.D., 254); (2) that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant. E. Preston and Co. had altogether 640 of these shares open with various jobbers for the defendant, and 250 for another client. All these had been carried over for several accounts. It appeared from the plaintiffs' books that at one account 250 shares open with a particular jobber were allocated to the defendant as part of his 640, whereas at the next account those 250 shares were allocated to the other client, and another block of 250 open with a different jobber were appropriated to the defendant's contract. It was contended that there was no evidence to show that the 300 open with the plaintiffs were ever allocated to the defendant as part of his 640, and therefore there was no privity of contract between plaintiffs and defendant; "Beckhusen and Gibbs v. Hamblet" (5 Com. Cas., 217); (3) in view of an appeal, that upon E. Preston and Co. being declared defaulters, Rule 177 applied as between plaintiffs and defendant, so that the only liability of the defendant was to settle with the official assignee upon the hammering price. This point was decided, so far as this Court was concerned, adversely to the defendants in "Beckhusen and Gibbs v. Hamblet."

Dr. Richardson, official assignee of the Stock Exchange, gave evidence that there was no usage or custom whereby, upon the default of the broker, his client had an option to close the bargain with the jobber at the hammering price. Also that there was nothing irregular in a broker who had allocated at one carrying over a parcel of shares open with a jobber to one client transferring this parcel to another client at the next carrying over, and that this was a usual practice.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. McIntyre appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. E. Morten (with him Mr. H. Reed, Q.C.) for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE MATHURW, in giving judgment, said that the evidence in this case was more distinct than in the previous case decided by himself of "Anderson and Co. v. Beard" (ante, p. 367). In that case it was rather assumed that the broker's client had an option to close with the jobber at the hammering price. But the point was not really in issue, because the client there repudiated the whole transaction with the jobber. In the present case there was the clear and unchallenged evidence of Dr. Richardson that there was no custom or usage by which the defendant was entitled to such an option. Then it was said that, as a matter of fact, the plaintiffs had offered this option to the defendant and it had been accepted by him. But that was not made out. Mr. Detmold said the bargain was closed at the hammering price, but it was clear he was acting under what he supposed to be his rights under Rule 177. And that the plaintiffs did not intend to offer that option was evident from their solicitors' letter of December 20. Then it was said that the shares had been so dealt with by E. Preston and Co. that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant. But the evidence was that they only acted in interchanging the parcels of shares between different jobbers in the customary manner. There seemed no objection to that, and the practice seemed reasonable. There was therefore privity of contract and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed with costs.

A stay of execution was granted with a view to an appeal.

GOODWIN V. SATURLEY.*

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant not to assign without consent—Consent not to be unreasonably withheld to a responsible assignee—Claim by tenant for withholding consent.

The defendant became tenant to the plaintiff of a house, and he covenanted not to assign the premises without the consent of the plaintiff, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld to a responsible tenant. The plaintiff refused his consent to an assignment. The plaintiff having sued for rent, the defendant counterclaimed for a declaration that the proposed assignee was a responsible person, or, alternatively, for damages for breach of covenant by the plaintiff in refusing the consent.

Held, that there was no covenant by the plaintiff to give his consent in the case of a responsible assignee, such words being merely a qualification of the defendant's covenant.

"Sear v. House Property and Investment Society" (16 Ch.D., 387) followed.

In this case the plaintiff sued to recover £50, being two quarters' rent for a shop known as 157, High-road, Kilburn. The defendant admitted the plaintiff's claim, subject to a counterclaim, in which he set out that the lease of the premises in question contained a covenant by himself, his administrators, executors, and assigns not to carry on or to permit to be carried on upon the demised premises any trade other than the trade of a confectioner, and not to assign the premises without previously obtaining the consent in writing of the lessor, but that nevertheless such consent should not be unreasonably or arbitrarily withheld to a respectable and responsible assignee. The defendant, in November, 1899, applied, by a person who was desirous of becoming his assignee, for the lessor's consent to the assignment. This was refused by the plaintiff, and the defendant asked for a declaration that the proposed assignee was a respectable and responsible underlessee, and that he was entitled to sublet the demised premises to him, or, in the alternative, for damages for the plaintiff's breach of his covenant not to refuse his consent to a respectable and responsible assignee. The plaintiff having replied that the counterclaim disclosed no cause of action, since there was no covenant by the lessor not to refuse the licence, the question of law was argued before his Lordship.

Mr. T. Willes Chitty appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Givven for the defendant.

Mr. CHITTY submitted that it was clearly established in "Sear v. House Property and Investment Society" (16 Ch. Div.) that where there was a covenant by the tenant not to sublet without the landlord's consent, such consent not to be unreasonably refused, there was no covenant by the landlord to give his consent. The proper course for the tenant was to let the premises, despite the refusal, and if the refusal was found to be unreasonable the letting would be a good one. He also referred to "Treloar v. Bigge" (L.R., 9 Ex., 151) and "Hyde v. Warner" (3 Ex. Div., 72).

Mr. GIVVEN argued that in the case of "Treloar v. Bigge" the words referring to the landlord's consent not being arbitrarily withheld only appeared in a proviso to the lessee's covenant, and it was said by Chief Baron Kelly in his judgment that if the words there used had been used in another part of the deed they might be properly construed as amounting to a covenant by the landlord. In the present case the words were not part of a proviso, but were in the covenant itself.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY.—What the Chief Baron said was that there was a covenant on the part of the lessee, and that the words in question contained a qualification of it. They were all part of the same covenant. If they were in a different part of the deed—for instance, among the lessor's covenants—they might be held to constitute a covenant on the part of the landlord.

Mr. GIVVEN, continuing, said he also asked for a declaration that the proposed assignee was a respectable and responsible person. This was a proper case for a declaration.

His LORDSHIP said he could not make a person respectable or responsible by making a declaration.

Mr. GIVVEN said that such a declaration would prevent the landlord from bringing ejectment against the assignee. The defendant was left with a lease on his lands which he could not get rid of because the landlord refused his consent to the assignment. He also claimed that such refusal was a breach of the landlord's covenant for quiet enjoyment. Part of the enjoyment was the right to assign, and anything done by the landlord in contravention of that right was an interference with the right of quiet enjoyment.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said he did not think the case was distinguishable in principle from "Sear v. House Property Investment Society." It was said in the argument that the words "but nevertheless such consent should not be unreasonably or arbitrarily withheld" must be read as an independent covenant on the part of the lessor that he would not unreasonably refuse his consent. It seemed to him that that exact point was raised and dealt with in the case he had referred to. The difference in the words used in the two cases was merely a grammatical variation which did not affect the matter. He thought it must be read, not as a covenant by the landlord, but as a qualification of the lessee's covenant. If the landlord did unreasonably refuse his consent the lessee could deal with the premises without restriction. With regard to the question of the declaration of right which was asked for, he was of opinion that it could not be given in the present case, nor did he think there was any breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment. There would therefore be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

THE DRIEFONTEIN CONSOLIDATED MINES (LIMITED) v.
JANSON—THE WEST RAND CENTRAL GOLD MINES COMPANY (LIMITED) v. DE BOUEMENT.*

Insurance—Marine—Restraints and arrests of hostile Government—Commandeering of gold—
State of war, whether existing.

The cases arose out of the commandeering of upwards of £300,000 worth of bullion by officials of the Transvaal in October last. The defendants were underwriters at Lloyd's. The facts and the arguments were fully reported in The Times of May 26 and 29.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Lord Robert Cecil, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW.—The first of these two cases was an action brought by the plaintiff company against underwriters at Lloyd's to recover a loss through the capture of gold while in transit from Johannesburg to the United Kingdom. The policy contained the usual clause against capture. The facts were these:—The gold was despatched from Johannesburg by train on October 2, and was seized at the frontier of the Transvaal by the orders of the Transvaal Government. On October 9 an ultimatum was issued by the Transvaal Government announcing that if certain demands contained therein were not complied with the conduct of the British Government would be treated as a declaration of war at 5 o'clock on October 11. The gold was taken absolutely out of the possession of the plaintiff company, and a demand was made on the underwriters for payment of the amount of the loss, but the underwriters refuse payment on the grounds stated in the points of defence, as follows:—"The plaintiffs are a limited company incorporated according to the laws of, and domiciled within the territories of, the present South African Republic and are alien enemies or her Majesty, and the loss, if by any peril insured against, was by an arrest, restraint, or detention by the Government of the present South African Republic incidental to actual or expected hostilities against her Majesty and made for a purpose connected therewith—namely, to supply the said Government with funds with which to levy war upon her Majesty, as they were then purposing, and shortly afterwards proceeded, to do, whereby the plaintiffs' claim herein is for an indemnity which is contrary to public policy and is altogether barred and cannot be maintained." For the purposes of this action it was agreed that the Blue-books issued by the Government of this country should be treated as containing the evidence of all material facts, and it was further agreed that no dilatory plea should be set up based on the fact that the plaintiffs were an alien company, and therefore could not sue in this country while the war lasted. The case is to be dealt with as if the war was over. The first point raised on behalf of the defendant in argument was this. It was said that it was shown from what appears in the Blue-books that the Transvaal Government were, on October 2, resolved to go to war, and that the seizure of the gold was made with the object of obtaining the means of prosecuting the war effectively. The seizure was said, therefore, to be like an attack actually made by a belligerent Power upon enemy's territory. If that contention is right, all the serious consequences of a state of war would have followed from October 2. If war had then commenced, all commercial relations between the subjects of the two countries should have ceased, and every kind of communication that could relieve the pressure of hostilities was a violation of duty. I am clear that there was no state of war on October 2. What constitutes a state of war is well described in "Hall's International Law" (4th ed.), at p. 63:—"When differences between States reach a point at which both parties resort to force or one of them does acts of violence which the other chooses to look upon as a breach of the peace, the relation of war is set up, in which the combatants may use regulated violence against each other until one of the two has been brought to accept such terms as his enemy is willing to grant." There was no evidence before me of the existence on October 2 of an intention to settle the dispute by force, and, in fact, the negotiations for a peaceful settlement continued for several days after that date. Moreover both Governments were aware of the seizure of the gold and neither treated it as an act of war. There is no evidence of any intention at that date to issue the sudden ultimatum which was eventually delivered on October 9. Under these circumstances it is quite clear that the subsequent intention to wage war cannot be treated as an act of war at that time. The seizure was not a hostile act, and therefore if there is no other valid defence the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. But a second point was raised. It was said that when the war did actually break out the seizure of the gold, even assuming it to have been a neutral act before, then acquired a hostile character. The proclamation of war on October 11 dated back, it was said, to the previous seizure on October 2, with the same result as if the seizure had been made after war was declared. In support of this contention the cases of "The Herstdelder" (1 C. Rob., 113) and "The Boedes Lust" (5 C. Rob., 233) were cited. The case was said to resemble that of an embargo laid on alien ships followed by a declaration of war. In such a case the embargo would become a capture, and it is argued that here the seizure of gold ripened into a capture after the declaration of war. There is, however, in my opinion, no analogy between a seizure such as this, which only applies to the owner of the property seized, and an embargo. In the case of an embargo the property remains in the owner's hands, but here the bullion was taken from the control of the plaintiff company by seizure in invitum. Again, the cases referred to relate to the acts of a belligerent and throw no light on this case, where the seizure was by the Transvaal Government of the property of its own subjects. There is no authority for this supposed doctrine of the relation back from the date of the declaration of war to the date of the seizure. Then it was said there was a further ground of defence. It was said that, even if the original seizure was not an act of war and that a right of action arose as soon as the capture was made, the subsequent war extinguished the liability of the underwriters. The principle of law contended for was that any contract which operates to protect the enemy's property from the calamities of war is against public policy and illegal. The cases cited in support of this principle were the well-known prize cases in the early days of this century—"Furtado v. Rogers" (3 B. and P., 191), "Kellner v. Le Mesurier" (4 East, 396), "Gamba v. Le Mesurier" (ibid 407), "Brandon v. Curling" (ibid 409), and the statement of the law in "Duer on Insurance," Vol. 1, p. 414. No doubt it is the law that insurances on ships by English underwriters against English capture is illegal. In the words of Lord Ellenborough in "Brandon v. Curling" at p. 417:—"When the insurance is upon goods generally, a proviso to this effect shall in all cases be considered as engrafted therein—viz., 'provided that this insurance shall not extend to cover any loss happening during the existence of hostilities between the respective countries of the assured and the assurer,' because during the existence of such hostilities the subjects of the one country cannot allowably lend their assistance to protect by insurance the property and commerce of the subjects of the other." On the grounds stated in the earlier cases, to permit such insurance would be obviously repugnant to the interests of the State. Capture is intended to defeat and weaken the resources of the enemy, and the contract of indemnity would frustrate that purpose. It is said that this principle should be developed and extended to include this case, and that a further exception should be written into this policy—viz., the exception of capture by a belligerent Government of the property of its own subjects. There is no authority for that contention. It is said that to pay during the war the amount of the loss of the assured must increase the resources of the belligerent Power of which the assured is a subject. Without dealing at length with this proposition and without considering how far it could, in fact, be maintained, it is obvious that no such contention can arise when the war is over, and it has been agreed, as I have already said, that this case is to be treated as if the war were at an end. The supposed principle would wholly override the well-known rule of law that, when both the contract of indemnity is entered into and the loss occurs before the commencement of hostilities, the declaration of war only suspends the remedy whilst the war lasts, "Flinat v. Waters" (15 East, 260); "Alcinous v. Nigreu" (4 E. and B., 217); "Duer on Insurance," Vol. 1, p. 434. I am satisfied that my judgment in the first case must be for the plaintiff company. A point was argued at considerable length by Mr. Carver in his reply that the plaintiff company was not an alien enemy, on the ground that the majority of the shareholders were French, Germans, and subjects of the Queen, and that only a very few were the subjects of the Transvaal Government. In my opinion this company, being incorporated under the Transvaal law, must be treated as a Transvaal subject, and it is clear from the decision of Mr. Justice Story in the case referred to by Mr. Walton, "Society for the Propagation of the Gospel v. Wheeler" (2 Gall., 104), that a company may be treated as an alien enemy. In the second action the only difference is that a point was raised by the defendant that at the time of the loss the goods were not covered by the policy. That is a question of fact. The course of business followed by the plaintiffs was that parcels of bullion were, from time to time, forwarded from the mine to a bank in Johannesburg in order that they might be sent on to the United Kingdom, and the bank would make advances against the parcels of bullion. On October 9 the bullion in question was sent from the mine to the bank, and, according to the terms of the policy, the gold was to be covered at and from the mines to its ultimate destination. At the time when the gold reached the bank it was known that other gold had been seized, and the bank manager refused to make an advance on the gold. It was agreed that the gold should remain in the bank until further arrangements could be made. It is said that the gold was never in transit, but I am of opinion that it was. It was further said that the leaving the gold in the bank amounted to a deviation. It was, however, the duty of the assured to make the necessary arrangements for the safety of the gold, and the arrangement made was the best that could be done at the time. There was, therefore, no deviation. My judgment in the second case must follow the first and must be for the plaintiffs.

A stay of execution was granted pending an appeal.

MACKRELL AND ANOTHER V. BRENTFORD JUSTICES.*

Licence—Renewal—Refusal to renew—Grounds of refusal—Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, sec. 8.

This was an appeal by way of special case from the refusal of the justices of Brentford to renew the licence in respect of the Britannia Tap Beerhouse at Twickenham. The justices at the general annual licensing meeting refused the renewal. The owner and occupier appealed to the quarter sessions, where the order of the licensing justices was affirmed, subject to the special case, which stated the following facts:—The Britannia Tap Beerhouse, owned by Charles Arthur Mackrell and occupied by Robert Henry Shepherd, had been licensed for the sale by retail of beer and cider to be consumed on the premises ever since May 1, 1869, the licence having been continuously renewed down to and including the year 1898. No beer, however, had been sold on the premises for 28 years. There were no fittings in the house for the sale of beer. No sign board was exhibited nor was there any indication of a licence, except that the words "licensed for the sale by retail of beer and cider to be consumed on the premises" were painted in small letters over the door. From the year 1895 the licence had been held by one L. L. Harbor the then resident occupier. He was underleasee of and acted as manager for Messrs. Lascelles, Tickner and Co., the lessees for 21 years, but had no instructions from them, and was not expected by them, to trade. In 1898 the lease of Messrs. Lascelles expired and the appellant Mackrell became owner. On January 14 he leased the house to the appellant Shepherd, who, at the special transfer sessions, applied for a transfer of the licence formerly held by L. L. Harbor. The justices refused the transfer on learning that L. L. Harbor had not sold any beer on the premises and that the house was not therefore "an inn theretofore kept by another person being about to remove" within the meaning of section 4 of the Alehouse Act, 1828. The appellant Shepherd then applied to the licensing justices for a renewal to himself of the licence. Notice of objection was given on the ground that no beer had been sold and that the licence was not required by the needs of the neighbourhood; but no objection was made on any of the four grounds specified in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. The application for renewal was refused. The owner, C. A. Mackrell, and the occupier, R. H. Shepherd, appealed to quarter sessions, where the justices held that the case of "Reg. v. Cotham" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 802) was in principle applicable and that, as no beer had been sold upon the premises, such premises had not been kept as a beerhouse; that no use had been made of the licence; that the successive transferees had not intended to keep nor kept an inn; that the licence was merely colourable; and that therefore there was no jurisdiction to grant a certificate by way of renewal to the appellant Shepherd, notwithstanding that he was the occupier of the premises at the time of his application. They therefore dismissed the appeal subject to the special case, which now came on for argument.

Mr. BRUCE WILLIAMSON, for the appellants, contended that this house being a privileged house—i.e., one licensed on May 1, 1869—the justices could only refuse a renewal upon some or one of the four grounds specified in section 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. He cited sections 8 and 19 of that Act and section 7 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1870; and argued that the case of "Reg. v. Cotham" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 802) was one of transfer and not of renewal of a licence, and was not, therefore, in point. It was not necessary to the success of an application for a renewal that the applicant should at the date of the application be a person licensed—"Symons v. Wedmore" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 401).

The justices were not represented.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

Mr. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that the question before the Court was not whether the justices were bound to renew from year to year in a case where the applicant had no intention of carrying on the business of the occupier of a beerhouse. The Court had to deal with the facts of this particular case. This house stood licensed on May 1, 1869, and that licence had been annually renewed. The question was whether in these circumstances the magistrates could go outside section 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, and refuse the renewal because the licence was not required by the needs of the neighbourhood. In his Lordship's view the magistrates could not do so. The section of the Act was express and clear and only enabled the magistrates to refuse the renewal for one of the four grounds mentioned in the section. The needs of the neighbourhood were not included among the specified grounds, nor was the fact that the licence had not been exercised. The licensing justices and the Court of quarter sessions were therefore wrong and ought to have granted the certificate.

Mr. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. Section 19 of the Act of 1869 preserved the rights of persons occupying houses licensed on May 1, 1869, by preventing the refusal of renewals except upon one or more of four specified grounds. That statute only preserved those rights for one year. But in the following Session the Act of 1870, by section 7, applied the provisions of the former Act to renewals of such licences from year to year. An applicant could, therefore, come for renewal of the licence, which must be renewed except for one of these four grounds. The fact that there had been no sale was not one of those grounds. If a person licensed left the house and another person came in the newcomer could not get the existing licence transferred to him, "Reg. v. Cotham" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 802), because the machinery provided by statute did not apply to such a case. But his position at the end of the year when he came to have the licence renewed was very different. The case of "Symons v. Wedmore" ([1894] 1 Q.B., 401) made it clear that the tenant might come for a renewal though not at the time entitled to sell. "Reg. v. Cotham" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 802) was not applicable, and the justices ought to have granted the renewal.

The case was remitted to the justices with a direction to this effect.

TRUSTEES OF SIR J. SOANE'S MUSEUM V. ST. GILES'S AND ST. GEORGE'S VESTRY.*

Rating—Rateability—Sir John Soane's Museum —Trustees—Beneficial occupation.

The question in this case was whether the appellants, the trustees of the Soane Museum, were liable to be rated in respect of their occupation of the museum premises, No. 13, Lincoln's-inn-fields. The respondents were the joint vestry of the parishes of St. Giles-in-the-Fields and St. George, Bloomsbury, the rating authority for the district in which the museum is situated. On October 27 of last year the respondents rated the appellants in respect of the museum, assessing the rateable value at £292. They made a rate of 1s. 9d. in the pound for the relief of the poor, 1s. 7d. in the pound for purposes of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, and 3d. in the pound for sewerage expenses. The appellants refused to pay these rates and gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions from the assessment. Subsequently, by consent of the parties and by an order of Mr. Justice Kennedy, a special case was stated between the appellants and respondents, the parties agreeing that judgment in accordance with the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division should be entered in the Court of quarter sessions. The special case now came on for argument, and stated the following facts:—The appellants were appointed pursuant to an Act of the third year of William IV., which recited that Sir J. Soane had collected a number of valuable effects deposited in the rated premises which were built for the purposes of a museum, and in the occupation of Sir J. Soane, who was desirous that the museum and collection should be kept together and preserved for the public use and benefit. It was then enacted that the rated premises and also the adjoining house, No. 12, Lincoln's-inn-fields, should be vested in the trustees appointed by the Act and their successors, upon the trust that they should exercise a due control over the museum and provide that free access should be given at least on two days in every week in the months of April, May, and June, and at such other times as the trustees should direct, to amateurs and students of painting, sculpture, and architecture, and to such other persons as should apply for and obtain admission thereto, at such hours and in such manner as Sir J. Soane should have established before his death, or as the trustees should establish relating thereto; and that the trustees should not alter the arrangement of the collection. Provision was then made by the Act for the payment of a yearly sum of

* Reported by W. HUSSEY GRIFFITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£500 to defray rates, taxes, and charges charged upon the rated premises. Section 3 of the Act provided that a curator should reside in the rated premises, and that the trustees should appropriate to him one bed room and one sitting room to enable him to perform his duties. The special case further stated that the trustees, who were also trustees of a charity established by Sir J. Soane in favour of distressed architects and their families, regularly held an annual meeting in the rated premises for the distribution of funds among objects of this charity.

MR. S. A. T. ROWLATT appeared for the trustees, and contended that there was no beneficial occupation of the premises, which, consequently, were not rateable. The museum was created by the Act which then called in the trustees merely as custodians. The case was covered by the Brockwell Park case, "Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council" ([1897] A.C., 625).

MR. WALTER C. RYDE, for the respondents, contended that the trustees could be in no better position than Sir J. Soane himself would have been in. Benefit and not profit was the test of the rateability of property. The Brockwell Park case was readily distinguishable, for there the County Council had only an occupation of the park subject to the overriding rights of the public, which took away all possible benefit from such occupation. He cited "Greig v. University of Edinburgh" (L.R., 1 H.L., Sc., 348); "Mayor of London v. Stratton" (L.R., 7 H.L., 477); "Owens College v. Overseers of Chorlton-upon-Medlock" (18 Q.B.D., 403); "London County Council v. Churchwardens of Erith" ([1893] A.C., 562).

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said it was clear that the premises were rateable. This museum had been founded for 67 years, but until now no one had been found ingenious enough to argue to the contrary. Sir J. Soane had wished that the house and collection should remain as they had been in his lifetime, and that the public might have an opportunity of visiting them—not, however, the public at large, for admission to the museum was subject to restrictions. The rights of the public did not exhaust the beneficial user of the house. The chattels had to be housed and the curator supplied with rooms. This view was supported by "Reg. v. Cockburn" (16 Q.B., 480) and by "London County Council v. Churchwardens of Erith" ([1893] A.C., 562).

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL, concurring, said that in the Act establishing the museum and appointing the trustees there was nothing which rendered the property incapable of beneficial occupation. The absence of beneficial occupation was the gist of the Brockwell Park case, where the rights of the public took away any possibility of beneficial occupation by the County Council. Here though the rights of the public did to a certain extent, they did not by any means entirely, deprive the trustees of the beneficial occupation. The appellants were, therefore, liable to be rated.

LANGLEY V. BOMBAY TEA COMPANY (LIMITED).
Merchandise Marks Act, 1887—False trade description—Words and conduct.

This case raised the question whether a tradesman who by words or conduct represents that goods which he is selling are of a certain weight, contrary to the fact, can be said to "apply a false trade description" to the goods within the meaning of section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 28), so as to be guilty of an offence against that Act. The facts were as follows:—On December 2, 1899, the appellant, at the respondent's shop in Clayton-street, Newcastle-on-Tyne, asked for two half-pounds of tea. The tea was lying in packets on the counter. These packets were stamped on the outside in ink with the words "The weight of this package, including the wrapper, is half a pound." One of the respondent's salesmen took two packets, wrapped them in paper, and handed them to the appellant, who paid the sum of 2s. 6d. for them. Nothing was said by the salesman, who simply handed over the parcel to the appellant. The latter took it to an inspector of weights and measures. The parcel was then opened and there were found stamped in ink on each packet the words above set out. Placed under the string securing each packet was a ticket resembling a railway ticket, upon which was printed, "The Bombay Tea Company (Limited), 50, Bull-street, Birmingham. ½lb. cheque for Tea, Coffee, or Cocoa." On presentation of these cheques at the respondent's shop in Newcastle the appellant would be entitled to receive for each cheque some article as a present, or by way of discount on his purchase. The inspector weighed the packets and their contents. One packet was found to contain 144½ grains and the other 132 grains less than half a pound. In each case, however, the weight, including the paper wrapper, was more than half a pound by 24 grains in one instance and 35 in the other. Upon these facts an information was laid by the appellant against the Bombay Tea Company, the respondents, for unlawfully selling two half-pounds of tea to which a false trade description or statement as to the weight of the goods was applied, contrary to section 2, subsection 2, of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. The information was heard before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction for the city and county of Newcastle. The justices held that a trade description meant something written, printed, or stamped, and that a description expressed in words or implied by conduct was not sufficient to constitute an offence under the Act. They therefore dismissed the information. The appellant, being dissatisfied with this judgment, applied to the justices to state a case for the opinion of this Court. The case was accordingly stated, setting out the facts mentioned above. This case now came on for argument.

MR. ROBSON, Q.C., and MR. HERBERT JACOBS for the appellant, contended that a false description as to the weight of the goods had been given when the appellant asked for two half-pounds of tea and two packets containing each less than half a pound were handed to him in compliance with his order. That false description was applied to the goods. The word "apply" did not mean physically to attach to the goods. Such an attachment might have been necessary before the Act of 1887, the word used in the earlier statute of 1862 (25 and 26 Vict., c. 88, s. 8) being "put," which was now altered to "apply." Counsel alluded to sections 2, 3, and 4 of the later Act. Section 20 clearly contemplated a verbal misdescription. The dictum of Mr. Justice Wright in "Coppen v. Moore" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 300), to the effect that section 2, subsection 2, of the Act did not apply in case of a trade description which was wholly verbal, could not be supported. They also cited "Budd v. Lucas" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 408).

MR. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and MR. A. CLARKE-WILLIAMS (Sir Edward Clarke, Q.C., and Mr. T. Willes Chitty with them), for the respondents, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that in his view there had been no false trade description. The respondents had applied a description showing that what they were offering was less than half a pound. It could not, therefore, be said that they had applied a description to the effect that what they were offering was half a pound.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred, saying that he agreed with the dictum of Mr. Justice Wright in "Coppen v. Moore" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 300), that the enactment did not apply to verbal descriptions. This, though a dictum, was a deliberate statement of opinion after consideration by a learned Judge, who during the course of the argument had inclined to the opposite view. That opinion was one which his Lordship would follow even if he did not assent to it, which he did. In his view it disposed of this case.

CHRISTIE, MANSON, AND WOODS V. COOPER.*

Merchandise Marks Act, 1887—Selling goods with forged trade marks—"Acting innocently."

This case raised a very important point under the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 28), section 2, subsection 2. It was an appeal by Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods, the well-known auctioneers, from a conviction for unlawfully selling certain goods to which forged trade marks were applied. The appeal was by way of special case stated by the magistrate, which set out the following facts:—His Majesty Albert, King of Saxony, of the Royal Manufactory of Porcelain of Saxony at Meissen, in Saxony, is entered on the register of trade marks as proprietor of a certain trade mark, No. 1,137, in class 16, "in respect of china, porcelain, statuary, porcelain plaques on tiles, and bisque china," and such registration is now in force. The London agents of the Royal factory of Dresden are Messrs. Oppenheim, of 43, Farringdon-street, E.C. On January 9, 1900, and on the following day the appellants exposed to public view at their auction rooms in King-street for the purpose of sale, certain goods then advertised to be sold by them on January 11, by order of the executors of a deceased gentleman. The goods which were the subject of the complaint were lot 71, and were thus described in the catalogue—"71, a white Dresden centre dish, four smaller ditto; a pair of oval baskets on stems, with figures of cupids, children, and infant satyrs; and a pair of ditto candlesticks, with figure stems." The catalogues contained the conditions of sale by which the appellants stipulated that they should not be responsible for the correct description, genuineness, or authenticity of any lot. The pieces of china were in the white Dresden style, and had affixed to them marks resembling and being good imitations of the trade mark, No. 1,137, in class 16 above mentioned; but the magistrate found that the goods were not genuine Dresden china, and the marks on them were forged trade marks within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. On the morning of the sale on January 11 a telegram was despatched by the solicitors of Messrs. Oppenheim, the agents to the Dresden Royal factory, at about 9 30, and was received by Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods in time to admit of full examination of the goods in question. This telegram referred to a letter sent in July, 1898, by the appellants to Messrs. Oppenheim, which contained the following passage:—"All things sold by us are placed on view for two days preceding the sale, and our rooms are open to all, so that the Dresden factory's agents are at liberty to inspect every piece of china. Though we are quite ready to assist in stopping forgeries, we cannot undertake to be responsible in any way for the various articles that pass through our hands. Yours faithfully, CHRISTIE, MANSON, and WOODS." The telegram above mentioned was in these terms:—"Referring your letter, July 12, 1898, lot 71, to-day's sale; believed not genuine. Writing. HALSE and TRUSTRAM." After the receipt of this telegram the goods were examined by a member of the appellants' firm specially conversant with china, and he informed Mr. Anderson (the member of the firm who was about to conduct the sale) that he would advise the lot in question being sold "for what it is," as the goods had "to go"—i.e., be sold without reserve. Mr. Anderson thereupon made a memorandum on his own sale catalogue by putting his pen through the word "Dresden," and on lot 71 being reached he said to the assembled bidders, "our attention has been drawn to this lot and we sell it for what it is. You see what there is—what shall we say for it?" Bidding thereupon proceeded in the usual manner, and the lot was knocked down to the prosecutor, the respondent, for the sum of £4 10s. The articles comprised in lot 71 were lotted and described as they appeared in the catalogue by a person employed by the appellants as an expert in china, who at the time he so described them believed them to be Dresden and the marks upon them to be genuine. No attempt was made to establish that the articles were genuine Dresden china. The magistrate found that the appellants had sold goods to which a forged trade mark had been applied, and that, having failed to prove (a) that they had taken all reasonable precautions against committing the offence; and (b) that they had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade mark, they had not "acted innocently" within the meaning of section 2, subsection 2 (c) of the Act. He accordingly fined the appellants £10, and they, being dissatisfied with this decision, applied for the special case. The case now came on for hearing.

MR. MOULTON, Q.C., and MR. HORACE AVORY, for the appellants, submitted that the statute enabled a defendant to prove that he had acted innocently otherwise than by proving that he had taken all reasonable precautions against committing the offence and that he had no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade mark. The facts in this case proved that the appellants were innocent of any intention to offend against the Act, and that was sufficient to exonerate them.

MR. ISRAEL DAVIES, for the respondent, cited the cases of "Coppin v. Moore" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 306), "Wood v. Burgess" (24 Q.B.D., 165), and contended that the state of mind of an appellant was immaterial. It was sufficient for their liability if they sold goods under a false trade mark, the Act being for the protection of owners of trade marks.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that the magistrate was wrong in the view he took of section 2, subsection 2. He had held that "acting innocently" involved fulfilling all the conditions mentioned in that subsection—viz., taking all reasonable precautions and having no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade mark. But by subsection 2 (c) a defendant might prove that he had "otherwise acted innocently." The magistrate had not considered the possibility of innocence being proved otherwise than by taking all reasonable precautions and having no reason to suspect the genuineness of the trade mark. The conviction must therefore be set aside.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. The point of law in this case was what was the meaning of the words "that otherwise he had acted innocently." The effect of this statute had been carefully considered in "Coppin v. Moore" ([1898] 2 Q.B., 306). The scheme of the Act was this:—Whereas in most criminal cases the prosecution must prove a guilty intention, such proof by the prosecution was not necessary in this statute. Yet this was not one of those cases where the Legislature, intending to prevent the commission of an act, absolutely had provided that any one doing the act, whether with a guilty intention or not, should be punished. This statute fell short of that class of enactments. There must be a guilty intention, but the burden of proving it was not, as usual in criminal cases, upon the prosecution. It was for the defendant to prove that he acted innocently. The question was, had the defendant proved his innocence? The magistrate had held there could be no innocence without absence of suspicion, but for the reasons pointed out by Mr. Justice Grantham that was not the correct view. Innocence of any intention to infringe the Act might co-exist with a suspicion as to the genuineness of the trade mark. The only doubt was whether, instead of quashing the conviction, the Court should not remit the case to the magistrate for a finding as to the innocence of the defendant. But upon this point his Lordship did not dissent from the view of Mr. Justice Grantham.

HALL V. DUKE OF NORFOLK AND OTHERS.*

Support—Mineral workings—Subsidence—Injury to buildings.

A lessee of mines is not liable for a subsidence causing damage which occurs during his tenancy, but was caused by the excavations of his predecessor in title.

This was an action brought by Mr. John Hall, the owner in fee of the Manor-house, Overseal, Ashby-de-la-Zouch, in the county of Leicester, against the Duke of Norfolk, the executor and trustee of the late Lord Donington, Messrs. Richard Wilkinson, Henry Newton, Christopher Spalding, and the Moira Colliery Company (Limited) claiming (1) to have it ascertained what damage the plaintiff's house had suffered by reason of the working of the main seam in the adjoining Moira Colliery of the defendants; (2) a declaration that the defendants were liable to make good such damage; (3) payment accordingly. It appeared that in the years 1889, 1890, and 1891 the late Lord Donington worked the seam. On April 2, 1892, Lord Donington made his will, appointing the Duke of Norfolk, Mr. George Edward Lake, and the Hon. G. T. C. Rawdon Hastings executors and trustees thereof. On July 24, 1895, Lord Donington died, and his will was proved by the Duke of Norfolk and Mr. Lake, Mr. Rawdon Hastings renouncing probate. The Duke of Norfolk and Mr. Lake carried on the business of the colliery until October 1, 1895, and afterwards as agents for the defendants, Messrs. Wilkinson, Newton, and Spalding. On November 16, 1895, the trustees granted a lease of the Moira Colliery to the defendants, Messrs. Wilkinson, Newton, and Spalding, for 21 years, and on November 20, 1895, the Moira Colliery Company (Limited) was formed and the lease and the interests under it were assigned to the defendant company. There was no covenant on the part of the lessees to prevent damage by subsidence. In November, 1895, a subsidence occurred and the plaintiff brought his action. Mr. Lake had since died. The defence was that the defendants had not actively caused the damage, and therefore they were not responsible.

Mr. P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. MacSwiney appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Kenyon Parker for the Duke of Norfolk; and Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Ashton Cross for the lessees.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, in giving judgment, said that some years ago, from 1889 to 1891, Lord Donington worked coal under land in his possession, which was a perfectly rightful act. Many years after, at the end of 1895, the working of the coal caused a subsidence to neighbouring land of the plaintiff's, injuring a house on the land, in respect of which he was entitled to recover if he could find out the proper persons to proceed against. It was not proved when the subsidence occurred, but on the evidence it did not occur until after November, 1895, or until after the trustees demised the coal to the defendants. The plaintiff endeavoured to recover damages against Lord Donington's estate, but that action failed because it was a personal action which was determined by the death of Lord Donington. He then sought to claim against the persons who represented Lord Donington, the trustees, and lessees. The executors and trustees worked the coal for a few months, and must be treated as owners; they then demised the coal to the other defendants, who came into possession and worked the coal. It was not suggested that the executors and trustees or the defendants, the lessees, caused the damage. That was traceable to the working of the seam by Lord Donington between 1889 and 1891. There was no damage until 1895, and the right of action did not accrue until then. The question now arose whether, in point of law, the defendants could be rendered liable because they allowed the nuisance to be continued. In the case of "Greenwell v. Low Beechburn Coal Company" (13 The Times L.R., 471 and [1897] 2 Q.B., 165) Mr. Justice Bruce stated the question and decided against the plaintiffs and in favour of the defendants. He might say that, Mr. Justice Bruce having considered the question, all he had to do was to follow that decision, but as there was no reported decision on the exact point, and it was said that Mr. Justice Bruce's decision was not consistent with "Darley Main Colliery Company v. Mitchell" (11 App. Cas., 127), he thought, under the circumstances, it was his duty to consider the question as if it was not once concluded as settled law, and to examine the question for himself. He had heard a full argument and considered all the cases, and it seemed to him that unless the question was controlled by the "Darley Main Colliery Company v. Mitchell" he was not at liberty to create a new right of action not recognized in a Court of law. Having read the decision of Mr. Justice Bruce, he entirely agreed with the learned Judge. Mr. Justice Bruce pointed out that there was no reported case in which defendants had been made liable under such circumstances so that it would be creating a new right of action. In "Darley Main Colliery Company v. Mitchell" the House of Lords decided that a new cause of action arose when a new subsidence took place; that was the sole question decided there, but in his Lordship's opinion that case was in direct contradiction to the plaintiff's claim. Upon the point of law, therefore, he was of opinion that the plaintiff's case failed, and it was not necessary to go into the question whether the defendants could do anything to stop the injury. It was not proved here that if the cavity had been filled up the subsidence could have been arrested, so if he had not decided against the plaintiff on the point of law he should have decided against him on that point. There would be judgment for the defendants with costs.

Company—Winding up—Liquidator—Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890, secs. 4 and 6.

On a compulsory winding-up order being made the Official Receiver becomes ipso facto the provisional liquidator, and no other person can be appointed by the Court.

This was an appeal from an order of the County Court Judge at Leeds appointing one Henry Gaskell Blackburn as liquidator in the compulsory winding up of the above-named company. It appeared that the company had been formed in 1895 to carry on the business of furniture dealers. The capital consisted of £35,000 in shares of which practically nothing had been paid up. But little business had ever been carried on, and in March, 1900, the shareholders, who were the seven signatories, agreed to a voluntary winding up, Mr. Blackburn being appointed voluntary liquidator. Subsequently certain creditors presented a petition for a compulsory order. Upon the hearing of this petition Mr. Blackburn appeared and was represented by counsel. He did not object to the compulsory order's being made, but desired that he might be appointed permanent liquidator in the compulsory winding up. He had, on May 1, in his capacity of liquidator in the voluntary winding up, called a meeting of creditors who with four dissentient voices had voted for the continuance of the voluntary winding up with Mr. Blackburn as liquidator and a committee of inspection. The County Court Judge made the order for a compulsory winding up, and from this there was no appeal. But the learned Judge further acceded to Mr. Blackburn's request and appointed him permanent liquidator in the compulsory winding up. From this appointment the Official Receiver, as being by statute the liquidator under these circumstances, appealed.

Mr. ARTHUR RUSSELL, for the appellant, cited section 4 of the Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890, and the case of "In re North Wales Gunpowder Company" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 220), and contended that by the Act the Official Receiver was the liquidator until the shareholders should meet and appoint the permanent liquidator. Consequently the County Court Judge had no power to appoint Mr. Blackburn.

Mr. P. S. STOKES, for Mr. Blackburn, argued that under section 92 of the Companies Act, 1862, the Court had power on the hearing of the petition to appoint a permanent liquidator. There was nothing in the Act of 1890 to take away that power. Further, there had in fact been a meeting of creditors who had given their approval to Mr. Blackburn's acting, and the County Court Judge had taken the only reasonable course in appointing him liquidator.

Mr. Muir Mackenzie appeared for the petitioning creditor.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that though the Act of 1890 did not expressly take away the power formerly vested in the Court by the Act of 1862 of appointing a permanent liquidator on the hearing of a petition for a compulsory winding up, yet the scheme of appointment provided by the later Act was inconsistent with, and therefore abrogated, that of the earlier Act. The Official Receiver was now the liquidator until some other person appointed by a meeting of creditors duly convened by the Official Receiver was ready to act. The meeting of creditors called by Mr. Blackburn had not been summoned under the Act; what was done at it was therefore invalid. It might well be that when duly summoned the creditors might appoint some one other than Mr. Blackburn. The County Court Judge therefore had no power to appoint Mr. Blackburn. The appeal must therefore be allowed, with costs, to be paid out of the estate.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred.

THE JENNER INSTITUTE OF PREVENTIVE MEDICINE V. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF ST. GEORGE'S, HANOVER-SQUARE.*

Rating—Rateability—Exemptions—Society exclusively for purposes of science—Jenner Institute—Carrying on trade.

This case raised the question of the rateability of the Jenner Institute, Chelsea-embankment. The institute appealed by way of special case from an assessment by the respondents, the assessment committee, at a gross value of £1,000 and a rateable value of £834. The appellants were incorporated as a company in July, 1891, under the name of "The British Institute of Preventive Medicine." In December, 1898, they changed their name to the Jenner Institute of Preventive Medicine. The objects of the institute are to study, investigate, discover, and improve means of preventing and curing infective diseases, to provide instruction and education in preventive medicine to medical men and advanced students, to prepare and supply protective and curative materials for, and to treat persons suffering from, infective diseases. They have also provided laboratories, instituted lectures, issued publications, and founded a library. The examination of students and awarding prizes and certificates are among their objects, which include, subject to the provisions of the 21st section of the Companies Act, 1862, the purchase, sale, leasing, or holding of lands or other real and personal property and the mortgage of the same for the purposes of the institute. They have power to receive donations and subscriptions from persons desiring to promote the above objects and to hold funds in trust for the same, subject to the directions of the Charity Commissioners; and also to construct and maintain any buildings which may be necessary or convenient. Their memorandum of association provides that the income and property of the institute shall be applied solely for the promotion of these objects, and that no portion thereof shall be paid by way of dividend or otherwise by way of profit to the members, except to the extent of interest at 5 per cent. on loans made to the institute to promote its objects, or remuneration of professors or other officers and servants of the institute in return for services actually rendered. The institute is supported by interest on investments, fees for lectures, which have so far proved insufficient to defray the expenses thereof, receipts from sales of records and protective and curative medicines such as mallein, tuberculin, and antitoxins, fees for diagnoses, and also by donations. In the last five years donations to an amount exceeding £3,000 had been received and had been applied to current expenses and investments. In March, 1894, the appellants purchased the freehold and erected buildings which constitute the assessed premises. By an agreement, dated May 31, 1898, between the appellants and the Local Government Board, the former agreed to let and the latter to take certain rooms in the assessed premises from March 25 from year to year, in pursuance of which the Local Government Board entered into the occupation of the rooms and used them for the preparation of glycerinated calf lymph and investigations relating to vaccination. This agreement provided that the Local Government Board should not, without the consent of the appellants, use the rooms for any other purpose, and entitled the appellants to have access to the rooms at all times for the purpose of inspecting them. The rest of the assessed premises are exclusively used by the appellants. Antitoxin, mallein, and tuberculin are prepared for sale and sold by the appellants in pursuance of their memorandum of association. Mallein and tuberculin are prepared on the assessed premises. Antitoxin is prepared on the Poplars Farm, a branch establishment of the institute. Up to the present time the preparation and sale of antitoxin has been conducted at a loss to the appellants. For these reasons they appealed from the assessment made by the respondents, claiming to be exempt from parochial and other rates by virtue of the statute 6 and 7 Vict., cap. 36, section 1, as being a society established exclusively for the purposes of science and being supported in part by voluntary contributions. They had obtained the necessary certificate under that section, and a case was accordingly stated under section 40 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, which set out the above facts and now came on for hearing.

Mr. McCALL, Q.C., and Mr. ERNEST POLLOCK, for the appellants, contended that the institute was used exclusively for the purposes of science, and was supported by voluntary contributions. The making and sale of preventive medicines was a means of disseminating scientific knowledge. They cited "Churchwardens of St. Ann v. Linnean Society" (3 E. and B., 793); "Reg. v. Medical Society of London" (21 J.P., 789), "Bradford Library Society v. Churchwardens of Bradford" (1 E. and E., 88), "Royal College of Music v. Westminster Vestry" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 809). The letting of the rooms to the Local Government Board did not affect the exemption, as the Local Government Board, if an individual, would be rateable in respect of their occupation. "Reg. v. Overseers of Manchester" (16 Q.B., 449), "Earl Clarendon v. Rector of St. James's" (10 C.B., 806), "Purvis v. Traill" (3 Exch., 344). [MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM.—If the Royal College of Music were makers and sellers of violins, would they not be rateable?]

Mr. DANCK WERTS, Q.C., and Mr. WALTER C. RYDE, for the respondents, contended that the special case showed distinctly that the appellants carried on a trade in addition to advancing scientific knowledge. They cited "Art Union of London v. Overseers of Savoy" ([1894] 2 Q.B., 609; [1896] A.C., 296), "Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Forrest" (15 App. Cas., 384).

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that the case was an important and interesting one. The appellants were an institution to be commended in every way, and it was well to think that persons were to be found ready to subscribe to it. In the absence of some such society curative and preventive medicines of the utmost value, the making and preparation of which required the greatest skill, would not have reached their present state of perfection. But the Court had to construe an Act of Parliament. The object of the appellants was mainly for the preparation and sale of medicines, and though the earlier cases had gone far in the direction of exempting scientific societies, none had gone so far as to justify the Court in exempting the appellants.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. One of the objects of the appellants was no doubt the promotion of science, but one and probably the main object was to dispense to the public the benefits of science. That being so, they were not instituted exclusively for the purposes of science and the case was not brought within the exemption. The expression "disseminating" used by Lord Justice A. L. Smith in "Royal College of Music v. Westminster Vestry" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 809) did not mean disseminating the products of scientific knowledge. The only difficulty in the case was caused by the occupation of the Local Government Board. But the correct view was that unless the occupation by the under tenant of part was such that he could be rated in respect thereof it would not exempt the occupier of the rest of the premises from liability. If there were a rateable occupation by the under tenant, and the rest of the premises were occupied for the purposes of science, the rest would be exempt; but if part were occupied by a tenant who was not rateable that would not exempt the premises. The occupation of the Local Government Board seemed more analogous to that of a lodger than that of a tenant rateable in respect of his holding.

BENNETT V. HARDING.*

Metropolis—Public Health (London) Act, 1891, sec. 38, subs. 1—Sanitary accommodation—"Work-place," what is—Stable-yard of cab proprietor.

This case raised the question whether a stable and stable-yard constituted a "work-place" within the meaning of section 38, subsection 1 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, so as to make it necessary for the owner or occupier of such premises to provide sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences for the persons employed in or in attendance at such premises. The respondent was the owner or occupier of premises in Ormond-yard, within the jurisdiction of the Holborn District Board of Works. The appellant, the sanitary inspector of the Board of Works, served a notice on the respondent requiring him to provide the necessary sanitary conveniences in accordance with section 38, subsection 2 of the Act. The respondent failed to comply with this notice, and thereby, as the appellant contended, rendered himself liable to a fine of £20, and a further penalty of 40s. for every day during which the non-compliance continued. He accordingly laid a complaint against the respondent. The premises in question consisted of ten stables and a stable-yard, and were in the occupation of the respondent, who was a cab proprietor in a large way of business. He kept on the premises 110 horses and a large number of cabs, of which he was the owner. He employed upon the premises a number of men as horse-keepers and cab-cleaners. His business consisted in letting out cabs and horses by the day to drivers who were daily in attendance for the purpose of hiring, changing, and returning cabs and horses. The horse-keepers and cab-cleaners when not at work lived with their respective families in different rooms, having sanitary conveniences situate over different portions of the premises. In the stables and stable-yard there was no accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences for the horse-keepers and cab-cleaners employed there. The magistrate dismissed the complaint, holding that the stables and yard did not constitute a "work-place" within the meaning of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, section 38 (54 and 55 Vict., c. 76). The appellant being dissatisfied with this decision applied for, and the magistrate accordingly stated, a case, which set out the above facts.

Mr. H. COURTHOPE-MUNRO and Mr. W. H. LEESE, for the appellant, contended that the object of the Legislature was that factories, workshops, and places where persons are employed should be fitted with sanitary conveniences. This appeared from the Public Health Acts, 1890, section 22, and the Public Health Act, 1875, section 38. The word "work-place" was intended to have a wider meaning than factory or workshop. Counsel cited "Countess of Rothes v. Kirkcaldy Waterworks Commissioners" (7 App. Cas., 694); "Anderson v. Anderson" ([1895] 1 Q.B., 749); "Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Association" (1 Ex.D., 469).

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., and Mr. ELLIS J. GRIFFITH, for the respondent, contended that the persons who frequented these premises were customers and not workmen, and that the Act did not apply to this case. "Work-place" must be taken to be a place in the nature of a factory or workshop.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that the magistrate had found as a fact that the hirers of cabs and horses were in attendance on these premises, which were clearly a "work-place" devoted to the work of cab-cleaners and horse-keepers within a confined area. The case therefore came within section 38 of the Act, and the respondent ought to have been convicted.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred. If it were necessary to give to workshop a meaning similar to factory and workshop the similarity must be in relation to the objects of the Act. The stables were analogous to a factory or workshop, in so far as they held numerous persons at work permanently in a confined space. When once it was decided that the premises were a work-place, sanitary conveniences must be supplied, and it then became necessary to consider the sufficiency of those sanitary conveniences. For that purpose the needs of those in attendance on the premises had to be taken into account. The magistrate had found as a fact that the hirers of cabs were in attendance, and that being so, they were not the less so because they were customers.

STOKES V. SPENCER (HAYDON AND ANOTHER, CLAIMANTS).*

Bill of Sale—Validity—Name of grantor—Real and assumed names.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the Marylebone County Court giving judgment for the claimants in an interpleader issue, in which the claimants claimed under a bill of sale certain goods taken in execution by Stokes. One of the questions raised was whether the bill of sale was void by reason that the name of the grantor was wrongly stated. The grantor had for many years before the execution of the bill of sale been known under the name of Mrs. Spencer. Her real name was Ott, and the bill of sale was executed and registered in that name.

Mr. SHORTT, on behalf of the execution creditor, contended that there had, in fact, been no proper registration of the bill of sale, and that it was consequently void by section 8 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. He argued that the name by which the grantor was usually known ought to have been given. In "Ex parte McHattie" (10 C.D., 398) and again in "Downs v. Salmon" (20 Q.B.D., 775) it had been held that the Christian names of the grantor need not be correctly stated, the execution creditor not having been misled thereby, but no case had gone so far as to decide that the surname need not be correctly stated. A creditor searching the register would be misled by the bill of sale being entered under the wrong surname, though he might not be so misled if only the Christian names were incorrect.

Mr. SCARLETT, on behalf of the claimants, cited "Central Bank of London v. Hawkins" (62 L.T., 901), in which a bill of sale registered in a name assumed by the grantor and by which he was generally known was held to be valid.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM thought that the case was governed by "Central Bank of London v. Hawkins."

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said that the bill of sale would have been good under the common law. The only question was whether it was affected by the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. The object of that Act was to prevent frauds upon creditors by secret bills of sale. That object was sought to be attained by means of various specific things which were required to be done. It was possible that some of the means of attaining the object in view were omitted from the provisions of the Act. The present case seemed to show that that was the case. Section 10 (2) of the Act provided that the affidavit filed with the bill of sale should contain a description of the residence and occupation of the grantor, but there was no corresponding requirement that the name of the grantor should be so dealt with, as was pointed out in "Ex parte McHattie." That got rid of the objection so far as the inaccuracy in the name was concerned. The only way in which an inaccuracy in the name could affect the bill would be where the giving of the wrong name went to show that the description of the residence or occupation was insufficient.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY V. TUNBRIDGE-WELLS CORPORATION.*

Telegraph—Laying wires—Refusal to allow opening up of streets—Jurisdiction of highway authority—Telegraph Act, 1892.

This case raised a question under the Telegraph Acts, 1862 to 1892, as to whether a stipendiary magistrate or a County Court Judge has since the Act of 1892 any jurisdiction to hear and determine an appeal from a refusal of the highway authority to allow a telegraph company to open up streets for the purpose of laying wires or tubes. By the Telegraph Act, 1863, section 6, a telegraph company was empowered to break up any street or road, subject to the restriction that they could not place a telegraph under any street of any municipal borough except with the consent of the highway authority. By the Telegraph Act, 1868, section 2, the same provisions were made to apply to the Postmaster-General. By the Telegraph Act, 1869, section 4, the Postmaster-General was given the exclusive power of transmitting telegrams, with the exception of telegrams transmitted with his written licence. "Telegrams" has been held to include telephonic messages. ("Attorney-General v. Edison Telephone Company," 6 Q.B.D., 244.) By the Telegraph Act, 1878, section 3, if any highway authority having power to withhold consent to the Postmaster-General to place telegraphs under a street fail, within 21 days after being required, to give their consent, a "difference" shall be deemed to have arisen between such highway authority and the Postmaster-General; and that difference, by section 4, is to be referred to a stipendiary magistrate or to a County Court Judge, who is empowered to hear and determine such "difference" as if he were an arbitrator under the Regulation of Railways Act, 1868. The magistrate or County Court Judge may give the necessary consent, which is to have the effect of a consent given to the Postmaster-General by the highway authority under the Act of 1863. By the Telegraph Act, 1892, section 5, where the Postmaster-General has licensed any company to transmit telegrams, he may license the company to exercise his own powers under the Acts of 1863 and 1878, and thereupon those Acts shall apply. But, notwithstanding anything in the Act of 1878, a licensee shall not exercise any of these statutory powers without the consent of the urban sanitary authority or county council, and shall be subject to any terms and conditions which the county council or urban sanitary authority may attach to any such consent, and shall comply with any regulations of such council or authority from time to time in force in relation to telegraphic lines. By two deeds, the earlier dated in the year 1884 and the later in 1896, made between the Postmaster-General and the National Telephone Company, the company were authorized to work and use certain forms of telegraphs for the purpose of transmitting telegrams within the municipal borough of Tunbridge-wells. By a deed, dated March 10, 1896, and made between the Tunbridge-wells Corporation and the National Telephone Company the corporation consented to the company, "subject to the provisions of this agreement, exercising within the borough of Tunbridge-wells such powers as may from time to time and at any time be delegated by the Postmaster-General to the company in pursuance of the provisions of section 5 of the Telegraph Act, 1892." This deed contained the following stipulation:—"It is expressly agreed that the consent contained in the preceding clause is given upon the following conditions—(1) except as regards the work mentioned in the schedule the company shall not exercise any of the powers conferred on the Postmaster-General by the Telegraph Acts, 1863 and 1878, in respect of which the consent of the corporation is required under the said Acts, without obtaining the further consent in writing of the corporation to be from time to time given to the specific works for the time being proposed to be carried out under such powers, it being intended that the general consent contained in the preceding clause is not to operate to relieve the company from the obligations of obtaining the particular consent of the corporation to such specific work as required by and provided for in the said Acts." Clause 10 of this agreement contained a reference of all disputes and differences under its terms to two arbitrators or an umpire. The company wished to open a street and lay telephone wires and execute works not mentioned in the schedule to the last-mentioned deed. With a view to this they applied for consent of the corporation. This leave was refused, and the company now contended that under section 4 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, they were empowered to refer this "difference" to the County Court Judge. The County Court Judge expressed his opinion that he had jurisdiction to hear and determine the difference, but refrained from doing so until the hearing of this motion, which was for a prohibition upon the ground that since the passing of the Telephone Act, 1892, section 5, the County Court Judge had no further jurisdiction in such cases.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., and Mr. BOXALL appeared for the corporation, and read a case stated by the County Court Judge which set out the above facts and sections.

The COURT then called on Mr. CRIPPS, Q.C., and Mr. CASSELL for the company, who contended that the effect of the deed of March 10, 1896, was that for all works other than those specified in the schedule the consent of the corporation "as required by the said Acts" was needed. That meant the consent subject to appeal to the County Court Judge. They further argued that the County Court Judge was constituted an arbitrator and that prohibition was not the appropriate remedy.

The COURT granted the prohibition.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said that on the passing of the Act of 1892 the Crown had delegated to private companies powers which, up to that time, it had retained in its own hands; accordingly, it had given to the highway authorities greater powers of consenting to or forbidding proposed alterations in their streets than they formerly possessed. With this object the jurisdiction of the County Court Judge had been taken away, and the power of imposing a veto on proposed works rested finally with the highway authorities. On the second question, whether the County Court Judge was an arbitrator, assuming he had jurisdiction, section 4 of the Act of 1878 referred the matter to him "as if he were an arbitrator." That did not make the County Court Judge an arbitrator, but only directed him as to how he should act. Prohibition was, therefore, the appropriate remedy.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL concurred, referring upon the second point to the case of "Hull v. M'Farlane" (2 C.B., N.S., 796).

HAYLEY V. TAYLOR.*

Weights and Measures—Unstamped beer barrels —Weights and Measures Act, 1878, sec. 29.

This case raised the question whether beer barrels when used as measures for trade come within the operation of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, so as to make it necessary that they should be stamped in accordance with the provisions of section 29 of that statute. The appellant was the chief inspector of weights and measures for the county council of the West Riding of Yorkshire. The respondent was a brewer carrying on business in the borough of Keighley. In the month of December last Mr. Thomas Eckroyd, an innkeeper in Keighley, ordered from the respondent's traveller in the usual way a barrel of beer, and subsequently received from the respondent's brewery a barrel purporting to contain 35 gallons. The barrel was No. 1189 and stamped outside, "T. Taylor, 35 gallons." On the following day the respondent sent Mr. Eckroyd an invoice in which he charged for 35 gallons at 10d. per gallon, and he was paid for that quantity. One of the county council's inspectors afterwards tested the barrel with an imperial standard measure and found that when filled it would hold 33 gallons only, being two gallons less than the quantity stamped on the barrel and charged in the invoice. The barrel had not been verified and stamped as a measure as required by the Act. Neither the respondent nor his customer had measured the beer, and both relied entirely on the barrel as being an accurate measure of the quantity invoiced and delivered. By section 44 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1873, the local authority are required to fix times and places at which inspectors are to attend for the verification and stamping of weights and measures brought to them for the purpose of verification, but the county council have made no such provision as regards beer barrels used as measures for trade. It is computed that there are over a million such barrels in use within the jurisdiction of the council, but no office, room, or place has been provided where such barrels can be sent and stored for verification and stamping in accordance with the said section. It was admitted by the prosecution that at the present time it was impossible to carry out the verification and stamping of beer barrels if they were presented, and that no provision had, in fact, been made by them for those purposes. On these facts an information was preferred by the appellant against the respondent for unlawfully using for trade a certain measure, to wit, a beer barrel, not stamped as required by section 29 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. The justices found as a fact that the barrel had been used by the parties to the sale as a measure; but as the county council had made no provision for the verification or stamping of beer barrels used as measures, in accordance with section 44 of the Act, they dismissed the summons, but stated a case for the opinion of the High Court, which set out the above facts and now came on for argument.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Roskill appeared for the appellant; the respondent was not represented.

The COURT sent the case back to the justices with an order to convict.

IN RE HAYES, DECEASED—TURNBULL V. HAYES.*

Power—Execution—Limited power—Exercise by will before date of will creating the power—Validity.

Henry Hayes the younger, by his will made in December, 1884, after bequeathing certain legacies, gave all the residue of his property over which at the time of his death he should have a disposing power upon trusts in favour of his wife for life and after her death for his children. It appeared that the testator's father, Henry Hayes the elder, by his will made in June, 1893, after bequeathing his property in shares amongst his children had empowered each child to appoint by will a life interest in his or her share to a wife or husband. Henry Hayes the elder died in April, 1895, and Henry Hayes the younger in September, 1899. Henry Hayes the younger had no power of appointment exercisable in favour of a wife under any instrument other than the will of his father. Under a settlement of previous date to his will he had a power of appointing certain property in favour of his issue. The question for determination was whether the power conferred by the will of Henry Hayes the elder was well exercised by the will of Henry Hayes the younger, although executed before the will of Henry Hayes the elder.

Mr. D. D. Robertson and Mr. Alfred Adams appeared for the parties.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said:—It is clear upon the authorities that the 27th section of the Wills Act applies to general and not to special powers of appointment—see "Airey v. Bower" (12 App. Cas., 263); "Boyes v. Cook" (14 C.D., 53); and "Foulkes v. Williams" (42 C.D., 93). So far as the reasoning of the Vice-Chancellor in the case of "Stillman v. Weedon" (16 Sim., 26) is founded upon the application of section 27 of the Act, such reasoning must be disregarded in view of later decisions. It is also clear that the combined effect of sections 24 and 27 of the Act is to enable a general power of appointment by will to be well exercised by a will executed prior to the date of the instrument creating the power. Unless "Stillman v. Weedon" is to be read as an authority to the contrary, I have been unable to find any case in which it has been decided that a special power of appointment by will can be well executed by a will dated prior to the creation of the power by virtue of the operation of section 24 of the Act, and the opinion of Mr. Justice Stirling in "In re Wells" (42 Ch.D., 646) and the actual decision of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland in the case of "Doyle v. Coyle" ([1895] 1 I.R., 205) are distinctly opposed to any such conclusion. The case of "Stillman v. Weedon" may, I think, perhaps be reconciled with the last-mentioned cases, either upon the ground that if specific personal property the subject of the power be referred to in the will section 24 of the Act applies, because that property may then be said to be comprised in the will, or, to use the interpretative words of Lord Justice Turner in "Lady Langdale v. Briggs" (8 De G. M. and G., 391, p. 436), "so far as the will comprises dispositions of real and personal estate," or upon the ground that independently of the Act, if specific personal property the subject of the special power be dealt with by the testator, he must be deemed to have intended to exercise the only power enabling him to deal with it, although such power be created subsequently to the will. I am not certain of the precise view taken by Lord St. Leonards in "Sugden on Powers," 8th edition, p. 307, s. 49, where he deals with "Stillman v. Weedon." Be this as it may, having regard to the opinions of Mr. Justice Stirling and of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, in the cases I have mentioned, I do not think that I ought to deal with the present case (there being no specific description of, or reference to, the property in question) upon the footing that, not being within section 27, section 24 of the Wills Act applies. The difference in the result is that I cannot start with any presumption in favour of an exercise of the power by reason of the general words of disposition, looking only to see if there be a contrary intention expressed; but that I must approach the consideration of the terms of the will as though the Wills Act had never been passed. Acting on this view, and bearing in mind that the subject-matter is personal estate, and that such personal estate is not specifically mentioned or described in the will, bearing in mind also that the decisions in "In re

* Reported by R. B. SCHOMBERG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wells" and "Doyle v. Coyle" show that I should have regard to the date of the will, I will refer again to the case of "Foulkes v. Williams" (42 Ch.D., 93), a case dealing with the exercise of a special power over real estate, where Lord Justice Lindley says (p. 97):—"We must bear two things in mind. First, that section 27 only applies to a general power of appointment as to which a general devise operates as an exercise of the power unless there is some indication in the will of a contrary intention. Secondly, that as regards special powers the old law applies, which is that you must find some indication either by reference to the power or by reference to the property of an intention to exercise the special power. Anything which showed that the testator had the power in his mind would be enough. But if you cannot find anything to show that the testator had the special power in his mind it would be straining language to say that the devise would be an exercise of that power." The subject-matter in the present case is personal estate and, having regard to the old law before the Wills Act in reference to personal estate, I am unable to say that the property is so referred to as to show an intention to exercise a specific special power afterwards to be created. Then I have to consider whether there is any sufficient reference to the power. It is at least doubtful whether I am at liberty to have regard to the fact that the only power the testator could exercise in favour of his wife was the power in question. Even if I am I find no reference to any specific limited power either existing or to be afterwards created, although I do find an intention expressed to dispose of all property over which the testator shall have at the time of his death a disposing power in favour of his wife to the extent of giving her a life interest. Notwithstanding the expression of an intention to dispose of all that the testator should at his death have a power to dispose of, and notwithstanding the decisions bearing upon the ineffectuality of some similar expressions as showing a contrary intention in the cases of wills operated upon by the 24th and 27th sections of the Wills Act, I think, balancing as best I may the various considerations one way and the other, that the power has not in this instance been well executed. There are legacies given to the executors, who are no objects of the power, there is a trust for sale and conversion, and there is the use of the expressions "my estate" and "my trust estate," the latter being repeated several times over. I find a general intention shown to execute all powers of appointment and to benefit the widow, but upon the whole will I cannot find sufficient ground to enable me to hold her entitled as under an exercise of the subsequently created special power. I should like to mention that in some of the text-books the actual discussion and decision in "Stillman v. Weedon" has been treated as though it were only in reference to a general power. It is, however, clear to my mind that, rightly or wrongly, the Vice-Chancellor considered both sections 24 and 27 to relate to special powers, and that he was actually dealing with a case of a special power. His Lordship therefore held that the power was not well exercised.

SION COLLEGE V. LORD MAYOR, &C., OF LONDON.*

Rating—Reclaimed land—Exemption—7 Geo. III., c. 37—11 and 12 Vict., c. 163, sec. 169.

No. 28.—VOL. XVI.

This was a special case stated by the parties by the leave of a Judge in the matter of an appeal by the plaintiffs to the Court of quarter sessions for the City of London from a rate made by the respondents. The facts set out in the special case were as follows:—On April 23, 1899, the respondents, acting in pursuance of the City of London Sewers Act, 1897, the City of London Sewers Acts, 1848 and 1851, and the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and the Acts amending the same, duly made a consolidated rate for the year 1899 at 2s. 5d. in the pound (including 1s. 2d. for the School Board). The premises which the appellants occupied, and in respect of which they were assessed, were partly on land which was reclaimed under the statute 7 Geo. III., cap. 37, the same having been previously, until so reclaimed, part of the foreshore of the river Thames. The residue of the appellants' premises was on land reclaimed under other Acts. The questions arising on the appeal were solely concerned with the former portion. Since the conveyance to the appellants, and prior to the present rate, they had not been assessed in respect of the portion in question to the consolidated rate, owing, as the respondents alleged, to an error. The appellants duly appealed against the rate to the Court of quarter sessions for the City of London on the ground that the portion of land reclaimed under the Act of 7 Geo. III., c. 37, was exempt by that statute from all rates, taxes, and assessments whatever. The land and buildings in question, known as Sion College, were acquired by the appellants in 1886 by a conveyance to them dated April 8 of that year. The appellants contended that the land in question, and the building thereon, were not rateable to the consolidated rate made under the Acts mentioned, but were exempt by virtue of the statute 7 Geo. III., cap. 37. The respondents contended that the land was liable to be assessed to the consolidated rate under those Acts, and was not exempt. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the land was so exempt or not.

Mr. HORACE AVORY appeared for the appellants, and in support of their contention referred to the cases of "Garnett v. Bradley" (3 App.Cas., 967) and "Thorpe v. Adams" (L.R., 6 C.P., 125).

Mr. DANCKWERTS, Q.C., for the respondents, submitted that the Act of 7 Geo. III., c. 37, only provided that the land was to be free from existing rates and taxes. The provisions in all the Acts dealing with the subject indicated that the Legislature was careful to abolish all the exemptions it could think of. In the present case the rate was a new one which the land was liable to pay. He cited the cases of "Eddington v. Borman" (4 T.R., 4), "R. v. London Gas Light and Coke Company" (8 B. and C., 54), "Liverpool Library v. Mayor of Liverpool" (29 L.J., M.C., 221).

Mr. HORACE AVORY, in reply, submitted that, according to the respondents' contention, they could take away the benefit of the exemption by calling a tax by a new name.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in giving judgment, said that the case was one of some difficulty and he thought that it was a pity that the intention of the Legislature to take away the exemption was not more clearly expressed. He thought that the general view of the authorities, which they were bound to follow, was that the words taxes and assessments, from which the Act of Geo. III. said the land was to be exempt, included only taxes and assessments of the character then assessed. They would have very great difficulty in holding that the Legislature did not intend by section 169 of the Act of 1848 to make every person liable for the present rate, quite irrespective of whether they had any exemption in the past.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said he was of the same opinion. The cases were some guide to them in the construction of the Act of Geo. III., and they said that the true construction was that it was intended to relieve the land, which was embanked under that Act, from all rates and taxes which then existed, and which in the ordinary course of things would be renewed. It was intended to relieve the land from these burdens, although the form of the burden might be changed from time to time. He thought, however, that there was a sufficient intention shown by section 169 of 11 and 12 Vict., c. 163, to override the exemption that had been given, and their decision must therefore be in favour of the respondents.

WILLIAMS V. SCOTT.*

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—
Vendor and purchaser—Sale of land—Title—
Sale of trustee to himself.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Supreme Court of New South Wales of July 24, 1899, reversing a judgment of the Chief Judge in Equity.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. W. B. Lindley were counsel for the appellant; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Morten for the respondent.

SIR FORD NORTH, in delivering their Lordships' reserved judgment, said on December 2, 1898, the respondent—a mortgagee with power of sale—agreed to sell to the appellant a piece of land at Sydney for £550. The purchaser paid a deposit of 25 per cent. The title was as follows:—By her will Mrs. Catherine Austin appointed her son David Austin and her daughter Catherine Neilan her trustees and executors, and devised the property in question and other property upon trust to sell and to divide the proceeds among her eight children. She died in 1888, and by a deed of June 28, 1889, made between David Austin and Catherine Neilan as executors and trustees of the first part, William Neilan (Catherine's husband) of the second part, David Austin as administrator of the estate of Mrs. Austin's late husband of the third part, Sydney John Bull of the fourth part, and David Austin as purchaser of the fifth part, the property was sold to David Austin for £550 and in 1897 mortgaged by him to the respondent for £500. The purchaser's solicitors objected to the title upon the ground that David Austin was incapable of purchasing from himself and his co-trustee, and that the title therefore was not a marketable one. The vendor's solicitors insisted that the title was good, and produced a copy of what they described as an absolute release to the trustees from all the beneficiaries under the will of Catherine Austin, such release being dated June 15, 1889. The purchaser's solicitors pointed out that the release was insufficient, as it did not show that the beneficiaries were aware, or knew the effect, of the transaction in question; to which the vendor's solicitors replied that the transaction was well known to and acquiesced in by all the beneficiaries, and that in fact it was because the sale was made in the form set out in the conveyance of June 28, 1889, that the release was executed. The purchaser's solicitors still insisting on a deed of confirmation, the vendor's solicitors declined to procure it, as they did not consider it necessary, and stating that they had discovered that the sale was not made to David Austin but to John Austin, who was not a trustee. That explanation did not induce the purchaser's advisers to dispense with confirmation by the beneficiaries, and, as such was refused, they claimed to have the deposit returned, saying, however, that they were willing purchasers and if their objections were met in a fair way within the next week or ten days their client would still be prepared to purchase the land, to which the only reply of the vendor's solicitors was on January 16 that they had answered all the requisitions and that, under a power in the contract, the vendor would resell unless the purchase was completed during the week, and hold the purchaser liable for any loss on such resale. They accordingly advertised the property for sale, but that was stayed by an injunction in the present suit, commenced by the purchaser against the vendor for rescission of the contract, upon the ground that the vendor had failed to make out a good title to the property, and for a return of the deposit and other consequential relief. On March 3, 1899, the suit came before the Chief Judge in Equity who agreed by the wish of both parties to decide the one point as to the title raised by the requisition above quoted, and to leave it open to either party to ask for a reference to the Master as to the title on all other points. On the same day he made a decree declaring that the defendant had failed to make out a good title to the land and that the contract must be rescinded, directing that the deposit should be repaid to the purchaser with interest, and that the plaintiff's costs of the suit should be paid by the defendant, declaring that the plaintiff was entitled to a lien on the defendant's interest in the land for such deposit and interest; and restraining the defendant from dealing with the land to the prejudice of that lien. The vendor—the defendant in the action and present respondent—appealed from that decree, and the appeal was heard before Chief Justice Darley and Justices Owen and Walker. The two former agreed that the title was one which could be forced upon a purchaser, and that the decision of the Court below was wrong. The latter was of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. It was clear undisputed law that a trustee for the sale of property could not himself be the purchaser of it. No person could at the same time fill the two opposite characters of vendor and purchaser. But the purchase by David Austin was attempted to be supported upon two grounds not quite consistent with one another—viz. (1) that he was the purchaser of the property from all the beneficiaries who agreed in the sale to him with full knowledge of all the circumstances, and (2) that he and his co-trustee sold the property to John Austin, one of the beneficiaries, who, not being a trustee, was under no incapacity to purchase, and that David Austin subsequently purchased it from John Austin. As to the first point, their Lordships thought no sufficient evidence was forthcoming that any of the beneficiaries knew of the circumstances under which David Austin acquired and took the conveyance of the property. The allegation that the sale by the trustees was really made not to David Austin but to John Austin, who was capable of being the purchaser, was absolutely inconsistent with the terms of the conveyance itself. The proposition seemed to have found some favour in the Supreme Court that if the documents were capable of an innocent interpretation in favour of the title and the Court could say that the parties had not infringed any principle of law and were not guilty of misconduct, it would rather put that interpretation upon it than assume that the parties had been guilty of some wrongdoing or breach of law; and that in the absence of evidence to the contrary the Court must assume that the release was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters. Their

* Reported by W. J. SOULSBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lordships were unable to agree in that view. The conveyance itself was incapable of any interpretation but one, and that was unfavourable to the title. A trustee for sale of trust property could not sell to himself. If, notwithstanding the form of the conveyance, the trustee (or any person claiming under him) sought to justify the transaction as being really a purchase from the cestui que trusts it was important to remember upon whom the onus of proof fell. It ought not to be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the transaction was a proper one, and that the cestui que trusts were informed of all necessary matters. The burden of proof that the transaction was a righteous one rested upon the trustee, who was bound to produce clear, affirmative proof that the parties were at arm's length; that the cestui que trusts had the fullest information upon all material facts; and that, having that information, they agreed to and adopted what was done. Under these circumstances it would be inequitable to force such a title as that upon the appellant. It was not merely that the purchaser would be running the risk of proceedings being taken by the cestui que trusts to reopen the transaction. The purchaser would be saddled with a property which he would be unable for many years to put upon the market, unless recourse was had to some special restrictive condition which might seriously reduce the price a purchaser would be willing to pay for it. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty to discharge the order of the Supreme Court and dismiss with costs the appeal to that Court, and to direct that the respondent repay to the appellant the costs which, by the decree of the Supreme Court, the appellant was ordered to pay to the respondent. Their Lordships directed the respondent to pay to the appellant her costs of this appeal.

WILLIAMS V. INGRAM.*

Practice—Discovery—Documents.

The Court refused to compel defendants to produce documents which were in their possession solely as directors of a company to which the documents belonged.

Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 434), affirmed.

This was an appeal against the refusal of Mr. Justice Byrne, as reported ante, p. 434, to order the production of documents in the possession of some of the defendants. The plaintiffs are the five daughters of the late Mr. Herbert Ingram, the founder of the Illustrated London News, and the defendants are Sir William J. Ingram and Mr. Charles L. N. Ingram, the two surviving sons of Mr. Herbert Ingram, and some trustees. On Mr. Herbert Ingram's death his widow became solely entitled to the Illustrated London News, and, by an agreement made in 1882, Mrs. Herbert Ingram (afterwards Lady Watkin) assigned the newspaper business to the two defendants upon certain terms, by which she was entitled to one undivided moiety and the defendants to the other. In July, 1887, Lady Watkin, who had then parted with one-fourth of her moiety, transferred the remaining three-fourths upon trusts as to two-fourths for herself and as to the remaining one-fourth (or one-eighth of the whole business) upon trusts, under which in the events which had happened the plaintiffs had become absolutely entitled. In February, 1892, a private company was formed, under the name of the Illustrated London News (Limited), with a capital of £300,000, divided into 15,000 preference shares and 15,000 ordinary shares of £10 each, Lady Watkin and the plaintiffs being entitled to 5,625 of each class of shares. The first directors were Sir Edward Watkin, Mr. E. Watkin, and the defendants Ingram. The defendants Ingram were appointed managers of the company. The plaintiffs allege that negotiations subsequently took place between Lady Watkin and the plaintiffs and the defendants Ingram for the purchase of Lady Watkin's and the plaintiffs' shares and interest in the business, and in June, 1895, it was agreed that the defendants Ingram should purchase those shares and interest in consideration of an annuity of £4,500, the annuity to be secured by a charge on the shares. The plaintiffs allege that this purchase was made on the basis that the then existing annual profits of the business were only £20,000, and their case is that a mistake had occurred, or there had been some mismanagement, inasmuch as the defendants Ingram had in 1899 sold the company to a new company—namely, the Illustrated London News and Sketch (Limited)—for a total sum of £1,042,500, and by the prospectus of the new company it appeared that the profits had risen to quite £60,000 a year. The plaintiffs claim a declaration that the agreement for sale of June, 1895, is not binding on them and should be set aside and an inquiry and an account. The defendants Ingram deny the statements and allegations of the plaintiffs and generally traverse their case. The plaintiffs applied for an order for the production and inspection of the books, &c., of the Illustrated London News (Limited) and the Illustrated London News and Sketch (Limited). The defendants, by affidavit, stated that they had the books in their possession and power, but they objected to produce them because they are the property of the companies of which they are directors, but not the only directors, and that they have no property in or power to produce the same, and that the books are in their possession or power only in the sense that they have access thereto as directors of the companies and for the purposes of the business of the companies; and also because the ownership of the books relating to the Illustrated London News (Limited) had changed to that of the Illustrated London News and Sketch (Limited). The companies are not parties to the action, but they appeared on the application. Mr. Justice Byrne refused the application. In his opinion "Walburn v. Ingilby" (1 M. and K., 61), on which the plaintiffs had relied, did not justify him in making the order for production. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Mark Romer were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Martelli, for the defendants Ingram, were not called upon; Mr. Ward Colldridge was for the two companies.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that it was well worth consideration whether the power of the Court was sufficient with regard to the production before trial of documents in the possession of third parties. But as matters now stood his Lordship was satisfied that the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne was right. There was nothing to bring the present case within any exception from the general rule, as in "Walburn v. Ingilby" (1 M. and K., 61), the case on which the appellants had relied. As the law and practice now stood it was impossible to compel production of the documents in question. If any alteration was to be made in the practice, this could only be done by a new rule (if that were possible) or by fresh legislation.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. THE HANWELL URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Urban District Council—Land acquired for special purpose—Sale of surplus land.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 10), affirmed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich reported in The Times of November 3 last and ante, p. 10. The action was brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Earl of Jersey, and by the Earl of Jersey as co-plaintiff, for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the Hanwell Urban District Council, from erecting an isolation hospital for the reception of patients suffering from infectious diseases on some land in the parish of Hanwell, Middlesex, which had been acquired by the rural sanitary authority of the Brentford Union, the defendants' predecessors in title, from the Earl of Jersey, in 1883 for the purpose of disposing of the sewage of the parish, and from using the land, or any part thereof, as the site of any such hospital. The plaintiffs claimed a further injunction to restrain the defendants from using the land as a site for any such hospital so as to be a nuisance to the earl or his tenants, or a nuisance or injury to his adjoining property. Lord Jersey is the owner of the Osterley estate in Hanwell, consisting of arable and pasture land, and also of building land. In 1883 the Brentford Union, as the then sanitary authority of the district, purchased from him a piece of land of about 12 acres forming part of the Park farm included in the Osterley estate for the express purpose of the disposal of the sewage of the parish of Hanwell. The purchase for that purpose was sanctioned by the Local Government Board on the petition of the sanitary authority, and after an inquiry as to its propriety. The greater part of the land so acquired was accordingly used exclusively for the sewage purposes contemplated; but in 1896 the defendants, as the successors of the Brentford sanitary authority, proposed utilizing about two acres of the land which they had purchased, and which had been found to be unsuitable for sewage purposes, for the erection of a hospital for infectious diseases other than smallpox. A public inquiry was then held, on December 17, 1896, by a Local Government Board inspector, and the result was that by an order under the seal of the Board, and dated April 3, 1897, the Board directed that the two acres should be retained by the defendants as a site for the erection of a hospital for infectious diseases other than smallpox. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action, contending that the defendants had no power, either statutory or otherwise, to use the land for any other purpose than that for which it had been originally acquired. The defendants relied on the order of the Local Government Board, and contended that they were entitled to use the two acres for an isolation hospital, although that was not the purpose for which they and the rest of the 12 acres were originally required. Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, provides that "Any local authority may for the purposes and subject to the provisions of this Act purchase or take on lease, sell or exchange any lands, whether within or without their district. . . . Any lands acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any powers in this Act contained and not required for the purpose for which they were acquired shall (unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct) be sold. . . ." Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the defendants were not entitled to use the land for purposes for which it had not been originally acquired, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from using the two acres as a site for a hospital for infectious diseases other than smallpox. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Stallard were for the defendants; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Howard Wright were for the plaintiffs.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that he had felt considerable difficulty during the argument, and the case had seemed to him by no means a clear one. But on consideration he thought that the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich ought to be affirmed. Under the Public Health Act provisions were made for the protection of landowners, and the local authority was required to state the purposes for which it required to take land compulsorily. Unless section 175 altered the rights of the parties it must be taken that the defendants' predecessors acquired the land for statutory purposes—for the disposal of sewage. It was found that two acres of the land acquired were not fitted for the purposes of sewage, and then the idea occurred to the defendants that they might use the two acres not for any purpose connected with sewage, but for the purpose of erecting an isolation hospital—not a temporary hospital, but a permanent one. This led to the order which was made by the Local Government Board in April, 1897, which directed that the two acres should be retained by the defendants as a site for the erection of a hospital. It could not be implied or suggested that the Local Government Board had any power to enforce the erection of a hospital. The order was really made under section 175, and its effect was that the council might retain the land as their own, and then they could use it for any lawful purpose. In his Lordship's opinion, the language of section 175 was not sufficient to enable the local authority to apply the land permanently to a purpose for which they did not originally acquire it. The local authority had limited powers; they had power to acquire land compulsorily for specific purposes. They held the land subject to that restriction. The Local Government Board had directed that the land should not be sold. There might be many reasons why it would be desirable that the land should remain in the hands of the local authority, though they might not be able to use it permanently for any but the original purpose. At any rate, it would be too strong a thing to import a power of the Local Government Board to authorize the local authority to use the land for a purpose wholly inconsistent with that for which it was acquired. When there was a direction by the Local Government Board that the land should not be sold it could not be said that the local authority held the land free from any restriction. The Court was not now dealing with a merely temporary user, for it was admitted that the defendants intended to use the land for a permanent hospital.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

Salary of "clerk or servant"—Salary of managing director.

This was a summons in a debenture-holders' action to determine whether a managing director was entitled as clerk or servant of his company to a preferential payment up to £50 over the debenture-holders in respect of arrears of salary. The preferential payments in the Bankruptcy Act, 1888, in a bankruptcy or winding up of a company, gave priority to all other debts to "all wages or salary of any clerk or servant in respect of services rendered to the bankrupt or company during four months before the date of the receiving order, or, as the case may be, the commencement of the winding up, not exceeding £50." The preferential payments in Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1897, extended the priority to cases of the appointment of a receiver for debenture-holders with a floating charge on the assets of a company. By an agreement, dated October, 1897, Mr. James Kirby had been duly appointed managing director of the Newspaper Proprietary Syndicate (Limited) for three years at a salary of £600 a year. He had acted down to the time of the appointment of the receiver in this action as managing director and advertising manager, and not received any remuneration.

Mr. Martelli appeared for Mr. Kirby in support of the claim; Mr. Douglas opposed.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY, in delivering a reserved judgment, held that a managing director is not "a clerk or servant" within the meaning of the Acts, and that Mr. Kirby was not entitled to priority; at the same time, as the point had been properly raised, he directed the costs of the summons to be paid by the receiver out of the assets.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY V. LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Banker—Cheque—Crossed cheque—"Customer," who is—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 82.

Decision of Bigham, J. (15 The Times L.R., 433), affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham at the trial of the action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 433; 4 Com. Cas., 250. The action was brought to recover £142 10s., money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiffs, or, in the alternative, to recover damages to a like amount for the conversion of a cheque.

The facts were as follows:—One Huggins had been for many years a rate collector in the employment of the Wantage Rural District Council and of other similar bodies. In this capacity he had been in the habit of receiving from the plaintiffs and others cheques for the amounts payable by them for rates, and the cheques so received he used frequently to cash through the defendants' branch bank at Wantage. He had been in the habit of cashing cheques in this way for 15 or 20 years, and a considerable number of such cheques (50 or 60) were cashed by him in the course of each year. Apparently Huggins, on receipt of the money for the cheques, distributed it among the local bodies to whom he had to account. He was well known to the manager and officials of the bank at Wantage, and the bank were the bankers of the Wantage Rural District Council. Huggins, however, kept no account with the defendants, nor had he any pass-book; his transactions with the defendants were completely disposed of in each case as and when he brought the cheques. In November, 1898, Huggins falsely pretended to the plaintiffs that a rate had been made, and that the plaintiffs owed in respect of the same £142 10s. By, this means he induced the plaintiffs to give him their cheque for that amount. The cheque was drawn on the head office of the London Joint Stock Bank in favour of Huggins or order; it was crossed generally and marked "not negotiable." On November 16 Huggins, in accordance with his usual course of dealings with the defendants, took this cheque to their bank at Wantage to get it cashed. He handed it across the counter to the bank clerk, and the latter filled up a paying-in slip, which Huggins signed. This paying-in slip contained no reference to the cheque itself, but purported to show a payment into the bank of £142 10s. in money, a payment out to Huggins of £117 10s., and a payment to the credit of the district council's account at Huggins's request of £25. The learned Judge at the trial held that the business effect of this was that the bank handed to Huggins the amount of the cheque, £142 10s., which he then and there disposed of to his own use. Having thus obtained the cheque, the defendants crossed it to themselves, and sent it up to their head office in London for collection. On the next day, November 17, the cheque was duly presented and paid. Huggins's fraud was immediately discovered, and on November 18 he was arrested on a charge of obtaining the cheque by false pretences, and on January 2, 1899, he was tried, convicted, and sentenced. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the defendants. By section 81 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, "where a person takes a crossed cheque which bears on it the words 'not negotiable' he shall not have and shall not be capable of giving a better title to the cheque than that which the person from whom he took it had." By section 82, "where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment." Mr. Justice Bigham found as a fact that the defendants received payment of the cheque in good faith and without negligence, and that they received it for Huggins; and he was of opinion that Huggins was a customer of the bank within the meaning of section 82. He accordingly held that, though Huggins had only a defective title to the cheque, and by section 81 could not give the defendants a better title than he himself had, yet by section 82 the defendants were protected from liability. He therefore directed that judgment should be entered for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. H. D. Greene, Q.C., Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. Park Goff appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. A. T. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Guy Lushington for the defendants.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following considered judgment:—This action is brought by the Great Western Railway Company to recover from the London and County Banking Company as money had and received by the defendant bank to the use of the plaintiffs a sum amounting to £142 10s., or, in the alternative, in trover for a cheque for the like sum, which cheque had been fraudulently obtained from the plaintiffs by a man named Huggins, and which had been cashed by the defendants for Huggins and its proceeds received by the defendants from the plaintiff company under the following circumstances:—Huggins was a rate collector at Wantage, and by falsely pretending to the plaintiff company that certain rates were due from them obtained from the plaintiff company in supposed payment of the rates the cheque in question. It was a cheque drawn by the plaintiff company upon the London Joint Stock Bank in London in favour of Huggins or order, and was crossed “and Co.,” “not negotiable.” It was proved that the plaintiff company always paid Huggins the rates due from them by cheques in the above form. The cheque, it will be seen, was a cheque drawn upon the head office of the London Joint Stock Bank in London, and what I will call Huggins’s ordinary course of business with the defendant bank was to go to its Wantage branch when he received cheques from the plaintiffs, endorse them, and then present them at the Wantage branch to be cashed. And this the defendant bank was accustomed to do for Huggins. This was the course of business between the defendant bank and Huggins; and at times, at Huggins’s request, the branch bank would place some portion of the cash, which would otherwise have been handed to Huggins, to accounts named by Huggins. The branch bank then forwarded the cheque so cashed for Huggins to its head office in London, which then presented and obtained payment of the cheque from the drawers, in this case the plaintiffs in this action. This as regards the cheque in question had all taken place before the fraud of Huggins was detected by the plaintiffs, and when they did afterwards discover it they demanded the cheque or its proceeds from the defendants, which was refused. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action. The plaintiffs in the first instance attempted to show that the defendants, when they took the cheque, took it with notice of Huggins’s fraud, but in this they wholly failed, and this was abandoned at the trial. I will assume that money had and received or trover will lie in the circumstances of this case; but in the view I take it is not necessary to decide this, for supposing, as I will, that such actions or either of them will lie, if the question decided by my brother Bigham is rightly decided, as I think it is, this question becomes immaterial, for the real question is, Did the defendant bank in cashing the cheque for Huggins as they did, though crossed and with the words “not negotiable” thereon, come within the protection afforded to bankers by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61)? It is true that section 81 of the Act enacts that “where a person takes a crossed cheque which bears on it the words ‘not negotiable’ he shall not have and shall not be capable of giving a better title to the cheque than that which the person from whom he took it had”—in this case no better title than Huggins, which after disaffirmance of the transaction by the plaintiffs would be no title at all. But section 82 protects a banker who receives payment for a customer of a crossed cheque as follows:—“Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title or a defective title thereto, the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment.” Two points are made by the plaintiffs upon this section 82. The first is that Huggins was not a customer of the bank within the meaning of this section; and, secondly, if he were, the bank did not receive the proceeds of the cheque from the plaintiffs for their customer but for themselves. It was proved that the course of business between Huggins and the defendants—viz., the defendants’ cashing cheques for Huggins whether crossed and with the words “not negotiable” thereon, or without being crossed, at the Wantage bank, and collecting them—had been in existence for some 20 years, and that this was the way, as between Huggins and the branch bank in which he obtained cash for the cheques received by him as rate collector. I agree with my brother Bigham that whether or not a man is a customer of a bank is a question of fact. I do not agree with the suggested reading of the section that the word “customer” is confined to the case of a person who keeps a current account with a bank. I can find no such limitation in the section. This is not like the case of a stranger coming to a bank upon an isolated occasion to get a cheque cashed, which was the case in “Matthews v. Brown” (63 L.J., Q.B., 494), where it was held that such a person was not a customer within the section, Mr. Justice Cave saying that the word “customer” involves something of use and habit. In the present case there has been use and habit for 20 years. It was upon the same principle that Mr. Justice Collins, in “Lacave and Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais” ([1897] 1 Q.B., 148), decided that one Ponce was not a customer, the learned Judge saying (at page 155) that to constitute him one his relations must be much nearer and closer than those of Ponce in that case. I think that the cashing of the cheques for Huggins and then the collecting of the cheques by the defendant bank during a period of 20 years as a matter of fact constituted Huggins a customer of the bank, and I agree with Mr. Justice Bigham as to this. Then comes the next question, Did the bank receive payment of the cheque from the plaintiff company for their customer, Huggins, or for themselves? If they received such payment for Huggins I do not see how it can be even argued that Huggins was not their customer. It is said for the plaintiffs that the defendant bank did not do so, for it purchased from Huggins the cheque in question, and took it for better or for worse. I cannot think so. The defendant bank charged nothing for undertaking the suggested liability. Why should they have done so? I heard no reason, and I cannot conceive why they should have done so. The truth is that the branch bank, to accommodate Huggins and possibly themselves, in being able thus to pass money to London, cashed the London cheque at Wantage, undertaking to collect it for Huggins, he and not the bank standing the risk of the cheque not being met by the drawers. In my judgment they did not purchase the cheque at all. They collected it for Huggins, and not for themselves as argued. This is the inference Mr. Justice Bigham drew, and I draw the same. For the reasons above I am of opinion that the defendants are entitled to the protection afforded to bankers by section 82 of the Act, and I agree with my brother Bigham in the conclusion at which he arrived. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LOED JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS read the following judgment:—Apart from the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, I think there can be no doubt but that the defendant bank would, in the circumstances of this case, have become holders for value to the extent of the amount of the cheque, and would have been able to sue in their own right for that amount. The defendants would in no sense have had to sue as trustees for Huggins. This would have been their right and position as endorsees bona fide for value, and that value being the full amount of the cheque it seems to me immaterial for the question to be decided in the present case whether you speak of the defendants as discounters or purchasers or holders for full value. In any view they, apart from the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, would have been holders of the cheque able to sue in their own right for the whole amount. See “Thiedeman v. Goldschmidt” (1 De G. F. and J. 4, at p. 11). Now of such persons it seems to me that it would be prima facie wrong to draw the inference that they were bankers receiving payment for a customer of a cheque endorsed generally by the payee and payable on demand, not being post-dated. Apart from some evidence of a contrary intention the right inference to draw in such a case would be that the bankers received for themselves and not for the customer. Now what is the evidence of contrary intention—that is, of an intention that the defendant bank should collect and receive payment of the cheque as agents for Huggins? Nothing that I can see, except the fact that they made no charge for cashing a cheque payable on demand. Against this is the fact that there are no entries in the bank books and no receipt or other document such as one would expect if the bank were really acting as collecting agents for Huggins. The bank were willing to give cash for the cheque because they trusted Huggins. The mere absence of an express bargain in the series of years leaves the prima facie presumption where it was. To draw the inference of agency in the absence of evidence is very like repealing the 81st section in the case of bankers. If this is the right view, does the fact that this cheque was marked “not negotiable” make any and what difference in the position of the bank? Are the defendants, notwithstanding these words “not negotiable,” holders for value? I think they are. Section 81 runs thus:—[His Lordship read the section.] The section does not say that the person to whom the payee of the cheque gives a crossed cheque marked not negotiable shall not become transferee of the cheque, but merely that he shall not take a better title than that which the person from whom he took it had. The transferability of the cheque is not affected by the words “not negotiable,” but only its negotiability. Such being the effect of section 81, I see nothing in this case to induce me to draw the inference that the defendants, after they ceased to retain the cheque by presenting it at the bank on which it was drawn and received the amount, received or held that amount as agents for Huggins; but Mr. Justice Bigham and my brethren take a different view of the facts, and draw the inference that the defendant bank received the amount of the cheque for their customer Huggins. Notwithstanding the fact that when they took the cheque from him they paid him the full amount by paying for him £25 to the Wantage Rural District Council and giving him the balance of £117 10s. in cash, I do not think that I ought to differ from three Judges on a question of fact, and it therefore becomes unnecessary to consider the question of the right of action of the plaintiffs, the drawers, on the assumption that section 82 affords the defendants no protection; but I see no reason to doubt but that the plaintiffs, as true owners of the cheque, would have an action for the money obtained by the presentation of the cheque, notwithstanding the fact that the cheque when issued was a voidable and not a void instrument. It would have been otherwise but for the statutory effect of the words “not negotiable,” but I am inclined to think that the effect of those words is to place the person taking the cheque bearing those words in exactly the same position as the person from whom he takes it; but in the view of the facts taken by my brethren it is not necessary to decide this question.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER read the following judgment:—This is a curious case, and one of difficulty; but I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Justice Bigham was right in holding the defendant bank protected by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. I think on the facts the preferable view of the arrangement between Huggins and the bank with regard to the cheque in question is that the latter was to forward the cheque for collection and to receive the proceeds on behalf of Huggins in the sense in which the section speaks of a bank receiving payment for a customer, and that in anticipation of such receipt the bank advanced to Huggins the amount of the cheque. Of course the bank had the right to apply the proceeds in repayment of the advance, and had a lien on the cheque for the amount of the advance; but this, while establishing that the bank had a beneficial interest to the fullest extent in the cheque, does not conflict with the position taken up by the bank that in a legal sense, in the sense of the wording of section 82, the bank, when receiving the proceeds of the cheque, did so on behalf of Huggins. Suppose in this case Huggins had a current account with the bank, which was not in credit, and that the cheque had been paid in by him in the ordinary way as a customer, and that the bank had credited him with the amount at once, and allowed him to draw against that amount before the bank received payment of the cheque—in that case, equally with this, the bank might have had a beneficial interest in the cheque even to the extent of its full value; but it would clearly, in my opinion, have received payment of the cheque for its customer within section 82. In that case, as in this, the bank, as against the world, would have been a “holder for value” of the cheque within the definition of holder for value in the Act. But this is perfectly consistent with the view that in both cases, within the meaning of section 82, the bank received payment of the cheque for Huggins. The chief facts which lead me to the conclusion that in this case the bank received payment of the cheque for Huggins are that throughout the long period during which Huggins's cheques were cashed by the defendant bank there is no evidence or suggestion of any bargain being come to between them, or of any contract of purchase being negotiated or really intended. It is clear that no remuneration was paid to the bank by Huggins for advancing the amounts of the cheques, and I cannot think that it was intended that the bank should run any risk in the matter of title, or any risk whatever other than that involved in the mere advance of the amounts of the cheques. It must be remembered that what the bank cashed for Huggins were cheques payable immediately and drawn to his order, and were not even like short bills; and the true intent of the parties is, in my opinion, further shown by the fact that the bank advanced to Huggins the full amounts of the cheques without charge, even though some were, like the one in question in this action, crossed “not negotiable,” which to a bank must necessarily have caused hesitation or doubt if the bank was doing anything more than acting as a bank in receiving payment of the cheques on behalf of a customer. If I am right in the view that the true arrangement between Huggins and the bank in cashing his cheques was that the bank should receive payment of them for Huggins and apply the proceeds in repayment of its advances, then I cannot doubt, bearing in mind how long and continuously that arrangement had existed and been acted on, but that at the time the cheque in question in this action was cashed the relation of banker and customer existed between Huggins and the defendant bank, and that the bank received payment of that cheque for a customer within the meaning of section 82. It cannot have been essential that a current account should have been opened, into which the advances on the cheques on the one hand and the payments to the bank on those cheques on the other hand should be entered. This view renders it unnecessary for me to consider whether, if the bank could not avail itself of the provisions of section 82, it could as an innocent party escape liability on the ground that the payment of the cheque to it was by the act of the plaintiff company itself.

BURGER V. INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE ASSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Decision of Mathew, J. (15 The Times L.R., 506), reversed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew's on the trial of an action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 506; 4 Com. Cas., 328. The action was brought by shipowners on a policy of marine insurance granted by the defendants, and dated April 1, 1897, for £3,500 on the hull and machinery of the plaintiffs' steamship Durward for 12 months from April 1, 1897. The policy contained, inter alia, the following clause:—"Collision clause. Cross-liability. And we further agree that if the ship hereby assured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof be found liable to pay, and pay, any sums (not exceeding the value of the ship hereby assured) in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods and effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel, we will severally pay the assured such proportion of three fourth parts of said sums as our respective subscriptions hereto bear to the value of the ship hereby assured. . . . But this agreement is in no case to be construed as extending to any sums the assured may become liable to pay in respect to loss of life or personal injury to individuals from any cause whatever." On November 25, 1897, the Durward came into collision with, and sank, the tug Victory in the River Tees, and the Victory became a wreck, which was subsequently dispersed by the River Tees Conservancy Board acting under its statutory powers, and the costs of dispersing such wreck—viz., £1,178 19s. 10d.—were claimed by the board under their statutory powers, and were duly paid by the owners of the Victory. In an action arising out of the collision brought in the Admiralty Court the Durward was held alone to blame, and her owners were held liable to pay, and did pay, to the owners of the Victory the value of the tug and also the aforesaid sum of £1,178 19s. 10d. The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants the defendants' proportion of the amount which they had been obliged to pay in the Admiralty action. The defendants paid in respect of the value of the tug only, and the plaintiffs brought this action for the defendants' proportion of the payment of £1,178 19s. 10d. The defence was that the payment was not a sum paid in respect of an injury to the Victory within the meaning of the policy. Mr. Justice Mathew gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the defendants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said it was with great diffidence that he felt himself unable to agree with Mr. Justice Mathew in the conclusion to which he had come in this case. They had to construe a collision clause contained in a policy by which the owners of the steamship Durward had insured their vessel with the defendants. The Durward collided with the tug Victory in the River Tees and sent it to the bottom, and it had been found that this happened by reason of the negligence of those on board the Durward. The owners of the Durward were accordingly held to be liable to pay the owners of the Victory the damage sustained by them through the collision. The Victory having sunk in the fairway, the Commissioners of the Tees, acting under their statutory powers, dispersed the wreck and claimed the expenses of so doing from the owners of the tug. The owners of the tug paid the amount so claimed, viz., £1,178, and sought repayment of it from the owners of the Durward. The owners of the Durward, in accordance with their liability, besides paying the owners of the Victory the value of the tug, also paid them the sum of £1,178, and they now claimed to be indemnified by their underwriters, contending that their liability to make this payment was covered by the collision clause. Mr. Justice Mathew held that it was covered, and the underwriters appealed. By the collision clause the underwriters agreed that, if the ship assured should come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured should in consequence thereof be found liable to pay, and should pay, any sum in respect of one or other of three subject-matters, then the underwriters would pay the assured three-fourths of such sums. In his opinion it was clear that the clause was limited to those three subject-matters. The first was "in respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself." The second was "in respect of injury to the goods and effects on board thereof." The third was "for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel." The three subject-matters were quite clear, and the liability to indemnify was limited to them. He could see no reason for construing the words "in respect of" as meaning "in consequence of," as the plaintiffs contended ought to be done. The word "itself" seemed to him to be strongly in the defendants' favour; and with regard to that the assured had already paid a sum in respect of injury to the "other ship itself," and had been repaid by the underwriters. With regard to the third subject-matter, it was argued by the plaintiffs that the words "freight then being earned" were not words creating a liability on the part of the underwriters, but were words limiting their liability. Whether that were so or not, the point did not seem to him to avail the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs also relied on the proviso at the end of the clause as showing that the earlier words ought to be construed as bearing an enlarged meaning. In his opinion the insertion of the proviso was not really necessary. He came to the conclusion that the payment now in question was not covered by the collision clause, and that the appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he was of the same opinion. The assured had been held liable to pay to the owners of the tug Victory the expenses of dispersing the wreck of the tug; and they sought to recover the amount from their underwriters under their policy. Whether they could do so depended on the following words contained in the collision clause:—"In respect of injury to such other ship or vessel itself, or to the goods and effects on board thereof, or for loss of freight then being earned by such other ship or vessel." These words seemed to him so clear as to require no explanation. They catalogued the injuries in respect of which the underwriters undertook to pay the assured if the assured had to pay any sum in respect of them. In his opinion it was impossible to say that a sum which the assured had to pay in respect of the expense of clearing the tideway of the River Tees of a vessel which had been wrecked was a sum of money paid in respect of injury to the vessel itself.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

BOOTS, CASH CHEMISTS (LANCASHIRE) (LIMITED), AND OTHERS V. GRUNDY AND ANOTHER.*

Action, cause of—Trade combination—Interference with business—Inducing persons not to deal with plaintiffs.

An action will not lie against persons who, for their own benefit, combine to induce others to refrain from dealing with a particular person.

This case raised a most important question on the law of conspiracy. It was an argument on a point of law raised on the pleadings in the action, the defendants alleging that the statement of claim showed no cause of action. The plaintiffs and defendants were both sellers of etchings and engravings. The statement of claim alleged that the defendants in combination with others had maliciously and without just cause or excuse interfered with the plaintiffs in carrying on their business by inducing customers not to deal with them, through publishing a circular in these terms:—"Private and Confidential.—In view of the combination of several of the London publishers it is time that all bona fide printsellers throughout the provinces became united to defend themselves. It is known that two or three firms have admitted that they supply 'Boots and Co.' (meaning the plaintiffs), the Stores, Drapers, and others (who are non-subscribers to the Printsellers' Association) at half-price, and we think it very unfair when we know that these people want them to sell to the public at 25 per cent. off the published prices and advertise the fact. If the provincial trade would all agree not to order any goods from the travellers representing houses whose publications are systematically shown and offered by these notorious undersellers then their reports of no success will show their principals how very seriously we take it, and, although the measure proposed at the general meeting of the Printsellers' Association will not go to the root of the evil, we feel sure it is bringing the aggressor into a smaller radius and will to some extent mitigate this pernicious system of underselling. This matter is becoming so serious throughout the provinces that we venture to bring this suggestion before your notice in the hope that with your assistance it will have the desired effect. We are, yours faithfully." Then followed the names of 21 signatories. The defendants and the signatories were members of the Printsellers' Association. The plaintiffs alleged that the intention of the defendants and the signatories was to induce printsellers to refrain altogether from dealing with any print publisher who might sell any goods to the plaintiffs and to coerce print publishers into refusing altogether to supply the plaintiffs with any goods at all. That the defendants had coerced the majority of publishers in this country into refusing to sell any of their publications or any goods at all to the plaintiffs and that the plaintiffs had suffered damage through these acts. They claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from wrongfully and maliciously interfering with the plaintiffs in the free conduct of their business, and from continuing to do so by repeating the acts complained of. They also claimed damages.

Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. SCRUTTON, for the defendants, contended that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, as it only alleged an unfair competition on the part of the defendants. That was a perfectly lawful act—"Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor, Gow, and Co." (23 Q.B.D., 598; [1892] A.C., 25). It did not become unlawful if done by one person with a malicious motive—"Allen v. Flood" ([1898] A.C., 1); nor yet if done by many—"Kearney v. Lloyd" (26 L.R. 1, 268); "Huttley v. Simmons" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 181); "Scottish Co-operative Society (Limited) v. Glasgow Fleshers' Association" (35 Scottish Law Reporter, 645). A combination to do a lawful act was legal unless the act was done by illegal means. They also cited "Reg. v. Warburton" (L.R., 1 C.C.R., 274); "Reg. v. Aspinall" (2 Q.B.D., 48); "Reg. v. Turner" (13 East, 228); "Temperton v. Russell" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 715). Mr. JOSEPH WALTON, Q.C., and Mr. ARTHUR COLEFAX, for the plaintiffs, argued that there still existed causes of action, the gist of which was combination. Combination might render illegal an act which without the combination would not be illegal. This class of action was expressly left untouched in "Allen v. Flood" ([1898] A.C., 1), but was recognized in "Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor, Gow, and Co." ([1892] A.C., 25), per Lord Halsbury at p. 38, per Lord Bramwell at p. 45. The acts of the defendants in this case went far beyond what was done in the case last cited.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE.—If a strange butcher comes to a village and the existing butchers to prevent his effecting a foothold agree to undersell him that is quite lawful.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON.—No doubt. But if they publish the fact that they will not supply any one who has dealings with him that is actionable, if done in combination.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM.—A tradesman may refuse to supply any one without giving any reason. Why should his expressing his reason make his refusal actionable?

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON.—His intent is then manifest. Even if it were lawful to force the defendants here to keep up the prices of prints this object is being attained by illegal means. It is not lawful to attain a lawful object by means of insult and annoyance.

Mr. RUFUS ISAACS, in reply, cited "Tarleton v. McGawley" (1 Peake N.P.C., 270), and contended that nothing short of a tort in attaining a legal object would make its attainment unlawful. The argument for the plaintiffs involved an examination by the Court of the question what is reasonable trade competition, a question which the Court would not enter upon.

As the learned Judges differed in opinion, the judgment of the junior Judge was delivered first.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE read the following judgment:—The motion before us is to strike out the statement of claim as disclosing no cause of action, and the only cause of action upon which in the argument before us the plaintiffs placed reliance may be summed up in these words. The plaintiffs complain that the defendants have combined with others to prevent them from carrying on their trade by effectually inducing third parties not to sell to them, and that they have done this maliciously without just cause or excuse. The words "maliciously without just cause or excuse" probably add nothing to the strength of the plaintiffs' complaint; but they anticipate, and by anticipation repel, that which, if alleged and proved, would be a sufficient defence—namely, that the acts of the defendants were acts of trade competition and in furtherance of their own trade (see "Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor" [1892] A.C., 25). When regard is had to the detailed allegations with which this framework of complaint is clothed in the statement of claim, it seems not improbable that the defendants would, if the case went to trial, prove this defence and win the cause. But for the moment we have not to consider this. The question for us appears to be whether a combination by several against one, not for their own advantage, but for the purpose of depriving him of his trade or doing him some other pecuniary injury, gives to the person so injured a cause of action against the confederates. That any single person can use his utmost endeavour to prevent third persons from dealing with another man, and thus deprive him of his trade and even of his means of livelihood, is settled by the decision of the House of Lords in "Allen v. Flood" ([1898] A.C., 1), and I presume that what one could do any number of persons acting separately and without concert could equally do. But the effectual strength of one, or even of a number acting separately, is as nothing compared with the force of a combination which may be irresistible. If in such a case the injured person has no cause of action either for damages or an injunction he is without remedy; for if the combination be not actionable, it certainly is not criminal, and, conversely, wherever an act is criminal the person injured has (subject to the rule of public policy which postpones civil proceedings for a felony) a right of action for the civil injury. Now there are certainly some injurious acts which one person may do towards another without committing a crime, and which when done by several persons in combination become criminal. The books give several classes of indictable conspiracy. Some of them may be obsolete, or may, upon a more careful analysis, appear to be not substantive crimes, but only modes of looking at other crimes, or the evidence of an attempt to commit crimes. But when all deduction is made, there remain some cases of conspiracy which are criminal solely because of the combination. Knowingly to charge a man falsely with the commission of a crime is cruel and wicked, but if the accuser avoids giving evidence and committing perjury he will escape the criminal laws. The combination, however, of several to charge an innocent person with a crime is laid down to be an indictable conspiracy. The books also say that a combination to injure a man by fraud is an indictable conspiracy; and, though it seems difficult to say, with the modern improvements in our criminal law, that there are many cases in which a single person can injure another by fraud without committing a crime, still there are some, and at one time there were more, and to them, when done in combination, the law of conspiracy was applied. "Reg. v. Robinson" (1 Leach, 37) is a case in point; and in the more modern case of "Reg. v. Warburton" (L.R. 1, C.C.R., 274) the Court for Crown Cases Reserved assumed that for the act charged at the time it was committed an individual would have been scathless, but held confederates liable. If and where the practice of boycotting "maliciously and without just cause or excuse" was carried on to such an extent as to deprive a man or woman of the means of livelihood, it would be a blot upon our law if the confederate boycotters could not be punished. In these instances, therefore, confederacy would be indictable and therefore actionable. Now that the case of "Reg. v. Turner" (13 East, 228) has been disapproved and the authority of it, I think, destroyed by "Reg. v. Rowlands" (17 Q.B., 671), I should hold that all confederacies to injure a man by committing torts, which would be actionable against individuals committing them separately, become indictable by reason of the combination. It seems, further, that confederacies to injure without committing actionable torts, but by doing acts punishable only in the Ecclesiastical Court, are also indictable conspiracies ("Reg. v. Best," 2 Ld. Raym., 1,167; "Reg. v. Lord Grey," 9 St. Tr., 127). It remains to consider whether a confederacy to injure, which can be carried out without the commission of any tort actionable against an individual and without any breach of the old ecclesiastical law, may not, nevertheless, be a conspiracy. I say the old ecclesiastical law because it may be that the abolition of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in defamation has made what was relied upon in "Reg. v. Best" (2 Ld. Raym., 1,167) as an ecclesiastical offence one no longer. It is true that the language of the Judges who charged the jury in "Reg. v. Parnell" (14 Cox C.C., 508) is, with regard to their third division of the crime of conspiracy, hesitating and varying, and even the same might be said of the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen in "The Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor" (23 Q.B.D., 598). Sometimes the learned Judges speak in the most general language of any combination to do any form of injury, and sometimes they seem to speak of combinations to commit actionable wrongs. But the observations of Lords Bramwell, Hannen, and Field when deciding the last-named case in the House of Lords, and the reservation of Lords Herschell and Macnaghten when giving their decision in "Allen v. Flood" ([1898] A.C., 1), lead me to conclude that they recognized the wider view of conspiracy taken in the older cases. I do not see that in "Reg. v. Robinson" (1 Leach, 37) there was any actionable wrong, or that in "Reg. v. Warburton" (L.R. 1, C.C.R., 274) the injured partner would have had any civil remedy except in the Court of Chancery. I have made my observation on "Reg. v. Best" (2 Ld. Raym., 1,167), and I can see that in a conspiracy falsely to charge a man with crime some at least of the conspirators might take an effectual share without uttering slander or committing any actionable wrong. I think, therefore, that if the confederacy in this case for the motives and purposes alleged in the statement of claim were proved as laid it would be indictable, and at least equally, if not a fortiori, actionable. In other words, given the confederacy, the motive and purpose make all the difference. If a number of persons, because of political or religious hatred, or from a spirit of revenge for previous real or fancied injury, combine to oppress a man and deprive him of his means of livelihood for the mere purpose of so-called punishment, I think the sufferer has his remedy. If the combination be to further their own prosperity, if it be constructive, or destructive only as a means to being constructive, the case is otherwise.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE then read the following judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham:—It is necessary to read this statement of claim with care in order to ascertain its true legal effect. It begins by alleging that the plaintiffs and the defendants are both engaged in the trade of printers, and it proceeds to state that the defendants "with others" (which I take to mean with the co-operation of others) issued to a number of persons in the trade, both printers and print publishers, the circular set out in paragraph 2. The pleader then goes on to impute to the defendants and to the other signatories of the circular an intention in issuing the circular "to induce printers to refrain altogether from dealing with any print publisher who might sell any goods to the plaintiffs, and to coerce print publishers into refusing altogether to supply the plaintiffs with any goods at all." This intention is alleged to be expressed in the circular itself, but for my part I do not find it there. The only intention I find is an intention to induce printers to refrain from dealing with publishers who continue to supply the plaintiffs on such terms or at such prices as will enable the latter to resell at the low prices objected to, and in that way, and to that extent only to coerce such publishers to refuse to supply the plaintiffs. No intention is expressed in the circular to coerce publishers to refuse altogether to supply the plaintiffs. I do not, however, rely on this distinction for the purpose of my judgment. The fifth paragraph alleges that the defendants have, by means of the said circular, in concert with the other signatories, induced persons not to buy from publishers willing to sell to the plaintiffs, and have thereby "coerced" the publishers into refusing altogether to sell any publications at all to the plaintiffs, to the damage of the plaintiffs in their business. The only meaning of this paragraph is that the object with which the circular was issued has been attained, and that loss has resulted to the plaintiffs. It is not suggested that the defendants have done more than issue the circular and abstain themselves from buying of the offending publishers; and, if it be true (as for the present purpose I must assume) that the publishers have refrained altogether from dealing with the plaintiffs, I doubt if such action on their part can be said to flow naturally from the acts of the defendants. So far the statement of claim amounts to nothing more than a charge against the defendants of requesting a particular body of traders not to give orders for goods to another body of traders—the "provincial trade" is requested not to give orders to those publishers who supply the plaintiffs—and an allegation that the request has been followed by compliance. In my opinion, the charge amounts to nothing which can be described as a wrong done to the plaintiffs. If true it does not violate any right of the plaintiffs, and, therefore, it affords them no cause of action, for one man is entitled as against all the world to ask another to refrain from doing an act which that other may lawfully omit to do. But it is said (paragraph 6) that the defendants' acts were calculated to damage and were done with the intention of damaging the plaintiffs in their business, and, further, that they were unlawful and in restraint of the plaintiffs' right to trade freely, and were done maliciously and without just cause or excuse. These allegations do not better the plaintiffs' position. The intention is immaterial if the acts themselves are not wrongful, and merely to say they are unlawful does not make them so. That they resulted in loss to the plaintiffs or in a restriction of their trade is equally immaterial, for no one is responsible to another for the consequence of a lawful act. It is useless to say that lawful acts are malicious or are done without just cause or excuse, for no lawful act can be malicious in a legal sense nor does it require to be defended by any just cause or excuse. It carries its just cause or excuse with it. Causes of action arise out of acts done, not out of intentions, nor out of consequences; and though morally a man may be blameable for exercising his rights for the mere purpose of hurting his neighbour, it is better, in my view, that he should be condemned in the tribunal of public opinion than that his intention should be the subject of inquiry in a Court of law. With reference to the intention with which the acts charged against the defendants were done, I notice that the statement of claim does not allege that it was merely to damage the plaintiffs. The allegation of intention is consistent with a concurrent intention to benefit the defendants' own trade. I draw attention to this, not because I think it makes any difference in point of law, but because it has in some cases been said (I think erroneously) that when a right is exercised for the mere purpose of damaging another the act may become a tort. It was however, upon the concluding words of paragraph 6 of the statement of claim that the plaintiffs really relied. Those words are as follows:—"Further, the defendants have, as the aforesaid acts show, maliciously combined with one another and with others to induce the publishers of engravings not to enter into contracts or deal with the plaintiffs, and to induce others not to deal (except upon terms which did not allow the plaintiffs to do profitable business) with the plaintiffs. Such combination was unlawful, without just cause or excuse, and has occasioned damage to the plaintiffs." The plaintiffs' counsel admitted that upon the authorities the statement of claim probably disclosed no cause of action apart from the allegations of combination and conspiracy. It remains, therefore, only to consider whether in the present case the acts, being lawful if done by one, become tortious if done by several in combination. It is necessary, in my opinion, to define the word "conspiracy." A conspiracy exists when two or more combine to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. No conspiracy is, in my opinion, known to the law which has not for its object the accomplishment of an unlawful act (not necessarily a criminal act), or which does not involve the use of unlawful means. This, I think, is the result of the judgments in "Kearney v. Lloyd" (26 L.R., Ir., 268) and "Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor" ([1892] A.C., 25). Further, I think that, though probably all conspiracies, as I define them, are criminal, and therefore indictable, no conspiracy can give rise to a civil action unless it violates, or threatens to violate, the rights of an individual as distinguished from the rights of the public at large. If it does violate the rights of an individual, he may sue for damages; if it threatens such a violation, he may sue for an injunction. But before any action can lie a right in the individual must be violated or threatened. To use the words of Lord Halsbury in "Mogul Steamship Company v. McGregor" ([1892] A.C., 25), "If no legal right has been interfered with, and no legal injury inflicted, it is vain to say that the thing might have been done by an individual, but cannot be done by a combination of persons." In the same case Lord Watson says, speaking of the combined action of the defendants, "I apprehend that in order to substantiate their claim the plaintiffs must show either that the object of the agreement was unlawful, or that illegal methods were resorted to in its prosecution. If neither the end contemplated by the agreement nor the means used for its attainment were contrary to law, the loss suffered by the plaintiffs was damnum sine injuria." I ought, I think, to refer to the judgment of Lord Hennen in the same case. He says, at p. 59, "I arrive at the conclusion, therefore, that the objects sought and the means used by the defendants did not exceed the limits of allowable trade competition, and I know of no restriction imposed by law on competition by one trader with another with the sole object of benefiting himself. I consider that a different case would have arisen if the evidence had shown that the object of the defendants was a malicious one—viz., to injure the plaintiffs, whether the defendants should be benefited or not. That is a question on which it is unnecessary to express an opinion." As to this part of this judgment, I think, for reasons which will be found in Lord Herschell's judgment in "Allen v. Flood" ([1898] A.C., 1)—first, that the fact that the case was one of trade competition is of no significance; and, secondly, that the acts complained of being lawful the object with which they were done could in no case be material. In the present case I can find no act alleged against the defendants which amounts to a violation of any right in the plaintiffs, nor can I find any act alleged against the defendants which is unlawful as against any other individual or against the public at large, and I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the statement of claim discloses no cause of action. I am, moreover, quite satisfied that to allow such an action as this to go to trial would merely cause unnecessary loss to the parties and a waste of public time.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE thereupon withdrew his judgment, and the action was dismissed, the plaintiffs asking for, and obtaining, leave to appeal.

THE MAIN COLLIERY COMPANY (LIMITED) V. DAVIES.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Dependent," meaning of.

This was an appeal under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and the question was as to the meaning and effect of the word "dependent" in section 1, subsection A. 2 (2) of the First Schedule to the Act. The Court of Appeal—Lords Justices A. L. Smith, Rigby, and Vaughan Williams—on June 5, 1899, affirmed the judgment and confirmed the award of Judge Bishop, of the Glamorganshire County Court, dated March 23, 1899. The application was by William and Catherine Davies, the father and mother of William Rees Davies, who was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment by the appellant company, for compensation under the Act. The father was an able-bodied collier, earning the usual wages in the locality, and the boy was a hauler in the appellants' employ, earning 2s. 6d. a day. By reason, however, of strikes, stoppages, and other causes, his actual wages averaged 8s. a week only for the preceding 115 weeks worked. The boy lived at home with his parents and gave them all his wages, but they found him in food, lodgings, clothes, &c., and gave him an occasional sixpence for pocket money. The respondent had five other children, two of whom earned weekly wages, which were given to their mother. The County Court Judge found that the parents were in part dependent on the son's earnings, and after taking into consideration the amount necessary for the boy's keep and clothing awarded £23 8s.

Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. St. John Francis-Williams were counsel for the appellants.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., Mr. Brynmor Jones, Q.C., and Mr. S. T. Evans, for the respondent, were not heard.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal be dismissed, said that a short question of fact had been determined by the County Court Judge, who had found that there was a dependency in this case. The extent to which such dependency existed was not a matter for their Lordships to consider. The learned County Court Judge might have been right or wrong as to the exact degree to which that state of things existed; but if it existed at all the appeal must be dismissed. His Lordship did not think the Legislature had ever intended that any sharp, defined line should be drawn. In each case the question must be judged on the facts. What was the meaning of "dependent"? The notion that because a person who was under a legal obligation to keep the whole family, and who earned a considerable part of the total income himself, whilst, it might be, the others contributed only a small part, appeared to be the reason why the Legislature had introduced not only the word "dependent," but also "partially dependent." He had no doubt whatever that there was dependency in this case. The whole family relied on the wages earned. Whose wages? Clearly in part those of the boy. It appeared to have been forgotten that the obligation was upon the head of the family, who would be punished if he did not maintain his wife and children. The family being thus dependent upon the father, he in turn partly depended on the wages earned by those for whose maintenance he was responsible, and who made a contribution to the general fund. If it was true that the boy earned 8s. a week, it was clear that the father was dependent to some extent upon the boy's earnings in order to discharge his legal obligations. He was unable to see that there was anything in this case beyond the mere question of fact. He declined to assume that the Legislature had created a standard in the matter. No broad principle could be laid down, and no human intellect could define what the standard should be applicable to all cases. The problem was extremely obscure. The only things which the County Court Judge could regard were, what the family were in fact earning, and what they were in fact spending, for the purpose of maintenance. The learned Judge had taken those matters into consideration, and properly answered those questions. Lord Justice Rigby had said that he would have come to the same conclusion as the County Court Judge, and his Lordship quite concurred in that opinion.

LORD MORRIS entirely concurred in the motion for the reasons assigned by his noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

LORD SHAND said that in this case he had no difficulty in concurring with the motion of the Lord Chancellor. The facts showed that the father was in part dependent on the son's wages for his maintenance. He also agreed in thinking that, although the members of the household might not be dependents within the meaning of Lord Campbell's Act, still the fact of the father's having a large family was a circumstance which the County Court Judge was entitled to take into account. But, with deference to the Lord Chancellor, he was unable to accept the view that cases might not arise in which it would be necessary to adopt some standard for the decision of the question whether the father was or was not dependent on his son's wages. On that question he did not think that the mere circumstance that the father spent the money he received was conclusive of dependency. A father who was very well off and yet spent the money received as a child's wages could not be described as dependent. He agreed in the view expressed in the passage cited from Messrs. Minton-Senhouse and Emery's treatise on Accidents to Workmen by Lords Justices Collins and Romer in the case of "Simmons v. White" (15 The Times L.R., 263; L.R. [1899], 1 Q.B., 1,005; 68 L.J., Q.B., 507). It was there stated, page 156:—"Dependent probably means dependent for the ordinary necessities of life for a person of that class and position in life." That was the test to be applied.

LORD DAVEY also concurred, and observed that it was more satisfactory to look at the actual expenditure of the family than to introduce some vague canon which it would be impossible to express with precision.

LORD BRAMPTON and LORD ROBERTSON also concurred.

THALMANN FRÈRES AND CO. V. TEXAS STAR FLOUR MILLS.*

Sale of Goods—Contract—Construction—"Clearance," what is—Certificate of clearance issued before loading completed.

Decision of Bigham, J. (15 The Times L.R., 471), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 471; 4 Com. Cas., 265. The action was brought to recover damages for breach of contract and for the return of money paid under a mistake of fact. The contract in question was for the sale by the defendants to the plaintiffs of Colorado wheat to be shipped at Galveston, in the United States, by the steamship Highfield. The contract contained the following condition:—"Clearance not later than May 31, 1898." The question was whether that condition had been complied with, the fact being that the clearance was given on May 28, but the loading was not completed and the ship did not sail until June 2. The following are the facts as stated in the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham:—The plaintiffs were corn merchants carrying on business in Paris, and the defendants were corn shippers in Galveston. On May 10, 1898, the defendants telegraphed to the plaintiffs offering to sell two parcels of wheat on c.i.f. terms by the steamer Highfield for Havre, shipment within 21 days. On May 11 the plaintiffs answered:—"Highfield steamer clearance not later than May 25 we accept, &c." On the same day the defendants replied:—"Highfield now on passage from Las Palmas since May 5, expected ready to load May 22, steamer clearance early as possible, steamer clearance not later than end of this month; cable immediately if in order." On May 12 the plaintiffs closed the negotiation by wiring, "Highfield, we accept your offer." Thus the contract was made on the condition that the steamer's clearance should be as early as possible, and not later than the end of May. Contracts were subsequently exchanged on the forms of the London Corn Trade Association, and in these contracts the expression used was "Clearance not later than May 31 inst." The question in the case was whether the condition as to clearance by May 31 was complied with. No doubt the stipulation was made by the plaintiffs because it was necessary to have an early delivery of the wheat in Havre. The French Government had temporarily suspended the import duty on wheat, and, in order that the plaintiffs might obtain the benefit of this remission, it was necessary that the wheat should arrive in Havre by the end of June. After that date the duty would become again payable. The vessel was not under the control or in the management of the defendants; she was a general ship managed by her own agents. She arrived at Galveston on May 26, and at once began taking in cargo—cotton and grain. She continued taking in cargo on May 27 and 28, and on the latter date she was moved to another pier, where further cargo was waiting for her. There she completed her loading, the last cargo being taken on board on June 2, on which date the vessel sailed. She was delayed on her voyage by a breakdown of machinery, and consequently did not arrive in Havre until July 1, a day too late to enable the plaintiffs to secure the benefit of the remission of the duty. Meanwhile the plaintiffs had paid the defendants drafts for the price of the wheat and had obtained the shipping documents. This action was brought to recover back the money so paid, on the ground that the vessel had not "cleared" on May 31, according to the contract. Now "clearance" in his (the learned Judge's) opinion had a well known and definite meaning. It was a certificate issued by the Customs showing that the vessel named in it had complied with the Customs requirements and was authorized to proceed to sea; and the acts which had to be done at the Customs to procure such a certificate constitute the process of "clearing" the vessel. In this case the clearance was issued to the Highfield on May 28. The document certified that W. Richardson, master or commander of the steamship Highfield, had entered and cleared his said vessel according to law. This document was issued before all the cargo was on board, but it was issued at a time when all the cargo was alongside and waiting to be put into the ship. The affidavits from America, which were read, satisfied the learned Judge that it was issued in the ordinary course of business, and that it was customary to obtain the clearance of vessels before the loading was actually complete, so that there need be no delay in putting to sea. The learned Judge held that the clearance was not void because the cargo was not "on board," as required by the statute law of the United States, the affidavits showing that it was the practice of the Customs authorities to treat cargo as on board if in fact it was already alongside the ship. He further held that "clearance" was not equivalent to "being ready to sail." He accordingly held that the condition in the contract had been performed, and he gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Crve, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. B. M. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. E. Bray, for the defendants, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question was whether the ship had "cleared" not later than May 31. The word "clearance" meant the document of clearance. It was said that by the statute law of the United States a "clearance" could only be given when the cargo was on board. In his opinion "clearance" in the contract did not necessarily mean a clearance given in strict accordance with the statute law of the United States; it meant a valid and effective clearance given according to the practice of the Customs authorities at the port of Galveston. That was done in the present case. The parties had not made it a condition that the ship should be ready to sail by May 31. The plaintiffs therefore failed in their appeal.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

IN RE DE NICOLS—DE NICOLS V. CURLIER.*

International Law—Husband and wife—French law as to community of goods—English domicile—Will—Real property in England.

An interesting question arose in this case as to the rights of husband and wife of French nationality married in France and afterwards domiciled in England to real and leasehold property acquired in England. The testator, Monsieur Daniel Nicolas de Nicols, and his wife, Madame Celestine, both of whom were French, were married in France on May 30, 1854. They entered into no express contract on their marriage, so, according to French law, their rights to property were governed by the law of Communauté de biens. In 1863 they came to England where they became permanently domiciled. Their whole property when they came over was only about £400; but Monsieur de Nicols, as the proprietor of the well-known Café Royal, Regent-street, amassed a large fortune in England, part of which he invested in freehold and leasehold estate. He died in 1897, and by his will he gave his residuary estate to his executors and trustees upon trust for sale, and to hold the proceeds upon trust for his wife for life, and, after her death, upon trusts for his only daughter, her husband, and children. The widow took out an originating summons to ascertain her rights and interests in the property of the testator by reason of their having, while domiciled in France, married there without any contract. The question formulated in Chambers for decision was, "Did the change of domicile alter the legal position of the parties to the marriage in reference to property?" The case was argued before Mr. Justice Kekewich, the argument being confined to the effect of the change of domicile as to the personal property. On February 3, 1898, Mr. Justice Kekewich made a declaration that the change of domicile by the spouses did not affect their respective rights under the French or matrimonial domicile in and to the movable property acquired by the spouses or either of them after such change (L.R. [1898], 1 Ch., 403). The result of this was to make the widow entitled to half the testator's personal estate. The daughter and her husband and children appealed, and on May 19, 1898, the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich, holding that the change of domicile altered the rights of the husband and wife as to unsettled movable property and that, as at the time of the husband's death the parties were domiciled in England, their rights were governed by English and not by French law, so that the personal property of the testator was effectually disposed of by his will (L.R. [1898], 2 Ch., 60). On December 15, 1899, the House of Lords reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal and restored the decision of Mr. Justice Kekewich (L.R. [1899], A.C., 21). The case then came on for argument again before Mr. Justice Kekewich as to the effect of the change of domicile, on the rights of husband and wife with regard to real and leasehold property in England, and his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce appeared for Mme. Celestine de Nicols; Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. E. J. Elgood for the executors and trustees of the will; Mr. P. O. Lawrence, Q.C., and Mr. Whinney for the daughter of the testator and her children.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, in delivering judgment, said,—Undoubtedly the House of Lords considered and determined merely the question whether the marriage contract affected movable goods notwithstanding the change of domicile, and all that was said must be read with reference to that question, as the only one to which attention was directed. Albeit so restricted, the decision proceeded on the broad principle that a contract operating by force of law in the absence of expression by the parties is as complete and as obligatory as a contract expressed, and must have effect given to it on the same footing. Unless, therefore, there is some inherent disability in some particular property to be bound by such a contract, it must equally be applied to and enforced against all falling within its scope, and this is according to the language of the code and the evidence given in explanation of it. On the present occasion the Court is asked to determine whether in enforcing the contract it is right to include freehold and leasehold estates in England—that is, what we term real estate and chattels real, as distinguished from personal estate other than chattels real which is covered by the decision of the House of Lords. Assuming that these freehold and leasehold estates are within the scope of the contract, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that they are affected by it, unless, to repeat what has been already said, there is a disability inherent in this species of property. There are, therefore, two questions for consideration—one of fact—viz., whether these estates are within the scope of the contract; the other of law, whether they can be affected by it. The first question depends on the evidence which was before the House of Lords, some further evidence given by affidavit and orally on the hearing of the present application, and additional evidence adduced under leave given after the hearing in consequence of a letter from one of the witnesses which was communicated to the Court. This evidence was directed to the proper meaning of "immeubles" in the French code. There is no difficulty about the meaning of the word as regards the character of property comprised in it. It means, broadly, the soil itself and that which is attached to the soil as distinguished from that which, being unattached, is therefore movable. As in our own system of law so in that of France some things are, from their close connexion with the land, treated as attached to it, and, therefore immovable, but these exceptions do not impair the general description and are of no importance here. The difficulty which arose was whether the term comprised immovables abroad—that is, beyond France. The words of the code are, apparently, wide enough to cover all, wherever situate, and if it were an instrument which the Court is competent to construe it would be impossible to avoid the conclusion that this is its real meaning. The construction of the code, however, is beyond the competence of the Court. It is a matter of fact with which the Court can only deal according to the testimony of those qualified to give it. Hence the oral and the additional evidence subsequently given, to which reference has already been made. That evidence has set the matter at rest and removed all difficulty. It may be stated in general terms that, unless an exception is established in a particular case on the ground of public policy (and there is no suggestion of that here), the provisions of the code as regards "immeubles" are of universal application, that is, apply equally to immovable property situate in France and to that situate in a foreign country. Turning now to the question whether there is any objection in law to the contract operating according to the intention of the parties so as to bind the freehold and leasehold estates, one is at once confronted by the principle which distinguishes obligations respecting real estate from those which affect personal estate. That principle is well established, and is to be found stated in different language in many books. It will suffice to cite one. In Story's Conflict of Laws, section 158, the learned author says this:—

"The result of this reasoning (and it certainly has very great force) would seem to be that in the case of a marriage without any express nuptial contract the lex loci contractus (assuming that it furnishes any just basis to imply a tacit contract) will govern as to all movable property, and as to all immovable property within that country, and as to property in other countries it will govern movables but not immovables, the former having no situs, and the latter being governed by the lex rei sitæ."

In the following section, 159, he expounds this subject in a manner so opposite to the case in hand that it is worth while to quote it at length. It runs thus:—

"Perhaps the most simple and satisfactory exposition of the subject, or at least that which best harmonises with the analogies of the common law, is that in the case of a marriage where there is no special nuptial contract, and there has been no change of domicile, the law of the place of celebration of the marriage ought to govern the rights of the parties in respect to all personal or movable property wherever that is acquired and wherever it may be situate, but real or immovable property ought to be left to be adjudged by the lex rei sitæ as not within the reach of any extra territorial law. Where there is any special nuptial contract between the parties that will furnish a rule for the case, and as a matter of contract ought to be carried into effect anywhere under the general limitations and exceptions belonging to all other classes of contracts."

According to the decision of the House of Lords there is here a special nuptial contract between the parties ascertained by reference to the code, but not less precisely ascertained because it was not reduced into writing in connexion with the particular marriage. It ought, therefore (to adopt the language just quoted), to be carried into effect everywhere, but under the limitations and exceptions belonging to all other classes of contracts, one of which is, that as regards immovables, the lex rei sitæ must prevail. There is nothing in the common law of England to make the contract which we have already seen to be definite unenforceable respecting the freeholds and leaseholds in question, and if there be any obstacle, it must be found in some statutory provision. There is none but the Statute of Frauds, but that does not raise a formidable objection. Reference was made in argument to both the 4th and 7th sections of the statute. I do not propose to consider which of them is the more applicable, because, without doubt, either one or the other prohibits the creation of equitable interests in land, such as sought to be established here, except by writing under the hand of the creator of the trust. Nevertheless, it is insisted that the statute has no application to the circumstances of this case, and that the agreement between the parties made in consideration of marriage is sufficiently obligatory notwithstanding the absence of any writing. That is the point I am called upon to determine. It is settled that there may be an agreement of partnership by parol, notwithstanding that the partnership is intended to deal with land, and that to an action to enforce such agreement the plea of the Statute of Frauds will not avail. In such an action therefore the rights of the parties to the land, their respective interests in it, and their mutual obligations respecting it, may and must be determined and enforced notwithstanding there has been no compliance with the statutory provision. The authorities for this are not numerous, but they are conclusive—namely, “Forster v. Hale” (3 Ves., 696; 5 Ves., 308) and “Dale v. Hamilton” (5 Hare, 369). In the latter case Wigram, V.C., applied this ruling to a case where the partnership was intended to deal exclusively with land. Lord Lindley in his work on Partnership (6th edition, page 89) says that the latter case goes a long way towards repealing the Statute of Frauds, and that it is difficult to reconcile it with sound principle or the more recent decision of “Caddick v. Skidmore” (2 De G. and J., 52). This is a strong adverse comment, but yet I am bound to treat the decision as sound, and I did so in “Gray v. Smith” (43 Ch. Div., 411). Whether it is competent for the Court of Appeal now to disturb the ruling above quoted, or whether being competent the Court would be willing to do so, is not for me to say, but at any rate I must take the ruling to be established. It by no means follows that I ought to extend it, and it is fairly open to question whether the rule obtaining in contracts of partnership is properly applicable to a contract of marriage. In one sense no doubt that is also a contract of partnership, but no one would, I think, venture to rely on this, the ruling in the two cases referred to having reference to commercial partnerships with which the Court was there exclusively concerned. Nevertheless, the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor in “Forster v. Hale” seems to me to show that he intended to lay down a general rule, which may be applied without extension to the case in hand. This, I think, was the view of Vice-Chancellor Wigram in “Dale v. Hamilton,” and also, as it seems to me, of Lord Lindley, who cites the passage from the Vice-Chancellor’s judgment in “Forster v. Hale,” which supports it. The Lord Chancellor held that the question whether there was a partnership or not must be tried as a fact, and if it were established by evidence that there was a partnership, then the premises necessary for the purposes of that partnership would by operation of law be held for the purposes of that partnership. It is established here by evidence that land acquired by either of the two parties to the contract would by force of the contract be held by him or her in certain terms described briefly by the phrase, community of goods. Any lands subsequently acquired are an acquisition brought within, and are required to fulfil the purposes of the contract, and according to the Lord Chancellor’s reasoning they are by operation of law held for those purposes. There may be error in this way of stating the case and applying the Lord Chancellor’s ruling, but I am unable to discover it, and must, therefore, hold that the freehold and leasehold estates are as much subject to the community of goods as the movables which have been held subject to it by the decision of the House of Lords.

BARNETT V. CORPORATION OF ECCLES.*

Local Government—Public health—Sanitary works—Damage sustained by reason of exercise of powers of Public Health Act, 1875—“Full compensation,” what is—Costs.

Decision of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 316) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court, consisting of Mr. Justice Bigham and Mr. Justice Phillimore, on a special case stated by an arbitrator acting under section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The case is reported ante, p. 316. The question raised by the case was whether the “full compensation” to which a person is entitled who is damaged by the exercise of the powers of the Act includes costs reasonably incurred as between solicitor and client in defending himself before justices and appealing to quarter sessions and to the Queen’s Bench Division upon a charge made against him by the local authority. The case stated the following facts:—William Barnett was the owner of certain cottages in Ellesmere-street, in the borough of Eccles, the sanitary arrangements in which constituted a nuisance, for which it was alleged that Barnett was liable. Accordingly the Corporation of Eccles, under section 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, caused a notice, dated May 6, 1897, to be served on Barnett requiring him to abate the nuisance and for that purpose to execute certain works. This notice not being complied with, a complaint was laid by the corporation under section 95 of the Public Health Act alleging that the nuisance was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of Barnett. The complaint was heard and determined by a Court of summary jurisdiction in October, 1897. Barnett called several witnesses, and in the result an order was made requiring him to comply with the requisitions of the notice of May 6, 1897. Nothing was said as to costs at that hearing. Barnett appealed to quarter sessions, and in January, 1898, the appeal was heard and dismissed subject to a special case stated for the opinion of the Queen’s Bench Division. That special case was heard before a Divisional Court, who ordered that the order of the quarter sessions dismissing the appeal should be quashed with costs, and judgment entered for Barnett. The order of the justices was also quashed, and it was further ordered that the corporation should pay the costs of the appeal and the costs of the proceedings before the petty sessions, such costs to be taxed by the Master of the Crown Office, the Court at the same time holding that the nuisance arose from the default of the corporation themselves, and that there had been no default on the part of Barnett. The cost of the appeals to the Queen's Bench Division and to the quarter sessions were taxed at £62 5s. 6d. and £83 8s. 5d. respectively, and paid to Barnett. The costs of defending himself before the justices in petty sessions were not paid. By section 308 of the Public Health Act, 1875, a person who is not in default is entitled to full compensation for any damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act. The Divisional Court were of the opinion that Barnett was not entitled to more than his taxed costs of the proceedings before the petty sessions, quarter sessions, and the Queen's Bench Division. His actual expenses reasonably and properly incurred in proceedings before those Courts largely exceeded the amount allowed or recoverable on a taxation as between party and party. Barnett accordingly appealed. There having in fact been no order for costs made by the petty sessions, the appellant contended that on the principle of the cases "Walshaw v. Brighouse Corporation" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 286) and "Bater v. Birkenhead Corporation" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 679) he was entitled to his reasonable expenses of the proceedings before that Court. The argument was in part directed to the question whether his right to such expenses had been waived before the Divisional Court. Counsel for the respondents suggested, in order that the real question between the parties might be decided, that the costs before petty sessions should be taxed by an officer in the Crown Office.

Mr. Marshall, Q.C., and Mr. Clarke Hall appeared for the appellant; Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., appeared for the respondents.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH, in giving judgment, said that the real dispute between the parties was whether the words "full compensation" entitled the appellant to recover as part of that compensation the difference between taxed costs and costs as between solicitor and client in the proceedings before the petty sessions, quarter sessions, and the Queen's Bench Division. The Divisional Court had held that he was not so entitled, but that the words "full compensation" entitled him to what the law allowed and not what the law did not allow. That judgment was right. The real question between the parties being as above stated, the cases cited of "Walshaw v. Brighouse Corporation" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 286) and "Bater v. Birkenhead Corporation" ([1893] 1 Q.B., 679) did not apply.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred. The decision of the Divisional Court upon the only real question in the case was absolutely right. To decide otherwise would open the door to the discussion of a question of law long settled, that when once there had been an assessment upon taxation there should be no further assessment unless there were some contract or statute giving an absolute indemnity.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. PENRYN.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Settlement—Disposition for life of settlor—Exemptions—Finance Act, 1894, sec. 15.

This was an information, filed by the Attorney-General, against Mr. Edward H. Leynster Penryn and Mr. Frederick G. Simpkinson, trustees of the settlement on the marriage of Charles James Vaughan, the late Dean of Llandaff, and Catherine Maria Stanley, claiming estate duty in respect of property passing under the settlement upon the death of the dean.

By the settlement, which was dated April 1, 1850, Mrs. Vaughan settled her share in a sum of £10,500 3½ per cent. bank annuities, to which she was entitled in remainder upon the death of her mother, in the following trusts:—To pay out of the income £100 a year to Mrs. Vaughan during the joint lives of herself and her husband; to pay the residue of the income to her husband during his life and after the death of either to the survivor for life; on the death of the survivor to divide the capital among the children of the marriage and in the event of there being no children of the marriage to hold the property in trust for Mrs. Vaughan if she should survive her husband. Mrs. Vaughan's mother died in the lifetime of Mrs. Vaughan and her husband, and the share so settled fell into possession and was received by the trustees. The dean died on October 15, 1897, in the lifetime of Mrs. Vaughan, leaving no issue of the marriage. Mrs. Vaughan died subsequently. The trustees of the settlement claimed that the trust funds settled by Mrs. Vaughan, amounting in value to £19,228 16s. 6d., which passed to her absolutely on the death of her husband, were exempt from estate duty by virtue of section 15 (1) of the Finance Act, 1896. That section provides that, "where by a disposition of any property an interest is conferred on any person other than the disposer for the life of such person or determinable on his death, and such person enters into possession of the interest and thenceforward retains possession thereof, to the entire exclusion of the disposer, or of any benefit to him by contract or otherwise, and the only benefit which the disposer retains in the said property is subject to such life or determinable interest, and no other interest is created by the disposition, then on the death of such person after the commencement of this Act the property shall not be deemed for the purpose of the principal Act (the Finance Act, 1894) to pass by reason only of its reverting to the disposer in his lifetime."

On behalf of the Crown it was contended that the section did not apply (1) because an interest was reserved to the disposer—namely, the £100 a year; (2) because other interests beside the life interest were created by the disposition—namely, the limitation in favour of the children, though in point of fact no children were born. On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the property in which Mrs. Vaughan's husband took a life interest was the residue after the payment of the £100 a year to her, and that in that property no benefit was retained by Mrs. Vaughan except such as was subject to her husband's life interest. It was also contended that the life interest in favour of the children of the marriage was not an "interest created" within the meaning of the Act unless and until children were actually born of the marriage. "In re Dawson" (39 C.D., 155) was cited.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Vaughan Hawkins appeared for the Crown; and Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Rashleigh for the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE PHILLIMORE said that he had been unable to agree with his learned brother on either of the points raised. He had come to the conclusion that the only property in which an interest was conferred by the settlor upon her husband was so much of the property settled by her as was free and unencumbered. He was also of opinion that no other interest in the property was created by the settlement, because there never was a person to receive an interest. It was similar to the case of an interest in favour of a corporation which never existed, or whose powers were restricted so that it could not take the interest. The question whether an interest was created in favour of the children would not arise until the death of the life tenant. He met the case put in argument of a man dying leaving a widow with young children in favour of whom there was reserved an interest contingent upon their attaining the age of 21 or marrying, by saying that in that case the property would become taxable at the moment of the husband's death, for then there would be an interest in the property other than the husband's life interest. For these reasons he thought that the property was exempt from the payment of duty by virtue of section 15 of the Act of 1894, and his judgment was in favour of the respondents.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said that the sort of case contemplated by section 15 was where a person granted to an old servant the use of a cottage for his life. It was thought a hardship that in such a case the grantor should be liable to pay duty upon the death of the servant. He had come to the conclusion, applying the words of the section to Mrs. Vaughan's settlement, that she was excluded from the benefit of the provision. For it was not the case that the only interest retained by her in the property in which her husband took a life interest was such as was subject to his life interest, because the payment of the £100 a year to herself was not subject to his life interest at all. With regard to the other point, he was of opinion that the words "no other interest is created by the disposition" meant interest created at the time of the settlement. The purport of the deed was that Mrs. Vaughan divested herself of everything except her life interest. It was true that it provided that if there were no children the property should revert to her. But how could it be said that no other interest in the property was created than her husband's life interest, when the most important interest created by the settlement was that in favour of the children? His judgment was, therefore, in favour of the Crown.

Judgment was entered for the Crown, with costs.

MR. VAUGHAN HAWKINS said that if no appeal was entered the costs would not be claimed.

MELLOR V. BRITTON.*

Building Contract—Quantity surveyor—Charges —Liability of builder.

This was an action by a quantity surveyor against a builder to recover £411 for preparing quantities. A Mr. Sanderson had entered into a building agreement with the freeholder of certain land at Chelsea to erect thereon flats, to be called Burton-court, which when completed were to be leased to Sanderson. He employed the plaintiff to prepare plans and to take out quantities on which builders were invited to tender. The defendant was amongst the builders who tendered. His tender, amounting to £28,000, was accepted by the building owner. The defendant in the usual way included in his tender the amount of the plaintiff's charges, and in the ordinary course the plaintiff would have been paid by the defendant out of the first instalment of the contract price received by the defendant from the building owner, but when the first instalment became due it was not paid, and the defendant thereupon entered into an arrangement with Sanderson by which the defendant took over the latter's agreement with the freeholder, and released him from all claims, present and future, under his contract, but Sanderson was given an option to purchase the building when completed on paying the defendant the contract price and interest. Up to the present time the building had not been completed, and in these circumstances the defendant denied his liability to pay the plaintiff the amount of his charges.

MR. BAILHACHE, for the plaintiff, said that the custom of the trade that the quantity surveyor should be paid by the builder out of the first instalment of the contract price, although the contract of employment in the first instance was with the building owner, had been judicially recognized (see "North v. Bassett," [1892] 1 Q.B., 333). Here the defendant had not been paid in money by the building owner, but he had received an equivalent in kind, having taken over the whole adventure and given the building owner an absolute release.

MR. W. H. STEVENSON, for the defendant, contended that his client was not liable. The case was like "Campbell v. Blyton" (Hudson's Building Contracts, vol. 2, p. 105), where the building owner had given a mortgage to the builder, and Mr. Justice Wills there held that the builder was not liable to the quantity surveyor. The undertaking of the defendant was to pay out of a particular fund—namely, the first instalment—and that fund had not as yet come into existence.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. In the first instance the plaintiff could call upon the building owner to pay his charges, but as soon as the latter had entered into a contract with a builder and had put him in a position to pay by providing him with money, the building owner's liability to the plaintiff came to an end. Then what were the contractual relations between the plaintiff and the defendant? The defendant had undertaken to pay him as soon as he himself received his first instalment from the building owner. That placed on the defendant the obligation to get the first instalment. He was not bound to try and get blood out of a stone, and if he could not get payment from the building owner he was under no liability to the plaintiff; but if he could get the money or an equivalent he was liable. A difficulty arose in this case about the payment of the first instalment, but it was not an insurmountable difficulty, for having regard to the amount of work which had been done the building owner might have raised the money. If proper steps had been taken the building owner would have been able to pay. What happened was that the defendant for reasons of his own took from the building owner an out and out assignment of the agreement with the freeholder in full satisfaction of all the defendant's claims under his contract. The position was, therefore, that the defendant had chosen to accept, instead of cash, the assignment of the building agreement, carrying with it the benefit of all the work done up to that point (which far exceeded the plaintiff's claim) and also the possibility of future benefits. If the builder chose to vary his relations with the building owner he might do so, but not so as to prejudicially affect the claim of a third party who had nothing to do with the arrangement. There would be judgment for the amount claimed with costs.

A stay of execution was applied for and refused.

POWELL V. THE MAIN COLLIERY COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

It is not necessary that the "claim for compensation," which is required by sec. 2, subs. 1, to be made within six months of the occurrence of the accident, should be made in some form of legal procedure.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 282) reversed.

This was the first appeal under the Workmen's Compensation Act which has reached the final tribunal. It stood, at the beginning of the present sittings, last but two on the list, but its hearing was accelerated; and the case affords an illustration of the rapidity with which legal proceedings can, as will be seen from the dates below, in favourable circumstances be carried from the first Court to the last. The report of the hearing in the Court of Appeal only appeared in the month in which the appeal to the House has been disposed of. The arguments were heard on the 21st inst., when their Lordships reserved judgment.

The appeal was from an order of the Court of Appeal of March 16, 1900, setting aside an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, made by Judge Bishop, the Judge of the County Court of Glamorganshire, holden at Neath and Aberavon on October 27, 1899, whereby it was ordered that the respondent company should pay to the appellant the weekly sum of 13s. 11d. as compensation for personal injury caused to him on December 21, 1898, by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a workman employed by the company in coal mining, such weekly payment to commence as from the 7th day of January, 1899, and to continue during the total or partial incapacity of the appellant, or such time as is prescribed by the Act. On May 2, 1899, the appellant duly gave to the respondents notice of the accident, as required by section 2 of the Act. On the same date the appellant also delivered to the respondents a document in the following terms:—

"Notice of Claim.

"To the Main Colliery Company (Limited), Skewen.

"Take notice that I claim the sum of 13s. per week, from the 4th day of January, 1899, until such date as I shall be able to resume work, as compensation for injuries received by me on the 21st day of December, 1898, at your colliery at Bryncoch.

"(Signed) WILLIAM POWELL.

"Address. Mount Pleasant, Clydach, R.S.O."

On October 2, 1899, the appellant filed in the County Court of Glamorganshire, holden at Neath, in accordance with Rule 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, a request for arbitration under the Act, embodying the same claim. The respondents by their answer, filed on October 19, 1899, pleaded that the claim for compensation, not having been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident, was barred by section 2, subsection 1, of the Act, which is as follows:—"Proceedings for the recovery under this Act of compensation for an injury shall not be maintainable unless notice of the accident has been given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof, and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured, and unless the claim for compensation with respect to such accident has been made within six months from the occurrence of the accident causing the injury, or, in case of death, within six months from the time of death. Provided always that the want of or any defect or inaccuracy in such notice shall not be a bar to the maintenance of such proceedings, if it is found in the proceedings for settling the claim that the employer is not prejudiced in his defence by the want, defect, or inaccuracy, or that such want, defect, or inaccuracy was occasioned by mistake or other reasonable cause." It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the word "claim" must be interpreted to mean the initiation of proceedings before the arbitrator, and that in this case the only claim made within the meaning of the subsection was the request for arbitration filed by the appellant nine months and 11 days after the accident. The appellant contended that it meant any definite demand for compensation made by an injured workman upon his employer, and was satisfied by the above "notice of claim" of May 2, 1899. The County Court Judge overruled the respondents' objection, and awarded the appellant a weekly payment of 13s. 11d. for such time as is before mentioned. On appeal Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Collins, Lord Justice Romer dissenting, adopted the respondents' interpretation of section 2, subsection 1, of the Act, and allowed the appeal. The case is reported ante, p. 282; L.R. [1900], 2 Q.B., 145; 69 L.J., Q.B., 542.

Sir R. T. Reid, Q.C., Mr. S. T. Evans, and Mr. Redwood Davies were for the appellant; Mr. Ruegg, Q.C., Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Anton Bertram for the respondents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the judgment appealed from be reversed, said that the question arose within a narrow compass, but was of great importance. The whole case might be stated very shortly by reading the subsection on which it depended. [His LORDSHIP read the section above set out.] Nothing, he continued, very much turned upon the service or the person upon whom the notice was served. Reading the actual claim which was made in this case, no one could reasonably doubt that, unless there were some circumstance extrinsic to the actual words, this was a claim for compensation, and it was not contested that it was made within the period limited by the Act. It was made by the person injured, served by him upon the employers, and the claim was stated and described as made for a definite sum in respect of an accident referred to by its date. Without giving an artificial meaning to the words, no one could doubt that this was a claim for compensation under the Act, as it purported to be. The sole argument urged against this view before their Lordships was that a claim for compensation must be made in some form of legal procedure. That was the proposition. It might be conceded that with lawyers the ordinary form of taking proceedings would be some form of legal procedure. But the answer was that under this Act we had not the ordinary form of legal procedure. The Judges had all admitted that the word "proceedings" was used in a sense different from that which would be described as ordinary legal procedure. But it was said that the word was used in a different sense in this initial stage of the proceedings. This argument involved two assumptions. First, something must be found in the statute to justify this artificial meaning, or the Legislature must be assumed to have used the phrase "claim for compensation" with the implied addition of the words "in some form of legal procedure." He entirely repudiated the need of either assumption. There was nothing in the statute which intimated that the claim for compensation must be technical in form and application. For himself, he declined to add words which would be inappropriate to the subject-matter. A Court had no right to add words to a section in an Act of Parliament unless the exigency of the case compelled. Upon that short ground he was of opinion that the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal was wrong, and that of the dissenting Judge right, and that the judgment of the County Court Judge should be restored. Dealing with the statute itself, he would remark that there was a careful avoidance of technicality. It contemplated what might excite horror in the minds of lawyers, that a man injured should be able to claim so much and go to the County Court and get the matter at once decided. If anything like a technical commencement of litigation had been intended, the Legislature might have said so; but where was there any suggestion of suit, or writ, or anything in the form of a statement of claim? There was throughout no technical phraseology to indicate parties at issue or the initiation of proceedings. Once the claim for compensation was made, the matter was, either by agreement or by operation of the statute itself, remitted to the arbitrator. He did not agree with the argument which had been suggested, that there was no mode of procedure provided for determining the question. That there was none actually pointed to by the statute he granted. But he had never heard that a defendant could not appoint an arbitrator to have a question settled. It had happened to himself when he was at the Bar, and to others who had experience of arbitrations, that when a plaintiff had shilly-shallied about the appointment of an arbitrator the other side had taken steps to get one appointed. Why was not that procedure applicable to these cases? Lord Justice A. L. Smith had referred to such and such provisions as made for the benefit of the man, and such and such others for that of the employer. But they were not dealing with a contract, but with an Act of Parliament, and he repudiated anything tending to qualify the statute itself, which provided that the claim must be made within six months, as it had in this case been made. Lord Justice A. L. Smith had referred to two decisions, one in Scotland and the other in Ireland. When examined, however, those cases disclosed that there was really no claim made at all. The judgment of the County Court Judge should be restored and the appeal allowed.

LORD MORRIS dissented, and accepted the reasoning of Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Collins in the Court of Appeal. While the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, extended the liability of employers, that liability was confined to cases of actual or constructive negligence; but the Compensation Act made the employer an insurer against accidents. The earlier Act prescribed six months as the limit of time for bringing an action. It would be strange if the later and wider statute did not also impose a limit. The workman might still proceed under either Act. Section 1, subsection 4, of the Act of 1897 said, "If within the time hereinafter in this Act limited for taking proceedings." The only limitation to answer this was the expression "the claim for compensation" in section 2, subsection 1, with its limitation of six months. That section enacted, like the Employers' Liability Act, as a condition precedent to the maintenance of proceedings a notice to be given to the employer of the accident happening, and further enacted that "the claim for compensation" must be made within six months from the occurrence of the accident. There could not be an action, as the tribunals were only a somewhat mythical body called a representative committee, or an agreed arbitrator or the County Court Judge as arbitrator. The latter was the choice in the present case, and the "request for arbitration with respect to the compensation payable" was lodged on October 2, 1899, much beyond the period of six months from the date of the accident. In his opinion that claim for compensation took the place of an action under the Employers' Liability Act, and there must be some proceeding initiated before the expiration of the six months, the words "claim for compensation" being substituted for the "action" in the Employers' Liability Act. The words were "the claim" not "a claim" for compensation. If the words of the Act were satisfied by the mere sending of a notice to the employer without proceeding to give seisin to any tribunal of the claim, the claim might be kept hanging over the employer's head to the most remote period of time, not even limited by the Statute of Limitations. That the employer might initiate proceedings appeared to him an unmeaning and futile contention. An examination of the elaborate provisions of subsections 2, 3, 4, and 5 of section 2 led him to the conclusion that "the claim for compensation" could only mean an appeal to a tribunal.

LORD SHAND concurred with the Lord Chancellor, and observed that unlike the two decisions referred to by Lord Justice A. L. Smith the claim in this case was specific as to amount, date of accident, and other particulars. The claim, which was the first step in the proceedings, was duly made in accordance with the Act of Parliament. It was not necessary to enter into details, and he entirely agreed with what had been said by the Lord Chancellor and by Lord Justice Romer in the Court below. The matter, according to the statute, was to be settled by an arbitrator—the matter being that which was raised by the claim. It did not say that an action was necessary. He also was of opinion with the Lord Chancellor that, after a claim in valid form had been intimated by the workman to the employer, if the workman delayed, it might be for an indefinite time, to initiate arbitration proceedings, the master would be entitled to do so to the effect of demanding that the claim should be dismissed as unfounded.

LORD DAVEY said that the reasons for his opinion had been so clearly stated by Lord Justice Romer that he took the liberty of adopting that learned Judge's language as his own.

LORD BRAMPTON, in a long judgment, after stating the facts, expressed concurrence with the Lord Chancellor's motion. There was, he said, no warrant for even a suggestion that a limit was expressly put by the statute upon the time within which arbitration proceedings must be commenced, unless it were found in section 2 (1) of the Act. He assumed that the framer of that subsection intended in it to express, in the "ordinary language" which he had in the following subsection enjoined an injured workman to use in preparing his notice of injury, that which every intelligent person, reading this subsection alone for his guide, would understand from the language employed. In his opinion, only one conclusion was possible—that the workman, in giving notice of injury and making his claim for compensation within six months had fulfilled every obligation imposed upon him by the subsection. If it were intended to be interpreted in the sense attributed to it on behalf of the respondents, more misleading language could not have been employed.

LORD ROBERTSON also was of opinion that the appellant was right. The proceedings contemplated by the Act of 1897 for the settlement of claims were not primarily judicial proceedings; and the error of the respondents arose from overlooking this distinctive characteristic of the Act. Arbitration might be required to decide differences arising in the proceedings; but if this occurred it was only incidental to the proceedings, and was not contemplated as a necessary part of them.

Once this was realized it became clear that the proper initiation of the proceedings was not an appeal to arbitration, but was exactly such a claim as that which was sent to the respondents. He would only add that the most plausible argument against the appellant—viz., that on his theory there would be no check on delay—was not supported by the statute. As soon as the claim was sent to the employer he could, if he disputed it, himself take the difference to arbitration and have it settled. The framer of the rules could not possibly take away this right which arose under the statute.

The appeal was accordingly allowed.

IN RE HADLEIGH CASTLE GOLD MINES (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Extraordinary resolution to wind up voluntarily—Requisite majority—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 51.

The declaration of the chairman at a general meeting of a company that a resolution to voluntarily wind up was passed by the requisite majority cannot be impeached as founded on a mistake.

HIS LORDSHIP delivered the following judgment, reserved from the 15th inst. in this winding-up petition.

This is a petition by fully-paid shareholders asking for a compulsory order. An extraordinary resolution to wind up voluntarily was proposed at a general meeting of the company duly convened on January 31 last. At this meeting the chairman declared "he resolution to be carried on a show of hands. I find this as a fact. No poll was demanded. The petitioners ask for a compulsory order (first) on the ground that the extraordinary resolution was not passed by the requisite majority, the chairman's declaration having been founded upon a mistake, and (secondly) on the ground that there are charges against the directors and promoters which it would be better to investigate by means of a compulsory order. The first point raises a serious question under section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, whether after the declaration of the chairman it is competent for the Court to receive evidence to impeach that declaration. Treating the matter apart from authority, it seems to me that this question must be answered in the negative. Section 51 enacts that "unless a poll is demanded by at least five members a declaration of the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same." "Conclusive" seems to me to be a clear word. The Act contains several forms of language. By section 67, a minute signed by the chairman "shall be received as evidence" in all legal proceedings. By Table A, article 42, at any general meeting, unless a poll is demanded, a declaration by the chairman that a resolution has been carried and an entry to that effect in the book of the proceedings of the company "shall be sufficient evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against such resolution." I cannot regard "conclusive" as equivalent to "sufficient." I think the Legislature intended, in the case of a special or extraordinary resolution, that the chairman's declaration should be conclusive unless challenged by means of a poll demanded by five members. This view, however, is directly contrary to that expressed by Mr. Justice Kekewich in "Young v. South African Syndicate" ([1896] 2 Ch., 268). He says with reference to section 51, at page 275:—"The reasonable construction of that clause seems to me to be that you are not bound to prove either the number or proportion of the votes, but that, without more, the declaration of the chairman is to be accepted as conclusive evidence without that proof; not that it shall be accepted as conclusive if there is proof that the number or proportion of votes is against the declaration. If there is proof forthcoming that the declaration is inconsistent with the real facts, I do not think that the word 'conclusive' goes so far as to exclude that evidence; for otherwise it would open the door to gross mistake if not to fraud." I have felt considerable doubt whether I am at liberty to follow my own view, but I think for the reasons which I am about to state I can do so. Mr. Justice Kekewich was under the impression, as stated at page 274, that the point arose before him for the first time. His attention was not called to the case of the "Gold Company," which is reported in 11 Ch.D., 701, but is more fully reported in 48 L.J. Ch. N.S., 281. In that case only 17 shareholders were present. Eleven voted for the extraordinary resolution to wind up voluntarily, two against it, and four did not vote at all. No poll was demanded, and the chairman declared the resolution to be carried. It seems plain that this was a mistake, for there was not the requisite three-fourths majority. Vice-Chancellor Malins treated the voluntary winding up as valid, but nevertheless made a compulsory order. In the Court of Appeal this order was reversed. It appears from the L.J. report, page 286 that counsel for the respondents (petitioner) were about to argue that the voluntary winding up was irregular and that the wishes of the shareholders were not properly ascertained, upon which Lord Justice James remarked "As no poll was demanded, the ruling of the chairman is by the section 51 made conclusive. You cannot go into that now." This apparently was the decision of the whole Court. The Court discharged the order of Vice-Chancellor Malins and recognized that the voluntary winding up could not be impeached. This decision was not brought to the notice of Mr. Justice Kekewich and under the circumstances I think myself at liberty to disregard his decision and to follow my own view. The result is that I must treat the winding up as valid and not capable of being impeached. I may add that this result seems to me to be eminently convenient, for the present case furnishes a remarkable illustration of the extreme difficulty of ascertaining precisely what took place at a noisy meeting of shareholders; no two witnesses agree. It is perhaps right that I should observe that Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams in "Re Bidwell Brothers" ([1898] 1 Ch., 603) and Mr. Justice Chitty and the Court of Appeal in "Ernest v. Loma Gold Mines (Limited)" ([1896] 2 Ch., 572; [1897] 1 Ch., 1) considered whether a chairman had proceeded upon correct principles, but the point was not taken that a chairman's declaration is made conclusive, and the attention of the Court was not called to the authorities. I cannot regard either of those cases as decisions adverse to the view which I have expressed. On the second point I feel no difficulty in saying that the petitioners have not established any case. The decision of the Court of Appeal in the "Gold Company" case is itself a strong illustration of the doctrine that the Court will not, under ordinary circumstances, make a winding-up order after a voluntary winding-up at the instance of shareholders. Such rights as they may have against directors or promoters can be enforced by means of an application under section 138. Moreover, I see no reason to doubt that the liquidator will do his duty. The result is that I must dismiss the petition and dismiss it with costs.

Mr. Younger, Q.C., and Mr. Maughan were for the petitioner; Mr. Cosens-Hardy for the company; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. George Cave, and Mr. Edward Ford for debenture-holders and shareholders respectively opposing.

MOLINOS DE ARROZ V. MUMFORD.*

Insurance—Policy against loss caused by war —Construction—Rice requisitioned for food.

This was an action to recover a loss under a policy of insurance subscribed by the defendant and other underwriters at Lloyd's. The policy, which was dated December 9, 1898, and was for the space of 12 calendar months from that date, contained the following clause in writing:—"£20,000 on produce, rice, paddy, &c., the property of a company managed by Messrs. Smith, Bell, and Co. in any part of the Northern Provinces of Isla de Luzon. This policy is only against all loss or damage directly caused by war, revolution, civil commotion and (or) hostilities and fire risks excluded by fire insurance companies' policies." The question was whether a loss of rice and paddy, which had been "requisitioned" by the Filipinos in the course of hostilities with the United States, was covered by the policy.

Sir Robert Reid, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in giving judgment, said that the facts of the case were as follows:—In 1898 the plaintiffs were the owners of two mills in the island of Luzon. Their business was to clean paddy and convert it into rice and sell the rice to customers in the Philippine Islands, and the regions thereabouts. In May, 1898, a war broke out between Spain and the United States. In August, Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands, was captured by the United States, and by October, 1898, the war was practically at an end, the result being that the United States took possession of the Philippine Islands. During the war the American troops had been assisted by the natives of the islands led by General Aguinaldo. After the war, however, the relations between the United States and the natives were not in a very satisfactory condition, and the plaintiffs took out the policy sued upon. In February, 1899, Aguinaldo commenced hostilities against the United States forces in the immediate neighbourhood of Manila, but the Filipinos were gradually driven back in the direction of the plaintiffs' mills, which were 180 miles from Manila. In May things were in such a condition that the managers of the mills, who were Englishmen, were forced to leave the mills and to go within the American lines. They left the mills under a staff of workmen and clerks, half-castes and natives; and the mills were at the mercy of the forces of Aguinaldo. It became necessary for food to be found for Aguinaldo's troops, and he requisitioned the unprotected rice and paddy at the plaintiffs' mills. This began on June 1, and continued till November 14, with the result that practically all the rice and paddy was taken from the plaintiffs' mills. The main question in the case was as to whether the rice and paddy so taken was lost within the meaning of the policy. His Lordship was of opinion that it was. He agreed with the argument put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs that in looking at the cause of the loss one must not confine oneself to the immediate physical consequences of some act of violence committed in the course of war. The proper way was to remember that there was a condition of things in existence which could be described as a state of war, and the object of the plaintiffs was to protect themselves, and of the defendant to insure the plaintiffs, against the consequences of that state of things; and one of the direct consequences of that state of things was that the plaintiffs' rice was taken from them against their will. It was said for the defendant that the taking of the rice was in the nature of an enforced sale or a rude form of taxation. His Lordship did not agree. The rice was taken from the plaintiffs just as much as if an army had camped near the mills and had fed on the rice. No attention need be paid to the fact that the so-called Government of the Filipinos went through the empty formality of handing to the plaintiffs pieces of paper which purported to be receipts for the rice taken. On the main question in the case, therefore, his Lordship held that the loss was directly caused by war within the meaning of the policy. There was another question. Before the rice was taken it had deteriorated by reason of its having been kept too long in the mills. The plaintiffs said that, had it not been for the warlike operations that were going on, the rice would not have been detained but would have been sold in the ordinary course of business and would have realized a sound price, and it was contended that the damage to the rice from the necessary detention was as directly caused by the war as the loss through the taking away of the rice. His Lordship had some doubt on this point, but he came to the conclusion that it could not be said that the deterioration of the rice was directly caused by the war, and therefore the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover that head of loss. His Lordship held that the amount which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the policy was £15,000, and gave three months' interest at 4 per cent.

FLEMING V. THE BANK OF NEW ZEALAND.*

Banker—Cheque—Consideration—Consideration moving from plaintiff's agent—Action for dishonouring cheques.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand of February 4, 1899, reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Pennefather.

Mr. Asquith, Q.C., and Mr. J. W. McCarthy were counsel for the appellant; Mr. Arthur Cohen, Q.C., and Mr. W. Wills for the respondents.

LORD LINDLEY, in delivering their Lordships' reserved judgment, said the action was brought in New Zealand by the plaintiff against his bankers for dishonouring certain cheques. The action was tried with a jury, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for £2,000 damages. The defendants appealed, and the Court of Appeal not only set aside the verdict and judgment but entered judgment for the defendants with costs. From that decision the plaintiff now appealed. The plaintiff was a farmer and stock dealer in an extensive way of business. He was a large buyer of sheep, for which he was in the habit of paying cash. He was in good credit, but in August, 1897, his account with his bankers was overdrawn to the extent of £859. He had made an arrangement with them for an overdraft of £1,200. The plaintiff had in August and September, 1897, a large number of sheep in the hands of the Southland Frozen Meat and Export Company, and those sheep were at the plaintiff's disposal and were available as a security if the plaintiff desired to borrow money upon them. Mr. Chisholm was the bank manager and Mr. Thompson was the manager of the Frozen Meat Company. On August 28, 1897, the plaintiff and Chisholm had a conversation about the plaintiff's overdraft; about the sheep he had in store with the Frozen Meat Company; and about further purchases of sheep which the plaintiff might desire to make. The plaintiff and Chisholm gave different accounts of the conversation; Chisholm maintaining that those sheep were to be a security for the plaintiff's overdraft, whilst the plaintiff maintained that no pledge of these was ever made. On September 4, 1897, the plaintiff drew on the defendants four more cheques for sums amounting in the aggregate to £658 17s. 2d. in payment of sheep then bought by him. In order to provide for the payment of those cheques the plaintiff asked Thompson to see Chisholm and to pay £1,000 into the bank to the plaintiff's credit to meet these particular cheques. Thompson knew nothing of the plaintiff's overdraft. On September 6, 1897, Thompson saw Chisholm and explained his mission, but proposed that, as a matter of convenience to the Frozen Meat Company, he should deposit a store warrant for sheep instead of cash. That Chisholm assented to. A store warrant for 2,250 sheep belonging to the plaintiff and valued at £1,000 was accordingly sent to the bank on the same September 6. Thompson then supposed that the cheques to meet which he had deposited the warrant would be paid on presentment. Chisholm appeared to have understood that the store warrant was to secure the plaintiff's old overdraft. Whatever the explanation might be, the fact was that after Chisholm had received the store warrant the cheques were presented and dishonoured. The next day Chisholm sent to the holders of the cheques, and they were then again presented and paid. The real controversy at the trial was whether the store warrant was deposited by Thompson to meet the four cheques drawn on September 4 or to cover the old overdraft. Another question was whether Thompson exceeded his authority in obtaining credit from the bank on the security of the store warrant instead of placing £1,000 to the plaintiff's credit at his bankers in order to meet the cheque. The difference between the plaintiff's instructions and the mode in which Thompson carried them out was practically of so little consequence to any one that their Lordships were surprised that any real importance should have been attached to that variation from the plaintiff's instruction. It appeared to their Lordships to be plain from the evidence given at the trial that it never occurred to Thompson nor Chisholm nor to the plaintiff that anything could turn on the substitution of the store warrant for cash. They all treated the substitution as of no importance at all. Fourteen questions were submitted to the jury, and on their findings judgment was entered for the plaintiff for £2,000 damages and costs. The defendants appealed and applied for a new trial. They contended that the plaintiff had no cause of action, that evidence as to special damage had been improperly admitted, and that the damages were excessive. In the Court of Appeal all the members agreed that evidence of special damage had been improperly admitted and that the damages were excessive. If a new trial had been ordered, unless the plaintiff had consented to reduce the damages to £500, as suggested by Mr. Justice Denniston, probably no further appeal would have been heard of. But the majority of the Court of Appeal went further, and held that the plaintiff had no cause of action and gave judgment for the defendants. That view is based entirely on Thompson's substitution of a store warrant for cash with the bank as above stated. Treating that deposit as unauthorized by the plaintiff, the Court held that there was no consideration for the promise by the bank to the plaintiff to pay the dishonoured cheques; and the Court further held that the ratification by the plaintiff of the unauthorized deposit was too late to avail the plaintiff. For the reasons already given, their Lordships would not themselves have come to the conclusion that Thompson exceeded his real authority, or that the jury really meant to find that he had. Taking the eighth and ninth findings—that the plaintiff did not authorize Mr. Thompson to deposit the warrant instead of cash or approve his having done so—in connexion with the evidence relating to them, their Lordships would not have understood the eighth finding as amounting to more than that nothing was said by the plaintiff to Thompson about depositing a store warrant. The further inference that Thompson exceeded his real authority in depositing the store warrant was, no doubt, consistent with the finding; but such inference did not appear to their Lordships to be warranted by the evidence and appeared to their Lordships to be opposed to it. They would not themselves have adopted the view taken by the Court of Appeal of the eighth finding or have regarded it as meaning more than was stated above. But, even if the Court of Appeal were right in regarding the eighth finding of the jury as a finding that Thompson really did exceed his authority, and thereby expose himself and the Frozen Meat Company to actions for damages, their Lordships were not prepared to hold that, apart from ratification, no contract was proved between the plaintiff and the defendants entitling the plaintiff to sue them for a breach of it. The other answers of the jury contained all the elements necessary to constitute a contract between the plaintiff and the bank and a breach of it for which the plaintiff could sue. The authority to Thompson to obtain for the plaintiff as his principal a promise by the bank to pay the cheques was proved. The promise by the bank to Thompson as the agent and for and on behalf of the plaintiff to pay the cheques was also proved. The deposit by Thompson of the store warrant for the sheep as the consideration for that promise was also proved. What more was wanted? Was it consideration, or was it consideration moving from the plaintiff? First, as to the consideration. In "Currie v. Misa" (L.R., 10 Ex., 153; App. 1 A.C., 554) the question arose whether a cheque drawn by the defendant and made payable to Lizarde and Co. was given for consideration or not, and whether the plaintiffs were holders of the cheque for value. The case was an important authority on the meaning of consideration. Mr. Justice Lush in giving the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said (L.R., 10 Ex., 163):—"A valuable consideration in the sense of the law may consist either in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to the one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility given, suffered, or undertaken by the other." That definition had been constantly accepted as correct. Their Lordships so treated it, and, if correct, it covered this case so far as some consideration was concerned. The deposit by Thompson of the sheep warrant with the bank conferred upon the bank some right, interest, profit, or benefit which was all that was required by the first half of the definition to constitute a consideration for the bank's promise to Thompson as agent for the plaintiff to pay the cheques which he had drawn and were outstanding. Moreover, Chisholm knew the circumstances under which the store warrant was deposited; and he was content to take it as the consideration for his promise. Next, as to the objection that the consideration did not move from the plaintiff. The doctrine that the consideration for a promise must move from the promisee was laid down in the textbooks (e.g., in Leake in his Digest of the Law of Contracts, pp. 611 and 612), and held good in ordinary cases where a promise was made to one man for the benefit of another. But the authorities for the doctrine did not cover a case like the present, in which the consideration was supplied by an agent who obtained the promise for and on behalf of his principal. Chisholm was told that Thompson was instructed by the plaintiff to pay the bank £1,000, and if he had required it, that sum would have been paid accordingly. Chisholm chose with his eyes open to waive the payment in cash and to take the store warrant for what it was worth. Their Lordships were not aware of any authority for saying that in such circumstances the promisor could avoid performance of his promise to the third party on the ground that the consideration did not move from him; and to extend the doctrine to such a case would be wholly unreasonable. The above view of the case rendered it unnecessary to consider any question of ratification or to dwell on the decision of "Bolton Partners v. Lambert" (41 Ch.D., 295) and its application to the facts of this case. The decision referred to presented difficulties, and their Lordships reserved their liberty to reconsider it if on some future occasion it should become necessary to do so. But, although their Lordships were unable to hold that the plaintiff had no cause of action, they agreed with all the members of the Court of Appeal in thinking that the learned Judge who tried the case was wrong in admitting evidence of the plaintiff's loss of custom and of credit from particular individuals. The details of that misreception of evidence were given in the judgments of the Court of Appeal, and it was unnecessary to refer to them again. The damages awarded by the jury appeared to their Lordships to have been exorbitant, considering that the plaintiff's cheques were honoured by the bank the morning after the afternoon on which they were dishonoured. The plaintiff was, however, entitled to substantial damages, and their Lordships would adopt the views of Mr. Justice Denniston that £500 would be ample. Their Lordships would, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed and the judgment appealed from be reversed with costs, and that a new trial ought to be directed unless the plaintiff consented that the damages should be reduced to £500, and that in the event of his so consenting he ought to be entitled to judgment for £500 and to the costs of the action. The respondents would pay the costs of this appeal in either event.

RICE V. NOAKES AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Mortgage—Redemption—Restrictive covenant—Tied publichouse.

A mortgage of a leasehold publichouse prohibited the mortgagor from selling during the leasehold term liquor not purchased from the mortgagee.

Held, that the mortgagor was entitled to redeem free from the tie.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (ante, p. 38), affirmed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy which is reported ante, p. 38. The case raised an important question as to the rights of mortgagors and mortgagees of publichouses.

The plaintiff, a licensed victualler, in October, 1897, became the purchaser of property at Camberwell, including a publichouse known as the King's Arms, held upon lease for a term expiring at Christmas, 1923. Prior to his purchase the defendants, Noakes and Co. (Limited), brewers, had a mortgage on the property, the terms of which were practically identical with those of the mortgage of 1897 mentioned below. The defendants were not the vendors, but they released their security in order to enable Messrs. Nicholson, the second mortgagees, to sell to the plaintiff for £8,800. As is usual, the plaintiff only found a small portion of the cash, the defendants, the brewers, advancing £4,850 on a first mortgage. This mortgage was dated October 7, 1897. It contained a recital that the defendants had agreed to lend to the plaintiff the sum of £4,850, upon having the repayment thereof, and of such other moneys as were thereafter mentioned, secured in manner thereafter appearing; and it was witnessed that, in consideration of £4,850 then lent to the plaintiff by the defendants, and for securing the payment to the defendants of the said principal sum and all such further sums as thereafter mentioned, the plaintiff demised and conveyed to the defendants the leasehold premises, and all trade and tenant's fixtures, and the goodwill of the business of a licensed victualler or other business carried on upon the said premises, and the full benefit and advantage of all certificates and the magistrates' and Excise licences for carrying on such business or relating to the said premises, to hold to the defendants subject to a power of redemption therein contained. By this proviso it was declared that, if the plaintiff should, either on demand by the defendants left at the demised messuage, or without such demand, pay to them all such principal moneys and interest as were respectively mentioned in the covenant for payment thereafter contained, and as should then be due on that security, then the defendants would, at the request and cost of the plaintiff, surrender or reconvey the premises to the plaintiff or as he should direct, and (after attorning tenant at a peppercorn rent if demanded) the plaintiff covenanted with the defendants that he would on demand pay to them the said principal sum and interest at 5 per cent. until payment, and all such further sums as should be due from the plaintiff, as well for money advanced to or for the use of the plaintiff or paid on his behalf as therein mentioned, or on any other account or otherwise howsoever, with interest at the rate aforesaid, as also for goods sold and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff. After other provisions the deed continued as follows:—"And for the considerations aforesaid the mortgagor, so as to charge the premises . . . hereby demised, into whosoever possession the same may come, whether by act of the party or by operation of law or by any other ways or means however, and to the further intent that the obligation of this covenant may run with the land, doth hereby covenant with the company that the mortgagor shall not, nor will at any time during the continuance of the term aforesaid, and whether any principal moneys or interest shall or shall not be owing upon the security of these presents, use or sell, or permit to be used or sold, in, upon, or about the said demised premises, any malt liquors except such as shall be bona fide purchased by the mortgagor of the company. And, further, that, if and whenever there shall be a breach of the said covenant, he, the mortgagor, shall and will pay to the company the sum of £1,000 as and for ascertained liquidated damages for each such breach, and will sell all such malt liquors pure, unadulterated, and unmixed, and of the like strength, character, and quality in all respects as the same shall be supplied to him." The deed also declared that the words "the mortgagor" and "the company," except when otherwise controlled by the context, should, throughout the deed, include all persons deriving title under them respectively. The plaintiff was willing to pay off all money due to the defendants under the mortgage, and required them, on payment being made, to reconvey the leasehold property to him, and to release him from the covenant by which the house purported to be "tied" to the defendants during the whole currency of the lease, or to transfer the mortgage to him and assign the benefit of the covenant. The defendants were willing to reconvey or transfer, but not to release or assign the covenant, and the present action was brought to obtain a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled not only to reconveyance or transfer, but also to a release or assignment of the covenant. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy held that "the 'tie,' though perfectly valid during the continuance of the security, cannot be maintained when all moneys due upon the security have been paid off," and that, on payment of all moneys due, the plaintiff was entitled to have a reconveyance of the property, or to a transfer of the security, free in either case from the "tie." The defendants appealed.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Stanley Fisher were for the defendants; Mr. Astbury, Q.C., and Mr. Beaumont were for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the case was one of considerable importance, and he was glad to find that the parties intended to carry it to the House of Lords. The mortgage deed, on its face, was a mortgage of a house not subject to any "tie." The effect of the covenant in question was to "tie" the house to the defendants up to the end of the term in 1923. The question was whether that covenant could stand. It seemed to his Lordship impossible to say that the old doctrine that the equity of redemption of a mortgage must not be "clogged" could now be disregarded by the Court, or that the doctrine had disappeared. This had not been argued by Mr. Haldane, but he had contended that there was no clogging of the equity of redemption in the present case. His Lordship read the rule as thus stated by the late Lord Bowen (then Lord Justice Bowen) in "Marquis of Northampton v. Pollock" (45 Ch.D., at p. 215). "Whenever a transaction is in reality one of mortgage, equity regards the mortgaged property as security only for money, and will permit of no attempt to clog, fetter, or impede the borrower's right to redeem and to rescue what was, and still remains in equity his own." His Lordship (the Master of the Rolls) could not express the rule more clearly. He understood it to mean that on redemption of the mortgage the mortgagor was entitled to have back that property which he had mortgaged, and that any stipulation which would prevent this when the mortgage obligation was fulfilled would be bad. This expression of the rule was approved by the late Lord Bramwell when the same case was before the House of Lords under the title "Salt v. the Marquis of Northampton" ([1892] A.C. 1). In that case no doubt was thrown upon the doctrine; the question discussed was whether the doctrine applied under the peculiar circumstances of that case. In the present case, was it true that the covenant in question did not impede the mortgagor's right to redeem the property which remained in equity his own? The covenant would probably run with the land. If it were binding, its effect was that up to 1923, even if the mortgage debt was paid, the owner of the house would not be entitled to obtain his beer in the best market, but would be bound to take it from the defendants. It was impossible to say that this did not diminish the property which was to be given back to the mortgagor on redemption. It prevented his getting back that which was his own. Apart from any of the recent decisions his Lordship thought the case was reasonably clear. But it was said that the course of recent decisions, ending with "Santley v. Wilde" ([1899] 2 Ch., 474; 15 The Times L.R., 528) showed that the covenant must be regarded as not affecting the equity of redemption, but as a collateral stipulation. His Lordship did not think he was in any way departing from those decisions. He thought that "Mainland v. Upjohn" (41 Ch.D., 126) and "Biggs v. Hoddinott" ([1898] 2 Ch., 307) were easily distinguishable from the present case. "Santley v. Wilde" was much more difficult. It was a decision of the Court of Appeal and was binding on that Court. But his Lordship did not think it infringed on the doctrine which was recognized by the House of Lords in "Salt v. the Marquis of Northampton." In "Santley v. Wilde" the lessee of a theatre borrowed £2,000 on the security of a mortgage of the lease, and by the mortgage deed she covenanted to repay the £2,000 by 20 quarterly instalments, and also to pay to the mortgagee one-third of the net profits of the theatre during the whole of the term of the lease (which was four years longer than the time fixed for the payment of the £2,000), and the property was to be redeemable only on payment of the £2,000 and interest, and all other moneys covenanted to be paid. The Court construed that contract as charging the mortgaged property with the obligation to pay the share of the profits as well as the debt of £2,000. If so it was clear that the principle that the equity of redemption must not be clogged was not infringed. The judgments of the Court showed that this was the true view of the case. And this was the distinction which Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy had pointed out in the present case. The Master of the Rolls did not differ from his view, though he had expressed the distinction in somewhat different words. In his opinion "Santley v. Wilde" afforded no ground for saying that such a covenant as that in the present case did not interfere with the principle which was recognized by the House of Lords in "Salt v. the Marquis of Northampton." His Lordship was clearly of opinion that the covenant infringed the doctrine referred to, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed with the Master of the Rolls. The old maxim "once a mortgage always a mortgage" had not been in any way infringed upon. It must, of course, be applied carefully. The only question in "Salt v. the Marquis of Northampton" was whether there was "once a mortgage," and the House of Lords came to the conclusion that there was a mortgage ab initio. There was no question that if so the maxim applied. Another way of expressing the rule was that "you must not clog the equity of redemption." This maxim was not always easy of application. But, at any rate, there must be in substance a restitution of the property which was mortgaged. It must not be made any worse than it was. The mortgagee must not reserve to himself any hold upon the property when the time for redemption had arrived. These maxims still remained in full force. It was idle to say that the equity of redemption was not clogged when a house which was mortgaged as a free house was to be taken back by the mortgagor as a "tied" house. The "tie" could not be supported without doing violence to the maxims referred to.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

ELLIOTT V. YATES AND ANOTHER.*

Taxes Management Act, 1880—Distress for income-tax—Authority of tax collector to levy distress—43 and 44 Vict., c. 19.

This was an application by the plaintiff for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Channell and a common jury. The action was brought to recover damages for trespass for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house and levying a distress, and also to recover damages for irregularity in the distress by remaining in too long.

The question raised was an important one—namely, whether collectors of income-tax and house duty who have authority to collect income-tax and house duty for the year ending April 5 have power after the year ending April 5 to levy a distress for income-tax and inhabited house duty due and payable for the year ending on April 5. The plaintiff occupied a house at Maidenhead, the assessment of which was increased. The plaintiff, on account, it was stated, of illness, did not appeal to the assessment committee, and on demand being sent to him for income-tax, under schedules A and B of the Income-tax Act, and for inhabited house duty in respect of his occupation of the house for the year ending April 5, 1899, he refused to pay, thinking the assessment too high. On May 25, 1899, the defendants caused a distress to be levied on the premises to recover the amount due for income-tax and inhabited house duty, and left a man in possession until June 15, 1899, when the distress was withdrawn. The plaintiff subsequently paid the amount of the income-tax and inhabited house duty, and brought this action. The defendants were appointed collectors by the local commissioners on March 31, 1898, and on December 13, 1898, the commissioners signed a warrant (being in the form No. 5 in the second schedule to the Taxes Management Act, 1880) authorizing the defendants to demand and collect the income-tax and inhabited house duty for the year ending April 5, 1899. The material parts of the warrant are set out in the judgment of Lord Justice A. L. Smith. The reason why the warrant was not made out until December 13, 1898, was that the duties for the year did not become payable until January 1, 1899. Collectors were appointed each year. Mr. Justice Channell held that the defendants had authority to levy the distress, and that, therefore, the distress was not illegal. In the event, however, of his decision being wrong upon this point he asked the jury to assess the damages upon this head of claim. The jury assessed the damages at 5s. upon the claim for damages for irregularity in the distress—that is, for keeping the distress in for too long a time. The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for £10. The plaintiff applied for judgment or a new trial upon the first head of claim.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. J. G. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Poley appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., and Mr. E. Layman appeared for the defendants.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—The plaintiff in this action seeks to recover from the defendants damages for having trespassed upon his dwelling-house at Maidenhead on May 25, 1899. The defendants are collectors of income-tax under Schedules (A) and (B) of the Income-tax Acts, and also of inhabited house duties, and were appointed by the Commissioners of Taxes to collect the same pursuant to the Taxes Management Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict., c. 19), for the year ending April 5, 1899. The defendants justify the alleged trespass under a warrant dated December 13, 1898, duly granted to them under the Taxes Management Act, 1880. It is not in dispute (1) that the taxes for which the defendants distrained had been duly demanded of the plaintiff upon January 1, 1899; (2) that such taxes then became due and payable by the plaintiff, and continued so down to the distress (which is the alleged trespass) upon May 25, 1899; and (3) that the plaintiff throughout persisted in refusing to pay what was due from him, and that he had no valid excuse for such refusal. The first point taken on behalf of the plaintiff is that under the warrant the defendants' authority to distrain came to an end upon April 5, 1899, and consequently they were functi officio upon May 25, 1899, and could not justify under it. In my judgment this is not so, and the authority under the warrant has no such limitation, and this will be seen upon reading it. The warrant, after reciting the appointment of the defendants to be collectors of the duties arising from property, professions, trades, and offices, and of the duties on inhabited houses for the year ending April 5, 1899, enjoins and requires the collectors to make demand of the several sums upon the parties charged therewith, and upon payment thereof to give acquittances, and "if any person should refuse to pay the sum or sums charged upon him upon demand duly made, for non-payment thereof to distrain for the same by virtue of this our warrant without further authority." I do not find in this warrant that the power to distrain is limited to a distress made on or before April 5, 1899, but, on the contrary, the power given is to distrain without limit as to time "for duties payable for the year ending April 5, 1899." I would point out that the collectors appointed in the succeeding year for the year ending April 5, 1900, could not distrain for the taxes and duties due for the preceding year ending April 5, 1899. So much for the warrant itself under which the defendants justify. But it is further argued for the plaintiff that by the Taxes Management Act, 1880, the collectors became functi officio on April 5, 1899. I will first deal with the only section that has any possible bearing upon this point prior to section 100, for in that and the following sections the statute deals with a new state of circumstances which does not exist in the present case. Section 73, subsection 1, which is the only section referred to in this part (Part V.) of the Act, deals with the nomination of collectors in the month of April in each year. There is nothing in this section which enacts that after the month of April, 1899, the nominated collectors may not get in unpaid arrears which they were appointed to collect and which they could not collect owing to the persistent refusal of the taxpayer to pay, and, indeed, subsection 9 of the section points to this, that it is not until the collectors' accounts for the year have been closed that the collectors' office is at an end. I can find down to section 100 nothing which enacts that a collector's power to distrain under section 86 of the Act ceases upon April 5 in any year under a warrant similar to that in the present case. The collector appointed is not for one year only, and no more, his appointment is to collect the taxes for the year ending April 5. Although there is a fresh appointment every year, the collectors appointed are not in place of those appointed in the preceding year, but to collect another year's taxes. No doubt, as a rule, the duties of the collectors for a particular year would be practically ended with the year, but they are not appointed only for the period of a year, nor do their duties of necessity end with the year. As a short method of description, they might be referred to as collectors appointed for a year, and I think that the expression in section 117, subsection 1, "for the remainder of the year," is explicable in the view that the Act intended to show clearly that the appointment of one collector in lieu of another was not intended to invalidate the latter's acts for the period during which he had acted. At section 100 there comes a new part of the Act—viz., Part VII., headed "Receipt and Account." This gives rise to other considerations. By section 100 the Board may appoint in each year a day to receive the moneys received by the collectors, on which day the collectors shall account for all moneys given them in charge to collect. By section 103 on the appointed day the collectors are to pay over to the collector of Inland Revenue the moneys received by them, and by subsection (b) to deliver a schedule of arrears. Until this is done, in my judgment, the collectors' authority to collect has not terminated. By section 105 and the following sections, under the heading of "Schedules of Arrears," different processes are prescribed by which a defaulting taxpayer may be brought to book by the Commissioners and others. In the present case no day prior to the day of distress had been appointed for receipt of the moneys collected by them under section 100, and consequently no schedule of arrears was in existence, and it will be seen that in this state of circumstances none of the sections after and including section 100 have any application to this case, and I have not to consider what effect they would have if they did apply. I cannot find in the Act prior to section 100, which is the part of the Act which applies to this case, any more than in the warrant itself, that the authority of the collector to collect arrears due before April 5, 1899, terminates upon that day; and as no day for receipt has been appointed under section 100 the sections subsequent thereto do not apply. The argument that the proceedings to make the plaintiff pay after April 5, 1899, must be by way of making him a Crown debtor is not well founded in this case, and, in my opinion, in the present case there is nothing to justify such an argument. The above are the only points now remaining in the case. I agree with my brother Channell that the defendants can justify, as they have done, under their warrant of distress of December 13, 1898. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

IN RE ARCHIBALD D. DAWNAY (LIMITED).
Company—Shares—Liability for—Fully-paid

*Reported by G. I. FOSTER COOKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

shares issued to vendor—Signatory to memorandum of association—Companies Act, 1867, sec. 25—Companies Act, 1898, sec. 1.

"In re F. W. Jarvis and Co." ([1899] 1 Ch., 193) approved and followed.

This case is one of very much importance to intending vendors to public companies, where the purchase-money is to consist, either in whole or in part, of paid-up shares, for it illustrates the necessity of seeing that all the statutory formalities required in such a case are complied with, so as to ensure the vendor against possible liability in the future of being after all called upon to pay for those shares in cash.

The case now before the Court was as follows:—The above company was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1896, on August 7, 1897, with a nominal capital of £75,000 in 7,500 shares of £10 each. The object of the company was the acquisition of the business of a civil and consulting engineer and surveyor and constructional engineer established by a Mr. Archibald D. Dawnay, with the stock, plant, machinery, and business premises. The basis on which the company was formed was the purchase from Mr. Dawnay of the business for £40,690, by the allotment to him or his nominees of 4,069 fully-paid shares, and a draft agreement to that effect was prepared before the incorporation of the company ready to be adopted by it and executed on its incorporation. Mr. Dawnay, who himself drew up the memorandum of association, signed it for "4,069" shares of £10 each which, though not indicated by any numbers, he understood and were intended, as he deposed, to be the paid-up shares which were the consideration to be given him for his business. He also signed the memorandum for 200 further shares, which he paid for in cash. He stated that he never agreed to take any other shares than those mentioned, and that when he signed the memorandum he was not aware that his doing so implied any contract or obligation to pay cash for the 4,069 shares, and that his signing for them in those circumstances was an inadvertence. There were other subscribers to the memorandum for shares amounting in all to 231 shares and one other share had since been issued, the total issue thus being 4,501 shares; the remaining 2,999 shares were never issued. The agreement for the sale and purchase of the business (the draft of which had already been prepared, as above mentioned) was duly executed on August 11, 1897, after the incorporation of the company, and on the 13th was filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies. After reciting the objects and formation of the company, it was agreed that the vendor, Mr. Dawnay, should sell and the company should purchase the business in question, and that part of the consideration should be "£40,690 to be satisfied by the allotment to the vendor or his nominees of 4,069 fully paid-up shares in the capital of the company to be numbered 1 to 4,069 both inclusive," and that, as the residue of the consideration, the company should undertake to discharge all the debts and liabilities of the business. Shortly after the filing of the agreement the 4,069 shares, numbered as stated in the agreement, were duly allotted to the vendor and registered in his name, and certificates for them were duly issued to him. No further capital beyond the 75,000 shares was ever created. No notice of any call in respect of any of the 4,069 shares had ever been given. The serious question then arose whether Mr. Dawnay, the vendor, was not liable to pay in cash for the 4,069 for which he subscribed the memorandum, there being nothing to show that those shares were identified with the 4,069 numbered shares specified in the agreement. Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, requires that every share in a company "shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares." By section 1 of the Companies Act, 1898, the Court is empowered to grant relief for an omission to file a sufficient contract under section 25 of the previous Act, where the omission has been "accidental or due to inadvertence"; and accordingly the vendor applied by motion under section 1 of the Act of 1898 that the company should, within 14 days after the order now asked for, file with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies a memorandum in writing in the form scheduled to the notice of motion, and that an order might be made to the effect that—the Court being of opinion that the 4,069 fully paid-up shares mentioned in the agreement were the 4,069 shares for which the vendor had signed the memorandum of association—on the filing of the said memorandum in the form scheduled within the time aforesaid, such memorandum should, in relation to the 4,069 shares, operate as if it were a sufficient contract in writing within section 25 of the Act of 1867, and had been duly filed at or before the issue of such shares. The scheduled form of memorandum purported to state that the 4,069 shares numbered in the agreement were the 4,069 shares for which the vendor had signed the memorandum of association, and had been issued in satisfaction of the £40,690, part of the consideration agreed to be paid to the vendor. An affidavit by a director of the company agreed with the vendor in saying that the company never contemplated an allotment of any further shares to him, and never made any call in respect of the 4,069 shares for which he signed the memorandum of association, "considering them to be the very shares agreed to be allotted as fully paid up under the terms of the filed agreement, and that the omission to file a sufficient agreement with the memorandum arose from inadvertence." It appeared that the company was in a prosperous condition and paying large dividends.

Mr. BUNTING, for the vendor, relied upon "In re Whitehead and Brothers (Limited)" ([1900] 1 Ch., 804), submitting that the present case was distinguishable from "Dalton Time Lock Company v. Dalton" (66 L.T., 704) and "In re F. W. Jarvis and Co. (Limited)" ([1899] 1 Ch., 193).

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. W. Brinton appeared for the company.

At the conclusion of the argument on the 21st inst. his Lordship reserved judgment.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH said,—Judgment was reserved because I was unwilling to depart from the decision of Mr. Justice Romer in "In re F. W. Jarvis and Co. (Limited)" ([1899] 1 Ch., 193) or to adopt that of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy in "In re Whitehead and Brothers (Limited)" ([1900] 1 Ch., 804) without further consideration. Unless the distinctions which satisfied Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy in the latter case, and which were also urged here, are sufficient, this case must be governed by the decision of Mr. Justice Romer, which is directly in point. The case before him was like this one. It was one in which a vendor had signed the memorandum of association for a number of shares in precisely the same way as in the present case, in consideration of the issue of which as fully paid up he contracted after the incorporation of the company to sell his property; and there, as here, the vendor's shares were protected by a registered agreement, and the question arose respecting the same number of shares for which the memorandum of association was signed. The report states ([1899] 1 Ch., 194) that there was evidence that the shares for which the vendor signed the memorandum of association were the same as those issuable to him under the agreement; but the learned Judge did not consider the evidence as sufficient, and indeed says, on page 189, that the two lots of shares could not be identified. He held that the case was not one contemplated by the Act of 1898; but, more than that, he considered it on its merits, and though deeming it a case of great hardship and expressing his regret that he could not help the applicant, he determined, for the reasons set out in his judgment, that the application ought not to be granted. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy came to a different conclusion in "In re Whitehead and Brothers (Limited)." He held that case to be distinguishable from that decided by Mr. Justice Romer. The only distinction noticed in his judgment is that there was no difficulty in identifying the shares registered in the name of the vendor as being the same shares as those subscribed for by him on the memorandum. I cannot myself see from the report that he had any better evidence of identity than was before Mr. Justice Romer; but perhaps there was some which has escaped my notice or is not expressly mentioned in the report. The other distinction urged in argument, but not referred to by the learned Judge, was that, in the case before Mr. Justice Romer, there were shares not taken up more than sufficient to provide for the double allotment, whereas in "In re Whitehead and Brothers (Limited)" all the shares had been issued. I do not say that this is not a fact worth consideration, and it is undoubtedly present here; but I do not think it sufficient, standing alone, to induce me to distinguish a case similar in other respects from "In re F. W. Jarvis and Co. (Limited)." As regards the other distinction which I have commented upon in connexion with the case before Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy, I need only say that I have no more convincing evidence than was before Mr. Justice Romer, and that it seems to me—as it seemed to him—insufficient. Besides these distinctions there is a fact peculiar to this case which deserves separate notice, because much was made of it in argument. The applicant subscribed the memorandum of association not only for the same number of shares as that for which he agreed to accept in payment of purchase-money, but also, and separately, for 200 shares for which he admits he is liable to pay. The argument I understand to be this—that this is evidence of two classes of shares subscribed for, and that one of them is identical with the other, being undoubtedly distinct from the vendor's shares. To my mind the observations of Mr. Justice Romer are equally applicable to both, and the fact, peculiar though it be, does not assist the applicant. Under these circumstances I must follow Mr. Justice Romer's decision and refuse the application. It is as well to add that I do this not so much because I am bound by the case of "In re F. W. Jarvis and Co. (Limited)," as because it approves itself to my judgment and I ought not readily to adopt distinctions from it. As stated by that learned Judge at the conclusion of his judgment, my order will not prejudice any question that may hereafter arise between the applicant and the Court as to whether, under the circumstances, he is or is not bound to take other shares under the memorandum of association; but, seeing the importance of the case, the considerable amount involved, and the public inconvenience of a difference of opinion between Judges on such a question, I venture to hope that my conclusion will be submitted to review in the Court of Appeal.

HIS LORDSHIP accordingly refused the application, but made no order as to costs.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Vaughan } 1900.
Williams, and Romer, L.JJ.) } June 30.

CROSSFIELD AND SONS V. TANIAN.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Sched. I., para. 12—Award—Application to review.

An award cannot, by an application to review under para. 12 of Sched. I., be impeached on the ground that facts were taken as admitted at the hearing which ought to have been contested.

This was an appeal from the refusal of the Judge of the Warrington County Court to review an award made in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation, Patrick Tanian, was a labourer in the employment of Messrs. Crossfield and Sons, and in the course of his employment he met with an accident which resulted in the loss of his right eye. The applicant duly filed a request for arbitration, and in the particulars annexed to the request he stated that his weekly wages before the accident were 30s., and that at the time of filing the request he was earning wages at the rate of 17s. 1d. a week. The employers filed an answer, in which they stated that the applicant's weekly wages before the accident were not 30s., but 19s. 10½d. This answer, however, was only filed two days before the hearing of the arbitration, whereas Rule 17 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, requires that the respondent's answer shall be filed "five clear days at least before the day fixed for proceeding with the arbitration." At the hearing the County Court Judge, finding that the employers' answer was out of time, considered himself bound to accept the applicant's statement contained in the particulars, and he made an award in the applicant's favour for a weekly payment of 12s. 6d. The award was made in August, 1899. In March, 1900, the employers applied to the County Court Judge, under paragraph 12 of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act, asking that the weekly payment might be reviewed. The County Court Judge declined to accede to the application. The employers appealed. It was not suggested on their behalf that any change had taken place in the circumstances of the case between the making of the award and the application for a review, but it was contended that, on the true construction of paragraph 12 of Schedule I., it was open to either party at any time to apply for a review of the weekly payment. Paragraph 12 is as follows:—"Any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the maximum above provided, and the amount of payment shall, in default of agreement, be settled by arbitration under this Act."

Mr. Arthur Powell appeared for the employers, Mr. W. D. Benson for the workman.

The COURT, without calling upon counsel for the workman, dismissed the appeal, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams doubting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that what they had to consider was the true meaning of paragraph 12 of the first Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act. The question was whether employers could apply under that paragraph for a review of a weekly payment where the circumstances, which existed at the time of the making of the award, had not in any way altered at the time of making the application for a review. An award had been made in this case by the County Court Judge, who had before him the statement of the workman that his weekly wages before the accident were 30s. The employers desired to show that the workman's wages had been 19s. 10½d. But the County Court Judge held that, as the employers had not filed their answer five days before the hearing, in accordance with the rules, they were out of order, and it was not open to them to take this point, and he therefore made an award on the basis of the workman's statement. The award was made in August, 1899. It was clear that the County Court Judge had not made any mistake in dealing with the case as he had done, neither was any appeal brought against the award. But in March, 1900, the employers applied under paragraph 12 of Schedule I. for a review of the weekly payment which the County Court Judge had awarded. The question arose, What change had taken place in the circumstances of the case since the making of the award. The answer was that no change whatever had taken place. The point which the employers really wished to raise was that the award was wrong, because the County Court Judge ought to have found that the workman's wages before the accident were 19s. 10½d. But could the employers in an application under paragraph 12 show that the award was wrong? In his opinion they could not. Paragraph 12 was passed ad hoc altogether. It contemplated that an injured workman might get well, or, at any rate, he might get better, or he might get worse. And accordingly it enacted that any weekly payment—not any award—might be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review might be ended—that was to say, if the workman got well—or diminished if he got better, or increased if he got worse. He thought that the decision of the County Court Judge refusing to review the weekly payment was right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he agreed that it would be manifestly unfortunate if paragraph 12 of Schedule I. of the Workmen's Compensation Act could be used for the purpose of appealing against any award which one party or the other did not like. He felt sure that the Legislature did not intend this enactment to be used for such purpose. But though he felt this, on the other hand he knew no duty of the Court which it was more difficult to exercise, or which, in his opinion, ought to be more sparingly exercised, than what he might call the power of interlinear legislation, that was to say, of introducing into an Act of Parliament words which were not there. What were the words of this enactment? "Any weekly payment may be reviewed at the request either of the employer or of the workman, and on such review may be ended, diminished, or increased, subject to the maximum above provided." It was suggested that in the exercise of the powers which the Court had of interlinear legislation they should read in the words "if the circumstances are changed." He could not feel that there was any necessity for introducing those words into the enactment. But whether that were so or not, it seemed to him that the employers now proposed to show the existence of circumstances which were different from the circumstances which were before the County Court Judge on the original hearing. It was said that they could not do that, because they were estopped by the previous award. He was not sure that that was so. In the first place, an award was not a judgment so as to operate technically as an estoppel. And, in the second place, if abstract justice required them to say whether there ought not to be an estoppel, he could not help seeing that this was a case in which the question of amount had never been determined on the merits at all. It might be that the result was that there was an estoppel, but he could not feel sure. At any rate, he hesitated to read into the Act words which were not there.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said that this was an attempt to re-open an arbitration and impeach an original award on the ground that facts were admitted at the hearing which should have been contested. This was done under cover of an application made under paragraph 12 of Schedule I. to the Workmen's Compensation Act. In his opinion that paragraph was directed to another purpose, and was not intended to enable an award to be impeached on any such ground. He thought that it applied to cases in which some change in the circumstances had taken place since the date of the award. Here there had been no such change, no new fact had intervened. It seemed to him that, if the appeal were allowed, it would lead to great abuse. Whenever a party was dissatisfied with an award, he could keep on having fresh arbitrations until he obtained an award in his favour.

THE QUEEN V. OLLIS.*

Criminal Law—Evidence—Admissibility—False pretences.

On a trial for obtaining money by false pretences evidence as to other similar transactions on the part of the prisoner tending to show a course of conduct is not rendered inadmissible by reason of the fact that he has been tried and acquitted in respect of such other transactions.

This case was argued before five Judges on March 17 last, and subsequently before the Court as at present constituted on May 5, when judgment was reserved. A report of the arguments will be found in The Times of March 17 and May 7.

The case was one stated by the Recorder of Bath for the opinion of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, and raised an important question as to the admissibility of certain evidence. The defendant, Thomas Edwin Ollis, was tried at the quarter sessions for the city and borough of Bath held on October 13, 1899, on an indictment charging him with obtaining from Mr. H. F. Ramsey a cheque for £3 by falsely pretending that a cheque for £5 drawn by himself on the Birkbeck Bank in favour of Mr. Ramsey was a good and genuine order for the payment of £5. Mr. Ramsey gave evidence on behalf of the prosecution to the effect that the defendant on July 1, 1899, borrowed £2 from the witness: that on the following Wednesday (July 5) he gave the witness the cheque for £5, and the witness, believing the cheque to be a good one, gave in exchange his own cheque on the London City and Midland Bank for £3; that on presentation the defendant's cheque was returned marked N-S; and that when the witness took it to the defendant the latter expressed surprise, saying something about expecting money to have been paid in by some solicitors, and wrote out another cheque, which was returned similarly marked. Other evidence was given, which was to the effect that the defendant had an account at the Birkbeck Bank, but that the balance to his credit on July 5 was only 3s. 10d., and that no money had been paid into the account since March, 1896; that he was an undischarged bankrupt; and that £183 would be due to the defendant as commission upon the sale of an hotel, but that the hotel had not been sold. The defendant was acquitted on this indictment. He was tried on the following day on another indictment charging him with three similar offences—namely, that on July 6, 1899, he obtained 10s. from Mrs. B. L. Rawlings by falsely pretending that a cheque for £3 15s. 6d. drawn by him on the Birkbeck Bank was good, and that on June 24, 1899, and on June 26, 1899, he obtained the sums of £1 10s. and £2 respectively by falsely pretending that cheques for £1 10s. and £2 respectively were good. The evidence given by Mr. Ramsey in the trial of the former indictment was tendered by the prosecution, but was rejected by the Recorder on the ground that it would be unfair to the defendant to admit it. The jury, being unable to agree, were discharged, and the defendant was tried again on the same indictment at the following quarter sessions, held on January 8 of this year. The evidence of Mr. Ramsey was again tendered and pressed upon the Court, and was this time admitted and the defendant was convicted. But the Recorder reserved the question whether the evidence of Mr. Ramsey was properly admitted for the consideration of this Court.

Mr. J. Harris Stone and Mr. W. T. Lawrance appeared for the defendant; and Sir Sherston Baker for the prosecution.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in delivering judgment, said that the question here arose upon a case stated by the learned Recorder of Bath, before whom the accused was indicted for obtaining sums of money by false representations, by means of worthless cheques. The trial of the first of these charges took place on October 13, 1899. It appeared that on July 1, 1899, Ramsey lent the accused £2 and on the 5th asked him to return it. The accused then wrote out a cheque for £5 and asked Ramsey to cash it, and Ramsey, believing it to be all right, gave him his cheque for £3. The cheque for £5 was dishonoured. In May, 1899, the accused had been adjudicated bankrupt. He had kept an account at the Birkbeck Bank, but that account had been dead, although not closed, since March 31, 1896, nothing having been paid in or drawn out, and on July 5, 1899, his balance there was 3s. 10d. At the trial the accused said that he expected money to be paid into his banking account by a firm of solicitors. A member of the firm stated that the accused would have been entitled to some £183 commission on the sale of some property, but that the sale had not taken place. The accused was acquitted upon this particular charge. His acquittal may have proceeded upon the ground that the representation was not fraudulently made; or, if fraudulently made, that the prosecutor had not been induced by that fraud to part with his money. On the following day, October 14, the accused was again put upon his trial upon an indictment containing three distinct charges in three several counts, all for obtaining money by means of worthless cheques on the Birkbeck Bank—that is to say, on July 6 he obtained £3 15s. 6d. from Bertha Lucy Rawlings, on June 24 £1 10s. from W. H. Morris, and on June 26 a further sum of £2 from Morris. The jury were unable to agree upon their verdict, and the accused was again put upon his trial upon this indictment containing the three charges at the quarter sessions held in January, 1900. At this trial counsel for the prosecution pressed the Recorder to admit evidence of the fraud practised on Ramsey as relevant to the charges then before him and as negating any reasonable belief on the part of the accused that there was money at the bank to meet these other cheques or any of them. The evidence was, after discussion, admitted; and Ramsey made precisely the same statement he had made before upon the trial of the first indictment when the accused was acquitted. The only point for their present determination was whether that evidence was inadmissible by reason of the fact that it was given on a former trial on a charge of which he was acquitted. We all agree the evidence was not inadmissible on the grounds suggested in the case. It was clear that there was no estoppel; and the negating by the jury of the charge of fraud on the first occasion did not create an estoppel; nor was there any question arising upon the maxim Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto. The evidence was not less admissible because it tended to show the accused was, in fact, guilty of the former charge. The point was, was it relevant in support of the three subsequent charges? In the opinion of the majority of the Court, and in his Lordship's own opinion, it was relevant as showing a course of conduct on the part of the accused and a belief on his part that the cheques would not be met. The accused gave cheques on June 24 and 26 which were dishonoured, and, finally, a further dishonoured cheque on July 6, all three cheques having been drawn on the same bank as the first dishonoured cheque was drawn upon. It was impossible to say that all these facts were not relevant as showing an intention to defraud. The fact of the dishonour of the first cheque might, and perhaps ought to, have been capable of explanation, but it was impossible to say that it was not relevant. He (the Lord Chief Justice) had had the benefit of reading his brother Bruce's judgment, and had done so with great respect, as it differed in some respects from his own, and it appeared to him to go rather to the weight than to the admissibility of the evidence. In his opinion the conviction must be affirmed and the matter remitted to the learned Recorder to be dealt with by him in his discretion. His Lordship added that Mr. Justice Mathew concurred in the above judgment.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM said he would confine his remarks to what seemed to him to be the only legal question for their determination, and the only one argued before them. Whether or not evidence given against a prisoner on one charge on which he had been acquitted can be afterwards used against him on another charge, not for the purpose of again attempting to get him convicted of the offence of which he has been acquitted, but merely to prove guilt in his conduct on the second charge by reason of his conduct in the first case. In other words, to negative the suggestion of the innocence of his conduct in the matter which was the subject of the second charge by giving evidence of facts previously given on the first charge which disprove his suggestion of an innocent mind, and an innocent action, in the second case. Having compared the present case to that of a man uttering base coin, his Lordship said that the objection to the admissibility of the evidence had arisen, he thought, from an entire misapprehension of the principle Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto. That fundamental maxim of our criminal law meant that a man should not twice be put in peril for the same offence after a verdict had been returned by the jury, where the verdict had been given, it must be remembered, on a good indictment on which the prisoner could be legally convicted. How could it be said that this was the same offence as that on which he was acquitted? His Lordship referred to the cases of "Reg. v. Westwood" (4 C. and P., 547) and "Rex. v. Birchenough" (1 Moody's Crown Cases, 477), as supporting his view, and said the real test was, was the first charge the same as that on which the prisoner was being charged again, or was the evidence necessary to support the second indictment sufficient to prove a legal conviction on the first. If not, the evidence on the first charge could be used again because it was being used in a different case and on a different charge. For these reasons, in his judgment, their answer must be yes, the evidence was admissible.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE then read the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright who, after stating the facts, said the first question argued was whether on the trial of the indictment for obtaining money by a false pretence from Rawlings and Morris on June 24 and 26, and July 6, evidence was relevant which was admitted to show that on July 5 and 6, the prisoner was endeavouring by an exactly similar pretence to obtain money from Ramsey. He thought the question must be answered affirmatively. The evidence tended to show that the conduct of the prisoner in tendering drafts on a bank at which he had no living account was not inadvertent or accidental, but was part of a systematic fraud extending over a period immediately preceding and following the date of the offence charged, and the case in that respect seemed to him to be governed by "Reg. v. Francis" (L.R., 2 C.C., 128) and "Reg. v. Rhodes" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 77). The real question was whether this relevant evidence of the false pretence on July 5 and 6 ought to have been excluded on the ground that it was part of the evidence given for the prosecution at the former trial at which the prisoner was acquitted. He thought the objection as to the admissibility of the evidence was rightly overruled, because it was not shown that the jury at the first trial negated the making or the fraudulent character of the pretence charge at that trial. The offence charged was not alone the making of that false pretence, but was the making of it and the obtaining of the then prosecutor's money by means of it. The only possible ground of objection to the reception of the evidence, assuming it to be relevant, seemed to be that there was an estoppel of record or quasi of record. An objection in the nature of autrefois acquit could not, of course, be maintained, because on either indictment the prisoner could not have been convicted of the offences or any of them which were alleged in the other indictment. Nor could there be an estoppel of record or quasi of record unless it appeared by record of itself, or as explained by proper evidence, that the same point was determined in the first trial which was in issue in the second trial. But in this case the record of the first trial would show no more than a general verdict of not guilty. It would not show, nor would evidence be admissible to show, whether the jury acquitted on the ground that in their opinion the pretence was not false, or on the ground that though false it was not fraudulently made, or on the ground that the money was not thereby obtained from the prosecutor. The use at the subsequent trial of Ramsey's evidence was not an attempt to re-open the question of the prisoner's innocence of the charge on which he had been acquitted, or to defeat the immediate and direct object of the former acquittal of that charge. He therefore agreed with the majority of the Court that the conviction should be affirmed.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE, in delivering judgment dissenting from the majority of the Court, said that the real question for the jury on each of the counts which alleged a separate offence was whether the prisoner, at the time he passed the cheques in the counts mentioned, believed that the facts were such that the cheques would be met. They were not told in the case what was the nature of the evidence in support of any of the charges in the indictment, save that they were told that a witness, Harold F. Ramsey, gave the same evidence he had given on the trial of the prisoner on a former indictment. The question was whether such evidence was admissible, and it became a little difficult to decide that question without knowing what was the direct evidence offered in support of the charges upon which the prisoner was convicted and what was the nature of the defence raised. But it appeared to him that enough was stated to show that the evidence of Harold F. Ramsey was not admissible on the trial of the prisoner on the indictment on which he was convicted. They might assume that the three cheques mentioned in the second indictment were all passed on the dates mentioned in the indictment and were all dishonoured, and, further, that the defence on the second indictment was the same as on the first—namely, that the prisoner at the time when each cheque was passed believed that the cheque would be met. That would depend on the knowledge or belief of the prisoner as to the state of his banking account on the days in question. The question they were asked to consider was whether the statements of Ramsey, with reference to the issuing by the prisoner to him of a cheque on July 5, were relevant to the question affecting the prisoner's knowledge of the state of his banking account on June 24 and 26 and July 5. He did not think that the transactions of July 5 could reasonably be considered to have any bearing upon the prisoner's knowledge or belief as to the state of his banking account on June 24 and 26. They certainly had no direct bearing on these questions, and if they were admissible, they were so admissible on the ground that they fell within the rule which allowed in some cases evidence to be given of facts distinct from, but similar to, the facts on which a charge was based. It was important to bear in mind that this rule did not render it competent for the prosecution to adduce evidence tending to show that the accused had been guilty of criminal acts other than those covered by the indictment on which he stood charged for the purpose of leading to the conclusion that the accused was a person likely from his criminal conduct or character to have committed the offence for which he was being charged. His Lordship referred to the cases of "Reg. v. Oddy" (2 Den. C.C., 265) and "Reg. v. Holt" (Bell's C.C., 280) as illustrating this principle. He did not see how this latter case could be distinguished from the present. A line of cases had established the rule that when it becomes material to establish that an act charged in the indictment, and proved to have been done, was intentional and not accidental, evidence was admissible of similar acts done by the same person, having no direct bearing upon, or connexion with, the acts charged in the indictment save that the acts were similar and done by the same person. This rule was sometimes stated, he thought inaccurately, to be a rule which admitted indirect evidence of this class to prove guilty knowledge. He believed the evidence was admissible under this rule only on the ground that it tended to negative mistake or accident. His Lordship proceeded to give illustrations of this rule and referred to the language of Chief Justice Lord Coleridge in "Regina v. Francis" (L.R., 2 C.C., p. 181), cited with approval by Chief Justice Lord Russell in "Reg. v. Rhodes" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 77). In the present case there was no question of accident or mistake, the question was knowledge or no knowledge of the state of the banker's account, or of circumstances raising a belief in the mind of the prisoner respecting the state of his banker's account. Although there was a superficial resemblance between the act of pretending that a false coin was a genuine one and the act of pretending that a cheque was a valid cheque when it was not, there is a distinction between the two cases. The character of a coin is inherent in it and does not depend upon external circumstances, but in the case of a cheque, which was a genuine cheque (that is, signed by the person by whom it purported to be signed), the validity of the cheque depended upon the state of the banker's account, and upon arrangements made between the customer and the banker, which might vary from day to day and were in no way inherent in the cheque. The act of pretending that a genuine cheque is a valid one is in substance a pretence that circumstances exist at the time of the passing of the cheque which justify a belief that the cheque will be met. Such circumstances might exist on one day and not on another, and the fact that such circumstances exist or do not exist on one day have no necessary connexion with the question whether such circumstances exist or do not exist on another day. In other words, the successive acts of passing at different dates genuine cheques falsely pretending that they are valid are not necessarily successive acts of the same character, because the quality of each successive act depended upon the knowledge of the person passing the cheque of circumstances existing at the time external to the instrument itself and varying in character from day to day. Therefore he thought that indirect evidence, based upon transactions other than those charged in the indictment, were not admissible within the rule which permitted such evidence to be given to negative mistake or accident. He was also of opinion that the evidence of the transaction on July 5 was not admissible as evidence of a system of fraud. He thought, therefore, that the evidence of the transactions on July 5 was not admissible on any of the counts of the second indictment, and that the conviction should be quashed, and that even if the evidence of that transaction should be held to be admissible as bearing on the first count, yet, as it was admitted generally and the jury were not directed to consider that evidence in connexion with that count alone, he should still be of opinion that the conviction should be quashed. On the question whether, if Ramsey's evidence were admissible on other grounds, it ceased to be admissible on the ground that the defendant had been acquitted of the charge contained in the first indictment, though he entertained during the argument considerable doubt upon the subject, he was now of opinion that that objection could not be maintained. He had had the advantage of reading the judgments of Mr. Justice Wright and Mr. Justice Channell, and on this point he agreed with the opinions expressed by them.

MR. JUSTICE RIDLEY said he had had an opportunity of reading Mr. Justice Bruce's judgment, with which he agreed, and he did not think he could usefully add any judgment of his own.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that it appeared to him that this evidence of Ramsey's would certainly have been admissible in the first instance on the trial of the indictment on which the defendant was convicted, although in itself capable of sustaining another charge against him of a criminal offence—that is, had there not been a former trial in the course of which this evidence has already been given. He thought it was material, for it went some way to show that the defendant knew that he had no assets at the bank on which he gave the cheque, as this had already been brought to his notice in regard to another cheque given by him but a very short time before. This evidence had, however, been given at the first trial, and it was said that therefore it was not again admissible, on the grounds stated in the "case reserved." This was in effect to state that this case came within the rule Nemo debet bis puniri pro uno delicto a rule which applied equally in civil actions under the form Nemo bis vexari debet pro eadem causa. This rule was the foundation of the pleas in bar known as autrefois acquit and autrefois convict. To the indictment on which the defendant was convicted it would not have availed him to plead either of those pleas and to have supported them by evidence in the trial in Ramsey's case. Had only the evidence given on the trial in Ramsey's case been given on the trial of this indictment there would have been no evidence to go to the jury, for there would have been none of the giving of the cheque, or making the false pretences, charged as a crime by this indictment. It seemed to him, therefore, that by the admission of this evidence the defendant was not in reprobis, for he felt sure that those words were not to be understood as meaning that a man is not to be more than once annoyed by the same evidence. He thought they meant that he was not to be by legal process twice exposed to the risk of being found guilty of the same crime or the same tort, or liable twice to pay the same debt be it to the State or his fellow citizens. To hold otherwise seemed to him to rule that evidence which had been given once should never be produced again against the same defendant; yet it was plain that up "to a certain point" the evidence must often be the same, although the defendant was accused of wrongs done to two distinct persons and that in different suits or forensic proceedings. It seemed to him impossible to say that the evidence was irrelevant to the issue, and, as a matter of law, he was of opinion that the evidence of Ramsey was admissible.

MR. JUSTICE CHANNELL said it was an elementary principle of criminal law that a prisoner could only be convicted on a criminal charge by evidence bearing directly on that charge, and that it was inadmissible to endeavour to support the charge by showing that the prisoner had committed other similar offences, and was therefore likely to have committed the one with which he was charged. He knew of no exceptions to that rule; but nevertheless there were cases where evidence of transactions other than those the subject of the indictment could be given, because those transactions had a direct bearing upon one of the questions at issue on the trial of the particular indictment. Where the proof of an offence involved the proof of such matters as intent to defraud, or guilty knowledge, or the like, the evidence of other transactions was often the only evidence by which that essential part of the offence could be proved. In such cases evidence of other transactions was admitted, not for the purpose of showing that the prisoner committed the other offences, but for the purpose of showing that the transaction the subject of the indictment was done with the intent to defraud, or with guilty knowledge, as the case might be. It seemed to him to be a mistake to say that if the other transactions have been the subject of an indictment the prisoner is being twice vexed for the same matter by the proof of them on a subsequent indictment being allowed. His Lordship, having cited the case of a man passing counterfeit coins as an illustration in point, said the objection in the present case was to the evidence of Ramsey. The mere fact that he had given evidence in the case in which the prisoner had been acquitted of course did not make his evidence inadmissible. No one suggested that the evidence of the banker's clerk, the solicitor, and the trustee in bankruptcy, given also in the former case, was inadmissible. If the evidence of Ramsey was wanted to show that the prisoner had committed a fraud on Ramsey, that act being the fraud for which he was indicted, it would be inadmissible; but it was not wanted for that purpose but to show if possible that frauds were committed on Rawlings and Morris. Its admissibility, in his opinion, depended solely on whether it was relevant for that purpose, and upon the question of relevancy he concurred in the judgment of the majority of the Court.

Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, M.R., } 1900.
Rigby and Collins, L.JJ.) } July 2.

ISAACS V. EVANS.*

Practice—Non-suit—Non-suit on counsel's opening.

A plaintiff should not be non-suited on his counsel's opening except by the consent of his counsel.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Farwell's, reported ante, p. 113. The appeal raised an important question of procedure—viz., as to the circumstances which will justify a Judge at the trial of an action in deciding the case upon a preliminary question of law without hearing the evidence.

The action related to an alleged partnership in a gold mine in Wales. One of the plaintiffs, Thomas Evans, alleged that he and the defendant, Meredith Evans, had had several transactions together as partners in joint adventures in relation to gold-mining properties in Wales, and that in the month of April, 1898, they determined to acquire a certain property at Garthgell, in Merioneth, with a view to mining for gold. The owner of the property was one John Vaughan, and the plaintiff Evans alleged that he and the defendant arranged with him for the grant of a lease to the defendant on behalf of himself and the plaintiff Evans, and such lease was accordingly granted, and further, that a Crown licence was granted to the defendant on behalf of himself and the plaintiff Evans. The defendant had worked the mine since the date of the lease and the licence. In November, 1898, the plaintiff Evans assigned to the other plaintiff, Godfrey P. Isaacs, his moiety of the term, with rights and powers under the said lease and licence. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendant had refused to recognise their title or interest, and that he wrongfully claimed to be himself fully entitled to all the benefit arising under the said lease and licence. They accordingly claimed 1 a declaration that the defendant is a trustee of one moiety of the property at Garthgell for the plaintiffs or one of them; 2) an account; (3) an injunction. The defendant denied the existence of a partnership, and pleaded the Statute of Frauds. In reply, the plaintiffs set up acts which they alleged to be part performance of the partnership agreement. When the case was opened on behalf of the plaintiffs, Mr. Justice Farwell intimated that he would first deal with the question arising under the statute. The plaintiffs' counsel desired to go into the evidence before the question of law was determined, but the learned Judge declined to adopt that course; and at the conclusion of the opening he decided against the plaintiffs without hearing counsel for the defendant. Upon the Statute of Frauds the main contention of the plaintiffs was that the alleged contract was a partnership contract which might be proved by parol evidence, notwithstanding that the subject-matter of the contract was land and that the statute required that any contract for the sale of lands, or any interest therein, should be evidenced in writing; and reliance was placed upon "Forster v. Hale" (5 Ves., 308) and "Dale v. Hamilton" 5 Hal., 369. The learned Judge, however, held that the statute applied. In his opinion it was clear upon the cases that before evidence could be admitted as to the contract it must be shown that there was an actually subsisting partnership. Otherwise it would always be possible to evade the statute by pleading a partnership. He thought that the case of "Carriek v. Sandmore" 2 De G. and J., 161 was directly in point. He, therefore, dismissed the action with costs. The plaintiffs appealed.

*Reported by H. B. HEWING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

E. Ford were for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. Ingle Joyce for the defendant.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the learned Judge had decided this case upon a preliminary discussion arising out of the opening of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs. Inasmuch as he (the Master of the Rolls) thought that there were not sufficient materials before the Court to enable it to determine the case and that there must be a further inquiry, he would, in accordance with the usual practice, abstain from saying anything upon the questions which had been raised since it might embarrass the parties upon the further inquiry. He would only say this, that, there being here three questions to be determined—viz., as to what the agreement was, whether there had been part performance of it, and what were the rights of the rights of the plaintiffs and the defendant—he did not think that the Court could deal with those questions without hearing the evidence. He would have had more hesitation in adopting this course but for the decision of the Court of Appeal in “Fletcher v. London and North-Western Railway Company” ([1892] 1 Q.B., 122); and his hesitation arose from the fact that in his own personal experience he had known many cases in which the plaintiff had been non-suited. But he thought that it would not conduce to expedition if a preliminary judgment was to be given upon an assumed state of facts in a case where there was any dispute as to the real facts, and in all cases there ought to be the consent of the plaintiffs’ counsel to that procedure. It was not possible to say in this case that there had been any such consent, and it was for that reason that he was pressed with the decision of the Court of Appeal in “Fletcher v. London and North-Western Railway Company.” In that case the Court laid it down broadly that, except by the consent of the plaintiff’s counsel, a plaintiff ought not to be non-suited without the evidence being heard. Where that consent was given it might fairly be assumed that the plaintiff was satisfied with the facts as stated in the opening. This case must therefore be remitted for trial.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY agreed. He was not sorry to be bound by the rule laid down in “Fletcher v. London and North-Western Railway Company.” In his opinion, as a general rule, the time that was wasted in discussions whether the witnesses should be called and the almost inevitable disputes that arose when the evidence had not been given, more than counterbalanced any advantage to be gained by deciding a case at the trial upon a preliminary point of law.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS said that “Fletcher v. London and North-Western Railway Company” came as somewhat of a surprise to the profession, but it was a decision of the Court of Appeal and their Lordships were bound by it. Speaking for himself, where a case was tried before a Judge without a jury and the counsel for the plaintiff had, as he might be trusted to do, stated his case up to the very high-water mark of what he was able to prove and the Judge was against him, he thought it would be a waste of public time to hear the evidence. It was, however, improbable that counsel would often insist upon the evidence being heard when the result must be the same as upon his opening statement. He regretted the delay which would result in this case.

PRICE AND PIERCE V. MARITIME INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Insurance—Marine—Subject-matter of insurance —“Advances”—Construction of policy.

*Reported by F. O. ROBINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment. Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—This action is brought to recover a total loss on a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants. The question is whether there has been a total loss within the meaning of the policy. The facts were as follows:—In December, 1898, the Italian ship Cinque was loading at Pensacola for a voyage thence to Southampton. The master required money for his disbursements, and he borrowed the amount from the plaintiffs, who took from the master a document which for the purposes of this case may be called a promissory note. The note is in the following terms:—“£760 12s. 9d. stg. Pensacola, Fla., Dec. 30, 1898. Ten days after arrival at port of destination of the steel bk. called Cinque, of which I am the master, now lying at Pensacola, Fla., loaded with P.P. sawn timber and lumber, and ready to sail for Southampton, I promise to pay to the order of myself the sum of £760 12s. 9d. British sterling in approved bankers’ demand bills in London value received for necessary disbursements of my vessel at this port, for the payment of which I hereby pledge my vessel and freight, and my consignees at the port of destination are hereby directed to pay the amount of this obligation from the first amount of freight received for account of my said vessel, any other draft or obligation by me drawn at this port on said freight to be secondary to this. Signed in duplicate, one being accomplished, the others to stand void. COMMOSA RITTORI, Master of the Steel Bk. Cinque.” The effect of this transaction was to vest in the plaintiffs an insurable interest in the vessel and her freight, and the plaintiffs thereupon effected the policy sued on. It is a policy at and from Pensacola to Southampton, the subject-matter of the insurances being “advances valued £775,” the risks are described in the customary way, and the insurance is against total loss only. The vessel proceeded on her voyage, but she never reached her destination. In February, 1899, she ran ashore at the Azores and became a total wreck. The cargo was discharged, and the holder of the bill of lading obtained possession of it upon payment of £790, being freight pro rata itineris. By Italian law, subject to which the contract of affreightment had been made, such freight was in the circumstances payable. The question is whether, having regard to this payment, there can be said to have been a total loss within the meaning of the policy. The question, in my opinion, subdivides itself into two,—First, what was the real subject-matter of the insurance? Secondly, was that subject-matter totally lost? Each is question of fact rather than of law. Now, in my opinion the only interest which the plaintiffs had consisted of a charge on the vessel and her freight to secure the payment of their advances. When the ship went to sea that security, and nothing else, was in peril, and that security alone could form the subject of an insurance. The words “advances valued £775” in the policy mean, therefore, the interest in ship and freight which the plaintiffs held as security for the loan they had made. It is said on behalf of the plaintiffs that that is not the subject-matter of the insurance, and that what the defendants underwrote was the risk of the ship’s never arriving at Southampton, and in support of this contention it is pointed out that, by the terms of the promissory note, the loan is only repayable after the arrival of the ship at Southampton; and it is suggested that the non-arrival of the ship involves a total loss of the plaintiffs’ money. But the answer to this contention is plain. First, no such risk as that suggested can be found described in the policy; the word “advances” is quite inapplicable to it. Again, I doubt whether a man can create in himself an insurable interest by merely agreeing with his debtor that the debt due to him shall only be payable on the arrival of a ship. He must have some interest in the ship, her freight, or her cargo—some interest in the property in peril. A man may be largely interested in the arrival of a ship and yet have no insurable interest in her—as where the ship is bringing goods to a market where the man deals, which, when they arrive, he can buy and so fulfil his contracts and thereby save himself from loss. Further, I do not see what the underwriters have to do with the terms of the promissory note; they were no parties to it and knew nothing of it. And, lastly, I doubt whether the non-arrival of the ship would afford any answer to a claim against the shipowners for repayment of the loan. It is the master who protects himself by the words “ten days after arrival,” not the shipowners. The latter are by the note directed to pay the amount of the loan “from the first amount of freight received.” I think the defendants’ definition of the subject-matter of the insurance is the right one, and not the plaintiffs’. Then the question remains—Was that subject-matter (the charge on the ship and freight) wholly lost? I think not. The plaintiffs say it was, because the ship was lost and because the only freight pledged to them was, as they say, the freight payable at Southampton, which was also lost. No doubt the ship was lost; but was the freight? I think not. The plaintiffs did not merely get a charge on the freight payable at Southampton; they got a charge on all the freight the ship might earn on the insured voyage. The terms of the promissory note show that to be so; and, inasmuch as the ship earned £790, which was paid to her owners at the Azores, there has been no total loss of the subject-matter of the insurance.

GALLIERS AND OTHERS V. BYCROFT AND ANOTHER.*

Privy Council Appeals—Natal—Will—Construction—Substitution—Direct substitution—Fideicommissum.

This was an appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Natal of December 1, 1898.

The Hon. J. W. Leonard, Q.C. (of the Cape Bar), appeared for the appellants; Mr. Israel Davis for the respondents.

SIR HENRY DE VILLIERS, in giving their Lordships’ judgment, said the will which their Lordships were called upon to construe was executed in Natal, but the testator, William Galliers, sen., was an Englishman who had married in England before he settled in Natal. The will was in English in the following terms:—“I give and bequeath all and singular my real and personal estate . . . unto my dear wife Matilda Galliers (born Sabin) for the use and benefit of herself and my children during her lifetime, and after her decease I direct that the same may be equally divided among my children or such of them as may be then alive.” The testator died in 1864, leaving him surviving his wife, one son, and three daughters. The son, William Galliers, jun., died in 1875, after executing a will by which he bequeathed all his property to his wife Fanny Galliers. He left him surviving his wife and one son, William

Elton Galliers. The wife of the testator (William Galliers, sen.) died in 1897 leaving her surviving her three daughters already mentioned and her grandson, William Elton Galliers. The executors of William Galliers, sen., thereafter awarded the whole of the estate to the three daughters. Objections were filed against the distribution on behalf of the widow and the son of William Galliers, jun., they claiming to be entitled to share in the distribution of the estate. The Supreme Court, by its order, the Chief Justice dissenting, directed the executor “to frame and file an amended account so as to include in it William Elton Galliers, jun., as taking his father’s share in the capital of the estate of William Galliers, sen., and also his father’s share of the income of that estate from the date of the death of the widow of William Galliers, sen.” Against that judgment the three daughters had appealed. The widow of William Galliers, jun., had joined her son in supporting the judgment, but she claimed that, if her son should be held not to be entitled to his father’s share, she, as the sole heiress under her husband’s will, was entitled to it. The ground upon which a majority of the Natal Supreme Court supported the claim of the testator’s grandson was “that the law of Natal (differing in this respect from English law, but following Roman law) applies to cases of the present kind a rule of construction that where a parent has appointed children (or remoter descendants) as heirs and directed that upon their death their share should go over either to a stranger or to another child, then the going over or substitution is subject to the tacit condition implied by law that the deceased child left no issue.” That statement of the rule, if confined to the case of fideicommissary substitutions, appeared to their Lordships to be a fair deduction from the Roman and Dutch authorities on the subject. The rule had its origin in a response given by Papinian and quoted in the “Digest” (35, 1, 102) as follows:—“A grandfather having instituted as his heirs a son and a grandson born of another son requested the grandson, if he should die within his 30th year, to restore the inheritance to his uncle. The grandson died within the age mentioned leaving children. From a conjecture of dutiful conduct I answered that the condition of fideicommissum had failed because it would be found that less had been written than spoken.” It was obvious that in that brief opinion Papinian was not referring to the case of a direct or ordinary substitution—that was to say, the substitution of the son on failure of the grandson to take under the will—but to the case of a fideicommissary substitution, that was to say, the substitution of the son for the grandson by virtue of a trust imposed on the latter to restore the inheritance on the happening of a certain event after he had entered on it. The term fideicommissum, used by Papinian, would not be applicable to a direct substitution, nor would the grandson be requested or able to restore (restituere) an inheritance which he had never entered upon. The law relating to fideicommissa had been fully developed in his time, and it was a very common practice for Roman testators in creating such trusts to make them conditional upon the fiduciary heir dying without children. Papinian held in effect that that condition si sine liberis decesserit should be read into every will whereby the burden of fideicommissum was imposed on a grandchild of the testator. The authority of Papinian stood so high that the response was accepted as law, and it was confirmed by two Imperial rescripts quoted in the code (6, 25, 6, and 6, 42, 30), which extended the application of the rule to the case in which descendants of whatever degree were burdened with fideicommissum and even to the case of natural children who were so burdened. The terms of both rescripts clearly showed that the condition si sine liberis was intended to be read only into wills by which fideicommissa were created. None of the Dutch Commentators on the Digest or the Code who were cited in the judgment of the Court below had extended the rule any further. Voet (36, 1, 17, et seq.), Peresius, Wissenbach, and Strykius treated the matter as part of the law relating to fideicommissary dispositions, and all the illustrations given by them were cases of fideicommissary substitution. Bruneman, in his Commentary on the cited passage of the Digest, confined the rule to fideicommissary substitutions and, in his Commentary on the Code (6, 42, 30), he expressly stated on the authority of Peregrinus (de fideicommissis) and other writers that the condition was not implied in the case of ordinary substitution unless the instituted heir was also burdened with a fideicommissum in favour of the substituted heir. Burge, in his Commentaries (vol. 2, p. 109) said:—"The condition si sine liberis is in certain cases implied when it has not been expressed. If a father or grandfather institute his son or grandson, who at the time has no children, with a fideicommissum to restore the inheritance to a third person, this condition si sine liberis is implied." He then proceeded, following Voet, to specify the limitations upon the rule of construction thus broadly stated, and he treated the matter as falling entirely under the law relating to fideicommissary substitutions. No decision of any Court administering the Roman-Dutch law had been cited to show that the condition had ever been implied in the case of a will under which the heir or legatee, if he took his inheritance or bequest at all, would take it free from any trust or burden. The case of Mylne (1 Natal Law Reports, p. 88), which was mainly relied upon by the Court below, was treated by the Court, which decided it as one of fideicommissary substitution. The testator in that case bequeathed the annual proceeds of his estate to the children of his daughter Jessie, who had been first married to one Robertson and then to one Tollner. The will then proceeded thus:—"In the event of any one of these my heirs dying, whether of the Robertson or Tollner families, the dividend or share of the deceased shall revert to and be paid to the survivors of that family to which the deceased belonged." After the death of the testator the children of Jessie received the annual proceeds and two of them claimed payment of the corpus of the estate free from any limitation over, but Chief Justice Connor decided that they were not entitled to succeed on the distinct ground that the substitution was intended to apply after as well as before they had entered on their inheritance. So far as the substitution was intended to take effect after the testator's death, it was clearly fideicommissary, for the children of Jessie were mentioned as "heirs" whose shares on their death should "revert" to the survivors of their respective families. That being so the condition si sine liberis was read into the will, but, as it could not be known until the applicants' death whether they would die without issue, the Court refused to order the payment to them of the corpus of their shares as their absolute property. The case, therefore, was no authority for the proposition that the condition si sine liberis could legally be read into a will which merely substituted one heir or legatee for another in the event of the instituted heir or legatee not entering on the inheritance or legacy. By the will now in question the testator, after giving a life interest in his estate to his wife for the benefit of herself and his children, directed that after her decease the estate should be equally divided among his children or such of them as might then be alive. The effect of that direction was virtually to institute the children as heirs on the death of their mother and to substitute the survivors for such of the children as might die before their mother. It was a case, therefore, of direct and not of fideicommissary substitution. The children were not requested to part with their inheritance after they had once entered on it, and consequently those who survived their mother took their inheritance free from any burden. Those who died before their mother entered upon no inheritance and possessed nothing to restore. Their Lordships' attention had, however, been called to the English case of "Sturges v. Pearson" (4 Mad., 411), in which it was held that a bequest to several or to a class, "or" to such of them as shall be living at a given period, should be construed as a vested gift to all subject to be divested in favour of those living at that period, and that, consequently, if none were then living all were held to take. Their Lordships were not aware that that doctrine of vesting and divesting had ever been adopted in the Roman or the Dutch law, but, assuming that it had been so adopted, such a vesting and divesting would be a very different matter from the aditio and restitutio by an heir or legatee under a fideicommissary substitution. If William Galliers, jun., had survived his mother his inheritance would, under the will, have belonged to him absolutely. Having died before her he acquired nothing in respect of which a fideicommissum could be imposed on him. The will itself was free from ambiguity and contained no indication of any desire on the testator's part to benefit his grandchildren in preference to his surviving children, and the question to be determined was whether this was a case in which a Court administering the Dutch law could legally supply the omission of a supposed natural duty. To read into a will words which the testator had not used, to presume an intention which the testator had not expressed, could only be justified by a positive rule of construction having the force of law. Such a rule could not now be extended beyond the special circumstances to which the law originally confined it, even although the reason which led to the introduction of the rule might be applicable to other circumstances also. It was said that the principle underlying the rule of construction now under consideration was that the testator must be presumed to have overlooked the contingency of his instituted children or other descendants having issue. That principle would, no doubt, also be applicable to the case of direct substitution, but it would be equally applicable to many other cases than that of substitution, whether direct or indirect. The text of the Roman law had applied the rule of construction only to fideicommissa, no text writer or decided case under the Dutch law had extended it any further, and those commentators who discussed the question whether the rule should be extended to wills which contained no fideicommissary substitution answered the question in the negative. Their Lordships were therefore unable to agree with the majority in the Court below that the rule should be applied to the construction of the will now in question. It was not implied in that decision that the application of the conditio si sine liberis to direct legacies to children with a substitution had been an illegitimate extension of the principle by those Courts of law (as in Scotland) which had derived it from the Roman law, and their Lordships recognized the strength of the reasoning by which that extension was justified. It was enough for the decision of the present case to say that the Roman-Dutch law had not so proceeded, and it was for their Lordships to apply the law as it stood. But another rule of construction, bearing a close resemblance to the one just considered, had been called in aid by the respondents and it was this, that where a testator conferred benefits by will on his "children" he must be presumed to have intended to include under that term all other descendants. The reason for that supposed rule was variously stated, and one of the grounds on which it was supported was the extreme improbability that the testator would have omitted to mention other descendants if he had thought of them. It was clear, however, from the reasoning of Voet (36, 1, 22) that in his time, at all events, no such hard and fast rule of construction was recognized. The conclusion at which he arrived was that the word "kinderen," which was the Dutch equivalent for "liberi" and for "children," must prima facie be taken to refer to descendants of the first degree, but that, if it could be gathered from the context of the will or from other circumstances that the testator had regard to descendants of a remoter degree, the word should be construed as having such wider signification. He added that the question in each case was not one of law but rather of intention. It appeared from later authorities that in the case of a bequest to the testator's own "children" the Courts of Holland required much slighter evidence of a desire to benefit further descendants than in the case of a bequest to the children of another person. It was difficult to find in the terms of the short will now under consideration such an indication of a desire to benefit the children of the testator's children as to justify their Lordships in giving to the term "children" the wider signification contended for. The Judges in the Court below held the same view, and moreover relied upon the case of "Martin v. Lee" (14 Moore P.C.C., 142), which was decided by their Lordships' Board on appeal from Lower Canada. There the testatrix, a married woman, domiciled in Lower Canada, had made a will in the English language. By the will she devised her estate to her husband for his life and after his decease to her children living at the time of her decease. One of her children predeceased her, leaving a child who was held by the Court of Lower Canada to be entitled to take under the will on the ground that the term "children" included grandchildren. Their Lordships, however, held that, upon the true construction of the will, the intention of the testatrix was to restrict the gift to her children, which intention countervailed the general force given by the law of Lower Canada to the word "enfants." Their Lordships added that it might well be that the will "having been written in the English language the proper mode of dealing with the case may have been for the Courts in Canada to ascertain what, according to the English law, was the meaning of the word 'children' as used in the will." The point was not decided, nor was it necessary for their Lordships now to decide it, seeing that, in their opinion, the children of the testator's children would not have been included in the word "kinderen" even if the will had been in the Dutch language and that word had been employed. In regard to the respondent Mrs. Rycroft, she claimed to be entitled, as sole testamentary heiress of William Galliers, jun., to his share of the estate in case his son should fail in his claim. Their Lordships, however, fully agreed with the Judges of the Natal Court that the words in the will "or such of them as may then be alive" prevented such a vesting of the inheritance in any child dying before his or her mother as would make the inheritance transmissible to his or her heirs. It was only in the event of William Galliers, jun., dying after his mother that Mrs. Rycroft would have been entitled to his share of the inheritance—as he died before his mother, his sisters, being the persons substituted for him under their father's will, were entitled to the share which he would otherwise have taken. The result was that in their Lordships' opinion the judgment proposed by the learned Chief Justice was right, and they would humbly advise her Majesty to allow the appeal, to disallow the objections to the distribution, and to order that the cost of all parties in the Court below be paid out of the estate of William Galliers, senr. The cost of all parties on appeal would also be paid out of the estate.

IBEDALE AND PORTER V. THE CHINA TRADERS INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Insurance—Marine—General average—Loss of freight.

Held, that freight had not been lost in such circumstances as to make the loss the subject of general average contribution.

Decision of Bigham, J. (15 The Times L.R., 460) affirmed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham at the trial of the action, without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L. R., 460; 4 Com. Cas., 256; [1899] 2 Q.B., 356. The action was brought to recover for a total loss under a policy of insurance on freight by the ship Lodore.

The parties agreed to the following statement of facts:—1. The plaintiffs own the iron ship Lodore, and by charter, dated February 10, 1897, chartered her to load coals at Cardiff for Esquimalt at 19s. 9d. per ton delivered. By a policy, dated March 3, 1897, they insured the chartered freight thereunder, valued at £1,650, with the defendants, against, inter alia, loss by fire and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid freight. 2. The Lodore proceeded to Cardiff, and there loaded a full cargo of coals and sailed on March 29, 1897, on the insured voyage. On May 26, 1897, the coals began to heat, and the master decided, for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo, to jettison cargo, and to bear up for the River Plate. About 40 tons were jettisoned and the Lodore subsequently anchored in Buenos Ayres Roads on May 29, 1897. Between that date and June 25, 1897, cargo was from time to time discharged, and various surveys were held upon the coals, and it was found that the coals continued hot and would heat still further if the voyage was proceeded with. Accordingly, on June 25, 1897, the coals were condemned, and were ultimately sold. The vessel abandoned her voyage to Esquimalt and returned to the United Kingdom with another cargo, and the chartered freight was totally lost. 3. It was necessary for the safety of the whole adventure for the vessel to put into Buenos Ayres as aforesaid, and it was reasonably certain that, if she had continued on her direct voyage, the temperature of the coal would have continued to rise until spontaneous combustion ensued, and that, had she so continued her voyage, the ship and cargo would have been destroyed by fire before reaching Esquimalt. When and while she was at Buenos Ayres, the ship and her cargo, both the portion landed and the portion remaining on board, were in safety, but after she reached Buenos Ayres no part of the cargo could have been reloaded and (or) carried with safety to Esquimalt in the same or another bottom, and it was all necessarily and properly sold at Buenos Ayres. 4. The policy and charterparty, the protest, dated August 11, 1897, and the average statement, dated March 15, 1898, with the survey reports as therein set out, may be referred to as parts of this special case. 5. This action, in the defence to which all underwriters interested similarly to the defendants concur, is defended to test the question whether by way of set-off and deduction from the total loss on the policy, which is admitted, the defendants are entitled to have the said loss of freight made good in general average to any and what extent, and to deduct the contribution to the same falling on the plaintiffs as ship-owners from the amount due on the policy. 6. It is not intended to allege or rely on improper condition of cargo as a defence to any claim there may be. 7. The Court is to have power to draw all necessary inferences of fact, and the parties agree to leave the adjustment of figures, on such principle as may be laid down, to Mr. F. C. Danson, of Liverpool, average adjuster. The learned Judge held that at the time the master abandoned the voyage the freight was hopelessly lost and could not, therefore, be said to be sacrificed at all. The plaintiffs were, therefore, not liable to make good any part of the loss in general average contribution. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the defendants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiffs.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the judgment of the Court as follows:—This is an action by shipowners upon a policy of marine insurance by which the defendants underwrote for the plaintiffs the chartered freight of coals, valued at £1,650, upon a voyage from Cardiff to Esquimalt in the plaintiffs' ship Lodore, and the perils insured against were "loss by fire and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid freight." It is not disputed by the defendants that the chartered freight was lost by reason of the perils insured against within the meaning of the policy ("The Knight of St. Michael" [1893], p. 30), and that for this loss the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs. But the defendants contend that upon the facts of this case there has been a general average loss which is the subject of a general average contribution payable by the plaintiffs, and that for the amount of this contribution the defendants are entitled to have credit given to them when they pay to the plaintiffs the amount recoverable under the policy. The question argued before us is whether as regards the coal, upon the delivery of which at Esquimalt the freight would have become payable, there has been a general average sacrifice which would form the subject of a general average contribution, and, as this was the only point taken or argued, I pass on without observing upon the form in which the question is raised. My brother Bigham has held that the defendants' contention is ill-founded, and they appeal. It has long since been established that to constitute a general average loss so as to be the subject of a general average contribution two things at least must co-exist—(a) there must be an intentional sacrifice of part of the ship or cargo, or a voluntary expenditure for the benefit of the ship and cargo; (b) that such sacrifice or expenditure must be made at the time when a common danger to ship and cargo existed, for when the common danger has ceased there can be no sacrifice or expenditure that can be the subject of a general average contribution. Lord Justice Bowen in "Svensden v. Wallace" (13 Q.B.D., 69, at p. 84) thus expresses himself as to what constitutes a general average sacrifice. He says:—"It is essential at the outset to bear in mind two things—the nature of every general average sacrifice, and the object of every general average contribution. A general average sacrifice is an extraordinary sacrifice voluntarily made in the hour of peril for the common preservation of ship and cargo. . . . The sacrifice" must be "made for the common safety in a time of danger." What the learned Lord Justice here says about a general average sacrifice is only what will be found laid down in many cases and stated in the text-books of authority, though clothed in different language. We have nothing in this case to do with any expenditure, for it is not suggested that there has been any. What we have to consider is whether there has been a general average sacrifice of cargo, so as to be the subject of a general average contribution by the owner of ship and freight. It is said by the defendants that there was a general average sacrifice of the coal when the ship turned off her course and bore up to the River Plate, followed, as it was, by an abandonment of the voyage after the ship arrived at Buenos Ayres. To appreciate this argument it seems to me important to consider—first, the position of matters and what took place when the captain of the ship determined to bear up for the River Plate; and, secondly, what took place after the ship's arrival there. The admitted facts are that upon May 26, 1897, when the ship was on her voyage from Cardiff to Esquimalt, the coals began to heat and the master decided "for the safety of the ship, freight, and cargo to bear up for the River Plate." I leave out of consideration the 40 tons of cargo which were jettisoned, for no question now arises thereon. I do not doubt that the bearing up under the circumstances above mentioned for the River Plate was a general average act, which would have given rise to a general average contribution if, in consequence of such act, any expenses or loss to the cargo were thereby occasioned. But no question of expenses arises, for none were incurred, and there was no loss to the cargo thereby occasioned. In these circumstances how can it be said that the bearing up for the River Plate was a general average sacrifice as regards the cargo, so as to be the subject of a general average contribution? No part of the cargo was in fact sacrificed, and a fortiori there was no general average sacrifice so as to be the subject of a general average contribution. Mr. Carver argued that the voyage was abandoned when the captain decided to bear up for the River Plate, but in my judgment it clearly was not. The master bore up for the River Plate and went into Buenos Ayres for the purpose, if possible, of continuing the voyage after he had got the cargo in order. He did not bear up for the River Plate for the purpose of abandoning the voyage. That was wholly foreign to his purpose. The bearing up for the River Plate was no abandonment of the voyage at all, and it is wholly erroneous to say that it was. Now the ship with the coals on board—other than those jettisoned—arrived at Buenos Ayres on May 29, 1897, and remained there till June 25, 1897, on which day the coals were condemned and ultimately sold. The admission is that "when and while the ship was at Buenos Ayres the ship and her cargo were in safety." The sale of the cargo, which in my opinion constituted the abandonment of the voyage, was not a general average sacrifice which forms the subject of a general average contribution, for the common danger had ceased, and the ship and cargo had then been in safety for about a month. The suggestion that the sale of the coal at Buenos Ayres was made for the common safety of ship and cargo to enable the vessel to bring her voyage and the common adventure to a successful issue will not assist the defendants, for, as was pointed out by Lord Justice Bowen in "Svensden v. Wallace" (at p. 85), a sacrifice for the safety of the common adventure does not constitute a general average sacrifice according to the law of England; nor, indeed, did Mr. Carver argue that it did. What he argued was that there had been a general average sacrifice of cargo when the ship bore up for Buenos Ayres, and at that time there was a common danger. I agree that then there was a common danger, but then there was no sacrifice of cargo. I am of opinion that there has been no general average sacrifice in this case, and consequently the right to a general average contribution never arose, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs. I agree with Mr. Justice Bigham's inference of fact that at Buenos Ayres the coal was hopelessly lost.

No. 30.—VOL. XVI.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Vaughan } 1900.
Williams, and Romer, L.J.J.) } July 2.

Practice—Pleading—Statement of claim—Causes of action—Joinder.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Bucknill's reversing an order of a Master striking out the plaintiff's statement of claim unless amended within seven days. The defendants were James Browne Martin, Gilbert Pitcairn Simpson, George Wreford, Edward C. Robson Rose, William James Cousins, Arthur Burr, Henry Thomas Potter, and Harcourt Willoughby Marley. The defendants Cousins, Burr, Potter, and Marley were the promoters of the plaintiff company. The defendants Martin, Simpson, Wreford, and Rose were directors of the plaintiff company. The statement of claim alleged that all the defendants had been guilty of a conspiracy to defraud, in pursuance of which they had carried out certain purchases, loans, and other transactions. The statement of claim further alleged, alternatively, that the defendants who were directors, in carrying out the said purchases, loans, and other transactions, had acted negligently and recklessly, and in breach of their duty as directors. The defendants took out a summons at Chambers asking that the statement of claim might be struck out, on the ground that a tort alleged against all the defendants could not properly be joined in the same statement of claim with a separate tort alleged against some of them. The Master, thinking that the case was governed by "Gower v. Couldridge" ([1898] 1 Q.B., 348), made an order that the statement of claim should be struck out unless amended within seven days. Mr. Justice Bucknill, thinking that the case was governed by "Frankenburg v. Great Horseless Carriage Co." ([1900] 1 Q.B., 504), reversed the order of the Master. The defendants Martin and Simpson appealed.

Mr. Stewart-Smith (Mr. Robson, Q.C., with him) appeared for the appellants; Mr. R. A. McCall, Q.C., and Mr. J. Austen-Cartmell, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the decision of the learned Judge was right. The action was brought by a company against two sets of individuals—viz., the promoters of the company and the directors. The statement of claim alleged, as to both the promoters and the directors, that was to say, as to all the defendants, that they had been guilty of a fraudulent conspiracy, in pursuance of which they had carried out certain purchases, loans, and other transactions, whereby the plaintiffs had been damaged. It then went on to allege that the directors in carrying out the said purchases, loans, and other transactions had acted negligently, recklessly, and in breach of their duty as directors. It was argued that, according to the case of "Gower v. Couldridge," the two allegations ought not to be allowed to stand in the same statement of claim. But in his opinion the present case was not governed by "Gower v. Couldridge." In that case there were three defendants, as to two of whom three separate causes of action were alleged, while as to the third only two causes of action were alleged. It was held that the two causes of action against the third defendant could not be joined in the same statement of claim with the three causes of action against the two defendants. In the present case the allegation was that there was a cause of action for conspiracy against all the defendants, and then as regards the same cause of action it was alleged that the defendants who were directors were guilty of breach of duty as directors. In his opinion the statement of claim ought not to be struck out, but ought to be allowed to stand. Neither did he see any reason why the Court in the exercise of its discretion should order the charge of conspiracy to be tried separately from the other part of the action.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, } 1900.
Vaughan Williams, and Romer, } July 3.

SHOOLBRED V. ROBERTS.*

Decision of Phillimore, J. (15 The Times L.R., 523), affirmed in part.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Phillimore on an interpleader issue, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 523; [1899] 2 Q.B., 560. The issue raised the question whether the plaintiff, who was the trustee in bankruptcy of the defendant, John Roberts, the well-known billiard player, or the defendant was entitled to the sum of £200, which had been paid into Court by Messrs. Ashley and Smith (Limited), the proprietors and publishers of the Sportsman newspaper, in these circumstances:—On November 28, 1898, John Roberts, the defendant, and Charles Dawson entered into an agreement to play a match at billiards for the sum of £100 a-side, and under the terms of the agreement the editor of the Sportsman was appointed stakeholder. The sum of £200 was duly received by Ashley and Smith (Limited) to abide the event of the match and to be paid to the winner, each of the parties depositing £100. The match was duly played, and resulted in favour of the defendant on April 3, 1899. On March 29, 1899, Ashley and Smith (Limited) received a notice from the plaintiff claiming the £200 in their hands on behalf of the creditors of the defendant. On April 4, 1899, the defendant applied to Ashley and Smith (Limited) for payment of the £200 to him. Thereupon they paid the money into Court, and the issue above stated was directed. It appeared that the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt in March, 1898, and was at the trial of the issue undischarged. Mr. Justice Phillimore held that the trustee was entitled to the £100 deposited by the defendant, as the defendant could have recovered it back from the stakeholders and the trustee stood in the same position as the defendant. As regards the £100 deposited by Dawson, the learned Judge held that the trustee was not entitled to that sum. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiff for £100. The defendant appealed, and the plaintiff gave cross-notice of appeal.

*Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by W. F. BAILEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Bonsey appeared for the defendant; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. E. T. Holloway appeared for the plaintiff.

"In re Roberts" ([1900] 1 Q.B., 122, and ante, p. 29); "Burge v. Ashley and Smith" ([1900] 1 Q.B., 744); and section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 109), were referred to.

The COURT dismissed the appeal and allowed the cross appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that, with regard to the £100 deposited by the defendant with the stakeholders, it must be taken that either the defendant or his trustee in bankruptcy claimed the return of the deposit from the stakeholders who had not paid it over. It could not now be contended, since the decision in "In re Roberts," that this £100 belonged to the defendant as his personal earnings. The first question was whether the defendant could have recovered this sum from the stakeholders. It had been held over and over again that a deposit in a case like this could be recovered by the depositor from the stakeholder before it had been paid over to the winner. It seemed to him that the defendant could have recovered the £100 back. That being so, it seemed clear that the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to this £100. With regard to the other £100, which had been deposited by Dawson, different considerations arose. Whether an order for interpleader ought ever to have been made he (the Lord Justice) did not stop to inquire. An interpleader order had been made and the stakeholders had paid the £200 into Court. What ought to become of the £100 which had been deposited by Dawson? Did it belong to Dawson? Clearly not, because Dawson had plenty of opportunity of intervening and claiming it, and he had not done so. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed it as being entitled to it through the defendant, and the proper order to make in the special circumstances of this case was that this sum should be handed over to the defendant's trustee in bankruptcy. With regard, therefore, to the first £100 the appeal would be dismissed, and as regards the other £100 the cross appeal would be allowed. There would be no costs of the appeal or cross appeal.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed in the peculiar circumstances of the case with the judgment delivered by Lord Justice A. L. Smith. But he did not wish it to be supposed that, when a bankrupt had made a wagering contract, his trustee in bankruptcy could come forward and recover the amount won by the bankrupt on the wagering contract as winnings. Nor did he wish it to be understood that the parties to these wagering transactions could evade the law by agreeing to pay the money into Court, and then, by having a consent order made for an interpleader issue, try the question as to who was entitled to the winnings. He had very great doubt whether in this case an interpleader order ought to have been made at all. By Order 57, r. 1 (a), the person seeking relief by way of interpleader must be under liability for a debt, money, goods, or chattels, for or in respect of which he was, or expected to be, sued by two or more parties making adverse claims thereto. He did not see how those conditions precedent were fulfilled in the present case. How could it be said that the stakeholders expected to be sued by two or more persons making adverse claims to this fund? Therefore he did not think that an interpleader issue ought to have been ordered in this case. It had, however, been ordered and tried. The trustee in bankruptcy had taken action with regard to £100, part of the stakes, which was inconsistent with its remaining in the stakeholders' hands. He claimed the £100, not as winnings, but as a deposit made by the defendant with the stakeholders. When he had done that, whether or not in words revoked the authority of the stakeholders, in substance and effect he did so. Therefore the money no longer remained in the stakeholders' hands to be disposed of as winnings, but had to be dealt with as a deposit. Dawson did not claim the other £100 back, but he was willing to have the money handed over to the defendant or his trustee in bankruptcy as being money which he, Dawson, had voluntarily placed in the stakeholders' hands. In these special circumstances they might give judgment for the plaintiff.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER agreed. As to the defendant's appeal, he had nothing to add to the judgments already delivered. The cross appeal gave rise to a question of some difficulty. The interpleader issue was not between the parties to the wagering contract, but between one party to the wagering contract and a person claiming through him. Rightly understood the case was one where the bankrupt, who was entitled to a sum of money, raised as against his trustee in bankruptcy the point that he, the bankrupt, was entitled to the money under a void gaming contract. It was, therefore, a case where the bankrupt raised, as against his trustee in bankruptcy, section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845. He (the Lord Justice) did not think that the bankrupt could raise such a point as against his trustee in bankruptcy. The circumstances here were peculiar, and throughout the interpleader proceedings the stakeholders treated the money in their hands as belonging to the defendant, and the only question was whether the defendant or the trustee claiming through him was entitled to the money. He (the Lord Justice) agreed with what had been said as to the care which ought to be taken in directing an interpleader issue where the stakeholder applying for the interpleader issue held in his hands money the subject of a wagering contract. He did not think that he was going too far in saying that an interpleader order ought not to be made where the parties to a wagering contract were applying to the Court for it.

Husband and Wife—Married women's property—Settlement by infant—Subsequent repudiation..

This was an action by Felix Buckland and Jeanette Edith Buckland, his wife, against E. J. S. and L. J. Buckland (infants) and H. F. Cockle and J. E. Blackett, asking for a declaration that a certain settlement was not binding on the plaintiffs and that Cockle and Blackett, the trustees thereof, might be directed to transfer the settled property to the plaintiff, J. E. Buckland, on her separate receipt.

Under the will of James Cockle, who died in July, 1875, the female plaintiff was entitled to a legacy of money and shares, and Cockle and Blackett (with another person since deceased) were the executors. On December 12, 1891, the female plaintiff being then an infant, aged 18, was married to the plaintiff F. Buckland, and before the marriage a settlement dated December 8, 1891, and made between the female plaintiff (then J. E. Cockle) of the first part, F. Buckland of the second part, and the defendants Cockle and Blackett (the trustees) of the third part, was executed. By this settlement, after reciting that upon the treaty for the marriage it was agreed that the legacy and the investments thereof should be settled upon the trusts and subject to the powers and provisions thereafter declared, it was witnessed that, in pursuance of the agreement and in consideration of the marriage, the female plaintiff, with the privity and approbation of F. Buckland, declared that the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of the legacy and investments, upon trust after the marriage to pay the income to the female plaintiff during her life for her separate use, without power of anticipation, and after her death in trust for such of her children as she should appoint by deed or will, and in default of appointment for the children of the marriage equally, and if there should be no child attaining 21, if a son, or being married, if a daughter, then upon trust that the trustees should hold the property in trust for such persons as the female plaintiff should appoint, and in default of appointment if the female plaintiff should survive her husband in trust for her, her executors, administrators, and assigns, and so that during the intended coverture she should not have power to anticipate the same, but if F. Buckland should survive the female plaintiff, then in trust for the persons who would have been entitled under the Statute of Distributions if the female plaintiff had died intestate and without having been married. The female plaintiff alleged that on attaining 21 she had repudiated the settlement, but that the trustees declined to hand over the trust funds to her. The defendants, other than the trustees, were the children of the marriage. The defendant trustees relied on section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which, so far as it is material, is as follows:—"Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman." The case was tried before his Lordship on June 28 and 29, and at the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship reserved judgment.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. T. H. Attwater was for the plaintiffs; and Mr. A. St. John Clerke for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKLEY delivered judgment as follows:—"In 'In re Queade's Trusts' (33 W.R., 816) the settlement was a post-nuptial settlement made in the year 1847 between the wife, who was an infant, the husband, and the trustees. It contained an agreement and declaration by the parties, and a covenant by the husband, that all future property by the wife should be settled. In 1883—that is to say, after the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882—the wife became entitled as one of next of kin to a share of undisposed of residuary estate. There, as here, the wife was at the date of the deed an infant, and there was, therefore, no settlement by her. Mr. Justice Chitty held that section 5 of the Act of 1882 was operative in those circumstances, and that the wife was entitled. In 'Hancock v. Hancock' (38 Ch.D., 78) that case was disapproved. The Court of Appeal held that according to its true construction the 19th section of the Act of 1882 prevents section 5 from interfering with any settlement which would have bound the property if the Act had not been passed. The argument that "settlement" in section 19 must mean a settlement which is binding upon the wife was advanced and failed. The settlement in that case did not contain any covenant by the wife or any joint declaration or agreement. Subsequently in 'Stevens v. Trevor-Garrick' ([1893] 3 Ch., 307) Mr. Justice Chitty held that in a case where not section 5 of the Act but section 2 was the relevant section, the principle of the decision of the Court of Appeal was equally applicable. In this state of things it appears to me that the decision in 'In re Queade's Trusts' is gone altogether, and that it cannot be maintained, as was argued before me, that the effect of section 19 is merely to provide that the construction of the settlement is not to be affected and that the Act does not apply except where the wife is bound by or has assented to the settlement. I conceive that I must deal with the present case upon the footing that section 2 is not to interfere with the settlement, if it be a settlement which would have bound the property if the Act of 1882 had not been passed. What then would have been the effect of the settlement of December 8, 1891, if the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, had not been passed? At the date of the marriage in December, 1891, the lady was entitled to a legacy of £1,000 under the will of her father, who had died in 1875. It was not given for her separate use. It was therefore a sum to which the husband would after the marriage have been entitled by virtue of his marital right upon reducing it into possession. In that state of things a deed was executed to which the lady (then an infant), the intended husband, and certain trustees were parties. It recites the will by which the legacy is given, and the death of the testator, and recites that the lady is an infant of the age of 18 years or thereabouts, and then recites that upon the treaty for the marriage it was agreed that the legacy should be settled upon the trusts after declared. The testatum is that in pursuance of the said agreement and in consideration of the said intended marriage, the lady, with the privity and approbation of the intended husband, declares that the trustees of the will shall stand possessed of the legacy upon certain trusts. Now, seeing that the lady was at this date an infant, the recited agreement cannot have been with her. It must have been an agreement between the intended husband and the trustees for the beneficiaries, including the children of the marriage if there should be such. In pursuance therefore of this agreement between the intended husband and the trustees, the intended wife with the privity of the intended husband declares that the legacy shall be held upon certain trusts. As a declaration by the infant this of course had no effect at all, so that, unless the recital of the agreement is to be operative as between the parties who are recited to have agreed, the instrument will have been wholly inoperative as to the property purporting to be settled. The case therefore seems to me parallel with that of 'Holles v. Carr' (2 Freeman, 3; 3 Swan, 638), referred to by Lord Romilly in 'Young v. Smith' (L.R., 1 Eq., 180). There is a plain recital of an agreement that the legacy shall be settled upon trusts which are in the instrument after declared, and no subsequent operative part to give effect to that agreement, unless it be found in implying a covenant on the part of the husband to do such things as are necessary to give effect to the settlement which the infant purports to make with his privity and approbation. Under these circumstances it appears to me that there is in this instrument an agreement by the husband which binds the marital right which is his upon the footing that the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has not been passed. In other words, I think that, as in 'Hancock v. Hancock', the agreement by the husband to settle, although unaccompanied by any obligation binding the infant wife, is an agreement which would have bound the property if the Act of 1882 had not been passed, and that upon the true construction of that Act section 19 prevents section 2 from interfering with it. I may add that, as a matter of fact, it is plain from the evidence which was given before me that the guardian of the lady, who was one of the trustees, stipulated for the execution of the settlement as a condition of approving the marriage, and that there was in fact an agreement as between the husband and Mr. Henry Frederick Cockle, the trustee, that the property should be settled as appears by the instrument of December 8, 1891. Under these circumstances the action fails, and must be dismissed.

COHEN V. KUSCHKE AND CO. AND KOENIG.*

Principal and Agent—Secret commissions—
Action by principal to recover.

In this case, which was reported in The Times of June 27, the plaintiff sought to recover the amount of secret commission alleged to have been paid by Kuschke and Co. to Koenig when the latter was the manager of the plaintiff's tobacco business. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £38, and judgment was given accordingly against Koenig. It was contended, however, on behalf of Kuschke and Co. that judgment could not be given against them unless it was proved that the plaintiff had suffered damage by Kuschke and Co.'s prices being raised so as to cover the amount of the commission. The case came up for further consideration of this point on June 30, and judgment was given to-day.

Mr. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Norman C. Craig were for the plaintiff; Mr. J. Eldon Bankes was for Kuschke and Co.

Mr. WITT argued that the case was covered by the authority of "Lister and Co. v. Stubbs" (45 Ch.D., 1). As soon as the seller knew that the person with whom he was dealing was the buyer's agent there was fraud. When an article was being sold, the value of which was a matter of opinion, it was impossible to prove the true value. He referred to "Grant v. The Gold Exploration and Development Syndicate (Limited)" ([1900] 1 Q.B., 233).

Mr. BANKES contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment, because he had no finding by the jury that the price was increased by the amount of the bribe. It was Mr. Witt's deliberate act that that question was not gone into, for he had objected to evidence on the point. Counsel cited "Mayer of Salford v. Lever" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 168). In the second case cited by his learned friend it was clear that the bribe was added to the purchase-money. It was tried by a Judge alone, and he drew that as an inference of fact. It was not a matter of law that in every case where secret commission was paid the purchase price was loaded with the commission. It was an inference of fact in every case.

Mr. WITT, in reply, submitted that in contemplation of law the defendants had fixed the real price at the price actually charged less the amount of the commission.

MR. JUSTICE BRUCE read the following written judgment:—This is a claim by the plaintiff to recover £38, a sum paid by the defendants Kuschke and Co. to the defendant Koenig, being a sum paid by way of secret commission to Koenig, who was engaged as the plaintiff's buyer. It was not disputed at the trial that the sum of £38 was paid by Kuschke to Koenig, but the question in dispute was whether it was a sum of money paid in pursuance of a bargain made by Koenig for the purchase from Kuschke and Co. of a parcel of 32 bales of Sumatra tobacco, or was a mere gratuity paid to Koenig as a Christmas-box or as a present. The defendants contended that it was a mere gratuity and that it had no relation to the contract by Koenig for the purchase of the 32 bales. Thereupon I left to the jury the following question, whether a term of the bargain was a promise to pay Koenig 3d. in the pound by way of secret commission and whether payment was made in pursuance of such promise. They answered that in the affirmative. I thereupon entered judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant Koenig. The question now arises as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendants Kuschke and Co. It was contended by Mr. Bankes on behalf of the defendants Kuschke and Co. that as there was no evidence that the price of the 32 bales had been enhanced by the amount of the commission, Kuschke and Co. are not liable. But I cannot agree with that contention. It is clear that Kuschke and Co. knew perfectly well that Koenig was the plaintiff's agent and was buying the 32 bales for him, and it is quite clear from the evidence of the defendants that the money paid to Koenig was paid to him with the intention that he should have the benefit of it. Indeed, as I have said, the case of Kuschke and Co. is that the £38 was a present to Koenig. If the money paid was not a mere gratuity, the defendants Kuschke and Co. must have paid it as a secret commission. By the finding of the jury Kuschke and Co. did pay this money to Koenig as a secret commission and in those circumstances I think it matters not whether a different price would have obtained had there been no bargain for a commission. In this sale it was a term, it entered into the bargain, that a sum of money, which was part of the apparent or pretended price of the goods, was to be paid over to Koenig for his own use. That money was in law not Koenig's money, but it was the money of the plaintiff. And if the defendants Kuschke and Co. paid over to Koenig with knowledge of the circumstances money which was the plaintiff's money, intending that Koenig should keep it for his own use and that the plaintiff should be kept in ignorance of the payment, I think they are liable to the plaintiff for the amount. The plaintiff cannot, of course, recover the money twice over, but he is entitled to recover it against either or both of the defendants, and he is entitled to judgment against Kuschke and Co. for £38 and costs.

Rigby and Collins, L.J.J.) } July 5.

ROGERS V. ROSEGOOD.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract—Covenants—
Restrictive covenants—User—Covenant running with the land—Rights of assignees.

Decision of Farwell, J. (ante, p. 20), affirmed as regards some of the plaintiffs. Cross appeal of plaintiff Rogers allowed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Farwell, which was reported in The Times of November 8 last, and ante, p. 20. The action was brought by the trustees of the will of the late Sir John Millais, as owners of property in Palace-gate, and by W. R. Rogers, the owner of adjoining property, for the purpose of enforcing restrictive covenants against the defendant, who is now the owner of the property known as Thorney-house, at the corner of Palace-gate and Kensington-gore, and proposes to build a large block of residential flats upon it. On May 31, 1869, the then Duke of Bedford purchased a plot of land, which formed part of the property to which the action related, from Messrs. Cubitt and Co., and covenanted to erect thereon not more than one messuage, or dwelling-house, which was to be used for a private residence only, and no trade or business was to be carried on there. Subsequently, on July 31 in the same year, he purchased an adjoining plot upon similar conditions, except that there was no express restriction as to the number of houses to be built upon it. These covenants were expressed to be intended "to enure for the benefit of" Messrs. Cubitt and Co., "their heirs and assigns, or others claiming under them to all or any of their lands adjoining or near to" the property purchased by the Duke. The Duke subsequently purchased another adjoining plot, with respect to which no restrictive covenants were entered into. Sir John Millais bought his property in Palace-gate from Messrs. Cubitt in 1873 and built a house upon it. The conveyance to him contained no express assignment of the benefit of the covenant entered into by the Duke of Bedford. The conveyance contained a recital of one of the conveyances to the Duke, but did not in any way refer to the restrictive covenant therein. In 1872 the Duke of Bedford died, and his successor no longer wished to live at Thorney-house. In order to enable him to dispose of the property more freely, Messrs. Cubitt in 1876 executed a deed releasing him, so far as they could, from the covenant relating to the number of houses to be built on the property. The plaintiff Rogers, who was one of the firm of Cubitt and Co., and consequently one of the original covenantees, purchased other property in Palace-gate from the firm after the date of this release. The defendant purchased from the Duke's devisees. Mr. Justice Farwell held that the trustees of Sir John Millais were entitled to the benefit of the restrictive covenant, and could enforce it against the defendant, and that the erection of a block of flats would be a breach of the covenant not to erect more than one house on the land. His Lordship accordingly granted an injunction in favour of the trustees as against the defendant. But his Lordship held that the plaintiff Rogers, having joined in releasing the covenant, could not now enforce it. The action was dismissed as regarded Rogers. The defendant appealed; and Rogers gave a cross notice of appeal.

*Reported by J. F. WALKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Allen were for the defendant; Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. Christopher James were for the plaintiffs. On June 21 last the judgment of the Court was reserved.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read the judgment of the Court dismissing the appeal and allowing the cross appeal. His Lordship said:—This case raises questions of some difficulty, but we are of opinion that the decision of Mr. Justice Farwell is right, and ought to be affirmed. No difficulty arises as to the burden of the covenants in this case. The defendant is the assignee of the covenantor in respect of the two plots of land comprised in the conveyances of May 31 and July 31, 1869, and he took with notice of the covenants now sought to be enforced. Nor have we any hesitation in accepting Mr. Justice Farwell's conclusion, that the buildings which the defendant proposes to erect will involve a breach of these covenants. The real and only difficulty arises on the question—whether the benefit of these covenants has passed to the assigns of Sir John Millais as owners of the plot purchased by him on March 25, 1872, there being no evidence that he knew of these covenants when he bought. Here again the difficulty is narrowed, because by express declaration on the face of the conveyances of 1869 the benefit of the two covenants in question was intended for all or any of the vendor's lands near to or adjoining the plot sold, and therefore for (among others) the plot of land acquired by Sir John Millais, and that they "touched and concerned" that land within the meaning of those words so as to run with the land at law we do not doubt. Therefore, but for a technical difficulty which was not raised before Mr. Justice Farwell, we should agree with him that the benefit of the covenants in question was annexed to and passed to Sir John Millais by the conveyance of the land which he bought in 1872. A difficulty, however, in giving effect to this view arises from the fact that the covenants in question in the deeds of May and July, 1869, were made with the mortgagors only, and therefore in contemplation of law were made with a stranger to the land, "Webb v. Russell" (3 Term Rep. 393), to which, therefore, the benefit did not become annexed. That a Court of Equity, however, would not regard such an objection as defeating the intention of the parties to the covenant is clear; and, therefore, when the covenant was clearly made for the benefit of certain land with a person who in the contemplation of such a Court was the true owner of it, it would be regarded as annexed to and running with that land, just as it would have been at law but for the technical difficulty. I think this is the plain result of the observations of Vice-Chancellor Hall in the well-known passage in "Renals v. Cowlishaw" (9 Ch.D., 125), of Sir George Jessel, M.R., in "London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm" (20 Ch.D., 583), and of Vice-Chancellor Wood in "Child v. Douglas" (Kay, 560), which, we agree with Mr. Justice Farwell, are untouched on this point by anything decided in the subsequent proceedings in that case. Referring to "Tulk v. Moxhay," Sir George Jessel, M.R., in "London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm" said:—"The doctrine of that case, rightly considered, appears to me to be either an extension in equity of the doctrine of 'Spencer's Case' to another line of cases, or else an extension in equity of the doctrine of negative easements, such, for instance, as a right to the access of light, which prevents the owner of the servient tenement from building so as to obstruct the light. . . . Where there is a negative covenant expressed or implied, as, for instance, not to build so as to obstruct a view, or not to use a piece of land otherwise than as a garden, the Court interferes on one or other of the above grounds. This is an equitable doctrine, establishing an exception to the rules of common law which did not treat such a covenant as running with the land" (by which he clearly means the burden), "and it does not matter whether it proceeds on analogy to a covenant running with the land or an analogy to an easement. The purchaser took the estate subject to the equitable burden, with the qualification that, if he acquired the legal estate for value without notice, he was freed from the burden. That qualification, however, did not affect the nature of the burden; the notice was required merely to avoid the effect of the legal estate, and did not create the right, and if the purchaser took only an equitable estate he took subject to the burden, whether he had notice or not." In an earlier passage (at p. 580), dealing with the covenant in question in that case—viz., a covenant by a purchaser and his assigns to resell, if called upon by the vendor (a railway company), and with the objection that it contravened the rule against perpetuities, he said:—"Whether the rule applied or not depends upon this, as it appears to me, does or does not the covenant give an interest in the land? If it is a bare or mere personal contract it is of course not obnoxious to the rule, but in that case it is impossible to see how the present appellant can be bound. He did not enter into the contract, but is only a purchaser from Powell, who did. If it is a mere personal contract it cannot be enforced against the assignee; therefore the company must admit that it somehow binds the land, but if it binds the land it creates an equitable interest in the land." These observations, which are just as applicable to the benefit reserved as to the burden imposed, show that in equity, just as at law, the first point to be determined is whether the covenant or contract in its inception binds the land. If it does, it is then capable of passing with the land to subsequent assignees; if it does not, it is incapable of passing by mere assignment of the land. The benefit may be annexed to one plot and the burden to another, and when this has been once clearly done the benefit and the burden pass to the respective assignees, subject, in the case of the burden, to proof that the legal estate, if acquired, has been acquired with notice of the covenant. The passage enclosed in a parenthesis in the report of the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Hall in "Renals v. Cowlishaw" supports the same view, nor are the general observations or the decision of the case itself inconsistent with it. There in the original conveyance which imposed the restrictive covenant there was no expression, as there is in the present case, that the restriction was intended for the benefit of any part of the estate retained, and it is in reference to such a case that he said "the plaintiffs rest their case upon there being assigns of the Mill Hill Estate, and they say that, as the vendors to Shaw were the owners of that estate when they sold to Shaw a parcel of land adjoining it, the restrictive covenant entered into by the purchaser of that parcel of land must be taken to have been entered into with them for the purpose of protecting the Mill Hill Estate, which they retained; and, therefore, that the benefit of that restrictive covenant goes to the assign of that estate, irrespective of whether or not any representation that such a covenant had been entered into by a purchaser from the vendor was made to such assigns, and without any contract by the vendor that that purchaser should have the benefit of that covenant. The argument must, it would seem, go to this length—viz., that in such a case a purchaser becomes entitled to (the benefit of) the covenant, even although he did not know of the existence of the covenant, and that although the purchaser is not (as the purchasers in the present case were not) purchaser of all the property retained by the vendor upon the occasion of the conveyance containing the covenant. It appears to me that the three cases to which I have referred show that this is not the law of this Court; and that in order to enable a purchaser as an assign (such purchaser not being an assign of all that the vendor retained when he executed the conveyance containing the covenants, and that conveyance not showing that the benefit of the covenant was intended to enure for the time being for the benefit of each portion of the estate so retained, or of the portion of the estate of which the plaintiff is assign) to claim the benefit of a restrictive covenant, this at least must appear, that the assign acquired his property with the benefit of the covenant—that is, it must appear that the benefit of the covenant was part of the subject matter of the purchase." So in "Child v. Douglas" (Kay, at p. 571) Vice-Chancellor Wood said:—"Where part of the remaining property of the original vendor has been sold to another person, who must be considered to have bought the benefit of the former purchaser's covenant, and more especially when the subsequent purchaser has entered into a similar covenant on his own part, he must be considered to have done this in consideration of those benefits, and even whether he actually knew or was ignorant that this covenant was, in fact, inserted in other purchase deeds, because he must be taken to have bought all the rights connected with his portion of the land." These authorities establish the proposition that, when the benefit has been once clearly annexed to one piece of land, it passes by assignment of that land, and may be said to run with it, as well in contemplation of equity as of law without proof of special bargain or representation on the assignment of it. In such a case it runs not because the conscience of either party is affected, but because the purchaser has bought something that inhered in or was annexed to the land bought. This is the reason why, in dealing with the burden, the pur-chaser's conscience is not affected by notice of covenants which were part of the original bargain on the first sale, but were merely personal and collateral, while it is affected by notice of those that touch and concern the land. The covenant must be one that is capable of running with the land before the question of the purchaser's conscience and the equity affecting it can come into discussion. When, as in "Renals v. Cowlishaw," there is no indication in the original conveyance, or in the circumstances attending it, that the burden of the restrictive covenant is imposed for the benefit of the land reserved, or any particular part of it, then it becomes necessary to examine the circumstances under which any part of the land reserved is sold, in order to see whether a benefit, not originally annexed to it, has become annexed to it on the sale, so that the purchaser is deemed to have bought it with the land, and this can hardly be the case where the purchaser did not know of the existence of the restrictive covenant. But when, as here, it has been once annexed to the land reserved, then it is not necessary to spell an intention out of surrounding facts, such as the existence of a building scheme, statements at auctions, and such like circumstances, and the presumption must be that it passes on a sale of that land, unless there is something to rebut it, and the purchaser's ignorance of the existence of the covenant does not defeat the presumption. We find nothing in the conveyance to Sir John Millais in any degree inconsistent with the intention to pass to him the benefit already annexed to the land sold to him. The covenant by the vendor to build a wall, if required by Sir John Millais to do so, in order to prevent Sir John Millais's windows overlooking the adjoining plot does not seem to us to have any bearing on the point, and we are of opinion, therefore, that Sir John Millais's assigns are entitled to enforce the restrictive covenant against the defendant, and that his appeal must be dismissed. It is, however, still necessary to consider the question raised by the cross-notice of Mr. Rogers. Mr. Rogers is one of the covenantees with whom the Duke of Bedford covenanted in a deed of October 30, 1876, "that every messuage to be erected on the two plots, or either of them, should at all times thereafter be adapted for and used as and for a private residence only." Mr. Rogers was a party to a deed of even date, whereby he and his partners released the Duke from the covenants restricting the number of houses to be built on the plots contained in the conveyances of May, 1869, and July, 1869. He afterwards took an assignment from his partners of two other plots of the firm's building land, near to the Bedford and Millais plots. Mr. Justice Farwell dismissed the action, so far as it set up any claim by Rogers, on the ground that the latter could not after the release above mentioned complain of the erection of several dwelling-houses; and the learned Judge did not consider that the proposed building would be a violation of the covenant with Mr. Rogers, that every house to be erected on the two plots, or either of them, or any part thereof, should at all times thereafter be adapted for and used as and for a private residence only. We are of opinion, however, that such a block of flats as it is proposed to erect would involve a breach of this covenant. Though we agree, as we have said, that such a building does involve a breach of the covenant that no more than one messuage or dwelling-house should be erected or standing on such plot, and that such messuage should be adapted for and used as and for a private residence, we think it is also a breach of the covenant in question. Though it is certainly not one messuage or dwelling-house only adapted for and used as a private residence, neither does it seem to us to constitute several separate dwelling-houses adapted for and used as private residences only, within the meaning of the covenant. We think residential flats, involving the use of a public entrance and staircase, do not answer the description of private residences contemplated by the words quoted. The covenant must, we think, be construed in an ordinary or popular, and not in a legal and technical, sense; and we do not think that residential flats, though for many purposes separate dwelling-houses, come within the popular description of the class of buildings which it was intended to permit. The cross-appeal, therefore, of Mr. Rogers must be allowed.

THE MAYOR, &C., OF THE BOROUGH OF HYDE V. THE OLDHAM, ASHTON, AND HYDE ELECTRIC TRAMWAY (LIMITED) AND OTHERS.*

Tramway Company—Laying down tramway—Power to break up footway—Tramway Act, 1870, secs. 3 and 26.

Decision of Grantham, J. (15 The Times L.R., 456), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Grantham, at the trial of an action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., at p. 456. The action was brought by the corporation of Hyde against the Oldham, Ashton, and Hyde Electric Tramway (Limited), the British Electric Traction (Pioneer) Company (Limited), the British Thomson-Houston Company (Limited), and the British Insulated Wire Company (Limited), for an injunction restraining the defendants from breaking open certain footways in the borough of Hyde, and laying down electric cables thereunder for the purpose of using them for working tramways which the defendants had constructed, and for damages.

The Tramways Act, 1870, section 26, provides that the persons authorized by any special Act to construct a tramway (called the promoters) "may from time to time for the purpose of making, forming, laying down, maintaining and renewing any tramway duly authorized, or any part or parts thereof respectively, open and break up any road" subject to certain regulations. The regulations provide that the promoters shall give notice to the road authority of their intention to open and break up any road, and that they shall not open or break up or alter the level of any road except under the superintendence of the road authority. By section 3 the term "road" is defined to mean "any carriageway being a public highway, and the carriageway of any bridge forming part of or leading to the same." By the Tramways Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1896, the British Electric Traction (Pioneer) Company (Limited), thereafter called the promoters, their successors and assigns, were authorized to construct tramways in the district of Oldham, Ashton-under-Lyne, and Hyde. The Oldham, Ashton, and Hyde Electric Tramway (Limited) were the successors of the British Electric Traction (Pioneer) Company (Limited). The other defendants were the contractors employed by them to do the work. Section 6 of the last-mentioned Act provides that the promoters may, and so far as regards so much of the tramways as is to be laid within the borough of Hyde shall, within two years from the date of the provisional order, construct and maintain the tramways therein described. Section 13, subsection 10, provides for the use to be made of any paving, metalling, or material excavated by the promoters in the construction of the tramways from any road under the jurisdiction of the plaintiffs. Subsection 19 provides that the promoters shall not, without the consent of the plaintiffs, work the tramways by steam or any mechanical power other than electricity and that such consent may be given subject to such terms and conditions as the plaintiffs think fit. Subsection 21 provides that the promoters shall enter into a bond to forfeit £500 to the plaintiffs in case the tramways are not completed within two years. Section 16 provides that the promoters shall, besides giving notice of their intention to open or break up any road, lay before the Board of Trade and the road authority a plan showing the proposed mode of constructing, laying down, maintaining, and renewing the tramways. Section 24 provides that the carriages used on the tramways may, with the consent of the Board of Trade, be moved by means of electricity or other mechanical power applied according to a system approved by the Board of Trade. Section 25 provides that the promoters may place and maintain on any street or road in which any of the tramways may be laid such posts and overhead electric wires as may be necessary and proper for working the tramway by electric power. A plan for the construction of the tramway was authorized by the Board of Trade under section 24 of the Act of 1896. It involved the laying down of cables or feeders under the footways of the streets traversed. Disconnecting stations were authorized to be erected on the pavement at intervals of a quarter of a mile, by means of which the electric current might be disconnected from any section of the overhead wire. On July 5, 1898, the defendants gave to the plaintiffs notice of their intention to open the ground of the streets under the plaintiffs' control, along which it was intended that the tramway should pass, for the purpose of laying the electric supply mains. Prior to this they had undertaken to pay £500 towards the cost of widening the streets. The plaintiffs, however, refused to consent to the feeders being laid under the footways, unless the defendants undertook to pay a further sum of £500 towards widening the streets. This the defendants declined to do, and, claiming to be entitled to lay the feeders under the footways without the consent of the plaintiffs, they effected the work in September and October, 1898. This action was commenced on December 2, 1898. At the trial Mr. Justice Grantham gave judgment for the plaintiffs, granting a mandatory injunction and also awarding them £100 damages. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Bartley Dennis appeared for the defendants; Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. E. Sutton for the plaintiffs.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the action was brought by the corporation of Hyde, in their capacity as surveyors of the highways within their borough, and they complained that the defendants had, without their consent and against their wish, laid down certain electric cables or feeders under the footways in certain streets within the borough. The defendants claimed that they had a right so to lay down feeders under the footways, and they claimed that they had a right to continue to do so, and they justified under the Tramways Act, 1870, and under a provisional order confirmed by a Confirmation Act passed in 1896. The question was, could the defendants justify under the Tramways Act for the provisional order? Mr. Justice Grantham had decided that they could not, and in his opinion that decision was right. It was clear, from sections 3 and 26 of the Tramways Act, that that Act did not authorize the opening or breaking up of footways, but only of carriage-ways. The defendants now said that those sections only applied to the laying down of tramways and not to the laying down of electric feeders. If that were so, at any rate the Act did not help the defendants in their justification. They then justified under their provisional order. Now did the provisional order give them the power to lay down electric feeders under the footways? Section 25 was the section on which the defendants chiefly relied. That section provided that the promoters might place and maintain on any street or road—he was not prepared to say that “street” did not mean the whole width of the street from wall to wall including the footways—such posts and overhead electric wires as might be necessary and proper for working the tramways by electric power. Did that confer authority on the promoters to lay down cables or feeders underneath the soil, or only to do something overhead and above the soil? In his opinion it only applied to something to be done above the soil and not underneath it. But it was argued on behalf of the defendants that it was necessary to lay down feeders underneath the soil in order to enable them to carry out their statutory powers of making the tramways. The argument came to this, that the word “overhead” in section 25 of the provisional order ought to be construed as meaning underground. He could not read the section as justifying the defendants in what they had done. At the trial the plaintiffs gave evidence of the damage which they had sustained, and the learned Judge awarded them £100 damages. The plaintiffs, however, wanted more than this; they said that the defendants claimed to have a right to lay the feeders under the footways, and intended to go on laying them, and they asked that the defendants might be restrained from doing so. The learned Judge accordingly granted an injunction. The defendants now said that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction because they had been too late in asking for it. It appeared that the work was finished on October 3, and that the writ was issued on December 2. But the corporation had not lain by and permitted the defendants to do the work. On the contrary, the work had been done in spite of the strongest objections on the part of the corporation. He did not think there was any ground for saying that the plaintiffs were too late. It was then suggested that the injunction would do more harm than good, and that, if the plaintiffs took a proper view of their duty, they would not ask for it. But the plaintiffs did ask for it, and in his judgment that suggestion was untenable. As to whether there ought to be a mandatory injunction, he thought that the injunction should be varied, and that it should be in the form which would be stated by Lord Justice Romer. The appeal failed, and must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS delivered a judgment in which he said that he entirely agreed.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said he also agreed. The form of the judgment would be altered, and would be as follows:—“Declare that the defendants are not empowered to lay or keep wires under the footways. Restrain the defendants from opening or breaking up such footways without the consent of the plaintiffs; but this injunction is not to restrain them from removing wires, provided they make good all damage.”

MATTHEWS AND ANOTHER V. USHER AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Forfeiture—Mortgage of equity of redemption.

In the case of a lease made before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the equitable owner of the reversion cannot bring an action to recover possession of the premises.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Ridley at the trial of the action without a jury. The action was brought to recover possession of certain houses upon the ground of forfeiture for breach of a covenant to repair in a lease.

The question was whether in the case of a lease made before the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the equitable owner of the reversion could bring an action to recover possession of the premises. The facts, so far as material to this report, were as follows:—On March 10, 1819, one Severn granted a lease of certain houses to one Everard for the term of 81 years at the annual rent of £36. The lease contained a covenant by the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns to repair and keep in repair the houses, and a proviso that the lessor, his heirs, and assigns might re-enter on breach of any of the covenants in the lease. In 1878, the legal owner of the reversion expectant on the lease executed a legal mortgage of it, and in July, 1887, he mortgaged the equity of redemption to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were in receipt of the rents and profits. In July, 1898, the plaintiffs served notice under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, stating as ground of forfeiture a breach of the covenant to repair, and brought this action to recover possession of the houses. The defendants contended that only the legal owner of the reversion, in this case the first mortgagee, could elect to take advantage of the forfeiture clause in the lease and bring an action to recover possession of the houses. At the trial the mortgagee was added as plaintiff in the action. Mr. Justice Ridley held that, by virtue of section 25, subsection 5, of the Judicature Act, 1873, the plaintiffs could bring the action and he gave judgment for them. The defendants appealed. By section 25, subsection 5, “A mortgagor, entitled for the time being to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of any land as to which no notice of his intention to take possession or to enter into the receipt of the rents and profits thereof shall have been given by the mortgagee, may sue for such possession or for the recovery of such rents or profits, or to prevent or recover damages in respect of any trespass or other wrong relative thereto, in his own name only, unless the cause of action arises upon a lease or other contract made by him jointly with any other person.”

Mr. R. M. BRAY, Q.C., and Mr. BROOKE LITTLE, for the defendants, said that before the Judicature Act, 1873, the mortgagor in possession could not have brought ejectment. Section 25, subsection 5, of that Act had not given him that right. The lease only gave the legal owner of the reversion the right to forfeit the lease. It was the right of the legal mortgagee to say whether he would elect to forfeit the lease or not. The lease was part of his security. Section 10 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, no doubt gave the mortgagor in possession the right to sue in such a case, but that section was limited to leases executed after the passing of the Act. That section would be unnecessary if the plaintiffs' contention were correct. The plaintiffs, therefore, were not entitled to sue. They referred to “Municipal Permanent Investment Building Society v. Smith” (22 Q.B.D., 70); “Fairclough v. Marshall” (4 Ex. D., 37); “Gentle v. Faulkner” (ante, p. 397, and [1900] 2 Q.B., 267).

Mr. DICKENS, Q.C., and Mr. H. TINDAL ATKINSON (Mr. Spence with them), for the plaintiffs, contended that in equity the mortgagor in possession was looked upon as the real owner of the property, and section 25, subsection 5, of the Judicature Act, 1873, said in effect that the equity view of the position of the mortgagor in possession should prevail in all Courts, and he could now sue to recover possession. The section put the mortgagor in the position of the mortgagee as long as the mortgagee allowed the mortgagor to remain in possession. They referred to "Trent v. Hunt" (9 Ex., 14), and "Heath v. Pugh" (6 Q.B.D., 345).

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the short question was whether the plaintiffs, who were only the owners of the equity of redemption, could bring this action to recover possession. The lease reserved to the lessor, his heirs, and assigns the right of re-entry on breach of any of the covenants in the lease. Clearly the plaintiffs, being the mortgagors, were not "assigns" within the meaning of the proviso. That word, as was held in "Gentle v. Faulkner," meant a legal assign. It was said that section 25, subsection 5, of the Judicature Act, 1873, gave the plaintiffs the right to bring ejectment for forfeiture on breach of covenant. There was a great deal to be said on both sides, but in his opinion that subsection did not cover the present case. It was conceded that a mortgagor could not have brought this action before the Judicature Act. Did section 25, subsection 5, enable the plaintiffs to do so? He (the Lord Justice) thought that that enactment meant that a mortgagor entitled for the time being to the possession of land might sue for such possession, and a mortgagor entitled for the time being to the receipt of the rents and profits of land might sue for such rent or profits. Here the plaintiffs were not entitled to possession of the land because the lease had not been forfeited. It was said that they stood in the shoes of the mortgagee. That contention would not avail them, because at the time of the action the mortgagee had not given notice under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and therefore had not put himself in a position to sue for possession. It was then said that the mortgagee was joined as a plaintiff in the action, but that again would not avail the plaintiffs, because, as already stated, notice under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, had not been given by the mortgagee or by any one on his behalf. Judgment must therefore be entered for the defendants.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment to the same effect.

SACCHARIN CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. REITMEYER.*
Patent—Infringement—Common form of patent —"Make, use, exercise, and vend," meaning of.

This was a patent action which raised a novel point of construction on the very old use of the word exercise in the common phrase "make, use, exercise, and vend," which occurs in all patents granted from the time of Queen Elizabeth to the present day.

The plaintiffs are the owners of several English patents for processes for making a substance called ortho-toluin-sulphuric acid, which is used in making saccharin. The defendant is a commission merchant. The plaintiffs sued him in respect of alleged infringements of one of their patents called Monnet's patent, by the sale of parcels of saccharin. In the case of one of the sales his Lordship held that the plaintiffs failed to prove that the saccharin was made from an article manufactured by the patented process. In another case the defendant had contracted to deliver, and procured to be delivered, at a German port saccharin to the Chemical and Drugs Company, an English company which imported the article to England and sold it in England. Against this company the plaintiffs have succeeded in getting judgment. In respect of this part of the case the defendant's counsel contended that, assuming that the article used in making the saccharin was made by the patented process, the delivery by him to an English person in Germany, whether with or without knowledge that it was to be sent to England, was no infringement of English law. They argued also that in vending saccharin they were not bound to inquire whether one article used in the making substance dealt in was or not made by the patented process.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. J. Graham were for the plaintiffs; Lord Robert Cecil, Q.C., and Mr. A. J. Walter for the defendant.

HIS LORDSHIP delivered judgment, reserved from the 27th ult., as follows:—This is an action in which the plaintiffs claim damages for the infringement of Monnet's patent of 1894. The plaintiffs in their particulars rely upon the importation of a parcel of saccharin purchased by the defendant from M. Cerck in June, 1897, and imported into this country and sold by the defendant. The defendant admits this importation and sale. As to this part of the case, it is sufficient for me to say that it is not proved that the saccharin in question was made according to the Monnet patent; and that, on the contrary, it has been proved to my satisfaction that it was made by a different process. So far, therefore, as relates to this part the plaintiffs' action wholly fails, and, whatever may be the ultimate result of the action, regard must be had to this in dealing with costs. The plaintiffs also rely in their particulars upon the defendant's transactions with reference to certain parcels of saccharin which were ordered by the defendant as commission agent or merchant in 1897 from certain persons on the Continent, and were delivered by the vendors at foreign ports direct to the order of the Chemical and Drugs Company (Limited), of Manchester, the purchasers. The orders were given by the Chemical and Drugs Company to the defendant in England. The goods were contracted to be delivered, and were in fact delivered to the company at Continental ports. The defendant got his profit as commission agent or merchant in respect of the transactions. As to these parcels, the question is entirely different. The defendant in the first place asserts that the plaintiffs have not proved that the stuff was manufactured according to Monnet's patent. I have had the evidence of a German chemist from whose works one of the cases was procured, and although his evidence was not altogether satisfactory, by reason of his refusal to state the details of the manufacturing process adopted by his firm, I think I must hold, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the plaintiffs have established that this one case of saccharin was manufactured according to Monnet's patent as interpreted by Mr. Justice Buckley in the recent case of "Saccharin Corporation (Limited) v. Anglo-Continental Chemical Works (Limited)." The evidence does not satisfy me except as to this one case. The defendant next contends that even if Monnet's process was adopted, yet there is no infringement, because Monnet's patent is not one for the manufacture of saccharin, but only for the manufacture of tolwin-sulpho chlorides, a chemical substance used in the manufacture of saccharin, but also used for other purposes and not contained as such in saccharin. The defendant contends, with great plausibility, that a new terror will be added to life if every person is held to infringe Monnet's patent who uses an article imported from abroad in the course of the production of which saccharin derived from a chemical substance produced according to Monnet's process may have been employed. It seems to me, however, that this point has really been decided against the defendant and in favour of the plaintiffs by Mr. Justice Buckley in the case to which I have referred, and I therefore propose to adopt his view without expressing any opinion of my own. Assuming, then, that the importation into this country of the saccharin infringed Monnet's patent, the further question arises whether the defendant has infringed. Now it is plain that a patent is of local force. It cannot and does not profess to interfere with or control acts done abroad, and it is for the plaintiffs to prove that what the defendant has done brings him within the reach of the law. The patent is in the common form scheduled to the Act of 1883. It confers upon the patentee the sole privilege and authority to "make, use, exercise, and vend" the invention within the United Kingdom and the Isle of Man. Of these four words, "make, use, exercise, and vend," it is admitted that the defendant has not "made" or "used," and I think it is clear that he has not "vended." (See "Badische Anilin Company v. Basle Chemical Works" [1898] A.C., 200.) It is said, however, that he has "exercised" the invention within the jurisdiction. It is remarkable that this word, which has been found in letters patent, at least since 1621, so far as I am aware, has never been construed. I think, however, that it can only mean "put in practice." I do not think it can be taken to cover a transaction such as I have to deal with. The defendant as a commission agent contracted for delivery to the purchasers at a German port. He had no interest whatever in the case when delivered at the foreign port to the purchasers. He had no right to control its destination. I assume that he knew or suspected that the greater part of the stuff would find its way into this country, but I cannot regard that as material. The acts done by the defendant on the Continent were lawful there, and—being done on the Continent—were not unlawful here. The plaintiffs have sought to extend the principle laid down in "Elmalie v. Bousier" (9 Eq., 217) and "Von Heydn v. Newstadt" (14 Ch.D., 230), that the importation into and sale in England of an article manufactured abroad according to a process protected by an English patent is an infringement of the English patent to a case where the defendant has neither imported into nor sold in England. The plaintiffs have attempted to create a prejudice in their favour by asserting that the purchasers to whom the stuff was delivered were, and were known by the defendant to be, a company possessing no capital. But this seems to me wholly irrelevant to any question I have to decide. This is not an action based upon a charge of fraud or conspiracy. It is an action based solely upon infringement of a patent, as to which scienter is immaterial. The plaintiffs have sued and obtained judgment against the Chemical and Drugs Company. They have sued, or they may sue, the persons who bought from that company in England. They now attempt to sue the defendant. I am not disposed for the first time thus to extend the rights of a patentee. In my judgment, the plaintiffs' action wholly fails, and I must dismiss it with costs.

THE TORVA EXPLORING SYNDICATE (LIMITED)
V. KELLY.*

Contract—Agreement—Construction—Promise to pay on "flotation" of company—Flotation, 'what is.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope of May 20, 1898, affirming a decision of the High Court of Matabeleland.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. A. M. Bremner were counsel for the appellants; Mr. H. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. R. J. Parker for the respondent.

LORD MACNAGHTEN, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the question in the case was, What is the meaning of the word "flotation" as used in an agreement between a mining prospector and his employers, who were a syndicate or joint-stock company, limited by shares, and formed apparently for the purpose of acquiring and dealing in mining claims and other property within the territories of the British South Africa Company? The agreement was dated July 17, 1894, and made between the Torva Exploring Syndicate (Limited) and the respondent. The syndicate thereby hired the prospector for two months certain, and one month more if required. He was to devote all his time and attention to the interests of his employers and use his best endeavours to peg off payable mining properties in Matabeleland or Mashonaland for their benefit. He was to be paid a monthly salary of £15, and to be furnished with all necessary prospecting gear and provisions. The development or abandonment of all properties pegged off was to be at the discretion of the syndicate's representative, and all claims pegged off were to be transferred to the syndicate. Then followed the clause on which the question turned:—"7. The prospector shall receive from the syndicate the sum of £250 (two hundred and fifty pounds) on flotation by the syndicate of every block of 10 claims pegged by the prospector." In the course of his service under this agreement the plaintiff pegged off 330 claims or 33 blocks of ten claims each. They were pegged off under licences procured by the syndicate. No transfer was therefore necessary. They were all registered in the name of the syndicate or its nominees. By an agreement dated March 13, 1895, the syndicate agreed to sell the whole of these 330 claims, together with certain other property, to the Charterland Goldfields (Limited) for the sum of £50,000, payable in fully-paid shares of the purchasing company, who were besides to undertake the contracts and obligations of the syndicate, including their obligations to their prospectors. The sale was afterwards carried into effect. The purchase money was paid, and the transfer was duly entered on the register of the British South Africa Company. The objects for which the Charterland Goldfields (Limited) was established were among others "(a) to purchase . . . mines and mineral properties. . . to carry into effect . . . an agreement with the Torva Syndicate" (being the agreement above stated), "(b) to prospect for, open, work, develop, and explore . . . gold . . . and other mines . . . and to carry on and conduct the business of raising, crushing, washing, smelting, reducing, and amalgamating ores, metals, and minerals, and to render the same merchantable and fit for use." The capital of the company was £500,000 in £1 shares. It was stated at the trial by the manager of the Charterland Goldfields that his company did not apply to the public for capital, but it was admitted that there were then about 2,000 shareholders and that the shares had been at a premium. Stopping at that point and putting aside for the moment the mining regulations of the British South Africa Company the result seemed to be that the Torra Syndicate did in fact dispose of those mining claims at a good profit to a substantial company having for its main purpose, or at any rate for one of its principal objects, the developing and working of gold mines. Was not that a "flotation" of those gold mining claims? The appellants said not. They said that it was not "flotation" at all, at any rate not the flotation contemplated by the agreement. "Flotation," they said, for the purposes of the agreement, meant the disposing of mining claims to a joint stock company with the consent of the British South Africa Company after doing the necessary work and obtaining a certificate called the inspection certificate prescribed by the mining regulations of the British South Africa Company. In order to show the meaning of the term "flotation" reference was made to the mining regulations of the British South Africa Company and the oral evidence given at the trial. Turning first to the regulations of the British South Africa Company, the word "flotation" was found occurring in the regulations of 1890 in a notice of May 17, 1892, amending one of those regulations and in the Mines and Minerals Ordinance of 1895. No definition of the word was given. The interpretation clause of the Ordinance of 1895 declared that in the interpretation of that Ordinance all words should be understood in the sense which they bore in ordinary use, and then it proceeded to define a great many expressions which were referred to as "special terms," amongst which the word "flotation" was not to be found. It was, however, clear from section 28 of the Mining Regulations of 1890 that "the flotation of a block" might be "into either a joint stock company or into a syndicate to further test the mine," that was as was conceded in the argument either into a mining company or into a developing company, and it was equally clear that the consideration for a flotation might be scrip or shares of the company or syndicate into which the mining claims were floated. The oral evidence as to the meaning of the term "flotation" did not help one much. No two of the witnesses agreed in their definitions. The plaintiff explained his view of the meaning of the word. He said that he discussed its meaning with Mr. Cresswell. He alleged that Mr. Cresswell, who acted for the syndicate, told him that there would be no difficulty in disposing of claims as soon as a sufficient number were obtained, and assured him that he would receive his share when the syndicate disposed of the claims whether they were transferred to a company or to an individual. That was all that "flotation" meant according to his view. Mr. Cresswell was not called by the defendants to contradict the plaintiff or to explain the part he took in the transaction. There was this to be said for the plaintiff's view that no doubt the primary object of making the prospector's remuneration dependent on flotation was that the syndicate might not have to put their hands in their own pockets. It was difficult to suppose that the parties to the agreement concerned themselves about the protection of the British South Africa Company, who were quite able to take care of their own interests. Besides calling a Mr. Heyman, who was managing director of "Willoughby's Consolidated," and formerly Civil Commissioner at Bulawayo, the defendants called Mr. Holland, the manager of the Charterland Goldfields, and Mr. Sauer, who was manager of the Rhodesian Exploration Companies, chairman of the Chamber of Mines, and manager of other companies. Mr. Holland's view was that "flotation," according to the Stock Exchange use of the term, meant "inviting subscriptions from the public for the purpose of launching a company." "Flotation," he said, "is complete when the public have responded and the capital is provided." "There is no flotation of a company," he added, "if the shares are not publicly offered." Mr. Heyman said that "flotation" meant "the grouping of a certain number of claims to be formed in a gold-mining company to be worked at a profit." But he rather disappointed expectations by saying he was not in a position to give an opinion as to Mr. Holland's definition. He was not an expert on mining; he was manager of his company purely for financial purposes. Mr. Sauer thought that "flotation of claims" was "the flotation of claims to work at a profit into a company ordinarily called a gold-mining company." There were different kinds of flotation of claims, he said, "either into a developing company, a mining company, or other companies." In practice he would call the Charterland Goldfields a development company. But on being referred by the Court to the memorandum of the Charterlands Goldfields he added, "I would say Charterland Goldfields is a gold-mining company." In further answer to the Court he said that in applying the term "flotation of claims" a gold-mining company actually working claims at a profit was meant. That, he said, was the intention, though it was very often badly expressed in the agreement. Discarding some of the suggested conditions of "flotation" on which the learned counsel for the appellants no longer insisted, such as Mr. Holland's view that there could be no flotation unless the shares were publicly offered and Mr. Sauer's notion that the company must be actually working at a profit the fair result of the oral evidence seemed to be that the disposition made by the syndicate of those mining claims was "flotation" according to the ordinary acceptance of that term. The learned Chief Justice who presided in the Court of Appeal corroborated that view by saying, "Quite independently of the evidence given in this case I am of opinion that there has been a flotation of claims in the sense universally understood in South Africa." Having expressed that opinion, the learned Chief Justice proceeded to consider whether the mining laws in force in the territories of the British South Africa Company at the date of the contract required a different construction. The Court of Appeal, concurring with Mr. Justice Vincent, who tried the case, determine the question in the negative. Their Lordships agreed in that conclusion, but as that was the principal point in the argument before the board it would be proper to add a few words on the subject. It might be observed in passing that apparently the point was not made by any witness at the trial or relied on in the argument before the Judge of First Instance. Its importance seemed only to have been discovered in the argument before the Court of Appeal. It was probably owing to that circumstance that there was so little evidence about the practices of the British South Africa Company in regard to mining claims, while so much stress was now laid on regulations which appeared to have been habitually disregarded. The Mining Regulations No. 1, 1890, were nominally in force when the agreement of July, 1894, was made. Section I. declared that the right of mining for and disposing of all minerals belonged to the British South Africa Company. Any person might take out a licence to prospect, paying stamp duty and signing a declaration of obedience to the company. Every holder of a licence had the right to peg off ten quartz reefs claims in block. Then his title to those claims was to be inscribed in the Mining Commissioner's Register, and he was to receive a certificate, and thereupon his licence as a prospector ceased. Every quartz reef claim registered by any prospector was held on joint account in equal shares with the company, and every transfer of the claim-holder's interest in such claim was subject to the right of the company. Every claim-holder desirous of transferring his interest might effect such transfer at the office of the registrar of claims. The transfer was to be duly entered in a book to be kept for that purpose and a certificate of transfer was to be granted. No transfer was to be made until the same had been duly registered, and no registration was to be made until all dues were paid. Every digger had to do a certain amount of work upon his block within a certain limited time under penalty of forfeiture, but the Mining Commissioner might extend the time at his discretion. When the required amount of work was done the claim-holder was bound to apply for an inspection certificate, and on giving evidence of having opened up a payable reef and having done the required amount of work he was to receive an inspection certificate certifying that the required work had been done. Then came section 28, on which the main argument of the appellants was founded. It provided that "when the claim-holder shall have received his inspection certificate he shall request the company to make a proposal for the flotation of his block into either a joint-stock company or into a syndicate to further test the mine. The company shall within a reasonable time either make a proposal or decline to do so." The section then proceeded to deal with each alternative. On any flotation the vendor's scrip was to be divided between the company and the claim-holder. It was not very easy to see how that clause was to be worked. One of the defendants' witnesses called it "pure nonsense." In May, 1892, the British South Africa Company issued a notice stating that the company waived its present option of flotation of mineral companies as laid down in its mining regulations, but retained the right of veto on any particular flotation and required application for formal consent before any mineral companies could be floated. That notice did not seem to make the matter very much clearer. On being referred to sections 27 and 28 Mr. Sauer, the chairman of the Chamber of Mines, said that the Chartered Company had not enforced their rights under that old law—"that is to say," he added, "they have never demanded their rights from claim-holders." Now the argument on the part of the appellants was this:—They said that the parties to the agreement—the prospector and the syndicate—must have been familiar with the mining laws in force in the territories of the British South Africa Company; they must therefore have contracted on the basis of those regulations, and consequently "flotation" in the agreement must be confined to the particular kind of flotation referred to in section 28, that is, flotation by the British South Africa Company or by the claim holder with their consent and in either case after the grant of an inspection certificate. But that consequence did not necessarily follow. The word flotation in the agreement seemed to be used generally. There was no limitation attached to it nor any qualification of any sort. Why should it be confined to the particular flotation referred to in clause 28, which did not seem to have been a workable clause nor one insisted upon in practice? The British South Africa Company were not prejudiced by a transfer of mining claims in accordance with their own regulations. All dues up to the time of transfer must be paid. They knew what the consideration was. That must be set forth in the declaration made for the purpose of transfer duty. They might, if they pleased, demand one-half of the shares payable on the transfer. If they preferred to wait or thought it better not to insist on their rights, why should the prospector lie out of the remuneration which he has earned and which his employers, without taxing themselves, were in a position to pay? In the result, their Lordships were of opinion that the fulfilment of the requirements of sections 26, 27, and 28 did not enter into the definition of flotation and was not a condition precedent to the flotation contemplated by the agreement of July, 1894. Their Lordships were pressed by the learned counsel for the appellants to follow the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in the case of "Gifford v. Willoughby's Mashonaland Exhibition Company" (reported ante, p. 24). The Court there rejected a similar claim by a prospector founded on an agreement expressed in the same terms as the agreement of July 17, 1894. Unfortunately the circumstances of that case were not such as to make it of much assistance. The case came from the Commercial Court. There was no evidence given there. The place of evidence was supplied by statements of counsel. It did not appear, however, what those statements were. Some evidence seemed to have been given before the Court of Appeal, but that evidence—whatever it was—was left in equal obscurity. Nor had the decision itself the weight of a united judgment. Each of the learned Judges seemed to have taken a separate line, not always considering in the views of his colleagues, nor always pointing in the same direction. Their Lordships would humbly advise her Majesty that the appeal must be dismissed. The appellants would pay the costs of the appeal.

MACBETH V. WILD AND CO.*

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—When lay days commence—Construction of charter-party.

In this case the plaintiff sued on behalf of himself and all others the owners of the steamship Louisiana. The claim was for demurrage at the port of discharge. By a charter-party dated December 30, 1899, it was agreed between the owners of the Louisiana and the defendants, as freighters, that the steamship should "proceed to a customary safe loading berth in the River Nervion . . . as ordered (in writing) immediately on arrival (or lay days to count), and there load . . . a full and complete cargo of iron ore . . . and being so loaded shall . . . proceed to a safe berth at Middlesbrough-on-Tees as directed by consignees or their agents, to whom notice is to be given, within office hours, in writing, of the steamer being ready to discharge, and there deliver the cargo on being paid freight." "Lay days shall commence when the steamer is reported at the Custom-house, and in free pratique at the respective ports of loading and discharging, unless the loading or delivery has sooner commenced, but not to be reported between the hours of 4 p.m. and 10 a.m." The vessel loaded a cargo and proceeded to Middlesbrough. Notice was given to the plaintiff's agents that the vessel should discharge at Gjerns Wharf, Middlesbrough. On February 7, 1900, the vessel arrived and anchored at the Bell buoy within the Port of Middlesbrough, but owing to neap tides and the draught of the Louisiana there was not water enough for her to proceed to the named wharf. At noon on February 7 the vessel had been reported at the Custom-house and was lying at the Bell buoy in free pratique, and thereupon the captain gave to the charterers' agents written notice of such facts and of his contention that the lay days began at noon on that day. The charterers contended that until the ship had proceeded to the wharf as directed the lay days did not commence. The vessel remained at the Bell buoy waiting for sufficient draught of water until February 12, when, the tides having sufficiently made again, she proceeded towards the wharf and was moored alongside at 4 30 a.m. on February 14. The plaintiff claimed demurrage for the period from noon on February 7 to 4 30 a.m. on February 14.

Mr. J. A. Hamilton appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. J. Eldon Bankes for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—As a rule lay days begin to count as soon as the ship is ready to deliver her cargo at the agreed discharging berth, but the parties may stipulate differently if they choose, and here they have so chosen. In express terms the charter-party provides that the lay days are to commence when the steamer is reported at the Custom-house and is in free pratique at the Port of Middlesbrough. At noon on February 7 the steamer was reported and in free pratique. The lay days, therefore, began to run from that time. The defendants say that the plain provision of the charter-party is to be disregarded or to be read differently from its ordinary sense—first, because the notice of readiness to discharge could not be given while the steamer was at the Bell buoy; and, secondly, because the provision as to the loading necessitates a different reading of the lay-day clause from that which its wording seems to require. As to the first of these contentions, I think there is nothing in it. When the vessel gets to the designated discharging berth the notice must be given, and if it is not given, and time is thereby lost, the shipowner will be liable in damages; but the omission to give the notice will not prevent the running of the lay days which has already commenced. As to the second contention, it is to be noticed that it is based only on the loading clause, which, except for the purpose of throwing light on the meaning of the lay-day clause, is immaterial to the question in hand. The lay days at the loading port are to begin to run when the ship is reported at the Custom-house and in free pratique, and apparently they may begin sooner if the loading berth is not named immediately on the vessel's arrival. For aught I know, the vessel may not be able to report herself at the Customs in Spain until she is in a position to name her loading berth, and if so that would account for the provision as to the charterer giving immediate notice of the berth. But whether this be so or not, the difficulty in reading the lay-day clause with the stipulation in the loading clause ought not to prevent me from giving to the former its plain effect in connexion with the provision as to the discharge.

Judgment for the plaintiff, with costs.

SCOTT AND HORTON V. ERNEST.*

Stock Exchange—Rules—Failure of broker—
Liability of broker's client to jobber.

Rule 71 of the Stock Exchange Rules applies to selling-out or buying-in only as between members of the Stock Exchange.

The plaintiffs in this case were jobbers on the London Stock Exchange, and the action was brought to recover £348 damages from the defendant for his failure to take delivery of 1,000 Bayley's United and 500 Hannan's North shares bought on his behalf from the plaintiffs by a Mr. C. Hemmerde, a broker on the Stock Exchange. The shares had, on the defendant's instructions, been carried over from time to time, and at the mid-December account they were again carried over to the end of December account. On December 14 Mr. Hemmerde was declared a defaulter; and at the end of December account the plaintiffs, having ascertained that the defendant was the client for whom the shares had been bought, applied to him for a "name" for the shares. The defendant did not furnish a name, and declined to recognize the plaintiffs in the transaction. The plaintiffs thereupon sold the shares in the market, and, the price having fallen, claimed the difference from the defendant. The contracts entered into with the plaintiffs related solely to the defendant's shares, and the question as to privity of contract in these circumstances between the jobber and the client of a broker in default has recently been decided adversely to the present defendant's contention by Mr. Justice Mathew in "Anderson v. Beard" (5 Com. Cas., 261) and "Levite and Thornton v. Hamblet" (ante, p. 436), following the dictum of Mr. Justice Kennedy in "Beckhussen and Gibbs v. Hamblet" (5 Com. Cas., 217). This point, therefore, although pleaded in the present case, was not argued; neither was there any argument on the question as to the measure of damages, that point having also been dealt with in the previous cases. A point was however taken on behalf of the defendant which had not been raised in any of the other cases. It turned on the provisions of rule 71 of the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange, which is as follows:—"Buying-in or selling-out must be effected publicly by the secretary to the committee for general purposes, or by the clerks of the house in their respective markets, who shall trace the transaction to the responsible party, and claim the difference thereon." It was contended for the defendant that the sale of the shares having been made by the plaintiffs in the market, and not as provided by the rule, the plaintiffs could not recover in this action. The defendant also said that on December 15 he had given notice to Mr. Hemmerde to close the transaction.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. G. A. H. Branson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. F. G. Thomas for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, in delivering judgment, said that on the question of fact as to the notice to sell alleged to have been given by the defendant to the broker, he was not satisfied that the broker ever received the instructions, and his lordship thought that the defendant must have known that the broker had not received those instructions, because he (the defendant) never received a contract note from the broker or from the official assignee. The facts, therefore, were as follows:—The defendant instructed a broker on the Stock Exchange to buy certain shares for him. The shares were bought from the plaintiffs, who were jobbers, and were carried over from time to time. The last carrying over was at the mid-December account for the end of December account. The effect of the carrying-over transaction was that the broker, as the agent of the defendant, made a contract for him with the plaintiffs, by which contract the plaintiffs became bound to deliver the shares at the end of December account to the defendant or to his broker, if the broker remained, in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange, in a position to receive the shares and pay for them. If he did not do so, then the person to whom the shares were to be delivered in the ordinary course was the defendant. Privity of contract existed between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and if the broker failed to be able to carry out the transaction in the ordinary way, then it had to be carried out by the plaintiffs with the defendant. On December 14 the broker was declared a defaulter, and he thereupon ceased to be able to carry out any more of his transactions, and under the rules all the transactions which he then had open with members of the Stock Exchange were closed by the official assignee. That closing did not, however, affect the defendant's rights and obligations. The defendant remained liable to the plaintiffs on the contracts, the subject of this action, and the plaintiffs equally remained liable to the defendant, just as if the closing of the broker's transactions by the official assignee had not taken place. That closing was merely part of the machinery of the Stock Exchange, for the purpose of speedily and finally regulating accounts between members, and it affected no one else. Therefore, at the end of December account the contracts in this action were still subsisting, the parties being the plaintiffs and the defendant. The obligation of the defendant was to take up the shares which he had bought when the end of December account arrived. He could perform that duty by passing his own name, and by informing the plaintiffs that it was his own name into which the shares were to be transferred, and that when the transfer had been duly prepared and certified in the company's office, then he would pay for the shares. The defendant did not do that. He did not intimate that he would take the shares himself, and he did not furnish any other name. In these circumstances the remedy of the plaintiffs was to sell out the shares in the ordinary way. They did so. They sold them in the ordinary way on the Stock Exchange for the best possible price. The result was a loss which they now sought to recover. It was said that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover this loss, because they had not proceeded in the way directed by rule 71 of the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange, subject to which the transactions had been entered into. In his Lordship's opinion, rule 71 probably related only to selling-out or buying-in as between members and not as between members and outsiders. Many of those rules were made for the purpose of regulating business between members, and did not refer to cases where a member of the outside public was brought into direct relation with a jobber by reason of the failure of the broker employed. Further, even if the rule did apply to transactions such as the present, it was directory only, and the non-observance of it did not deprive the plaintiffs of their right to recover this loss. There would therefore be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed with costs.

A stay of execution was refused.

BEARD V. LONDON GENERAL OMNIBUS COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to third persons—Negligence—Personal injuries—Scope of servant's authority—Omnibus driven by conductor—Non-suit.

This was an application for a new trial of an action tried before Mr. Justice Lawrance and a jury. The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants. The plaintiff's case was that on December 31, 1899, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, he was riding a bicycle in the neighbourhood of Battersea-rose, when he was run down and severely damaged by one of the defendants' omnibuses. It appeared that the omnibus was just about to start on a fresh journey and was making a slight détour in coming from the stables to its starting-place in front of the Norfolk Arms. One of the plaintiff's witnesses, a police constable, said that the man who was driving the omnibus was not a licensed driver, but the conductor. At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendants' counsel submitted that there was no case to go to the jury, and the learned Judge withdrew the case from the jury and directed that judgment should be entered for the defendants. The plaintiff now applied for a new trial. It was contended on his behalf that the learned Judge was wrong in non-suiting the plaintiff on the ground that there was no evidence that the man who was driving the omnibus was acting within the scope of his authority. The question whether a servant or agent was acting within the scope of his authority was always a question of fact, and was for the jury. It was well known to be an every-day occurrence for the conductor of an omnibus to drive for short distances during the temporary absence of the driver, especially in bringing the omnibus to its starting-point for a fresh journey.

Mr. Moyses and Mr. A. J. Wallach appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Jelf, Q.C., and Mr. Clavell Salter for the defendants.

The COURT dismissed the application.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said this was an appeal from a nonsuit by Mr. Justice Lawrance. The plaintiff, while riding a bicycle, had been run over by an omnibus belonging to the defendants, and had been thereby damaged, and he brought this action in which he complained that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the driver of the omnibus. If the plaintiff had simply proved that the defendants' omnibus was being driven negligently, as it in fact was, then in his opinion there would have been prima facie evidence that it was being driven by the person whom the defendants had authorized as their agent to drive. There would have been a presumption in the plaintiff's favour that the person actually driving was the authorized driver. But here the plaintiff's case was opened on the footing that the omnibus was not being driven by the driver, but by the conductor. The duties of a driver and a conductor were quite independent duties, and prima facie it was not the duty of a conductor to drive. It seemed to him that the plaintiff had negatived the presumption which otherwise would have existed in his favour. He thought that Mr. Justice Lawrance had been right in coming to the conclusion that there was no evidence that the accident happened through the default of an agent authorized by the defendants to drive.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said he thought that this case was on the border-line. If on the evidence it was clear that the conductor was doing something outside his functions, then, in his opinion, the nonsuit was correct. But he did not think it would be right, without evidence as to what were the functions of the driver and the conductor, to assume that it was necessarily beyond the functions of the conductor to take charge of the omnibus during the temporary absence of the driver. Proprietors of omnibuses sent out their omnibuses under the charge of a driver and a conductor, and although it was true that the driver and the conductor had different functions to perform, it was quite consistent with that that it might be within the scope of the authority of the one to perform the functions of the other during the temporary absence of the other. If it appeared that at a time when one journey was at an end and another journey was about to commence the conductor turned the omnibus round, and in so doing negligently injured the plaintiff, he thought that the case ought to be left to the jury, and that it would be for the defendants to show that it was outside the functions of the conductor to take charge of the omnibus during the temporary absence of the driver. But in this case the evidence spoke of the omnibus coming down the hill at the rate of eight miles an hour, and that evidence seemed to him to show that the conductor was not merely performing the driver's duty temporarily, but to be consistent with this, namely, that the driver had done what he undoubtedly had no right to do—that was to say, that he had delegated his authority generally to the conductor. He thought, however, that it would be unfortunate if it should go forth that whenever the conductor of an omnibus was found exercising the functions of the driver, then no case could possibly be made out against the proprietors of the omnibus in an action for negligence, unless the plaintiff called evidence to account for the temporary absence of the driver, and that in default of such evidence there was no case to go to the jury. It seemed to him that the sounder and simpler view was that, where omnibuses were sent out in charge of a driver and a conductor, it ought to be left to the jury to say whether the particular act done by the conductor was within the scope of his authority as conductor. He could not say of his own knowledge whether during the interval between two journeys the conductor had any duties to perform with reference to the horses, and he was not prepared to say that the mere fact that the act complained of was an act of driving on the part of the conductor was sufficient reason for not leaving the case to the jury. But in this case that consideration was not important, because the plaintiff's own evidence showed that the omnibus was coming down the hill at a great pace, and therefore the onus was on the plaintiff to show that the act of which he complained, being an act of such a character that it could not have been within the scope of the authority of any one except the driver, was authorized, and in his opinion the mere absence of the driver did not make it necessary that the case should be left to the jury.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER said he agreed in thinking that the appeal failed. He was of opinion that the presumption of authority which would have existed in the plaintiff's favour had been rebutted by the plaintiff's own witnesses, when it was proved that the person who was driving the omnibus was not an authorized driver, but only a conductor who from his position alone was clearly not authorized by the defendant company to drive. The onus was thus cast upon the plaintiff to give further evidence of authority, but no such evidence was given, neither was any case of necessity made out or even alleged.

IN RE COLE (INFANTS).*

Infant—Custody—Religious education—Change of religion by mother after the father's death.

Mr. Justice Byrne delivered judgment in the above application involving the custody of the infant children of a widow who some two years after her husband's death had become a Roman Catholic, she having previously been a Protestant, and her husband having lived and died a Protestant.

His LORDSHIP said,—This is an application in relation to the care and custody of the infant children of the late Mr. W. H. Cole and of M. M. Cole, his widow. The parents were married on April 12, 1877. The father died on April 11, 1894. There were five children of the marriage then living, all of whom are alive now—viz., one son and four daughters. The son, who was born in 1878, is now of age. The four daughters are Lillian, who was 12 years of age at her father's death, and is now 18, Hilda, who was then nine and is now 15, Winifred, who was then nearly five and is now 11, and Dora, who was then two and is now eight. The father, who died after a long illness from consumption, left nothing and the children are without means. The mother earns a living as a nurse but is unable properly to support or to provide a permanent home for the infants. She hopes hereafter to be able to establish herself in the management of a private nursing home, but at present that is nothing more than a hope. After the father's funeral the future of the children was discussed between the widow and her husband's father and two brothers. The father and one brother and a sister arranged to make a weekly contribution towards the support of the widow and four of the children and Mr. James Cole, the other brother, who was married but without children, offered to adopt Winifred and bring her up as his own child. This offer was accepted by the mother, and accordingly this child was handed over to James Cole and his wife and has remained with them ever since, having been duly and properly maintained and educated by them. She has been brought up in the Protestant religion, which was that of her father and at that time the religion of her mother also. Up to about April, 1896, that is to say for about two years, Mrs. Cole, the widow, assisted by the contributions from her late husband's family, kept up a home in Canterbury, all the children being brought up as belonging to the Church of England, the eldest daughter being a constant attendant at Sunday school. The eldest son always has been and remains a Protestant. At about the date I have mentioned Mrs. Cole adopted the Roman Catholic religion and sent her two eldest daughters, Lillian and Hilda, to a Roman Catholic convent school in Paris, where they have ever since remained. I was asked to postpone giving judgment until I should have seen these girls, so as to be satisfied that they are well and contented. I have now seen them and am satisfied that they are well cared for. They expressed themselves as being very happy and contented, and I saw no reason whatever to doubt their statements. Having regard to the age of these girls and to the length of time they have now been brought up and educated in the Roman Catholic faith, I do not think it would be right to disturb existing arrangements with regard to them even if an alternative scheme were before me, as it is not. Their brother Sydney Cole and their uncle James Cole, indeed, by their counsel expressed themselves as willing that present arrangements should be undisturbed as to these two children subject to my seeing them, as I have done. In regard to the child Winifred I think that I should be acting not only unwisely, but in contravention of principles which have been laid down by the Court as guides in such matters if I were to allow her to be removed from the care of her uncle simply to be sent to a Roman Catholic boarding school, which is the alternative suggested, although she has not arrived at an age when religious convictions are very deeply seated. She has been for six years well and kindly brought up by her paternal uncle and his wife, who appear in every way to have done their duty by her, and apart from other considerations which I shall have to refer to more particularly when I come to deal with the case of the youngest child I do not think that such an arrangement as was made by her mother and the paternal uncle in reference to the adoption of this child ought to be lightly disturbed. She is being brought up in the religion of her late father, and there is no suggestion that she is otherwise than well cared for and happy. A warm affection, as might be expected under the circumstances, exists between the child and her adopted parents. The case of the youngest child is more difficult to deal with. She is now eight years old and has been placed in a Roman Catholic boarding school in England by her mother. There is no question in this case of taking away a child from a mother's care ; but I have to consider whether the custody and upbringing of the child should be with the paternal uncle, who offers to undertake to maintain and educate her as one of his own, where she will have the companionship of her sister and where she will be brought up in the faith of her father, or whether she is to be brought up in the Roman Catholic faith by strangers. Undoubtedly I have mainly to consider (a) the welfare of the child ; (b) the wishes of the mother ; and (c) the wishes and religion of the father. As to the first point I have no reason to doubt that so far as physical and educational advantages are concerned the child would be well cared for and well educated for her station in life whichever course were adopted, but with her uncle she would have the advantage of the care of kind relatives and (a matter to which I attach very great importance) the companionship of her sister, a little older than herself. As to the second point, the mother undoubtedly desires the child to be educated as a Roman Catholic at a Roman Catholic boarding school. As to the wishes and religion of the father, I have to consider the facts. The father was all his life attached to the Church of England, and he appears to have taken a real interest in religious matters. He expressed dislike to what he considered to be ritualistic practices in the Church of England, and, although he occasionally attended Roman Catholic services and is stated by his widow to have once used an expression which might be construed as telling her she might change her faith after his death, I think that the true result of the evidence is that he was and always continued to be a member of the Church of England. He and his wife were married and their children were baptized according to the rites of that Church ; he was attended during his last illness by a Church of England clergyman, and his Burial Service was conducted by the same clergyman. After the father's death the mother continued to be a Protestant for about two years, bringing up her children in that faith, the eldest child, Lilian, as I have mentioned, being a constant attendant at Sunday school. Then came the change of religion on the part of the mother and the breaking up of the home. In the case of "In re Magrath" (9 The Times L.R., 66 ; L.R. [1893], 1 Ch., 143), Lord Lindley says (p. 148), in reference to the matter of having regard to the religion of the father :—"As regards religious education, it is settled law that the wishes of the father must be regarded by the Court and must be enforced unless there is some strong reason for disregarding them. The Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, which has so greatly enlarged the rights of mothers after their husbands' deaths, has not changed the law in this respect. This was decided by Mr. Justice Stirling in 'In re Scanlan' (4 The Times L.R., 611 ; L.R., 40 Ch.D., 200), and is unquestionable. The consequence is that, notwithstanding that Act, a widow may still find herself compelled to bring up her child in a religion which she abhors. The wishes of the father, if not clearly expressed by him, must be inferred from his conduct. If the father is dead it will be naturally inferred that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, his wish was that the children should be brought up in his own religion—that is, the religion which he professed. This inference is one which the Court, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is bound to draw, and is practically not distinguishable from a rule of law to the effect that an infant child is to be brought up in its father's religion unless it can be shown to be for the welfare of the child that this rule should be departed from, or the father has otherwise directed." Under all the circumstances

No. 31.—VOL. XVI.

I think it would be right in the present case that the youngest child should be committed for the present, at all events, to the care and custody of the paternal uncle, James Cole, and I think the proper order to make will be to appoint him to act as guardian of the two youngest children jointly with the mother and to commit the custody of these children to him until further order, he undertaking duly and properly to maintain, clothe, and educate them while under his charge ; the mother to have any access to them she wishes, if she gives an undertaking that whilst in her charge nothing shall be said or done with her knowledge or assent to tend to lead them away from the Protestant religion. I think the children ought to be allowed to stay with her if she wishes it at reasonable times and for reasonable periods. There will be liberty to apply, so that in the event of change of circumstances rendering it proper or desirable any alteration or modification of the present order may be made. His Lordship said that he should add that there was not a word which had been said against the kindness and goodness of any one concerned who had had anything to do with the children.

Mr. Younger, Q.C., and Mr. Dittin appeared for the applicant ; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. E. F. Lankester for the respondents.

Copyright—Drawings and designs—Infringement —Unassignable licence—Registration of copyright after grant of licence.

This case raised a question as to copyright on the sale of electro blocks of designs or pictures. The plaintiffs were wholesale manufacturers of furs, mantles, and coat suits in an extensive way of business at Manchester and Glasgow. In September, 1898, they published a catalogue of newest designs for the winter season of that year containing 12 illustrations. Messrs. Evans and Williams, who were the plaintiffs' customers, received one of these catalogues, and the plaintiffs, at their request, supplied them with nine electro blocks of the illustrations, charging 4s. 6d. apiece. Messrs. Evans and Williams handed over these blocks to the defendants, Messrs. Petty and Sons, a firm of "fashion printers," for production in Messrs. Evans and Williams's catalogue, and it was stated that Messrs. Petty and Sons at the same time purchased the blocks of Messrs. Evans and Williams, deducting the price from their charge for the catalogues supplied to them. In November, 1898, Messrs. Petty and Sons produced for the defendants, Messrs. Bull and Sons, drapers at Oxford and Reading, a fashion catalogue containing eight illustrations from the blocks in question, but with different names. The plaintiffs thereupon registered under the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45), their catalogue containing the 12 illustrations, and brought the present action against Messrs. Petty and Sons and Messrs. Bull and Co. for an injunction restraining the reproduction and sale of the illustrations, and claiming delivery up of the blocks. The action as against Messrs. Bull and Co. was stayed on terms which were not stated. The defendants Messrs. Petty and Sons stated that they had purchased the blocks of Messrs. Evans and Williams without any conditions or restrictions, and contended, amongst other defences, that the plaintiffs had no copyright in the illustrations as they had not been registered under the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict., c. 68), and that registration of the catalogue under the Act of 1842 simply as a book was not sufficient to protect the illustrations separately.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., Mr. Rowden, Q.C., and Mr. E. S. Ford appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Bray, Q.C., Mr. Willis Bund, and Mr. G. F. Hart for the defendants Messrs. Petty and Sons; and Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the defendants Messrs. Bull and Co.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said that when the plaintiffs sold the blocks to Messrs. Evans and Williams it was not in the minds of either party that the blocks would be used for any other purpose except for the purpose of Messrs. Evans and Williams's catalogue. He found, as a fact, that the bargain between the parties was that a licence was given to Messrs. Evans and Williams to use the blocks for that purpose only. The defendants, Messrs. Petty and Sons, had insisted on the rights of Messrs. Evans and Williams and contended that they were entitled after having acquired the blocks from the former to use them for any catalogue. Now, quite apart from the question whether a licence must or must not be in writing, he was of opinion that the case of "Cooper v. Stephens" (11 The Times L.R., 283; [1895] 1 Ch., 567), when once he had arrived at the conclusion of fact as to the actual bargain, really substantially, if not entirely, covered the questions of law taken by the defendants, Messrs. Petty and Sons, in this case. "Cooper v. Stephens" was a case where the plaintiffs were the registered owners of the copyright in books containing illustrations drawn by themselves of carriages, and their principal business was to supply copies of the drawings to persons in the carriage trade for advertising purposes, the copies being generally printed by themselves and supplied to the customers on advertising sheets. Occasionally, however, their customers wished to print the designs themselves with other matter not printed by the plaintiffs, and in these cases the plaintiffs sold the electro blocks. One Lilley, having thus acquired two blocks, afterwards allowed the defendants to use them. There was then no written licence from the plaintiffs to Lilley or from him to the defendants or written agreement with reference to the use of the electros. At the trial, it was found that three other drawings were copied from the plaintiffs' book. Mr. Justice Romer held that the sale of the blocks conferred no copyright on Lilley, but was a mere licence to use them, and that a substantial part of the block had been taken by the defendants in that case. In the present case a fortiori, where it was eight out of 12 of the drawings, there was a very substantial part of the plaintiffs book taken. The case of "Cooper v. Stephens" practically covers, if not entirely, the points of law that had been taken in the present case. The first point, speaking generally, was that the registration was insufficient in the present case, the plaintiffs not having registered their copyright prior to the transaction when the blocks were sold for the very purpose he had mentioned, and it was said that if a man being possessed of a copyright in a book, not having registered that copyright, chooses to sell or license to another to use one of the illustrations in that book, he is thereby debarred from afterwards asserting his right in the copyright in that portion of the book because he had not registered under the Fine Arts Act, 1862. He did not think that argument well founded. It was said it did not appear in the case of "Cooper v. Stephens" whether the book had or had not been registered prior to the licence in question. Certainly nothing was said to show that it had been registered prior to that date; but, whether that was so or not, he was of opinion that a man, being possessed of a copyright in a book, did not lose that copyright by reason of the grant of a partial licence or of a licence to use it, and that he was not prevented from suing an infringer if, before action brought, he registered his book. In other words, he did not by allowing a man to use a picture or pictures, which were a portion or portions of his book, lose his copyright in the book because he had not registered under the Act of 1862 for the protection of engravings or works of fine art. Another point taken was that purchasers of blocks might use them as they pleased. That depended, in his Lordship's mind, entirely upon the bargain made when the sale took place, and it did not appear to him that in point of law, under circumstances such as the present, the bargain was to be construed otherwise than as a licence to use for a particular purpose, merely because in order to allow that licence of user to be made use of a block or means of copying was supplied to the person to whom the licence was granted. The plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and delivery up of the blocks.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. BARKER.*

Nuisance—What amounts to—Tramway across road—Sanction of County Council—Injunction.

In this action, which raised an important question as to highways, the Attorney-General, at the relation of William Norman Greenwood, Harold Greenwood, Percy Greenwood, and Oscar Greenwood, and the said relators as plaintiffs, sought a mandatory injunction to compel the defendants, James Barker and Joseph Haigh, to remove the rails, tramplates, and other articles used in the construction of a certain tramway so far as the same crosses two several highways, and to restore the said highways to the condition in which the same were previously to the construction of the said tramway, and an injunction to restrain the defendants from constructing any tramway across the said highways so as to constitute a nuisance.

Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. MacSwinney appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Younger, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart Smith for the defendants.

The relators are tenants in common in fee simple of the mansion-house and grounds called Greenwood Leghe, situated near Ingleton, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and three of them reside in the mansion-house. The defendants are the owners of the Ingleton Collieries and Brickworks, which lie about two-thirds of a mile to the west of Greenwood Leghe. Between the collieries and the mansion-house lie in the following order:—(1) A narrow highway known as Barber Top-lane (used principally as an agricultural road to the adjoining farm-lands); (2) a highway known as the Keighley and Kendal road (hereinafter called the "main road," and being the main road between those two towns); and (3) a branch line of the Midland Railway Company. The relators own all the fields except one lying between the Ingleton Collieries and the Midland branch line. There are the following approaches to the mansion-house of Greenwood Leghe:—(1) The principal approach is along a carriage drive which starts from the main road and crosses the branch line by a bridge; (2) the second approach is by a cart road, which also starts from the main road and crosses the branch line by a bridge; and (3) the third approach is from the main road into a lane called Green-lane, and thence along a back carriage drive. The main road was constructed under an Act of Parliament in 1827, and its control is now vested, by virtue of the Local Government Act, 1888, in the county council of the West Riding. The control of Rarber Top-lane is now vested, by virtue of the Local Government Act, 1894, in the Settle Rural District Council. By a letter from their clerk, dated April 27, 1898, the Settle Rural District Council consented to the construction by the defendants of a tramway across Rarber Top-lane, so far as they had power to do so. Later in the same year the defendants applied to the county council of the West Riding for permission to carry the tramway across the main road at Ingleton, and an agreement, dated December 31, 1898, and purporting to be made between the county council and the defendants, was put in evidence, by which the council "to the extent of their lawful powers" agreed to permit the defendants to construct a temporary tramway on a gauge of 24in. across the main road. There were also provisions as to the methods of constructing and working the tramway so as to ensure the convenience and safety of the public, and the defendants agreed to indemnify the council against all actions and proceedings in relation to the laying down of the tramway and against all damages that might be incurred in respect of accidents or injuries. This agreement was duly executed by both defendants, but was never sealed by the county council. On February 27, 1899, the Highways Committee, "to the extent of the lawful powers of the county council," acceded to an application by the defendants to permit the substitution of a tramway with a gauge of 4ft. 8½in., instead of the 24in. gauge authorized by the agreement, and this resolution was endorsed on the agreement and signed by the solicitor to the council. Early in 1899 the relators gave notice of their objection to the construction of the tramway, and after correspondence between the parties the writ in the present action was issued on June 16. The tramway was completed by the defendants in the following August. The tramway runs from the Ingleton Collieries to the Midland branch line, crossing on the level both Rarber Top-lane and the main road, the latter at a point between two of the approaches to Greenwood Leghe—viz., the front carriage drive and the cart road above mentioned. The space between the rails on both level crossings is paved with square sets, and a similar paving is extended 18in. on the outward side of the rails on the main road crossing. Railway trucks are drawn by horses backwards and forwards along the tramway, carrying principally bricks, but also a small quantity of coal and red ash.

MR. HUGHES said that the level crossings constituted both a public and private nuisance, and could not be authorized by the local authorities. A level crossing was prima facie a nuisance, and there was no need to prove public injury—"Attorney-General v. Shrewsbury Bridge Company" (21 Ch.D., 752), "Attorney-General v. London and North-Western Railway Company" ([1900] 1 Q.B., 78)—as its construction was an illegal act. It was a breach of section 118 of 3 Geo. IV., c. 126, which was still in force, and which prohibited the breaking-up of any turnpike road. Counsel also referred to the following cases:—"Reg. v. Charlesworth" (16 Q.B. Rep., 1,012); "Reg. v. Train" (2 B. and S., 640); "Mayor of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird" ([1896] App. Cas., 434); "Goodson v. Richardson" (L.R., 9 Ch., 221); "Salt Union v. Harvey" (13 The Times L.R., 297). The evidence called by the plaintiffs, which referred principally to the level crossing over the main road, was to the effect that the crossing and trucks approaching it could not be seen for some distance on either side owing to intervening buildings and the walls that bounded the road, that the crossing was liable to frighten horses, and that it severely jolted persons who passed over in vehicles and on bicycles. One of the plaintiffs stated that in order to avoid the crossing he sometimes when driving used the back approach, which he would otherwise not do because of a steep ascent in Green-lane. A witness, who had been employed to watch the crossing, said that between March 16 and July 3, 1900, he had counted 166 trucks of bricks, six of coals, and seven of red ash. Evidence was also given that the existence and user of the tramway would depreciate the plaintiffs' property as a building estate.

A number of witnesses were called for the defence, who denied that either of the level crossings was a nuisance or dangerous to traffic. The defendant James Barker said that he had complied with all the requisitions of the county council, that on an average only four or five trucks a day passed along the tramway, that the trucks were always preceded by a man whose business it was to see if the lane and the road were clear, and that he had no intention of using a locomotive on the tramway. The chairman of the Settle Rural District Council said that a resolution had been passed by the council consenting to the level crossing over Rarber Top-lane, and a member of the Highways Committee of the West Riding County Council said that the committee had passed a resolution sanctioning the level crossing over the main road. As Mr. Justice Farwell had objected to the informality of the evidence with respect to the action of the county council, Mr. Wardell, assistant solicitor to the council, was called by Mr. Younger and produced the minute of the resolution passed by the Highways Committee sanctioning the level crossing, and also the report of the committee to the council in which that resolution was embodied. He said that in 1889 the council had delegated to the Highways Committee powers under sections 6 and 11 of the Local Government Act, 1888. In ordinary cases, such as the application by the defendants, the committee reported to the council, and the council adopted the report.

In answer to Mr. Hughes, the witness said he had not brought with him the minutes showing that the report of the committee had been adopted by the council, but he had no doubt it had been duly adopted. So far as he knew, the resolution of the committee sanctioning the alteration of the gauge of the tramway had never been reported to the council.

MR. YOUNGER contended that so far as the allegation of a private nuisance was concerned, the plaintiffs must prove special and particular damages—"Winterbottom v. Lord Derby" (L.R., 2 Ex., 316), "Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works" (L.R., 4 Q.B., 358), "Benjamin v. Storr" (L.R., 9 C.P., 400), "Caledonian Railway Company v. Walker's Trustees" (7 App. Cas., 259). This they had failed to do. There was no proof that they intended to turn their land into a building estate and the evidence as to possible depreciation was altogether too vague. As to the allegation of a public nuisance, the plaintiffs started with the assumption that a level crossing was necessarily a nuisance. That assumption was rebutted by "Matson v. Baird" (3 App. Cas., 1,082). What the local authorities had done was incident to their control of highways under the Local Government Acts, and was a reasonable exercise of their powers. Even though the agreement with the defendants had not been sealed by the council, there had been part performance by the defendants, and that was sufficient—"Mayor of Kidderminster v. Hardwick" (L.R., 9 Ex. 13), "Melbourne Banking Corporation v. Broughan" (4 App. Cas., 156), "Mayor of Oxford v. Crow" ([1893] 3 Ch., 535).

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL, after describing the nature of the action and the locus in quo, said that the first question he had to consider was one of fact—were the level crossings constructed by the defendants a public nuisance? He would deal first with the level crossing on the main road. Mr. Hughes had invited him to hold that the defendants had done something which was forbidden by statute. So far as he knew, that point had not been raised in any of the reported cases, and he preferred to regard himself as a jury dealing with a pure question of fact. There had been a great deal of evidence on both sides, including that of a number of experts. Experts, however, only gave their opinion one way or the other, and he thought it better to deal with the outside evidence of fact. The plaintiffs' witnesses had spoken of actual inconvenience suffered by themselves, and he saw no reason to doubt the accuracy of their statements. It was clear that horses had shied and stopped dead at the crossing, and that vehicles had been jolted. It was true that the defendants' witnesses had said that they experienced no discomfort, but the evidence of 20 witnesses who had felt nothing did not deserve so much consideration as the evidence of six witnesses who had felt something. Some people felt a jolt more than others, and horses differed both in age and temper. It was a question of degree. It was clear also that cyclists, whose claims merited attention, ran some risk in coasting down the gentle slope leading to the crossing, though he was not concerned to say whether a cyclist was entitled to coast or not. He found as a fact that the crossing on the main road was a public nuisance. As to the crossing in Rarber Top-lane, the evidence was not so forcible, though the narrowness of the lane added to the danger with a nervous or restive horse. On the whole he thought the facts were sufficiently strong to prove that this crossing also was a public nuisance. Then came the question of law raised by the defendants. It was argued that the local authorities had sanctioned the construction of the tramway. The only evidence of the sanction in the case of Rarber Top-lane was the oral testimony of a witness and a letter from the clerk of the Settle Rural District Council to the defendant Barker. That was not the proper way of proving the sanction of a public body, and he must disregard it. The evidence as to the authorization by the county council of the crossing over the main road was in a curious condition. The agreement with the defendants had never been sealed by the council, although the defendants had been warned in May, 1899, that the plaintiffs did not admit the agreement. There had apparently been a delegation of authority by the council in 1889 to the Highways Committee. But no resolution had been produced showing that the committee could sanction anything without referring the matter back to the council, and it was clear that at any rate the resolution by the committee for the alteration of gauge had never been reported to or adopted by the council. He was, therefore, not convinced that the defendants had proved that they had got the sanction of the county council. But even assuming that they had got such sanction, had the county council power to allow the construction of that which the Court held to be a nuisance? The council were given the management of the roads under the Act of 1888, and the roads were vested in them for the purpose of maintaining and using them as roads. There was nothing allowing the council to destroy a road in toto, and, therefore, he thought there was no power which allowed the council to interfere with a road so as to cause what the Court found as a fact to be a nuisance. He held that the council had no power to grant leave to commit a nuisance. The case of "Matson v. Baird" was distinguishable, and involved no question of nuisance at all. Then it was argued that the tramway was beneficial because it relieved the traffic which would otherwise pass over a portion of the road. That argument was disposed of by "Reg. v. Train." It was not possible to set off against a nuisance some convenience with regard to the user of another part of the road. Then he had to consider the case as it affected the relators. He agreed that special damage must be proved, and he thought that such damage had been proved by the evidence as to the depreciation of the plaintiffs' land as a building estate and the inconvenience suffered by the plaintiffs in being debarred from access by their front drive. The plaintiffs were accordingly entitled to the injunctions which they sought, and the defendants must pay the costs.

The mandatory injunction was stayed for a month with a view to an appeal.

ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF CAMBERWELL V. ELLIS.*

Poor Rate—Assessment—Publichouse—Increase of value—Premium paid for lease—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, secs. 46 and 47.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 39) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (the Lord Chief Justice and Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Vaughan Williams), dated November 18, 1899, and the question was whether the appellants were justified in increasing the assessment of the respondent's premises between two quinquennial valuations. The hearing below is reported ante, p. 39; L.R. [1900], 1 Q.B., 68; 69 L.J., Q.B., 202.

The respondent appealed to the Court of quarter sessions for the County of London against the assessment, but his appeal was dismissed, subject to a case stated for the Queen's Bench Division. The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Lawrence and Mr. Justice Channell) dismissed the appeal, but their decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the premises struck out of the supplemental valuation list. The material parts of the case, in which the respondent in the House of Lords is described as "the appellant," were as follows:—1. The appellant is and has been since October, 1896, the occupier of a publichouse known as the Adam and Eve, High-street, Peckham, in the parish of Camberwell. 2. At the quinquennial valuation in 1895 the gross and rateable values of the said publichouse were fixed at £485 and £405 respectively, which values were duly entered in the quinquennial valuation list made in that year. 3. By a provisional list made in December, 1896, the assessment of the said publichouse was increased by the overseers to £600 gross and £500 rateable value, and objection was made by the appellant to the said increased assessment on the ground that the said publichouse had not in the course of the year in which the said provisional list was made increased in value by the addition thereto or erection thereon of any building, nor had there been any increase of value from any cause within the meaning of section 47 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. 4. At the hearing of the objection the assessment committee endeavoured to get from the appellant information as to the premium given by him for the lease of the said public-house. This information the appellant refused to give, and the assessment committee, after hearing the said objection and viewing the publichouse, reduced the assessment to £575 gross and £485 rateable value. 5. In the supplemental valuation list made in 1897 the appellant's publichouse was again valued and assessed at £575 gross and £485 rateable. 6. The appellant objected, and on appearing before the assessment committee contended inter alia—(1) That the said publichouse had been improperly included in the provisional list, and therefore ought not to be included in the supplemental list and was therein too highly rated; (2) that no alteration in the value of the publichouse had taken place during the 12 months preceding the making of the supplemental valuation list within the meaning of section 46, subsection 1, of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; and (3) that the overseers were not in law entitled to consider or in any way to act on any sum of money paid or supposed to have been paid for the publichouse either since the date of the valuation list in force at the time of the making of the said provisional list or at all. 7. The assessment committee refused to grant the appellant any relief, and he appealed to the quarter sessions for the County of London. 8. At the hearing of the appeal counsel for the appellant again objected to any questions being asked or any evidence being given about the premium paid by the appellant. The Court, however, over-ruled the objection and the fact was elicited that the appellant had paid £16,400 as the consideration for his lease. No evidence was given as to the precise amount of the premium paid in 1895 or any time previously, but it was admitted by one of the appellant's witnesses that assuming the valuation appearing in the quinquennial list made in 1895 to have been calculated according to the method usually adopted in the parish of Camberwell the valuation must have been based on a supposed payment of a premium of about £6,400. The assessment committee, however, at the time of the revision of the quinquennial valuation list did not in fact know the precise amount of the premium which had been paid by the then occupier. Evidence was given by a valuer on behalf of the respondents that there had been since the date of the quinquennial valuation list a general appreciation of licensed premises throughout the metropolis, and that, in his opinion, the annual value of the said publichouse had between April and October, 1896, increased by about £100. It was, however, admitted that there had been no structural alteration to the publichouse. No evidence was given of any circumstances specially affecting the annual value of the publichouse. The respondents contended they were not bound to give any such evidence, but that it was enough for them to show that the value had in fact increased. It was further admitted that no publichouses had been placed in the provisional or supplemental lists except such as had in fact been sold since the date of the quinquennial valuation thereof, although publichouses in the neighbourhood had generally increased in value. 9. For the assessment committee it was contended that it was not necessary that there should be a structural alteration of the rated premises in order to warrant their insertion in a supplemental list, that the facts mentioned as to the premiums given for the lease of the publichouse were evidence of an alteration in matters stated in the quinquennial valuation list during the 12 months preceding the making of the supplemental list within section 46 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and that the payment of such premium showed that there had been such a material and unforeseen alteration of the value of the publichouse as to warrant its insertion in the supplemental list. 10. For the appellant it was contended that the facts hereinbefore mentioned were not in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of section 46, subsection 1 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and that all evidence as to the amount of premium paid by the appellant for the publichouse in October, 1896, was irrelevant and inadmissible and that the amount of such premium in the absence of any evidence save as hereinbefore stated as to the premiums previously paid could not afford any indication of an alteration in the value of the publichouse. 11. The Court of quarter sessions gave judgment confirming the values in the supplemental list. 12. The questions for the opinion of the Court are :—1. Whether the alteration in value which took place during the 12 months preceding the making of the said supplemental valuation list was in law an alteration within the meaning of section 46, subsection 1 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869. 2. Whether the amount of premium paid by the appellant in October, 1896, for the said premises ought to have been received in evidence. 3. Whether the amount of such premium was in law any evidence of an alteration within the meaning of the subsection hereinbefore mentioned.

Mr. Balfour Browne, Q.C., Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., and Mr. Ryde were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Littler, Q.C., Mr. Page, Q.C., and Mr. W. Russell for the respondent were not heard.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving that the appeal should be dismissed, said that the questions reserved were questions of law and not of fact. If the quarter sessions had found as a fact that there was an alteration in value, their Lordships would have had no power to disturb such a finding. But the question submitted was whether such alteration was in law one which came within the meaning of section 46. It appeared to his Lordship that there was no evidence of alteration within that section even if the value of the house was greater in one year than in the other. The Act of 1869 for obvious reasons, aiming at a uniform assessment in the metropolis and to prevent the recurrence of the same question—to the great expense of the parish and the vexation of the ratepayer—from year to year, had determined that the assessment once made should continue in force for the statutory period. But it was felt that difficulties might arise if the list were altogether unalterable, and the statute provided that if there were any alteration in a particular hereditament which was increased in value by structural alteration or "any cause whatever," inquiry should be made into the circumstances of such case. The words in the clause following the reference to structural alteration were wide but intelligible. The statute did not attempt to define the conditions of the clause's operation. It would be extremely dangerous to attempt to lay down a proposition to cover every possible case; each case must stand by itself; and he would not attempt to lay down any principle. But there must be definite circumstances to which the alteration was assignable; the mere fact that there had been an alteration of value was not sufficient. As matter of law, in answer to the first question he would say that evidence that the house was worth more than the amount at which it was assessed ought not to be received. It was remarkable that there was no evidence of the supposed value at the quinquennial valuation. One might have expected a statement showing a gradual increase and a comparison between the two periods. There was here nothing of the kind, and in answer to the second question he would say that in itself and apart from such comparison and special circumstances the amount of premium afforded no guide. In answer to the third question, the amount of the premium was not in law, apart from such comparison as he had referred to, evidence of alteration within the meaning of the statute.

He agreed, therefore, with the judgment of the Court of Appeal pronounced by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams; but he would hesitate to adopt some of the reasons or to accept the illustrations, from the cycle trade, gunpowder, and the like adduced by the learned Judge. In moving the dismissal of the appeal he did so simply on the facts before their Lordships, and did not desire to lay down any general proposition.

LORD SHAND was of the same opinion. If such grounds of alteration were to be recognized as this appeal was based upon there might as well be no quinquennial valuation at all. To establish a case such as that of the appellants there must be some definite cause similar in character to those referred to in the statute, additions or erections, or the like. A general appreciation of licensed premises was certainly not enough for the purpose. He did not deny that some of the circumstances which had in the course of the argument been referred to by Lord Davey—the building of a bridge or the establishment of a large factory—might justify such an intermediate valuation. But the onus of proof was upon the person demanding alteration, and there was here no justification for the claim.

LORD DAVEY said that the first thing was to construe the words of section 47:—"If in the course of any year the value of any hereditament is increased by the addition thereto or erection thereon of any building, or is from any cause increased or reduced in amount." He agreed that the words could not be confined to cases of structural alteration, but he thought the words "from any cause" were to be read as indicating causes ejusdem generis with those specified, in the sense that the cause must affect the value of the particular property. He agreed with Lord Justice Vaughan Williams that it lay upon those who desired to alter the assessment to prove the nature of the cause for the alteration in value. It was insufficient to state simply that there had been an alteration; a definable cause must be assigned and shown to affect the value of the particular property. It might also affect other properties, but it must be proved to influence the value of the hereditament in question. He agreed with the Lord Chancellor in his observations on the object of the quinquennial valuation and the danger of nullifying the beneficial results which were intended. Various illustrations had been put, but he thought it wiser to follow the Act itself and not to attempt an exact definition of the circumstances which would justify a fresh assessment. He should, like his noble friend, hesitate to accede to some of the illustrations given by the Court of Appeal. It was enough to say that, in his opinion, a general increase in the value of this class of property was not sufficient to justify a re-assessment, and he would answer the questions in the case stated in the same way as his noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

LORD ROBERTSON concurred with all that had been said by their Lordships. The general scheme of the Act was that the valuation was to stand for five years irrespective of fluctuations of general value which might occur during that period. But the Legislature also dealt with the case of individual hereditaments, the value of which happened to have been altered not by general economic or social change but by change in their own individual conditions affecting value. In the present instance nothing appeared to show anything special or individual in the cause of the alleged enhancement of the value of this house, so as to bring the case within the scope of the sections founded on.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed.

HOVENDEN AND SONS V. MILLHOFF.*

Principal and Agent—Secret commission—Bribe to purchaser's agent—Liability of vendor to repay.

This was an application by the plaintiffs for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Grantham and a special jury, reported in The Times of May 4 and 8. The action was brought to recover the amount of certain sums alleged to have been paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs' buyers, and for the return of alleged over-charges for goods sold by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs were wholesale perfumers and hair-dressers' sundrymen, carrying on business in Berners-street and in the City-road. The defendant was a tobacconist, who formerly carried on business in partnership with a man named Drapkin. The plaintiffs employed buyers, and they bought from the defendant cigars and cigarettes for several years, amounting in the whole to the value of £28,000. The plaintiffs discovered that the defendant had been in the habit of giving presents to the plaintiffs' buyers at midsummer and Christmas, and brought this action. The defendant proved at the trial that the charges for the goods sold to the plaintiffs were fair and reasonable, and were not excessive. The questions left to the jury and their answers were as follows:—(1) Did the defendant fraudulently conspire with any of the plaintiffs' buyers to charge excessive prices for goods?—No. (2) Were the prices excessive?—No. (3) Did the payments, being admittedly unknown to the plaintiffs, have any effect on the minds of the agents in favour of the defendants, in inducing the agents to give the orders and to pay the prices stipulated for?—Yes. (4) If yes, what were the damages?—One farthing. The learned Judge, upon these findings, entered judgment for the defendant.

Mr. JELF, Q.C. (Mr. Courthope-Munroe and Mr. W. H. Leese with him), for the plaintiffs, said that, though the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the charges for the goods were excessive, yet it was clear law that when a bribe was paid to a servant in a case like the present, the servant's master could recover the amount of the bribe from the person giving it—"Grant v. Gold Exploration and Development Syndicate" (ante, p. 86, and [1900] 1 Q.B., 233). The effect which the bribe had upon the mind of the person bribed was immaterial—"Shipway v. Broadwood" ([1899] 1 Q.B., 369). The verdict of the jury here upon the admitted facts was absurd. Once the payments were admitted, the only question was what was their amount, and when that was ascertained the plaintiffs were entitled to recover that amount from the defendant. It was suggested that the payments amounted to about £700, and the plaintiffs asked for an inquiry to ascertain the amount. The payment of these presents or bribes extended over about 14 years. The jury must have misunderstood the question they had to decide, and thought that, as the prices for the goods were not excessive, they must give a verdict for nominal damages. He also referred to "Salford Corporation v. Lever" ([1891] 1 Q.B., 168), "Shickle v. Lawrence" (2 The Times L.R., 776).

Mr. MARSHALL-HALL, Q.C., and Mr. R. E. MOORE, for the defendant, contended that the case set up by the plaintiffs on the pleadings was that there was a fraudulent conspiracy to charge the plaintiffs excessive prices for the goods, and the jury negatived this. That was the issue. The jury found that the prices charged were not excessive. It was proved that the prices charged to the plaintiffs for the goods were the lowest market prices. The presents given to the plaintiffs' buyers were not bribes; they were not given in pursuance of any prior agreement, and they did not increase the prices charged for the goods. The amount of the presents could not be recovered. In no case had a plaintiff recovered payments made to an agent unless a fraudulent intent was proved. In all the cases the payments had swollen the price of the goods. The recovery of money from the agent stood on a different footing. Further, the parties agreed at the trial to leave it to the jury to fix the amount, and the plaintiffs could not now complain that the jury had awarded them too small a sum.

The COURT allowed the application, and directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the plaintiffs, who were perfumers, had during a period of 12 years been purchasers of tobacco from the defendant, the value of the tobacco so purchased amounting altogether to £28,000. In 1899 the plaintiffs found out that the defendant had been in the habit of paying their agents 2½ per cent. on the invoice price of the tobacco, such payment having been at the time quite unknown to the plaintiffs. They accordingly commenced this action, in which they claimed recovery of the amount of the secret commissions paid by the defendant, and the return of certain overcharges, and also damages for conspiracy. The charge of conspiracy was negatived at the trial, and the question which they now had to consider was whether the commissions or bribes paid by the defendant could be recovered by the plaintiffs against the defendant. The jury found, in effect, that the defendant had paid the plaintiffs' agents a bribe of 2½ per cent. commission amounting to £710, but, though they found that that was proved, they returned a verdict for one farthing damages. In his opinion it was clear that, where a vendor bribed the vendee's agent by paying him 2½ per cent. on the invoice price, the meaning of that was that the price charged to the vendee was loaded by the amount so paid by the vendor to the vendee's agent. When the vendee discovered the payment, he was entitled to complain that the vendor had overcharged him by the amount of the bribe and to demand that it should be paid back to him again. He thought that, when it was proved that the bribe had been paid, the jury ought to have been directed that the amount which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover was the amount by which the price charged to the plaintiffs had been enhanced. The consequence of the bribe was that the defendant obtained an enhanced price, and that was the measure of damages. In his opinion, therefore, the verdict of the jury for a farthing damages was clearly and altogether wrong. The fact that Mr. Justice Grantham had directed judgment to be entered for the defendant seemed still more astonishing. He thought that the application should be allowed, and, as neither party wished that the expense of a new trial should be incurred, the judgment would be set aside, and judgment would be entered by consent for the plaintiffs for £710 damages.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said that he entirely agreed. He referred to the judgment of Lord Justice Collins in "Grant v. Gold Exploration and Development Syndicate," and said it seemed to be clear that the amount of the bribes could be recovered as money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiffs' use.

LORD JUSTICE ROMER delivered judgment in the following terms:—The Courts of law of this country have always strongly condemned and, when they could, punished the bribing of agents, and have taken a strong view as to what constitutes a bribe. I believe the mercantile community as a whole appreciate and approve of the Courts' views on the subject. But some persons undoubtedly hold laxer views on the subject. Not that these persons like the ugly word "bribe" or would excuse the giving of a bribe if that word be used, but they differ from the Courts in their view as to what constitutes a bribe. It may, therefore, be well to point out what is a bribe in the eyes of the law. Without attempting an exhaustive definition I may say that the following is one statement of what constitutes a bribe. If a gift be made to a confidential agent with the view of inducing the agent to act in favour of the donor in relation to transactions between the donor and the agent's principal and that gift is secret as between the donor and the agent—that is to say, without the knowledge and consent of the principal—then the gift is a bribe in the view of the law. If a bribe be once established to the Court's satisfaction, then certain rules apply. Amongst them the following are now established, and, in my opinion, rightly established, in the interests of morality with the view of discouraging the practice of bribery. First, the Court will not inquire into the donor's motive in giving the bribe, nor allow evidence to be gone into as to the motive. Secondly, the Court will presume, in favour of the principal and as against the briber and the agent bribed, that the agent was influenced by the bribe; and this presumption is irrebuttable. Thirdly, if the agent be a confidential buyer of goods for his principal from the briber, the Court will assume as against the briber that the true price of the goods as between him and the purchaser must be taken to be less than the price paid to, or charged by, the vendor by, at any rate, the amount or value of the bribe. If the purchaser alleges loss or damage beyond this, he must prove it. As to the above assumption, we need not determine now whether it could in any case be rebutted. As at present advised, I think in the interests of morality the assumption should be held an irrebuttable one; but we need not finally decide this, because in the present case there is nothing to rebut the presumption.

IN RE DE WILTON—DE WILTON V. MONTEFIORE.*

Husband and Wife—Marriage—Validity.

A marriage between two Jewish British subjects, an uncle and a niece, contracted at Wiesbaden, where it would have been legal, held to be invalid by the law of England.

This was a summons raising a question as to the shares into which, in the events which had happened, the residuary estate of the testatrix, Mrs. Laura Judith De Wilton, was divisible. This involved a further question as to the validity of a marriage contracted between a daughter of the testatrix and her maternal uncle, both of the parties being of the Jewish faith and the marriage having been solemnized according to the rites and usages of the Jews at Wiesbaden, where such a marriage would have been legal.

The testatrix by her will, dated July 30, 1889, gave certain stocks and securities to her trustees upon trust to divide the same into three equal shares, and declared that her trustees should stand possessed of one of such shares upon trust to pay the income thereof to her daughter, Consueloe, during her life, and after her death to stand possessed of such share in trust for the children or remoter issue of such daughter born or to be born during her life, or within 21 years after her death as the daughter should appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for all the children of the daughter, who being sons should attain 21 or being daughters should attain that age or marry. And if there should be no child or other issue of such daughter who should attain 21, or being daughters should marry, then after the death of the daughter and default or failure of children or issue, the testatrix declared that the said share of the trust fund should accrue to the shares of any other daughter or daughters who should be living at her death in equal shares. And the testatrix further declared that the trustees should stand possessed of another of such one-third shares upon the like trusts in favour of her daughter Eugenie and her issue. After disposing of the remaining one-third share the testatrix gave her residuary estate to the trustees in trust for all her children, including any who might have died in her lifetime leaving issue living at the death of the testatrix, and so that the share of any child who might have died in her lifetime leaving issue as aforesaid should devolve on his or her representatives in the same manner as if he or she had survived the testatrix and died immediately after her. And she directed that the trustees should retain the share of each daughter in the residuary trust fund and hold the same upon the like trusts in favour of each such daughter, her children, or issue as were thereinbefore declared of and concerning their said respective one-third share of the beforementioned trust fund. By a codicil dated June 12, 1893, the testatrix, after reciting that her daughter Eugenie had recently died, revoked the trusts in favour of Eugenie and her issue of and concerning the one-third share of the first-mentioned trust fund, and disposed of it otherwise, and in all other respects she confirmed her will. She afterwards made further codicils, which did not affect the present question. On January 30, 1899, the testatrix died. The question arose as to the share which would have come to the daughter Eugenie if she had survived her mother. Mrs. De Wilton was by birth a Jewess, but married a Christian in accordance with the rites of the Church of England. Her daughter Eugenie was brought up as a Christian. In 1876 Eugenie De Wilton became engaged to be married to her maternal uncle, Joseph Gompertz Montefiore. Both were British subjects domiciled in England. Mr. Montefiore was an adherent of the Jewish faith. Miss De Wilton was desirous of being admitted to the same faith, but could not be so admitted according to the rules of the synagogue to which Mr. Montefiore belonged, nor could she be married. They therefore went to Wiesbaden, in Germany, where, on August 20, 1876, they went through the form of civil marriage, and afterwards of marriage according to the custom and practice of the Jews. At that time Miss De Wilton had not been formally admitted into the Jewish faith, but she was so admitted at Paris on September 17, 1876; and afterwards, on the same day, she there went through the form of marriage with Mr. Montefiore according to the Jewish custom and practice. The evidence showed that such a marriage was valid according to the law in force at Wiesbaden. There were issue of the marriage five children, of whom four were still living. The testatrix appeared in her lifetime to have recognized them as children of her daughter. The question was whether the testatrix's daughter Eugenie left children or issue within the meaning of the will of the testatrix.

Mr. Dicey, Q.C., and Mr. B. Cohen appeared for the children of the daughter, and Mr. Henriques for other parties.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, after stating the facts, said that two contentions were raised on behalf of the children—(1) that the marriage was valid; if so, they were children of the testatrix's daughter according to the strictest construction of the word; and (2) that even if the marriage were invalid the language of the will was such as to include them under the designation "children" as used in the will of the testatrix. Considering the second point first, it was based on the doctrine laid down by Lord Cairns in "Hill v. Crook" (L.R., 6 H.L., 265) and by the Court of Appeal in "In re Joddrell" (44 Ch.D., 590)—viz., that the will was to be taken as a dictionary to find the meaning of the terms used by the testatrix. If, for example, the testatrix had referred to her daughter Eugenie as the wife of Mr. Montefiore (as she had done with respect to her two sisters), his Lordship would have had no difficulty in holding that the children of Eugenie must include those who had sprung from the union referred to. Unfortunately, nothing of the kind was found in the testamentary dispositions of the testatrix. What were relied on were the expressions found in the codicil, and particularly the confirmation of the will found in it. If in the will or codicil anything had been found showing an indication in the will that the testatrix regarded her daughter Eugenie as having left children or issue her surviving, his Lordship would willingly have applied the rule to which he had referred; but after careful examination of those instruments he had failed to find anything which satisfied him that the testatrix used the words "issue" or "children" otherwise than in their proper legal meaning, and he regretted (so far as he could properly express such a sentiment) that he was unable to decide on that ground in favour of the children. His Lordship had then to consider the first point—viz., the validity of the marriage. It was not disputed that the marriage of an uncle and niece, being British subjects domiciled in England, was void under the statute 5 and 6 William IV., c. 54. That depended on the enactments contained in 32 Henry VIII., c. 38, as judicially interpreted, the leading authorities being Coke's 2nd Inst., p. 683, "Reg. v. Chadwick" (11 Q.B., 173), and "Brook v. Brook" (9 H.L.C., 193). The last-mentioned case established that such a marriage was void although celebrated in a country where it would be legal as between persons domiciled there. It was said, however, that none of those statutes had any application to Jews, and it was contended that two such persons, if of the Jewish persuasion, might according to English law contract a valid marriage. There was no decision to that effect. The argument was based on the language of Lord Stowell in the case of "Lindo v. Belisario" (1 Hagg. Cons., 216) and on that of the Legislature in various Acts of Parliament dealing with the subject of marriage. The history of the Jews in this country, so far as it was material to the present question, was given in a note to the report of "Lindo v. Belisario" (1 Hagg. Cons., p. 217). His Lordship referred to that report, and, continuing, said that from that time forward (1673) the Jews appeared to have been permitted to reside in England and to practise the rites of their religion, and in particular to solemnize marriages according to their own usages. For a long time no legislative provision was made on the subject of their marriages; but by section 18 of Lord Hardwicke's Act (26 Geo. II., c. 33), intituled "An Act for the better preventing of clandestine marriages," it was enacted that "nothing in this Act contained shall extend to that part of Great Britain called Scotland nor to any marriages among the people called Quakers or among the persons professing the Jewish religion, where both parties to any such marriage shall be of the people called Quakers or persons professing the Jewish religion respectively, nor to any marriage solemnized beyond the seas." In that state of things the case of "Lindo v. Belisario" was decided. It was the first case in which the validity of a Jewish marriage was considered by an Ecclesiastical Court. In dealing with it Lord Stowell used language which would not have been inappropriate if the question before him had related to the capacity of the contracting parties as well as to the formalities of the marriage. In fact, however, the question related to the formalities only; it was one of intricacy and difficulty, and his Lordship was unable to find anything in the judgments which indicated that the observations to which he had referred were directed to anything beyond that which the learned Judge was called on to decide; certainly he could not look on them as an authority for the proposition that the capacity of members of the Jewish faith to contract marriage was regulated by their own law and not by the law of this country. The question in "Reg. v. Mills" (10 Cl. and Fin., 734) was also one of form, and to it the remarks of Lord Brougham (see p. 736) and Lord Campbell (see p. 794), cited in argument, appeared to have been addressed. His Lordship then turned to the language of the statutes. Reliance was chiefly placed on that found in 6 and 7 Wm. IV., c. 85, sections 2 and 3, and 4 Vict., c. 72, section 5, where it was enacted that persons professing the Jewish religion "may continue to contract and solemnize marriage according to the usages . . . of the said persons." It was contended that, inasmuch as contract was spoken of in addition to solemnization, it must be taken that the Legislature had treated as valid marriages contracted in accordance with the rules of the Jewish law, not merely as regards the form of marriage, but also as to the capacity of the contracting parties. His Lordship was unable to arrive at that conclusion. In the first place, the word "usages" was more apt with regard to matters of form than in relation to capacity of parties. Next, both these statutes (like 26 Geo. II., c. 35) dealt with the formalities of marriage, and an enactment with respect to capacity was, prima facie at least, beyond the purview of them. Again, in the statute 10 and 11 Vict., c. 58, passed for the express purpose of removing doubts as to the validity of the marriages of Quakers and Jews "solemnized according to the usages of those denominations respectively," it was declared and enacted "that all marriages so solemnized were and are good in law to all intents and purposes whatsoever"; that declaration and enactment related to form only. It was further to be remarked that, although in the statutes just mentioned, as in many others relating to formalities of marriage (as, for example, 4 Geo. IV., c. 76; 19 and 20 Vict., c. 20; and 61 and 62 Vict., c. 58), there was found an express exception of Jewish marriages, there was no such exception in 5 and 6 Wm. IV., c. 52, which dealt with capacity. In his Lordship's opinion, therefore, the marriage in question was not valid according to the law of England, and the fund must be distributed on the footing of the testatrix's daughter, Eugenie, having died in her lifetime without leaving issue.

EARL OF LONSDALE V. CRAWFORD.*

Settled Land Acts—Mining leases—Rent, whether capital or income—Will—Construction.

This summons, which was taken out under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 and 1890, raised the question whether the plaintiff, Hugh Cecil, Earl of Lonsdale, need set aside as capital money arising under the said Acts any part of the rents reserved under certain mining leases granted by the plaintiff of hereditaments comprised in a certain settlement of February 7, 1876. On the conclusion of the arguments on July 6 his Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Hamilton, Q.C., and Mr. W. Brinton appeared for the Earl of Lonsdale; Mr. Hughes, Q.C., and Mr. R. F. MacSwinney for the Hon. Lancelot Edward Lowther; and Mr. Younger, Q.C., and Mr. Charlton Hawkins for the Right Hon. James Lowther.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL read the following judgment:—This is a summons under the Settled Land Acts asking for a declaration that no part of the rents reserved under certain leases of the Lonsdale estates settled by the will of Henry, late Earl of Lonsdale (which rents vary with the selling price of the minerals gotten) need be set aside as capital money under the Settled Land Acts, and the answer to this depends upon whether the leases in question were granted under the Settled Land Acts or under the power in the will. These leases fall under two heads (1) those granted between the Settled Land Act, 1882, and that of 1890; and (2) those granted after the latter Act. Henry, late Earl of Lonsdale, made his will on February 7, 1876, and died August 15, 1876. He devised large estates in the north of England to uses under which there were several successive tenants for life, with remainder to the issue in tail male of each according to seniority. The last Earl of Lonsdale (St. George) was one of such tenants for life, and in May, 1881, he purchased the reversionary life interest of his brother, the present Earl, and conveyed it to trustees (of whom the defendant, Mr. James Lowther, is the sole survivor) on trusts for management and for the maintenance of the earldom. The present earl has no legal right to call for any payment from the trustees, but it is conceded by all parties that he is tenant for life within the meaning of the Settled Land Acts. St. George, Lord Lonsdale, died on February 8, 1882, without issue, and since then the estates have been managed by the trustees of the settlement of 1881. The will of Henry, Lord Lonsdale, contains a power of granting leases for 21 years for ordinary purposes, 99 years for building purposes, and 60 years for mining purposes, and in each case the donee of the power is the same. The power as to mining leases is as follows:—"Provided always and I hereby declare that it shall be lawful for every person hereby made tenant for life of the said manors and hereditaments hereinbefore devised in strict settlement as and when he shall be entitled to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits of the same manors and hereditaments . . . to appoint by way of lease all or any of the mines, coals, stones, clay, sand, and mineral substances in, under, or upon the same premises . . . so as there be reserved on every such appointment the best rents, tolls, duties, royalties or reservations by the acre, ton, or otherwise that can be reasonably gotten without taking anything in the nature of a fine or premium, and so as there be contained in every such appointment a condition of re-entry for non-payment or non-delivery within a reasonable time to be therein specified of the rents, tolls, duties, royalties or reservations thereby reserved, and so as the appointee or appointees do execute a counterpart thereof and do thereby covenant for the due payment or delivery of the rents, tolls, duties, royalties, or reservations thereby reserved. Provided always that the reservation of rents, tolls, duties, or royalties the amount of which shall vary with or according to the acreage worked or the minerals, coals, stone, clay, sand, or substances gotten shall not be taken to be in the nature of a fine or premium, though the effect of such reservation may eventually be disadvantageous to the remainderman." Many leases of the settled minerals have been granted since 1883, and I am asked to assume for the purpose of my decision that they have all been granted by the present earl with the consent of the trustees or trustee of the settlement, and are expressed to be made in exercise of every power or authority enabling the present earl. The defendants contend that these leases cannot have been granted under the power in the will, but that, if they can be supported at all, they must take effect under the Settled Land Acts. It is said, first, that the power of leasing in the will is no longer exercisable. It is not contended that the power has been extinguished by the alienation of the life estate, for it is now well settled that a power appendant may be exercised by the donee thereof although the estate to which it was appendant be gone, provided there is no derogation from the rights of the alienee of the estate, and of course there is no such derogation here, because Mr. Lowther has assented to all the leases that have been granted. But it is said that, as a matter of construction, the present earl does not answer the description of the person to whom the power is entrusted. I am unable to adopt this view. A power of leasing is one of those powers of management which are inserted in settlements for the benefit of the settled estate generally. Its exercise is fenced about with provisions for the safety of the remaindermen, and, as was pointed out in "Alexander v. Mills" (L.R., 6 Ch., 124), there is no presumption that a testator would prefer that the estates should remain unleased or unsold rather than that a tenant for life, possibly the testator's son or grandson, should exercise or assent to the exercise of leases and sales after he had parted with his life estate. I do not forget that I am dealing with a mineral lease in which the tenant for life consumes a part of the inheritance, but the other powers of leasing, and the similar powers of granting licences to copyholders and of consenting to sales and enfranchisements and partitions are expressed in similar terms. In my opinion the words "as and when he shall be entitled to the possession or the receipt of the rents and profits, &c.," applied as in this will to a number of persons taking in succession, refer to the falling into possession of the several life interests and not to the actual unencumbered beneficial enjoyment thereof. The words may be paraphrased "as and when his life estate shall be in possession." Authority is of little assistance in construction cases, but "Long v. Rankin" (Sugden on Powers, Appendix, 895) is a strong authority on a similar provision. The next objection is this—the leases reserve a rent varying with the selling price of coal, in accordance with the custom of the county. It is said that this is not authorized by the power, and that the leases for this reason cannot have been granted under the power. Now the power clearly authorizes the reservation of a rent in kind. Such a reservation necessarily involves a variation in value, for it is practically certain that the value of coal will vary in a term of 60 years, and it would, in my opinion, be absurd to hold that the tenant for life could reserve a varying rent if he reserved it in kind, but could not do so if he reserved it according to the selling price, although the result would be exactly the same except for the additional convenience to the lessors of the latter method. It is contended that the proviso at the end of the powers is limited so as to exclude the case of such a varying rent, but this proviso is inserted to meet the cases where a varying rent is not necessarily implied in the exercise of the power. I cannot infer, from the absence of an expression, which would be unnecessary, including such leases, an intention to exclude them and therefore to abrogate the power of leasing at varying rents already expressly given. I hold, therefore, that the power in the will authorized the grant by the earl, with the consent of Mr. Lowther, of the leases in question. But then it is said that they might equally have been granted under the Settled Land Act, 1882, and it is admitted that such of them as are made after 1890 could have been granted under that Act and the Act of 1890; and it is said that I ought to hold that the requirement of section 11 of the Act of 1882 is imposed by section 56 of the same Act on all the leases. It was argued, on the other hand, that the leases granted before 1890 could not have been granted under the Act of 1882 alone, because it is said that rents varying according to the price of minerals were not authorized by that Act. In the view that I take it is not necessary for me to determine this. I assume for the purposes of my judgment that such leases could have been granted, and I draw no distinction, therefore, between leases granted before and leases granted after the Act of 1890 came into operation. Under the will the tenant for life is entitled to the whole of the rents, &c., arising from leases of the minerals. Section 11 provides:—"Under a mining lease, whether the mines or minerals leased are already opened or in work or not, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement, there shall be from time to time set aside, as capital money arising under this Act, part of the rent as follows—namely, where the tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of minerals, three-fourth parts of the rent, and otherwise one fourth part thereof, and in every such case the residue of the rent shall go as rents and profits." If, therefore, section 56 has the effect for which the defendants contend, it will deprive a tenant for life of a part of his income without compensation. Now, it is a sound rule of construction not to construe an Act of Parliament as interfering with or injuring persons' rights without compensation, unless one is obliged so to construe it—see per Lord Esher in "Attorney-General v. Horner" (14 Q.B.D., at p. 257). Am I so obliged? The first subsection of section 56 merely preserves powers under settlements; the second subsection causes the difficulty. It says:—

"But, in case of conflict between the provisions of a settlement and the provisions of this Act, relative to any matter in respect whereof the tenant for life exercises or contracts, or intends to exercise any power under this Act, the provisions of this Act shall prevail; and, accordingly, notwithstanding anything in the settlement, the consent of the tenant for life shall, by virtue of this Act, be necessary to the exercise by the trustees of the settlement or other person of any power conferred by the settlement exercisable for any purpose provided for in this Act."

I think that the provisions here referred to are provisions connected with the execution of the power—e.g., consent of a third person—not with the results of such execution; it deals with the act of execution, not with the proceeds thereof, and this is borne out by the sentence "and accordingly," which shows the purview and scope of the subsection and limits its generality. I therefore hold that section 56 does not override the provisions of the will in this respect. But then it is said that the leases are granted in execution of all powers and authorities and are therefore executed under the power in the Act. Now, it is common practice for a man to purport to execute all powers. He does so in order to avoid the risk of his appointment being defeated by the failure of the particular power primarily applicable, while he has another which would, if exercised, supply the defect. In the same way, it used to be common practice to find that a man both appointed and granted in order that if either the appointment or grant failed the other might supply the deficiency. But in both those cases the property can in fact pass once only, and it must so pass by means of the first effective available legal means. If a man has once effectually appointed the property he cannot afterwards grant the same property, either by the same or any subsequent deed, because there is nothing on which the grant can operate. So, if he has effectively appointed under a power created by one instrument, he cannot again appoint the same property under a power created by another instrument, because there is no subject-matter on which the latter power can operate. The mere fact, therefore, that he purports to execute all powers does not prove that he has executed the statutory power, but I have to ascertain which he has in fact executed. The only suggestions made by counsel were that the power earlier in point of time should be taken to be executed rather than the later, and that the power more favourable to the donee of the power should be presumed to be executed rather than that which would deprive him of income. In the present case both these presumptions coincide, and nothing is suggested against them. I therefore hold that the power in the will, and that only, has been executed, and I answer the question in the summons by saying that no part of the mineral rents need be set aside.

EARLE V. KINGSCOTE.*

Husband and Wife—Wife's torts—Husband's liability—Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Decision of Byrne, J. (ante, p. 63), affirmed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne which was reported in The Times of November 27 and December 2 last, and ante, p. 63.

The plaintiff, a widow lady, residing at Andover, brought the action against Mrs. Georgiana Kingscote and her husband, Colonel Howard Kingscote. The plaintiff's case was that in May, 1898, she was induced by Mrs. Kingscote to lend her the sum of £5,300, the only security which the plaintiff got being Mrs. Kingscote's I.O.U. Subsequently, in July, 1898, the plaintiff was requested by Mrs. Kingscote to join her in the purchase of some shares which Mrs. Kingscote said had been recommended to her by a financier, and for that purpose she asked the plaintiff to raise a sum of £2,000 to be invested in the purchase—one-half of the shares being for the plaintiff and the other half for Mrs. Kingscote, who offered to be responsible for any loss by the plaintiff, and agreed that her (Mrs. Kingscote's) shares should be charged to make good any loss which might accrue to the plaintiff in respect of the advance. The plaintiff stated that she was at first unwilling to entertain Mrs. Kingscote's proposal, but, on Mrs. Kingscote's representation that she would by the investment in the shares be able in three months to repay the £5,300 already lent, the plaintiff consented to find or raise by promissory notes the sum of £2,000 to pay for the shares when they had been purchased. On July 23, 1898, Mrs. Kingscote telegraphed to the plaintiff that she had bought the shares and that it—meaning the investment—was a real good thing. On July 25 she further telegraphed to the plaintiff to direct a solicitor (who was the same solicitor who had acted in the £5,300 transaction) to let her (Mrs. Kingscote) have £2,000 on the plaintiff's guarantee, and again on the same day sent another telegram to the plaintiff asking her to telegraph to the solicitor, but not to mention the shares to him. The plaintiff, relying on Mrs. Kingscote's representation, telegraphed as requested to the solicitor, and signed and posted two promissory notes or bills for £1,000 each, payable to the solicitor. The name of Mrs. Kingscote did not appear upon the bills, but they were accepted by the solicitor, discounted by Jay, and the proceeds paid to Mrs. Kingscote, as the plaintiff stated, for the purpose of paying for the shares. The bills became due on October 28 following, and the plaintiff paid the amounts due thereon and took them up. The present action having been commenced by the plaintiff to protect her interests in the shares, Mrs. Kingscote, in opposition to a motion against her for interlocutory relief, swore an affidavit alleging that she had never purchased any shares with the £2,000. The plaintiff stated that if the affidavit was true it was contrary to other statements made by Mrs. Kingscote to the plaintiff, and that she had been induced by the false and fraudulent representation that the shares had been purchased to advance the £2,000. While the motion was pending £500 was paid to the plaintiff on account. The plaintiff claimed both against Mrs. Kingscote and her husband repayment of the £2,000. It was consented on behalf of Mrs. Kingscote that judgment for £1,500 should be given against her. The question, however, arose whether any judgment could be recovered against Colonel Kingscote. It was stated on his behalf that the transactions in question were without his knowledge or authority and that he had not participated in the use of the money, and it was argued, on the authority of "Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst" ([1854] 9 Exch., 422), that, although a married woman is answerable for torts committed by her during coverture, including frauds, and may be sued for them jointly with her husband, yet she cannot be sued for a fraud "when it is directly connected with a contract with her and is the means of effecting it and parcel of the same transaction," and that the husband was therefore no more answerable for the torts in question than he would have been for his wife's contracts. Mr. Justice Byrne held that Colonel Kingscote was liable in damages for his wife's tort, and that the law on the point was as laid down in "The Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst." The contract was effected prior to and independently of the fraud complained of, and his Lordship was unable to say that the fraud was "the means of effecting" the contract in the sense in which that expression was used in the case referred to. Colonel Kingscote appealed.

Mr. Latham, Q.C., Mr. Elgood, and Mr. Stuart Sankey were for the appellant; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. W. Baker were for the plaintiff.

Upon the appeal a question was raised (which was not raised in the Court below) as to the effect of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, upon the husband's liability.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the question was whether the fraudulent misrepresentation by Mrs. Kingscote that she had bought the shares was so connected with the contract for the joint purchase of the shares that no action would lie against the husband for the fraud because it would be an attempt to turn the contract into a tort. Mr. Justice Byrne had stated the law to be that the exemption of the husband from his common law liability for his wife's torts must be limited to cases in which the fraud was not only directly connected with the contract and parcel of the same transaction, but was also the means of effecting (in the sense of obtaining) the contract. In his Lordship's opinion, the learned Judge had correctly laid down the principle of law and had correctly applied it to the facts of this case. No doubt it was difficult to draw the line, but the learned Judge had pointed out the true distinction to be deduced from the cases of "Liverpool Adelphi Loan Association v. Fairhurst" (9 Ex., 422) and "Wright v. Leonard" (11 C.B., N.S., 258). Here there was a subsisting contract at the time of the misrepresentation, and his Lordship (the Master of the Rolls) came to the conclusion that the misrepresentation was not the inducement of the contract and was not the means of effecting the contract, but should be regarded as an independent misrepresentation for which the husband was liable to be sued. It was then contended that the law as to the husband's liability had been altered by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and this Court was asked to overrule "Seroka v. Kattenburg" (17 Q.B.D., 177), which was opposed to that contention. Speaking for himself he thought that that authority was quite right. That Act enabled a married woman to acquire and hold any property as her separate property and it enacted that she should be capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of her separate property on any contract, and of suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and then it enacted that the husband need not be joined as a party. It was said that it was involved in that that the husband could not be so joined. Whatever might be the foundation of the husband's liability, down to 1882, at any rate, it was established that the husband, whether the wife had separate property or not, was liable to be sued for the wife's torts jointly with the wife and it would be a strong thing to hold that the effect of the enactment above referred to was to take away that liability. The appeal would be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY concurred. In his opinion the false representation did not induce the contract, but only induced the plaintiff to suppose that her liability to perform the contract had arisen, when in fact it had not. With regard to the Married Women's Property Act, he had considerable doubt as to its meaning, but he did not find in that Act any words which would release the husband from the liability which attached to him at common law, and he thought it safer to assume that the Act had no such intention.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS agreed on both points, but he did not share the doubts entertained by Lord Justice Rigby as to the effect of the Married Women's Property Act.

THE VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE V. THE SHERIFF OF LONDON.*

Sheriff—Rates—Seizure of goods of person from whom rates due—Liability of sheriff to pay rates on demand—Local Act, 35 Geo. III., c. 73.

Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 50), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham at the trial of the action without a jury, reported ante, p. 50: [1900] 1 Q.B., 111. The action was brought to recover £18 19s. 3d. under section 195 of the Local Act (35 Geo. III., c. 73) in respect of parochial rates due to the plaintiffs from a man named Bush, whose goods had been taken in execution under a writ of fi. fa. by the defendant as Sheriff of London.

By section 195 of the above Act, when the goods of any person liable to pay any rate "by virtue of this Act shall be taken in execution" by the sheriff before the rate shall have been paid, then the sheriff, on demand being made by the rate collector, shall in the first place pay to the collector such rate, provided that the sheriff shall not be charged with the payment of more than one year's rate or of a larger sum than the value of the goods taken in execution. Section 179 of this Act authorized the levying of five distinct rates, one being a poor-rate. On November 17, 1898, the defendant, as sheriff, seized the goods of Bush under a fi. fa. in execution of a judgment, and on November 24 the defendant being still in possession, the plaintiffs' rate collector made a demand upon the defendant for the payment of £18 19s. 3d. for parochial rates owing at that time by Bush. This sum of £18 19s. 3d. comprised a poor-rate, a general rate, a sewers rate, and two other small rates. The minutes of the vestry, in which was entered the resolution ordering the rates, recited that the poor-rate was made in pursuance of the powers and authorities of, among other Acts, the 35 Geo. III., c. 73. The amount so demanded from the defendant was less than the value of the goods or of the judgment debt. On November 25, before the goods were removed from the premises or sold, the defendant received from Bush the amount of the judgment debt, and handed over this amount to the judgment creditor. The defendant thereupon withdrew from possession without having paid the rates. Mr. Justice Bigham held that the goods were "taken in execution" within the meaning of the Act, and that, though some of the rates were levied under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, by section 161 of that Act the overseers had the same powers, remedies, and privileges in respect thereof as they had for levying money for the relief of the poor under 35 Geo. III., c. 73. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Mr. A. T. LAWRENCE, Q.C., and Mr. P. ROSE-INNES, for the defendant, contended that the rates in respect of which the demand was made on the defendant were not rates which the judgment debtor was liable to pay "by virtue of" the Act of 35 Geo. III., c. 73. All the rates, except the poor-rate, were levied under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. As regards the poor-rate, section 161 of the Act of 1855 transferred only the general powers of the overseers as to the collection of the rate and not the special powers under a local Act. The Act of Geo. III., therefore, did not apply. They referred to "Paddington Vestry v. Great Western Railway Company" (28 L.J., M.C., 59). They further contended that the goods had not been "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of the Act of Geo. III. Those words meant removed from the premises.

Mr. ENGLISH HARRISON, Q.C. (Mr. Herbert Nield with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that the overseers (which word by section 250 of the Act of 1855 included rate collectors) had, by section 161 of the Act of 1855, the same powers as were given by the Act of Geo. III. in respect of the poor-rate. Therefore, the overseers had, in regard to the levying of all rates, the same powers as were given by the earlier Act. [LORD JUSTICE ROMER referred to "Vaughan v. Imray" (28 L.J., M.C., 78).]

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it was perfectly clear that these goods had been "taken in execution" within the meaning of section 195 of 35 Geo. III., c. 73. Goods were taken in execution when they were seized by the sheriff. With regard to the other point, he had had considerable doubt, but he had come to the conclusion that Mr. Justice Bigham was right. Were these parochial rates payable "by virtue of" the Act of Geo. III.? The rates due were the poor-rate, the general rate, the sewers rate, and two other small rates. Taking first the poor-rate, in his opinion that rate was levied by virtue of the Act of Geo. III. That Act had not been either expressly or impliedly repealed. The Metropolis Management Act, 1855, did not deal with the poor-rate at all. That Act dealt with a new rate, and the old corresponding rates were gone. But the poor-rate remained untouched. The judgment debtor was, therefore, liable to pay the poor-rate by virtue of the Act of Geo. III., and section 195 of that Act applied. Then, with regard to the other rates, they were leviable under the Metropolitan Management Act, 1855. By section 161 of that Act the overseers were to make separate rates—called a sewers rate, a lighting rate, and a general rate, “and the said overseers shall, for the purpose of levying such rates, proceed in the same manner, and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying money for the relief of the poor.” One of the powers, remedies, and privileges was that given by section 195 of the Act of Geo. III.—namely, the power of demanding from the sheriff the sum due for rates. Therefore, with regard to these rates also, the remedy given by section 195 was applicable. The defendant, therefore, must pay the sum due for rates from the judgment debtor. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

(LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Contributories—Application to remove name—Offer withdrawn before acceptance.

HIS LORDSHIP gave the following judgment, reserved from his sitting in company matters last week:—This is a summons by Mr. Wallace asking that his name may be struck off the list of contributories of the company. Mr. Wallace was a shareholder in the Commercial Fire Insurance Company of Scotland (Limited). This company was wound up in April, 1898, all its assets being transferred to the Metropolitan upon the terms of an agreement dated April 14, 1898, and made between the Commercial and its liquidators of the one part and the Metropolitan of the other part. By this agreement the Commercial and its liquidators agreed to transfer and make over to the Metropolitan all the goodwill and assets of the Commercial. The consideration for the transfer was partly an undertaking to pay and discharge all the debts and obligations of the Commercial, next an indemnity against all the costs of the winding-up of the Commercial, next the taking over of the whole staff of the Commercial, and then followed these clauses:—(5) “As a further part of the consideration for the said transfer every member of the Commercial shall, in respect of each share therein held by him or her, be entitled as of right to claim an allotment to himself or herself or to his or her nominee or nominees of either (first) a debenture bond for £1 10s. carrying interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum as from the 14th day of February, 1898, or (second) two ordinary shares of the Metropolitan of £5 each, with the sum of £1 credited as paid up on each of such shares, and the Metropolitan shall forthwith and within one month from the date hereof allot and issue the debenture bonds and shares so claimed, subject, however, to this condition—that the Metropolitan shall not be bound to allot shares under this agreement to any one to whom under their articles of association they could have objected as a transferee of shares. (7) A member of the Commercial entitled to claim an allotment of debenture bonds or of shares of the Metropolitan in terms of Clause 5 hereof must claim the same within 21 days from the date hereof by sending in to the Metropolitan or to the liquidators of the Commercial a claim in writing for an allotment of the debenture bonds or the shares as they may elect, and such claim must be signed by the member making the same, and, when it requests that an allotment of shares may be made to a nominee or nominees of such member, it must be countersigned by such nominee or nominees. (8) The liquidators of the Commercial shall, within seven days from the date hereof, give notice in writing to each member of the Commercial, stating the amount of debenture bonds and the number of shares which the member is entitled to claim as of right under this agreement and the time within which the claim for an allotment as aforesaid must be sent in, and there must be enclosed therewith proper forms of claim for debenture bonds and for shares addressed to the Metropolitan for signature by the member. The notice aforesaid shall in each case be given by sending the same through the post addressed to the member at his or her registered address as appearing on the register of members. (9) Members of the Commercial, other than dissentient members hereinafter mentioned, entitled to claim as aforesaid but who shall not within the period of 21 days before mentioned claim, shall be held to have elected to claim debenture bonds, and the liquidators shall immediately on the expiry of said 21 days nominate all such members other than dissentient members who do not claim for an allotment of the debenture bonds, which they are respectively entitled to claim under Clause 5 hereof, and the Metropolitan shall forthwith allot such debenture bonds to the nominees of the liquidators.” And by Clause 10 provision was made for the payment, so far as necessary, by the Metropolitan of the amount payable to any dissentient members of the Commercial. The liquidators sent a notice to Mr. Wallace. It is not forthcoming, but I presume it was in pursuance of Clause 8. Mr. Wallace on April 23, 1898, signed a document addressed to the directors of the Metropolitan, which, so far as material, was as follows:—“As the holder of five shares in the Commercial, I claim an allotment of ten ordinary shares of the Metropolitan of £5 each credited as paid up to the extent of £1 per share, being the proportion to which I am entitled under the agreement, and I hereby agree to accept such shares and to pay the further moneys payable thereon when called upon.” On July 2 Mr. Wallace wrote to the Metropolitan withdrawing his application for ordinary shares. This was acknowledged by the general manager on July 6. Mr. Wallace's letter was forwarded by the Metropolitan to the liquidators of the Commercial, who on July 8 wrote a reply to Mr. Wallace treating him as entitled to debentures instead of shares. Notwithstanding this, the shares were allotted to Mr. Wallace in the autumn of 1898, and the question for my decision is whether the allotment was valid. The answer must, I think, depend upon this. Was the document of April 23, 1898, an application which could be withdrawn before acceptance, or was it an acceptance of a prior offer made to him by the Metropolitan? Upon the whole, I think the former is the true view. There was no direct relation between the Metropolitan and Mr. Wallace prior to April 23. The contract of April 14, 1898, was made between the two companies, and the allotment of shares or the issue of debentures would have been a satisfaction pro tanto of the obligations entered into by the Metropolitan with the Commercial. I do not think that a shareholder in the Commercial can be deemed to have acquired any direct right under that contract as against the Metropolitan. It seems to me that it was open to the Metropolitan to refuse the application, and that, even if such refusal had been wrongful, the only persons who could have claimed compensation would have been the parties to the agreement. It has been argued that the liquidators must be deemed agents of the Metropolitan in sending the notice to Mr. Wallace, thus making it a notice by the Metropolitan, but there is nothing in the written documents to support this theory, and there is no evidence of agency apart from the documents. The reasoning of the Lords Justices in "In re New Eberhardt Company, ex parte Menzies" (43 Ch.D., 118) seems inconsistent with this view. The result, in my opinion, is that the application succeeds and the applicant's name must be removed from the list of contributories and the liquidator must pay the costs.

*Reported by D. FITCHER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.
No. 32.—VOL. XVI.

Mr. Herbert Jacobs was for the applicant; Mr. Whinney for the company.

AND OTHERS.*

Trade Union—Illegality—Expulsion of member —Refusal of Court to enforce agreement between members—Trade Union Act, 1871, sec. 4.

This was an appeal by the defendants, who are the members of the committee of an association called the Tea Clearing-house, against an injunction granted by Mr. Justice Kekewich on the 6th inst. restraining the defendants, until the trial of the action or further order, from acting upon a resolution, passed by the committee on June 25 last, expelling the plaintiffs from membership of the association on the ground that they had committed a breach of the rules.

The objects of the association are (inter alia) "to give facilities to the wholesale trade in tea for the lodgment and transmission of warrants, delivery orders, &c., and other orders to the various docks and warehouses from a central office." "To provide a central clearing-house or office, where all such warrants and orders may be lodged, instead of at the various docks and warehouses." The persons entitled to become members of the association are dock companies carrying on the business of warehousing tea in bond and tea warehouse keepers carrying on that business, who should undertake in writing to abide by and observe the rules and by-laws of the clearing-house for the time being in force. By rule 11 every member is bound to charge on teas the respective rates, &c., specified in the schedule to the rules, and is not to be at liberty to depart therefrom in any way, subject to the allowance of a discount not exceeding 10 per cent. No other discount, no money gratuities, and no advantages, direct or indirect, are to be offered or allowed by any member to any merchant, broker, or other person in connexion with any matter or thing in any wise relating to the Tea Clearing-house agreement. By rule 14, no member is to be entitled to warehouse or deposit tea with, or employ in connexion with tea, any dock company or tea warehouse keeper who is not a member of the clearing-house, or to purchase or sample any tea from the warehouse of any non-member. By rule 15, any member breaking or failing to observe any of the rules is to be liable to expulsion by resolution of the committee. The plaintiffs alleged that the resolution expelling them had been passed without their having had a fair opportunity of being heard, and this was the view taken by Mr. Justice Kekewich. The main objection taken by the defendants (and with this objection the learned Judge declined to deal fully upon an interlocutory application) was that the association is really a "trade union" within the meaning of the Trade Union Acts, 34 and 35 Vict., cap. 31 (1871), sections 3, 4, and 39 and 40 Vict., cap. 22 (1876), section 16, and that, the rules being in restraint of trade, the association is illegal, not in the sense that it is criminal, but in the sense that the Court could not assist any member by enforcing in any way the contract of membership. It was also objected that it was not shown that the association had any property which could give the Court jurisdiction. By section 3 of the Act of 1871, "The purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be unlawful so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust." And by section 4, "Nothing in this Act shall enable any Court to entertain any legal proceeding instituted with the object of directly enforcing or recovering damages for the breach of any of the following agreements, namely—(1) Any agreement between members of a trade union, as such, concerning the conditions on which any members for the time being of such trade union shall or shall not sell their goods, transact business, employ, or be employed." And by section 16 of the Act of 1876 the term "trade union" is defined as meaning "any combination, whether temporary or permanent, for regulating the relations between workmen and masters, or between workmen and workmen, or between masters and masters, or for imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, whether such combination would or would not, if the principal Act (i.e., the Act of 1871) had not been passed, have been deemed to have been an unlawful combination by reason of some one or more of its purposes being in restraint of trade."

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. Christopher James were for the defendants; Mr. Renshaw, Q.C., and Mr. Stewart-Smith were for the plaintiffs.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the main question was one of considerable importance. The real question for determination was whether, having regard to the rules of the association and the provisions of the Trade Union Acts of 1871 and 1876, the action could be maintained. It was necessary to see what the real object and scope of the association was. The essence of it as shown by rule 11 was that all the members agreed to charge for services rendered to teas certain rates fixed by the association, subject to a discount not exceeding 10 per cent., and that no other discount, no money gratuities, and no advantages, direct or indirect, should be offered or allowed by any member to any merchant, broker, or other person in connexion with any matter or thing in anywise relating to the Tea Clearing-house agreement. Rule 14 was also very important. And rule 15 provided for the expulsion of any member who failed to observe any of the rules. Was this an agreement in respect of which the jurisdiction of the Court was limited by section 4 of the Trade Union Act of 1871, and were the plaintiffs attempting to do that which was forbidden by the Act? Was the plaintiffs' proceeding one which the Court could not entertain? For many purposes trade unions were now perfectly lawful associations. But there was a specific section (section 4) in the Act of 1871 dealing with the question how far the Court should interfere to enforce agreements between the members of trade unions. There might have been some doubt as to what constituted a trade union, but section 16 of the Act of 1876 made this clear, and this association came within the definition. His Lordship was at first troubled by the difficulty whether this proceeding taken by the plaintiffs to restrain the committee from expelling them was a proceeding for "directly enforcing" the agreement between the members which came within section 4 (1). But his Lordship thought that it was. The complaint against the plaintiffs was that they had offered some financial advantages contrary to the rules. The result of a decision in favour of the plaintiffs would be that the association would be ordered to retain them as members for the purpose of enforcing the regulations. It was as members that the plaintiffs claimed the aid of the Court; they sought to maintain their position as members. In substance they were seeking to enforce the agreement between the members. The Court could not decide in favour of the plaintiffs without in effect differing from the principle of the decision of the late Sir George Jessel in "Rigby v. Connol" (14 Ch.D., 482), and the later decision of the Court of Appeal in "Swaine v. Wilson" (24 Q.B.D., 252) did not purport to be a decision to the contrary. In that case Lord Lindley pointed out that the real objects of the society were outside the Trade Union Acts. His Lordship came to the conclusion that the agreement in the present case was one which the Court had no power to enforce. This was a fatal objection and it rendered it unnecessary to consider the other points.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

MILBURN AND CO. V. JAMAICA FRUIT IMPORTING AND TRADING CO. (LIMITED).*

Ship—Charter-party—Bills of lading—Captain to sign bills of lading without prejudice to charter-party—Bills of lading without negligence clause—Indemnity.

Decision of Mathew, J. (15 The Times L.R., 512), affirmed (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting).

"The Carron Park" (15 P.D., 203) approved.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew at the trial of an action without a jury, reported in 15 The Times L.R., 512; 4 Com. Cas., 331. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Port Victor, which they chartered to the defendants by a charter-party dated October 9, 1896, for the term of 36 calendar months at the rate of £1,025 per month. The plaintiffs claimed to be indemnified under the terms of the charter-party against the consequences of the master having signed, by the instructions of the defendants, certain bills of lading for Government stores containing no negligence clause, by reason whereof the plaintiffs, as they alleged, had been prevented from recovering from the Government contribution in respect of a general average loss. Clause 10 of the charter-party was as follows:—"The captain shall sign bills of lading at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents may choose, without prejudice to the stipulations of this charter-party, and the charterers hereby agree to indemnify the owners from any consequences that may arise from the captain following the charterers' instructions and signing bills of lading. The captain to attend daily when in port at charterers' or their agents' office. The owners shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for condition of fruit or other cargo, and the charterers hereby indemnify the owners against any claim arising under any bill of lading." Clause 22 contained the following provisions:—"The act of God . . . negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, officers, engineers, refrigerating engineers, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners or charterers always mutually excepted. . . . In the event of breakdown of the steamer or accident, all port charges, pilotages, and other expenses thereby occasioned to be for owners' account." By Clause 25, "Average (if any) to be regulated according to York-Antwerp Rules, 1890." The Port Victor, in the course of a voyage from London to Jamaica, during the currency of the charter-party, by reason of the negligence of the master and mariners, came into collision with another vessel. In consequence of the collision the Port Victor was compelled to put back to the Port of London for the purpose of repair. Part of the cargo consisted of Government stores, which had been shipped under bills of lading which contained no negligence clause. The plaintiffs' case was that, if the bills of lading had contained a negligence clause, then, on the authority of "The Carron Park" (15 P.D., 203), the plaintiffs would have been entitled to claim from the Government a general average contribution in respect of the expenses of putting back to the Port of London; and that, as they had lost their right to such contribution in consequence of the master having signed bills of lading containing no negligence clause, they were entitled, in accordance with the terms of clause 10 of the charter-party, to be indemnified therefor by the defendants. Mr. Justice Mathew gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. T. E. Scrutton appeared for the defendants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. R. H. Balloch for the plaintiffs.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment, dismissing the appeal, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams dissenting.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—"This is an action by the owners of the steamship Port Victor against the charterers thereof upon an indemnity clause contained in the charter-party, whereby the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to indemnify them "from any consequences that may arise from the captain following the charterers' instructions and signing bills of lading." I agree with my brother Mathew that the scheme of the charter-party is that, while the ship was to be employed as a general ship, the owners were to be in the same position as if the goods put on board were the charterers' goods. By this charter-party it was provided that negligence or default of the master, officers, mariners, and other servants of the shipowners or charterers was to be always mutually excepted. The captain, following the directions of the charterers, signed bills of lading for certain Government stores shipped on board the Port Victor by the Government. In these bills of lading there was no exception as to negligence or default of master, officers, mariners, and other servants of the shipowners. During the voyage covered by the charter-party and bills of lading, by reason of the negligence of the master, the plaintiffs' ship came into collision with another vessel, and in consequence thereof it is not disputed that general average expenses were incurred in putting back to London, in payment of tug, pilot, and port dues, of wages and victualling the crew, and of other matters. The plaintiffs thereupon demanded contribution for these general average expenses from the shippers of the Government stores, which demand was refused upon the ground that those expenses had arisen owing to the negligence of the plaintiffs' master; and it is not denied that, if the general average expenses arose

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

owing to such negligence, as the bills of lading contained no exception as to this negligence, the cargo owners, that is, the shippers of the Government stores, would not be liable to make general average contribution to the plaintiffs. Lord Watson in "Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co." (14 App. Cas., 601) sums up the position as follows. He says:—"When a person who would otherwise have been entitled to claim contribution has, by his own fault, occasioned the peril which mediately gave rise to the claim, it would be manifestly unjust to permit him to recover from those whose goods are saved. . . . In any question with them he is a wrongdoer. . . . He cannot be permitted to claim either recompense for services rendered, or indemnity for losses sustained by him, in the endeavour to rescue property which was imperilled by his own tortious act." The allegation of the plaintiffs, the shipowners, is that, if there had been inserted in the bills of lading an exception as to negligence of the master, which usually is the case, there would then as between themselves and the cargo owners have been no negligence or default of the master, for this would then have been excepted. Mr. Carver, for the defendants, on the other hand, asserts that the introduction of such an exception into the bills of lading would have made no difference whatever, for he says that general average is not the creature of contract. In this I agree, for the foundation of a general average claim is ordinarily not that of contract, but is founded upon a loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo in the time of peril, and which must be borne proportionately by all who are interested. See per Mr. Justice Lawrence in "Birkley v. Presgrave" (1 East, 220, at p. 228). Lord Esher, in "Burton v. English" (12 Q.B.D., 218, at p. 220) says that the right to contribution comes "from the old Rhodian laws, and has become incorporated into the law of England as the law of the ocean. It is not as a matter of contract, but in consequence of a common danger, where natural justice requires that all should contribute to indemnify for the loss of property which is sacrificed by one in order that the whole may be saved." But, although general average is not the creature of contract, that does not settle the question in the present case, for what the contract of carriage is becomes an important factor when considering, not whether a general average claim for contribution has arisen, but in considering, assuming that such a claim has arisen, whether it can be taken away by the cargo owner showing that, as between him and the shipowner, the latter, to use Lord Watson's words, has been a wrongdoer. To create the shipowner a wrongdoer as regards the cargo owner there must be the breach of some duty, and, if by agreement between the two it has been agreed that it shall be no breach of duty for the master to be guilty of negligence, in other words, that as between the two the negligence of the master shall be always excepted, it cannot be said that it is a breach of duty towards the cargo owner for the master to be guilty of that which the cargo owner and shipowner have agreed shall be no breach of duty at all. This appeal raises the question whether "The Carron Park" (15 P.D., 203), decided by Sir James Hannen in the year 1890, is good law. That very learned Judge says:—"The claim for contribution as general average cannot be maintained where it arises out of any negligence for which the shipowner is responsible; but negligence for which he is not responsible is as foreign to him as to the person who has suffered by it." Having cited Lord Watson's judgment in "Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co.," Sir James Hannen proceeds:—"Here it appears to me that the relation of the goods owner to the shipowner has been altered by the contract that the shipowner shall not be responsible for the negligence of his servants in the events which have happened." This decision of Sir

James Hannen has been acted upon in practice in this country ever since it was given, and we are asked now to overrule it. It was expressly approved of by Mr. Justice Barnes in "The Mary Thomas" ([1894] P., 108, at p. 117), and my brother Mathew does not doubt its accuracy in his judgment now appealed from; and, in my opinion, it correctly followed out the decision in the Privy Council delivered by Lord Watson in "Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co." I believe "The Carron Park" is in accord with the law of England relating to general average in this country. It is said that "The Carron Park" is not in accord with what has been said in "Schmidt v. Royal Mail Steamship Company" (45 L.J., Q.B., 646) and "Crooks v. Allan" (5 Q.B.D., 38) cited by Lord Justice Bowen in "Burton v. English" (12 Q.B.D., at p. 222)—viz., "the office of the bill of lading is to provide for the rights and liabilities of the parties in reference to the contract to carry, and is not concerned with liabilities to contribution in general average." When read it will be seen that these cases do not deal with the question whether, where a general average expenditure has been incurred, the right to contribute thereto can be taken away by showing that the party incurring the expenditure was a wrongdoer as regards the person called upon to contribute. Whether he be such a wrongdoer must, as it seems to me, depend upon the contract which existed between the parties. This is not, as before stated, a case in which the question is whether a general average claim has arisen, for that in this case is not disputed, but the question is whether the shipowner has been a wrongdoer to the cargo owner. The shipowner says to the cargo owner, a general average loss has occurred to which you must contribute, and you cannot show that I have been guilty of negligence so as to absolve you from contributing thereto, for by express contract between us negligence is excepted. That the contract may at times be looked to appears from what Mr. Justice Willes said in "Johnson v. Chapman" (19 C.B., N.S., 563, at p. 583), when the question arose whether the owner of a deck cargo was entitled to claim general average in respect of such cargo jettisoned, and it was held that he was; for, said Mr. Justice Willes, "when you have established that it is a deck cargo lawfully there by the contract of the parties, it becomes subject to the rule of general average." Lord Watson, as will be seen, deals with the effect an exception as to negligence in a bill of lading may have upon a general average claim in "Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co." In the present case it is clear that the plaintiffs have been unable to obtain a general average contribution from the shippers of the Government stores by reason of no clause excepting negligence having been inserted in the bills of lading, and in my judgment the charterers are therefore liable to the plaintiffs under the indemnity clause in the charter now sued on, by reason of bills of lading having been signed without the exception of negligence being contained therein. As to the second point—viz., as to the effect of the clause at the end of paragraph 22 of the charter-party, I have nothing to add to what my brother Mathew has said thereon, except to say that I agree with him. In my judgment, for the reasons above, the appeal must be dismissed, and with costs.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, in the course of an elaborate written judgment, in which he dissented from the conclusion arrived at by the other members of the Court, said that the question was whether it was a consequence of the captain's signing the bills of lading, which in fact he did sign, that the shipowners had lost a right of general average contribution which they would otherwise have had against the owners of part of the cargo shipped. The peril in respect of which the expenses were incurred by the ship was a peril incurred by the negligence of the officers and crew of the ship. Now it was clear law that the rule of contribution had no application in cases where the danger which led to the sacrifice was brought about by the fault of the person claiming contribution, and if the right of contribution was thus excluded it could not be said that the fact that the ship could make no claim for contribution was the consequence of the captain following the instructions of the charterers and signing the bills of lading, and the case would not fall within the scope of the contract of indemnity in this charter-party. In such circumstances, in the absence of some special contract, the right to contribution would never arise, and it would not be true to say that the exclusion of the right of contribution was due to anything but the negligence of the shipowners' servant. But it was said that if the bill of lading had been in a different form from that in which it in fact was, and had contained, as undoubtedly was very usual, an exception of negligence of the master and crew, the right to contribution would have arisen: "The Carron Park" (15 P.D., 207) was relied on as an authority that such an exception in the contract of carriage would have this effect, and it seemed so to decide. His Lordship referred to "The Carron Park," and said that the judgment of Lord Watson in "Strang, Steel, and Co. v. Scott and Co." did not justify the decision in "The Carron Park." In his Lordship's opinion that decision was not right in principle. In his opinion the exceptions in the contract of carriage had nothing to do with the liability of the shipowner under the law of general average. The liability to contribute in no sense resulted from the contract of carriage, but existed wholly independently of the contract of carriage, by virtue of the equitable doctrine of the Rhodian law which, as part of the law maritime, had been incorporated in the municipal law of England. The rule of the Rhodian law excluding the person through whose fault the peril arose from benefits of general average contribution was based upon an obligation outside the contract of carriage. The shipowner could not claim contribution, because the peril had been caused by his fault, and the fact remained that it was caused by his fault notwithstanding the fact that it might be a form of the charter-party that the charterer should relieve him from responsibility so far as related to the contract of carriage for that fault of which he had been guilty. In his judgment the only way in which a shipowner could be placed in a position to recover general average contribution in a case where the peril had arisen from the negligence of the master or crew was a case where the master and crew had ceased, by the terms of the charter-party or otherwise, to be the servants or agents of the shipowner. In his opinion "The Carron Park" was wrongly decided. The law of general average contribution could not be applied in favour of a claimant through whose fault, whether personal or by his agents, the maritime peril was in fact brought about. Moreover, even if by special contract the right of contribution could be enforced against a party to the contract by the other party, even though his fault or negligence, his omission or his act of commission, had brought about the peril, he did not think that such a special contract was to be found in the exception to the charter-party, or would arise from the introduction of such an exception into the bill of lading. In his opinion the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew ought to be reversed.

Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, M.R., } 1900.
Rigby and Collins, L.J.J.) } July 20.

THE RHYMNEY RAILWAY COMPANY V. THE BRECON AND MERTHYR TYDVIL JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railway Company—Agreement between two companies to pool traffic—Stipulation not to seek any new line—Breach not entitling other company to treat agreement at an end.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 119), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice North's (reported ante, p. 119). The facts are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Baggallay, Q.C., Mr. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. C. H. Sargent were for the defendants. Mr. Cripps, Q.C., Mr. Ernest Moon, Mr. Harold Bompas, and Mr. G. S. Robertson were for the plaintiffs.

The appeal was heard on July 3 and 4.

The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the judgment of the Court allowing the appeal. He said,—This is an appeal from Mr. Justice North, who has decided in favour of the plaintiffs, the Rhymney Railway Company, in an action whereby the plaintiffs seek to obtain a declaration that an agreement of the year 1864 made between themselves and the defendants, the Brecon and Merthyr Tydvil Junction Railway Company, should be treated as determined. The defendants, by their defence, allege that the agreement is still binding and ask that an account may be taken under one of its clauses. The facts are partially stated in the judgment of Mr. Justice North, but it will be necessary to restate them in some detail in order that the grounds of our judgment may be clearly understood. Prior to the year 1864, the plaintiffs, the Rhymney Railway Company, were in possession of a line of railway running from the neighbourhood of Rhymney, on the west side of the Rhymney Valley, to Caerphilly, with a branch to the west to join the Taff Vale at the Walnut Tree Junction. The defendants, the Brecon Company, were in possession of a line of railway running also from the neighbourhood of Rhymney down the east side of the Rhymney Valley to Newport by way of Machen with a branch from Machen to Caerphilly, and also of a line running northwards from a point called Deri through Dowlais to Brecon and Merthyr. The plaintiff company had a branch from Bargoed to join the defendant company's line at Deri. This was substantially the position of the two companies in the year 1864. In the Session of that year both companies were in Parliament desiring to construct certain railways, and particularly a railway from Caerphilly to Cardiff; the Brecon company also proposing to construct a line from a point on their then existing line due north of Caerphilly to Caerphilly. Under these circumstances the heads of the agreement of 1864 were made out and confirmed by section 23 of the Rhymney Railway Act, 1864. The main provisions of that agreement may be summarized as follows:—Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 contemplated the construction of various lines by the Brecon and Rhymney Railway Companies respectively to the north of Rhymney, and a line from a point on the Brecon Company's line to Caerphilly. None of these lines have been constructed. Clauses 5 and 6 provided that the defendants, the Brecon Railway Company, should withdraw their scheme for constructing a line from Caerphilly to Cardiff, and that the plaintiffs should give the defendants running powers for through traffic from the terminus of the defendants' Caerphilly branch to the plaintiff company's station at Adam-street, Cardiff. Certain restrictions were imposed upon the user of these running powers.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By Clause 7 an alteration was made in the position of a junction between the defendants' line and the line of the plaintiffs, and the defendants were given running powers over the substituted junction and portion of the line of the Rhymney Company to Bargoed to a point to which they had already running powers communicating by way of Deri with their own line. By Clause 10 the plaintiffs gave the defendants running powers over their line between the end of the defendants' Caerphilly branch and Walnut Tree Junction subject to certain restrictions as to the traffic for which these running powers should be used. Clause 11 was in the following terms :—"After the opening of the Caerphilly and Cardiff line, the receipts arising from the traffic carried on between the New Tredegar works and Cardiff shall as between New Tredegar and Caerphilly be divided in equal proportions between the two companies after the deduction of 30 per cent. for working expenses, the mileage proportion between Caerphilly and Cardiff to belong exclusively to the Rhymney Company, the Brecon Company being allowed working expenses on the portion carried by them." Clause 17, on which the plaintiffs found their claim, is as follows :—"Except as herein mentioned neither company shall either directly or indirectly seek any new line from one side of the valley to the other to take away the traffic of either company." In pursuance of the agreement embodied in the heads of agreement the defendants withdrew their Bill for making an independent line from Caerphilly to Cardiff, the line of the plaintiffs was constructed, and the new junction near Bargoed station referred to in Clause 7 was also carried out. The works referred to in Clauses 1, 2, and 4 were never constructed. At the time of the making of this agreement the connexion across the valley between the plaintiffs' railway and the New Tredegar works already existed. Both parties appear to have acted on the agreement down to the year 1898, when the circumstances giving rise to this action arose. Some further communications were made from the Rhymney line on the western side of the valley to some new collieries opened up on the eastern, but it was agreed that these lines crossing the valley were constructed independently by landowners, and the case was conducted throughout on the basis that from 1864 down to 1898 both parties had abstained from any breach of the agreement. In the year 1896 the Barry Railway Company, which had about the year 1885 established docks and connecting railways running north from Barry, a port a few miles to the westward of Cardiff, obtained powers to construct a railway to join the line of the plaintiffs at Penrhos, and in the Session of 1898 the Barry Company were again in Parliament proposing to join the line of the defendants on the eastern side of the valley near Bedwas with another junction from the new projected line to the line of the Rhymney Company at Aber. The Bill was introduced in the House of Commons, but prior to its consideration before a Private Bill Committee in that House the heads of agreement were made between the defendants and the Barry Company which formed the foundation of the alleged breach by the defendants in respect of which the plaintiffs founded their right to treat the agreement of 1864 as at an end. These heads of agreement were dated April 26, 1898. Under them the defendants agreed to withdraw two railways which they were seeking power to construct for the purpose of making connexion between their own line and that of the plaintiffs in the neighbourhood of Caerphilly, and the Barry Company granted to the defendant company running powers over the Barry Company's proposed new line from its junction with the defendants' railway near Bedwas to its junction with the plaintiffs' railway near Aber. The agreement contained certain terms as to how the traffic to Barry was to be carried which are not material for the purpose of the present question. The Barry Company's Bill, which was introduced in the House of Commons, was opposed in committee on preamble by the plaintiffs, their opposition being founded upon, among other grounds, the rights which they had obtained under the agreement of 1864. Upon the preamble being declared proved, the plaintiffs did not appear upon clauses in the House of Commons. The Chairman of the Committee, in their absence, inserted Clause 9 of the Barry Railway Act, 1898, apparently for the protection of the plaintiffs. The terms of the heads of agreement between the Brecon and the Barry Companies, dated April 26, were made known to the plaintiffs in the course of the passage of the Barry Company's Bill through the Committee of the House of Commons. Upon the Barry Company's Bill being, in the ordinary course, referred to a Committee of the House of Lords, the plaintiffs again opposed the preamble, and, upon the preamble being passed, proposed an amendment to Clause 9 of the Bill which would have enlarged its scope so as to have brought within its protective provisions traffic from other places besides the New Tredegar Works. We have referred to these proceedings in Parliament because they were made the ground of a contention raised by the defendants that the plaintiffs had so acted as to preclude them from now saying that they could treat the agreement as determined. In the month of July, 1898, the plaintiff company informed the defendant company that they considered that the agreement of 1864 had been broken, and would be treated by them as determined, and in November of the same year they gave formal notice in writing to the defendant company determining the said agreement. Upon the case coming before Mr. Justice North, he held that the action of the defendants in connexion with the proposed new line of the Barry Company in the Session of 1898 was not only a breach of Article 17, but was such a breach as entitled the plaintiffs to treat the agreement thenceforward as at an end. Before considering the main questions which arise in the action it would be well to dispose of the preliminary point which was raised by the defendants—viz., that the action of the plaintiffs during the passage of the Barry Company's Bill through Parliament was such as to preclude them from treating the agreement as determined. We are clearly of opinion that nothing was done by the plaintiff company to prevent them from raising the case which they brought before Mr. Justice North. The action which they took in Parliament was action against the Barry Company in order to protect their rights, and, on failing to obtain such protection as they considered sufficient, they were, in our opinion, clearly entitled to resort to any further remedies which were open to them as between themselves and the defendants. The main questions, however, which arise for decision are the following. It is contended on behalf of the defendants that their action in the year 1898 did not constitute a breach of the 17th clause of the agreement of 1864; and secondly, that, even if it was a breach, it was not such a breach as entitled the plaintiff company wholly to determine and put an end to their obligations under the agreement. Mr. Justice North has found that the action of the defendant company did amount to a breach of Clause 17 of the agreement, and in this judgment he was, in our opinion, right. It was contended on behalf of the defendants, in support of their argument on this point, that the agreement of 1864 was intended to be an agreement whereby the traffic on the east side of the valley was to be treated as traffic of the defendants, and the traffic on the west side as traffic of the plaintiffs. To a certain extent this may be the result of Clause 17 of the agreement, but we are clearly of opinion that among the traffic which was intended to be protected in the interests of the plaintiffs was the already existing traffic from the new Tredegar pits to Cardiff by way of the plaintiffs' line, and that a scheme which proposed to take that traffic and divert it from Cardiff to another competing port by means of a line from one side of the valley to the other would be a new line to take away the traffic of the plaintiff company. There remains the question whether the breach of the agreement by the Brecon Company is such as entitles the Rhymney Company to treat the agreement as at an end, or whether their remedy is one for damages only. After the best consideration we can give to the matter, we are of opinion that the breach was not one entitling the plaintiffs to determine the agreement, but that they must seek their remedy in damages. It will be well to consider in the first instance what conduct on the part of one party to a contract justifies the other party in treating it as at an end. If there is a distinct refusal by one party to be bound by the terms of a contract in the future, the other party may, in our opinion, treat the contract as at an end. See "Withers v. Reynolds" (2 B and Ad., 882); "Hochster v. De La Tour" (2 E. and B., 678). See the judgment of Lord Blackburn in the "Mersey Steel and Iron Company v. Naylor" (at page 442 of 9 App. Cas.). Short of such refusal, we think the true principle to be deduced from all the cases is that you must ascertain whether the action of the party who is breaking the contract is such that the other party is entitled to conclude that the party breaking the contract no longer intends to be bound by its provisions. This part of the rule was laid down by Lord Blackburn in the same judgment (9 App. Cas., 443), where he says the rule of law is that where there is a contract between two parties, each side having to do something, if you see that the failure to perform one part of it goes to the root of the contract, goes to the foundation of the whole, it is a good defence to say, "I am not going to perform my part of it when that which is the root of the whole and the substantial consideration for my performance is defeated by your misconduct." It was contended by Mr. Cripps, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that, however little remained to be performed by the defendants, if it was to be gathered from the facts that they did not intend to fulfil their obligations to perform that part the plaintiff company were justified in treating the agreement as wholly determined. We think this goes too far. The result would be that, although all the main provisions of an agreement might have been performed, however trivial the breach was, the person complaining of the breach could treat it as going to the root of the contract. That this is not the true view of the law is, we think, to be deduced from another passage in the same judgment of Lord Blackburn, at p. 444, in which he says:—"I repeatedly asked Mr. Cohen whether or not he could find any authority which justified him in saying that every breach of a contract, or even a breach which involved in it the non-payment of money which there was an obligation to pay, must be considered to go to the root of the contract, and he produced no such authority. There are many cases in which the breach may do so; it depends upon the construction of the contract." The same view of the law was expressed by this Court in the case of "Johnstone v. Milling" (16 Q.B.D., 460). That was a case of the breach of one of the covenants of a lease, and in dealing with the principle to which we have referred Lord Justice Cotton said, at page 471:—"It must be taken, therefore, that the law is that when one party has done an act which amounts to a wrongful renunciation of the contract, and the other has acted upon it as such, there is a cause of action in respect thereof, but, when the other has not done so, then both the parties, as well as he who has attempted to renounce the contract as he who asserts its existence, are entitled to the benefit of its provisions. The Divisional Court in the present case treated the statements made by the plaintiff as a renunciation of the contract within the doctrine I have mentioned. I cannot say I think they were right in so doing. But, assuming that they were, I can find no case which shows that the doctrine in question applies to the renunciation of one particular covenant or stipulation in a contract such as a lease, which contains many. And as at present advised I am not favourably impressed with the view that the doctrine would apply to the case of a lease where the tenant cannot, in consequence of the refusal by the landlord to perform a particular covenant, put an end to the entire contract. But, however that may be, we have first to arrive at the conclusion that there was a renunciation of the contract." It remains to apply these rules of law to the facts in the present case. It is not contended that there was an express refusal by the defendants to be bound by the provisions of the agreement. What is said is that their conduct amounts to a breach of Clause 17 entitling the plaintiffs to determine the contract. Now to apply the text laid down by Lord Blackburn it cannot be said that any breach of Clause 17 goes to the root of the whole agreement and defeats the substantial consideration for it. In our opinion the main object of the agreement of 1864, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, was to get rid of the defendants' proposed competing line from Caerphilly to Cardiff, which by Clause 5 the defendants undertook to withdraw, and in consideration of which withdrawal the defendants obtained running powers both to Cardiff and to Walnut Tree Junction. A further provision, not in our opinion unimportant, was the grant of running powers to the Brecon Company under Clause 7. We think this view is further supported by the provisions of Article 11. If the defendants had obtained their own route from Caerphilly to Cardiff traffic might have been carried from the New Tredegar works to Cardiff wholly on the line of the defendants, in which event they would have secured the whole of the rate for themselves. The agreement provides that although such traffic will be carried to Cardiff entirely by the plaintiffs and never touch the defendant company's line at all, the defendants are to share in the receipts (after deducting working expenses) due to the portion of the transit from the New Tredegar pits to Caerphilly. In our opinion the provisions of the agreement show clearly that Clause 11 was part of the consideration paid by the plaintiffs for the abandonment by the defendants of their independent route from Caerphilly to Cardiff. If we could have found on the construction of the agreement that Clauses 11 and 17 depended the one upon the other—that is to say, that the consideration for Clause 17 was the granting of the share of the receipts under Clause 11—we should have been prepared to hold that a breach by the defendants of their obligation under Clause 17 justified the plaintiffs in refusing to fulfil their obligation under Clause 11. But looking at the whole agreement and its main provisions we think it would be wrong to hold that Clauses 11 and 17 are so mutually dependent, and, therefore, that the plaintiffs are justified in withholding payment under Clause 11 simply on the ground that there has been a breach of Clause 17. We may point out that the consequences of holding the agreement at an end might be very serious. The defendants' running powers from Caerphilly to Cardiff and Walnut Tree Junction would be gone, and although it is said that they have not hitherto been largely used, still they may be of great value: but, in addition, the running powers over the portion of the plaintiffs' substituted line south of Bargood Station would also be gone, and this forms part of the route of the Brecon Company to their own line north of Deri. For the above reasons we are of opinion that the decision of Mr. Justice North, holding that the plaintiffs were right in putting an end to the agreement, cannot be supported, and that the defendants are entitled to have a declaration that Clause 11 is binding on the plaintiffs, and to have an account taken thereunder. A subordinate question was raised as to interest, which has not been argued before us, and if any difference arises it should, we think, be raised on the taking of the account. The plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that the action of the defendant company did constitute a breach of the agreement, but until the line of the Brecon Company is opened they would not be entitled to recover any damages in respect of that breach. Each party to pay their own costs in the Court below, but the defendants are entitled to the costs of this appeal.

Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, Vaughan) 1900.
Williams, and Romer, L.J.J.) } July 20.

BOSTOCK V. THE RAMSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*
Practice—Costs—Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893.

Decision of Lord Russell of Killowen, C.J.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Lord Chief Justice's on a question as to costs, argued after the trial of an action. The action was one of malicious prosecution. The plaintiff was the principal proprietor of a travelling circus. The defendants were the Urban District Council of Ramsey. The plaintiff's circus visited the town of Ramsey, and the plaintiff's representative placed his wagons or vehicles in a particular part of a public thoroughfare where, in the opinion of the local authority, they constituted an obstruction of the highway. The defendants preferred an indictment against the plaintiff at the assizes for obstructing the highway, but Mr. Justice Wills was of opinion that there was no evidence on which he could properly be indicted, and the jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty." The plaintiff then brought this action for malicious prosecution. At the trial the Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that the plaintiff had not made out that there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause on the part of the defendants, and he held that there was no evidence of malice, and he therefore directed judgment to be entered for the defendants (see ante, p. 18). Subsequently, the Lord Chief Justice, after hearing argument on the question whether he should deprive the successful defendants of their costs, came to the conclusion that the defendants had acted unreasonably in instituting the prosecution, and that that constituted good cause for depriving them of costs; and, secondly, that he had a discretion to deprive them of costs notwithstanding section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, which provides that where in an action against a public authority a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. He accordingly ordered that the judgment should stand for the defendants without costs (see ante, p. 96). From this decision the defendants appealed.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Dr. J. W. Cooper appeared for the defendants; Mr. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Mr. P. Rose-Innes for the plaintiff.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that in his opinion the facts showed that the indictment which the defendants had preferred against the plaintiff was an oppressive and puerile indictment. When the case came before Mr. Justice Wills that learned Judge held that there was no evidence on which the plaintiff could properly be convicted, and in his opinion no reasonable jury would have convicted the plaintiff under the circumstances. The plaintiff then brought this action for malicious prosecution, and the Lord Chief Justice, after carefully considering the matter, came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had failed to give any evidence of malice on the part of the defendants, and he also held that the plaintiff had not proved an absence of reasonable and probable cause for instituting the prosecution; he accordingly gave judgment for the defendants. But it was obvious that the Lord Chief Justice took the same view of the prosecution as he himself had just expressed, and he deprived the defendants of their costs of the action. Apparently, he felt himself bound to deprive them of costs, and on this ground, that they had by their conduct induced the plaintiff to believe that there was malice on their part and that there was an absence of reasonable and probable cause. On this two questions arose. The first was whether there was any evidence of "good cause" for depriving the defendants of costs within the meaning of Order 65, Rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, which provides that where any action is tried with a jury "the costs shall follow the event, unless the Judge by whom such action is tried, or the Court, shall for good cause otherwise order." It had been held in "Jones v. Curling" (13 Q.B.D., 262) and other cases that if there was any evidence of good cause, then it was for the Judge at the trial to exercise his discretion, and there was no appeal to this Court from the exercise of the Judge's discretion, and that the only jurisdiction of this Court in the matter was to consider whether there was any evidence of good cause. In his opinion, the point was whether there was any evidence that the conduct of the defendants in instituting the prosecution under the circumstances was such as to give rise to the plaintiff's believing that he would succeed in an action for malicious prosecution if he brought one. Of course conduct having nothing whatever to do with the action could not constitute "good cause." But it had been decided in this Court in "Harnett v. Vise" (5 Ex. D., 307) that the question was not confined to the conduct of the parties in the litigation itself. He thought that there was evidence in this case that the conduct of the defendants was such as to lead the plaintiff to think that he had a good cause of action against them. The second question was as to the true construction of section 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893. It seemed to him to be clear that the meaning of that section was that where in an action against a public authority a judgment was obtained by the defendants it should carry costs as between solicitor and client in cases in which the defendants were entitled to costs. It could not mean that however oppressive and unreasonable they had been, and no matter whether they were entitled to costs or not, they should nevertheless have their costs as between solicitor and client. He thought that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

TIMMINS V. THE LEEDS FORGE COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Master and Servant—Master's liability to servant—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897—"Accident," what is.

This was an appeal from the decision of Judge Greenhow, sitting at the Leeds County Court, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. The applicant for compensation was a labourer in the employment of the Leeds Forge Company. The question was whether the injury to the workman was caused by an "accident." The appeal first came before the Court on February 3 last, when it was remitted to the County Court Judge to find the exact circumstances in which the injury occurred. The case now came on again. The evidence was shortly as follows:—The applicant's duty was to lift planks of timber. On January 26, 1899, he was engaged in shifting timber from one heap in the yard to another heap. He had been moving the timber the day before, and had no difficulty in moving it then. The timber consisted of pine deals 14ft. long, 11in. wide, and 3in. thick. On January 26 the planks were all frozen together, there having been a frost during the night. The applicant began work at 11 a.m. and had a difficulty in moving the planks from the beginning. At about 4 15 p.m. he bent down to lift a plank which was fast to some others with the frost, when he fell down in pain. The lower planks in the heap were more firmly fastened together on account of the rain and frost. He never had any difficulty before that occasion. The applicant was ruptured in consequence, and was injured. The County Court Judge found the above evidence to be true. It appeared that the applicant had been previously ruptured, but the County Court Judge found upon the evidence that he was practically cured of the old rupture, and was as good a man as he was before it, and was entitled to the same remedy as if this had been a rupture for the first time. The Judge also found that the rupture was, in fact, caused by the lifting of the timber and not by some other cause, and that it was, under all the circumstances of the case, an injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment, and that the employers were liable to pay compensation. He accordingly made an award in favour of the applicant.

Mr. BAIRSTOW (Mr. Cripps, Q.C., with him), for the employers, contended that there was no "accident" in this case. There was nothing fortuitous or unexpected. The workman knew that the planks were frozen together, as he had been working from 11 a.m. to 4 15 p.m., when the accident happened. The work was the man's ordinary work which was rendered heavier than usual by the frost. He referred to "Hensley v. White" (ante, p. 64; [1900] 1 Q.B., 481).

Mr. Tindal Atkinson, Q.C., and Mr. Compston, for the applicant, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the facts shortly were that the workman was engaged in moving piles of timber. There had been rain and frost the night before, and in consequence the planks got frozen together. The man found that he was able to move the timber. As he (the Lord Justice) read the evidence, the lower down the workman got in the stack of timber the harder the planks stuck together, owing to the rain and frost, and this was unknown to the workman. Accordingly when the workman tried to lift one of the lower planks he ruptured himself, owing to the difficulty of lifting it, on account of its being frozen fast to the other planks. It was said that there was nothing fortuitous or unexpected in the case. In his opinion, there was evidence upon which the County Court Judge could find that the injury was caused by something fortuitous and unexpected by reason of the planks sticking together. The appeal, therefore, failed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and LORD JUSTICE ROMER concurred.

IN RE JOLLY—GATHERCOLE V. NORFOLK.*

Will—Hotchpot clause—Rent owing—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, sec. 1.

Decision of North, J. ([1900] 1 Ch., 292), reversed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice North which was reported in The Times of December 15 last. The appeal was heard last week.

Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. Poyser were for the appellant; Mr. Rolt was for the daughter of the testatrix; Mr. H. Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. T. B. Napier were for the trustees of the will.

The COURT allowed the appeal. The facts are stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said,—The question is whether the trustees of the will of Anne Jolly, who made a will in the year 1891 and died in December, 1898, are entitled, in dividing her property between her four children, to deduct from the share of the son R. T. Jolly any amount in respect of rent due for a farm occupied by him since 1868. In 1868 the testatrix let the farm to her son at a rental of £80 a year. He paid the rent due up to the year 1881, and made no payment after that time. By her will made in 1891 Anne Jolly gave her property in trust for her four children, and declared (among other things) that all moneys owing to her at her death by any of her children for rent or otherwise should be brought into hotchpot, and that no child should be entitled to receive any share until such moneys so owing to the testatrix had been paid to her executors. Mr. Justice North has decided that the executors should deduct from the share of R. T. Jolly 12 years' rent of the farm for the period 1881 to 1893. I am unable to adopt this view. In the year 1893 R. T. Jolly obtained, by virtue of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, section 1, an absolute title to the property. It is, I think, inconsistent with his right so acquired that the rent which he ought to have paid should be deemed to be still owing. The effect of the Limitation Acts of 1833 and 1874 is, in my opinion, that, after the expiration of the statutory period of 20 and 12 years respectively, all rights which the reversioner would have had in respect of the land have come to an end, and I do not think that it would be consistent with that position that rent, the non-payment of which has given the occupier a title to the land, should still be deemed to be owing. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and that the trustees are not entitled to deduct anything in respect of the arrears of rent.

THE VALENTINE MEAT JUICE COMPANY V. THE VALENTINE EXTRACT COMPANY.*

Trade Name—Imitation—Using own name—Passing off goods as another's.

Decision of Stirling, J. (ante, p. 33), reversed and injunction granted.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling which is reported ante, p. 33. The plaintiffs, who are an American company and proprietors and manufacturers of the well-known extract called "Valentine's Meat Juice," sought by this action an injunction to restrain the defendant company from carrying on business as manufacturers or vendors of any preparation of extract of meat or meat juice under any name or title of which the name "Valentine" or "Valentine's" formed part, and to restrain the defendant C. R. Valentine from carrying on any such business under any such name or title without clearly distinguishing that business from the business of the plaintiffs.

The business of the plaintiffs was originally founded in 1871 by Mr. Mann T. Valentine, who had discovered a mode of preparing meat juice, and the business has always consisted and still consists entirely in the manufacture and sale of that preparation. In 1892, on the death of the founder, the business passed into the hands of the plaintiffs. They have no depot and employ no agent in England, although they make annual consignments to a few firms in this country to the extent of upwards of a quarter of a million bottles of their meat juice. Their preparation is mainly, but not exclusively, used by sick people and invalids. It is a liquid, and has always been sold in bottles of one size and of a distinctive shape, and under some designation of which the name "Valentine" formed part. In some cases it has been sold or referred to as "Valentine" simply. Until 1898 there was no other preparation of meat on the market connected with the name of Valentine. The defendant company was incorporated in this country in 1897 with a capital of £4,000 divided into 8,000 preferred shares of £1 each and 1,000 deferred shares of a like value, and having amongst its objects the carrying on of the business of meat extract or meat juice manufacturers and vendors. This company was promoted by the defendant Charles Richard Valentine, and he was its managing director. In 1895 he was in the employment as manager of the Colonial Consignment and Distributing Company, who are dealers in colonial produce, including, at one time, extract of meat manufactured according to Liebig's and other processes. Some time in 1895 the defendant Valentine conceived the idea of putting up solid extract of meat in the form of globules enclosed in a protecting cover, so that it could be carried about in small quantities and be made readily available as food by travellers and others. For this process he subsequently obtained a patent, which, in 1897, he sold to the defendant company for $1,440, to be paid as to £500 in cash and the balance in deferred shares. The memorandum of association was signed by seven clerks who were nominees of the defendant Valentine's, but the company was not, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Stirling, altogether what is ordinarily understood as a "one man company." The defendant Valentine left the service of the Colonial Consignment Company in June, 1898, and the defendant company then commenced the sale of meat globules. They were at first packed in boxes bearing labels describing them as "Valentine's Valtipe Meat Globules," the word "Valtine" being a registered trade mark which was acquired by the company on its formation from the defendant Valentine. Since the commencement of this action the description on the labels has been altered to "Valtine Meat Globules." The plaintiffs did not complain that the defendants had got up their goods so as to resemble the plaintiffs', but only that the defendants had made use of the name "Valentine" in such a way as to deceive the public into the belief that the goods sold by them were manufactured by the plaintiffs. Mr. Justice Stirling dismissed the action, but without costs. In his opinion there were features of suspicion in the case, but he came to the conclusion that want of good faith on the part of the defendants had not been established. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Sebastian were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. A. Sims were for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that no doubt the case was one of considerable importance. He would first express his view of the law applicable to the case. The law had been expressed in different language by different Judges, but there was no difference in principle. The principle could not be better stated than it was by the present Lord Chancellor in "Reddaway v. Banham" ([1896] A.C., at p. 204), where he said, "I believe the principle of law may be very plainly stated, and that is that nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else." And in the same case the late Lord Herschell said (at p. 210):—"The name of a person, or words forming part of the common stock of language, may become so far associated with the goods of a particular maker that it is capable of proof that the use of them by themselves without explanation or qualification by another manufacturer would deceive a purchaser into the belief that he was getting the goods of A when he was really getting the goods of B. In a case of this description the mere proof by the plaintiff that the defendant was using a name, word, or device which he had adopted to distinguish his goods would not entitle him to any relief. He could only obtain it by proving further that the defendant was using it under such circumstances or in such manner as to put off his goods as the goods of the plaintiff." And Lord Macnaghten expressed himself to the same effect, though not in the same language. In the opinion of his Lordship (the Master of the Rolls) the only difficulty in the present case was in the application of these principles to the facts. A strenuous effort was made by Mr. Upjohn in his able argument to draw a distinction between a case in which the name, of the use of which the complaint was made, was the name of the person who was carrying on the business and a case in which it was not. In his Lordship's opinion there was no difference in principle. In either case the principle stated by Lord Halsbury must be applied. It was, no doubt, more difficult to apply the principle when the name of a person was used. The rule, as applicable to such a case, could not be better expressed than it was by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Jamieson v. Jamieson" (15 Pat. Off. Rep., at p. 193):—"A plaintiff never can complain of the user by the defendant of either the plaintiff's personal name or of any other name that he chooses to use for the purpose of denoting his goods, unless he first establishes that in the market his goods have come to be known by that name. It is not a question, as it has been sometimes suggested, of the right of the law to restrain a man from using his own name. The right and duty of the Court always is to restrain a man from using a name that has come to be recognized as the name of a particular trader's goods for his, the defendant's, goods so as to suggest that the defendant's goods are the plaintiff's goods and to pass them off as such." That was an exposition of the law dealing with the very point now raised, and it showed that, though in such a case it was more necessary than in any other for the plaintiff to establish clearly the fact that the name in question had come in the market to denote the plaintiff's goods, yet the principle was the same as in other cases. The plaintiff must establish that the name in question had acquired a "secondary" meaning as denoting his goods. There was no doubt as to the law which was to be applied. The question was whether the names "Valentine's Meat Juice," "Valentine's Extract," or "Valentine" alone had come to be used in the market as distinguishing the plaintiffs' preparation only. There could be no doubt that they had. The evidence was overwhelming. The plaintiffs had established that their goods had become known in the market by these names, and there was no reason why these names should not be protected as much as any fancy name. His Lordship did not wish to judge any man harshly, but he could not treat the defendant's action in the matter as thoroughly straightforward and honest. He came to the conclusion that the defendant C. R. Valentine was perfectly aware that the names "Valentine's Meat Juice" and "Valentine's Extract" were names of great reputation in the market, and that he adopted the name in question for the purpose of getting the benefit of the reputation so far as he could. The evidence showed that a number of persons had bona fide thought that the article put on the market by the defendants was Valentine's meat juice contained in capsules. The Court had only to consider what would be the effect of the notices put out by the defendants and, in his Lordship's opinion, the only natural conclusion was that which was drawn by those persons who wrote to the defendants asking for an explanation. It was said that the plaintiffs and the defendants were appealing to different markets. His Lordship drew the conclusion that the defendants were representing and intending to represent to the public that their article was a Valentine's extract of meat which had new qualities, and that they were not merely claiming the invention of a capsule. It was not suggested that C. R. Valentine had experimented on extract of meat or had produced extract of meat or had done anything but obtain the best extract of meat which he could procure. In his Lordship's opinion the term Valentine Extract could not be used in connexion with meat juice without representing the goods to be those of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were entitled to the relief which they asked, and, under the circumstances, his Lordship thought that the injunction should extend to the use of the word "Valtine."

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgment to the same effect.

Mr. UPJOHN asked that the operation of the injunction might be suspended pending an appeal to the House of Lords.

The COURT refused to do this.

BARON AND ANOTHER V. THE PORTSLADE-BY-SEA URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Local Government—Sewers—Failure of local authority to cleanse—Public Health Act, 1875, sec. 19.

There is nothing in the Public Health Act, 1875, which takes away the ordinary common law right of action where a local authority neglects to cleanse the sewers vested in them and damage is thereby caused to an individual.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew on further consideration after the trial of the action with a jury, at the Lewes Assizes; reported in 15 The Times L.R., 513. The plaintiffs were the occupiers of certain premises at Portslade, consisting of a dwelling house and land used for agricultural purposes. A sewer, which was made by a private individual and which carried the sewage from a brewery and some cottages, passed in an open cutting through the plaintiffs' land. This sewer became vested in the defendants under the Public Health Act, 1875. Formerly the defendants, by arrangement with the plaintiffs, paid for the cleansing of the sewer, but in 1898 a dispute arose between the plaintiffs and the defendants, with the result that the sewer was not cleansed. The plaintiffs complained that in consequence thereof large quantities of sewage and filth came upon their land so as to cause a nuisance. The defendants contended that the plaintiffs' only remedy for the defendants' neglect of the statutory duty, imposed by section 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, of keeping the sewer properly cleansed, was by complaint to the Local Government Board under section 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The jury assessed the damages at £75. Mr. Justice Mathew held that the action would lie and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed.

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., and Mr. THORN DRURY, for the defendants, contended that the only remedy was by complaint to the Local Government Board under section 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that no action would lie. They referred upon this point to "Robinson v. Workington Corporation" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 619); "Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban Council" ([1898] A.C., 387); "Bateman v. Poplar Board of Works" (37 Ch.D., 272); "Hammond v. St. Pancras Vestry" (L.R., 9 C.P., 316). They further contended that as the defendants had not made the sewer they were only guilty of nonfeasance, for which no action would lie. "Attorney-General v. Dorking Union" (20 Ch.D., 595); "Brown v. Dunstable Corporation" ([1899] 2 Ch., 378); "Dent v. Bournemouth Corporation" (66 L.J., Q.B., 395).

Mr. J. G. Witt, Q.C., and Mr. Sinclair-Cox, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that he did not in any way question the law laid down in any of the cases cited. They were all beside the present question. In the present case there was a sewer vested in the defendants. That sewer was formerly cleaned out at certain intervals, and no nuisance was created or allowed to exist. The local authority seemed to have discontinued that ordinary and natural duty, and they thereby caused a nuisance to a private citizen with respect to his land. There was all the difference between the jurisdiction to call upon the local authority to make new sewers or a new system of drainage and the jurisdiction to compel the local authority to deal with the existing sewers in a proper and reasonable manner. There was no question here as to making new sewers. The plaintiffs' complaint was that the defendants, who had formerly dealt with this sewer in a proper and reasonable manner, had lately neglected to do so, and had thereby caused a nuisance and damage to the plaintiffs. His Lordship could not see why the obligations imposed on the defendants should not be enforced by action. The earlier part of s. 299 of the Public Health Act, 1875, had reference to new works. The only difficulty arose with regard to the later words of the section, but on looking at the context they evidently referred to a duty to be enforced of a kind similar to that dealt with in the former part of the section. The words did not mean that every time the local authority neglected to use proper diligence in the management of the existing sewers, the only remedy was by complaint to the Local Government Board. Where there was neglect by the local authority in the ordinary management of sewers and damage was thereby caused to a private citizen, there was nothing in the Act which took away the ordinary common law right of action. The judgment of the learned Judge was therefore right.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that none of the cases cited went anywhere near saying that where a local authority neglected the duty imposed upon them by s. 19 of the Public Health Act, 1875, of properly cleansing the sewers vested in them, and damage was thereby caused to an individual, the common law right of action was taken away, and that the only remedy the aggrieved person had was by complaint to the Local Government Board under s. 299.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS agreed.

WATSON V. H. BORNER AND CO. (LIMITED).*

Ship—Charter-party—Termination of voyage—Delivery of cargo at named wharf—Lay days, commencement of.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Mathew, reported in The Times of August 5, 1899, and 4 Com. Cas., 335. The action was brought by the owners of the steamship Netley Abbey to recover a balance of freight upon a cargo of ore carried from Elba to Cardiff under a charter-party dated January 15, 1898, made between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The main question in the case was whether the defendants were entitled to deduct from the amount of freight payable on the cargo the sum of £100 5s. in respect of despatch money alleged to have been earned by them, or only £49 5s. The charter-party provided that the Netley Abbey should "proceed to Elba and there load a cargo of ore, and being so loaded should proceed to Dowlais Wharf, Cardiff, and there deliver the same as customary according to the custom of the port, where and as directed by consignees, to whom notice is to be given of the vessel being ready to discharge." The cargo to be shipped at the rate of 200 tons per working day of 24 hours, and to be discharged on same conditions. Time for discharging to count "from 6 a.m. after ship is in every respect ready in berth and in free pratique, as per custom of port; written notice of such readiness being given to consignees during usual office hours. . . Demurrage, if any, at the rate of twenty shillings sterling per hour. Despatch money at the rate of half the demurrage." The Dowlais Wharf was a private wharf belonging to the Dowlais Iron Company, and was situated in the Roath Dock, Cardiff. The wharf was under the entire control of the Dowlais Company, who directed the order in which vessels were to load or discharge at their wharf. The cargo in question formed part of a large quantity of ore which had been sold by the defendants to the Dowlais Company under a contract made in 1897, by which the Dowlais Company were bound to take delivery ex ship in the Roath Dock, Cardiff. This contract provided that "the cargo should be discharged at the rate of not less than 300 tons per working day from time ship is ready to discharge, or buyers to pay demurrage as per charter-party." A bill of lading was signed for the cargo and was endorsed by the defendants and sent to the Dowlais Company, who discharged the vessel and paid freight on the cargo to the shipowners, the amount being settled in account with the defendants. At the Dowlais Wharf there were facilities for loading or discharging three vessels at a time. The Netley Abbey arrived in the Roath Dock on February 8, 1898, and notice of readiness to discharge was given to the Dowlais Company on that day. There were at that time three vessels at the Dowlais Wharf, one of which left early on the following day, and another vessel called the Onyx, which arrived in dock after the Netley Abbey, was, in order to suit the business arrangements of the Dowlais Company, put into her place to load. The Onyx was succeeded by another vessel, which also loaded cargo from the Dowlais Company. The Netley Abbey got into berth at 2 p.m. on February 14, and her discharge was completed at 6 a.m. on the 17th. The time allowed by the charter-party for unloading was 248½ hours. The defendants contended that loading time commenced at 6 a.m. on February 15, and that 200½ hours had been saved. The plaintiffs' case was that the Netley Abbey had been prevented from getting into berth on the 9th by the act of the Dowlais Company, who were the defendants' agents, and that in consequence, therefore, the defendants were not entitled to the despatch money claimed. Mr. Justice Mathew gave judgment for the defendants.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. R. H. Balloch, for the defendants, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that, in his opinion, the judgment was right. The case was perfectly clear. The obligation was upon the shipowners to take their ship to Dowlais Wharf. They did not do so until February 14, and therefore the lay days did not commence to run until 6 a.m. on February 15.

The LORDS JUSTICES concurred.

RE TRENCHARD, DECEASED—WARD V. TRENCHARD.*

Settled Land Acts—Tenant for life—Settled Land Act, 1882.

A testator by his will gave his wife the use of his residence as long as she should desire it, his estate to pay all rates, taxes, and outgoings in respect thereof; held, that she had the powers of a tenant for life in respect thereof under the Settled Land Acts.

In this case the testator, who died in April, 1899, by his will, made in March, 1897, gave to his wife the use of his residence, Woodville, so long as she should desire to make it her permanent place of residence and should remain his widow, his estate to pay all rates, taxes, and outgoings in respect thereof and to keep the house and grounds in tenable repair. It appeared that the testator had for many years resided at Woodville, which was a freehold suburban house with about one-and-a-half acre of ground, and that the rates, taxes, and outgoings amounted to some £120 per annum. The testator's widow had permanently resided at Woodville since the testator's death, but now claimed to be entitled, as tenant for life within the definition contained in the Settled Land Act, 1882, section 58, subsection vi., to exercise her power of selling the house and receiving the income of the proceeds, and also, in the event of such a sale, to receive out of the testator's estate such a further sum in each year during her widowhood as should be equivalent to the rates, taxes, and outgoings of the house. It was, amongst other things, contended, on the other hand, that the testator's widow took no estate in the house, but merely a licence or privilege of occupation, and therefore that the provisions of the Settled Land Acts did not apply.

Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. J. Bradford, Mr. Rowden, Q.C., and Mr. Ribton, Mr. Norton, Q.C., and Mr. Cozens-Hardy, and Mr. Clayton appeared for the parties.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said that the present case, but for the existence of certain decisions under the Settled Land Acts, would have presented considerable difficulties. In his judgment what was given by the testator to his widow was more than a mere licence to reside in the house. The will gave her an estate in the residence referred to, and that being so she had the powers of a tenant for life, within section 58, subsection vi., of the Act of 1882. The next point was whether the direction contained in the will as to the payment of the rates, taxes, and outgoings, so long as she should desire to make it her permanent place of residence, was such as would deprive the lady of all interest in the portion of the testator's estate properly applicable to such payment in the event of her selling the residence and therefore a prohibition or limitation, void within the meaning of section 51 of the Act, as preventing the tenant for life from exercising, or as inducing her to abstain from exercising, or as putting her into a position inconsistent with her exercising her powers under the Act, or as tending to bar that operation. He was of opinion that, so far as the direction in the will made it a condition that the benefit of the payments in question was to be dependent upon residence, it was void within section 51, and that the widow's interest in such sums continued during her widowhood independently of her residing in the house. were authorities which, as a matter of fact, carried him over the greater portion of the ground in the present case, and he did not consider that "Re Edwards' Settlement" ([1897] 2 Ch., 412) was to a contrary effect. He therefore declared that the widow had the powers of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Acts, and also that the benefit of the provisions of the will as to the rates, taxes, and outgoings did not cease on the sale of the residence.

THE QUEEN V. BUTTON.*

Criminal Law—False pretences—Remoteness—Conviction—Validity.

This was a case stated by the Recorder of Lincoln. At the quarter sessions held at Lincoln on July 3 last the defendant, Leonard Button, was convicted of attempting to obtain goods by false pretences. The following facts were proved at the trial:—On August 26, 1899, there were bicycle and athletic sports at Lincoln for which prizes were given. Among the various contests there were a 120 yards race and a 440 yards race, in respect of each of which a prize was given of the value of 10 guineas. Among the names sent in for these two contests was the name of C. Sims, Thames Ironworks A.C., and two written forms of entry were sent in to the secretary of the sports containing, as appears to be usual, a statement as to the last four races in which Sims had run, together with a statement that he had never won a race. These forms were not sent in by Sims, nor were they in his handwriting, and he knew nothing of them. They were, however, signed in his proper name and with his true address, and contained a correct account of his last performances. The forms were proved not to have been written by the defendant. The performances of Sims were very moderate, and as a matter of fact Sims was only a very moderate runner, and as a result the supposed Sims was given by the handicapper of the sports a start of 11 yards in the 120 yards race and a start of 33 yards in the 440 yards race. Sims was ill at Erith when the races were run and was not at Lincoln at all, and he was personated by the defendant, who was a fine performer and won both contests very easily. The suspicion of the handicapper having been aroused, he asked the defendant after the 120 yards race whether he really was Sims and whether the performances given in the entry form really were his and whether he had really never won a race. To these questions the defendant answered that he was Sims, that the performances were his own, and that he had never won a race. All these statements were untrue, and, in particular, he had won a race at Erith in his own name. The handicapper, who was called as a witness, stated that he should not have given the defendant such favourable starts if he had known his true name and performances. The Recorder, in summing up the case to the jury, said that if the defendant did what he did "for a lark" without any criminal intent and without intending to get the prizes they ought to find him not guilty, but that if he made the false representations wilfully, intentionally, and fraudulently with intent to obtain the prizes they ought to find him guilty.

The jury found a verdict of guilty, but the Recorder reserved a case for the consideration of the Court, the following being the questions to be determined :—(1) Whether the Recorder summed up the case correctly to the jury ; and (2) whether the attempt to obtain the prizes was too remote from the pretence.

Mr. J. PERCIVAL HUGHES, for the defendant, contended that the false pretences made by the defendant were exhausted by his admission to the contest and the advantage given to him by the handicapper. The winning of the race was attributable to his own skill as a runner, see " R. v. Larnier " (14 Cox, C.C., 497), when the Common Serjeant held in a case similar to the present after consulting Mr. Justice Stephen that the false pretences were too remote. The defendant never applied for the prizes. That was an act necessary to fully constitute the offence. Until that was done the defendant had a locus penitentiae. Counsel also referred to " R. v. Eagleton " (6 Cox, C.C., 559).

Mr. Montague Shearman and Mr. T. Hollis Walker, for the Crown, were not called upon to argue.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW said :—This conviction must be upheld. It is said that " R. v. Larnier " is an authority the other way. We must, however, consider that in that case the Common Serjeant had to direct the jury, and he directed them according to his impression as to what Mr. Justice Stephen thought. That case was differed from by Lord Justice Lindley. And I am clearly of opinion that Lord Justice Lindley was right. The questions are purely questions of fact. They are :—With what intention did the defendant enter for the races ? Was it to obtain the prizes ? And was that intention to obtain the prizes too remote ? No reasonable man could have any doubt as to the answer to these questions. The defendant represented himself to be a man who had not won a race. He was handicapped with that representation in view. But as a matter of fact he had won races. It was said that he did it " for a lark." The jury had an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon that point. It is said that his winning the race was due to his own prowess. But it was also due to the false pretences. It is also said that some other act on the part of the defendant was necessary, such as the application for the prizes, and that until that further act was done he could not be convicted, because the criminal intention involved in the false pretences had been exhausted by the entry for the races. That is an extremely subtle argument. In point of fact the defendant was found out before he applied for the prizes. If he had not been found out he would probably have applied for the prizes. Under the circumstances the jury found that the defendant made pretences which were false and which were not too remote. I am clearly of opinion that the conviction was good.

The other JUDGES concurred.

THE QUEEN V. STREETER.*

Criminal Law—Receiving stolen goods.

Held, that a person who received goods, stolen by a wife from her husband, knowing them to have been stolen, cannot be indicted under the Larceny Act, 1861, as a receiver of stolen goods.

This was a case stated by the Chairman of the West Sussex quarter sessions, and the question for the consideration of the Court was whether a person who received goods stolen by a wife from her husband knowing them to have been stolen could be indicted as a receiver of stolen goods.

The defendant, William Streeter, and Ellen Tickner were indicted at the midsummer quarter sessions, held on June 28 last, for larceny in a dwelling-house of household and other goods and £27 in money. There was also a count in this indictment for receiving the same. Ellen Tickner is a married woman, and until May last she lived with her husband at Stammerham, near Horsham. The defendant Streeter lodged with them. On April 21 the husband turned Streeter out of the house. On May 11 Ellen Tickner packed and sent by carrier to Horsham two boxes labelled " Streeter, passenger to Brighton," which the carrier handed to Streeter at Horsham Station. Ellen Tickner shortly afterwards left her husband's house, while he was at work, and joined Streeter at Southwater Station on the line to Brighton. They were subsequently living together as man and wife at Farnham. The husband, after his wife's disappearance, having missed the goods and money mentioned in the indictment, gave information to the police, and then Ellen Tickner and Streeter were arrested. At the time of the arrest the missing goods were found in the boxes which Ellen Tickner had sent to Streeter, and £27 in money was found in Streeter's box, the key of which was found in Ellen Tickner's purse. At the trial, at the close of the case for the prosecution, counsel for Streeter submitted that there was no evidence against his client on the count for larceny, and that on the second count, even if it were proved that Ellen Tickner committed a felony against her husband under the provisions of sections 12 and 16 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by taking his goods, yet Streeter could not be indicted for receiving such goods knowing them to have been stolen, because that statute had not made such receiving a felony, and because under section 91 of the Larceny Act, 1861, only persons who received goods the stealing of which amounted to a felony either at common law or under the provisions of that Act could be indicted as receivers, and that as the stealing by a wife of goods belonging to her husband was not a larceny at common law or under the Larceny Act no receiver of such goods could be indicted for a felony. The Chairman left the case to the jury subject to a case for the opinion of this Court. The jury found Ellen Tickner guilty on the count for larceny, and Streeter not guilty on the count for larceny, but guilty on the count for receiving.

Mr. RAVEN, for the defendant, cited " R. v. Smith " (L.R., 1 C.C.R., 266) and " R. v. Kenny " (2 Q.B.D., 307).

Mr. GRAHAM CAMPBELL, for the Crown, contended that " R. v. Smith " was wrongly decided.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW said,—" This case is concluded by " R. v. Smith." Formerly there were two cases of stealing in which indictments for larceny would not lie. One was where a married woman stole from her husband, and the other where a partner stole partnership goods. These two defects in the law were corrected by two separate enactments. The partner was made criminally responsible by the Larceny by Partners Act, 1867, and the wife was made similarly responsible by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. We must now turn to section 91 of the Larceny Act, 1861, the enactment by which receiving stolen property knowing it to have been stolen was made indictable. The language of that enactment is perfectly clear. It provides as follows :—" Whosoever shall receive any chattel, money, valuable security, or other property whatsoever, the stealing, taking, extorting, &c., . . . whereof shall amount to a felony either at common law or by virtue of this Act, knowing the same to have been stolen, taken, &c., . . . shall be guilty of felony."

* Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The important words are "either at common law or by virtue of this Act." "R. v. Smith" was the case of goods stolen by a partner, and it was held that an indictment for receiving such goods would not lie. Our decision must be the same in the present case—namely, that an indictment for receiving the money and goods stolen by the wife does not lie.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that in future cases there might be an indictment for receiving at common law.

The remainder of the JUDGES concurred.

THE SAXON STEAMSHIP COMPANY (LIMITED) V. THE UNION STEAMSHIP COMPANY.*

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Colliery guarantee—Construction—"Colliery working day," meaning of.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 The Times

Their Lordships gave judgment in this appeal which was argued before them on May 21 and 22 and is reported in 15 The Times L.R., 477; 4 Com. Cas., 29. It will be seen that the House has reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal and substantially restored—with a variation—the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

The appellants (plaintiffs) were the owners of the ship Saxon and brought their action against the respondents (defendants), who were charterers of the said ship by charter-party, dated January 25, 1898, to recover damages for breach of charter-party. It was admitted or proved that the facts and circumstances giving rise to the action were as follows:—Under the charter-party of January 25, 1898, the Saxon was to load a cargo of coal at Barry, subject to certain terms and conditions, of which the following are the material parts:—"Cargo, except any portion thereof required for stiffening, to be loaded in 12 clear working days, Sundays and holidays excepted, from the time true written notice is given, between 9 a.m. and 6 p.m., that all ballast or inward cargo is discharged and the stiffening coal (if any) is on board, and the ship is ready to receive her cargo. Stiffening coal, if required, is to be supplied at ship's expense, at the rate of 100 tons per clear working day, after 24 hours' notice is given of its being required and that the ship is ready to receive the same. The loading both of cargo proper and stiffening coal is subject to the conditions of the colliery guarantee in use at the said colliery. Any time lost through riots, strike, lock-out, or stoppage of pitmen, trimmers, or other hands connected with the working or delivery of the said coal, or from any conditions or exceptions mentioned in the colliery guarantee, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, obstruction on the railway and in the docks, or by reason of floods, frosts, storms, or any cause beyond the control of the said colliery, not to be computed as part of the aforesaid loading, or the hereafter mentioned discharging time." "Demurrage at loading ports as per colliery guarantee, at port of discharge at the rate of 3d. per register ton per working day." The colliery guarantee, referred to in the charter-party, was dated January 28, 1898, and was addressed to the respondents. By its terms the Saxon was to be loaded with a cargo of coal in 12 days, subject to the following:—"The following exceptions not to be computed as part of the aforesaid loading or stiffening time unless used, notwithstanding that during the time of any such exceptions coal may be shipped by us into any other vessel:—All holidays, whether public holidays or colliers' holidays, whereby work is suspended, either at the docks or at our colliery or collieries. Time from 5 p.m. on Saturday until 7 a.m. on Monday. Time occupied in shifting from hatch to hatch and in repairing. Any time lost through riots, strikes, lock-outs, dismissal of workmen, or from any dispute between masters and men causing a stoppage of our colliery or collieries, or of the trimmers, dock, railway, or other hands connected with the working, delivery, shipment, or trimming of the coal or on the railway or railways over which our traffic is usually conveyed to the loading dock or docks, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, causing stoppage of the same, or by obstructions or accidents at our colliery or collieries, or on the said railways or in the docks, or by reason of storms, floods, frosts, snow, or from any cause of whatsoever kind or nature. In case of partial holiday or partial stoppage of our colliery or collieries from any or either of the aforesaid causes, the lay days to be extended proportionately to the diminution of output arising from such partial holiday or stoppage. For the purpose of this guarantee, all holidays and full day stoppages at our collieries shall be deemed to commence at 5 p.m. the working day preceding, and to end at 7 a.m. the working day following such holiday or stoppage. In case the vessel, whether on demurrage or not, can complete loading the cargo by 5 p.m. on the day preceding any Sunday, holiday, or other stoppage of work, and such completion is prevented otherwise than by our act or default, time shall not count either for loading or demurrage until 7 a.m. on the day on which work is resumed." The colliery guarantee contained a scale of rates for demurrage (if any), the rate applicable to the Saxon being £13 per day. The colliery guarantee also provided that demurrage was to be "payable per colliery working day, or in proportion for any part of a day, which for purpose of computation shall be divisible into 24 parts." The Saxon arrived at Barry on March 8, and the lay days for loading, expired on March 31 at 2 p.m. Subsequently to the expiry of the lay days—viz., on April 9, a strike took place at the Ferndale Company's Collieries, which lasted a long time. The Saxon remained waiting for cargo, notice that the Saxon was on demurrage being given from time to time to the respondents and the colliery company, until by letter dated May 26, 1898, the respondents gave notice to the appellants' brokers that they could not load the ship. This notice was communicated to the owners of the Saxon, who thereupon took steps to obtain another charter-party. On June 13 the appellants got further employment for their vessel, and chartered her by a charter-party dated June 13 to Messrs. Hickie, Borman, and Co. Under that charter-party she was loaded without delay and sailed on June 17. The cargo loaded was 2,719 tons of coal, and the freight was 14s. per ton to Cape Town as against 18s. 6d. per ton to the same place under the respondents' charter-party, the freight in each case being subject to certain discounts and deductions. The claims put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs (appellants) were (1) for loss of freight. The amount claimed was £609 19s. 9d. and was made up of the difference of freight in the two charter-parties, taking all deductions into account and taking a full and complete cargo of coal at 2,719 tons, the quantity actually loaded under the second charter-party; and (2) for the detention of the Saxon by the respondents. The amount claimed was £785 8s. 4d., being demurrage at the colliery guarantee rate of £13 per day for the colliery working days from 2 p.m. on March 31 until June 17, when the loading under the second charter-party was completed. The appellants' calculation was upon the basis of reckoning every day from March 31 to June 17 as a colliery working day, except such days as were Sundays or public holidays, or colliers' holidays, and therefore excluded the following days:—Sunday, April 3, Mabon's Day (colliers' monthly holiday), April 4, Good Friday, April 8, Sunday, April 10, Easter Monday, April 11, Sundays, April 17 and 24, Sunday, May 1, Mabon's Day, May 2, Sundays, May 8, 15, 22, and 29, Whit Monday, May 30, Sunday, June 5, Mabon's Day, June 6, and Sunday, June 12, upon the ground that demurrage was payable "per colliery working day," and that the days excluded for the above reasons from the demurrage computation, were all such days as were not "colliery working days." It was admitted that the lay days having expired on March 31, at 2 p.m., the respondents were in default and liable to pay demurrage until April 9, when the strike began, but the respondents contended that failure to load after April 9 was due to the strike, and that owing to the strike the days for which demurrage was claimed were not "colliery working days," inasmuch as no work was in fact done at the Ferndale Company's Collieries on the days in question, and that, therefore, no demurrage was payable for the detention after April 9. The respondents further contended that all the exceptions, which by the terms of the colliery guarantee were not to be computed as part of the loading or stiffening time, also applied, notwithstanding that the loading time had expired, and the vessel was on demurrage, and, therefore, claimed, in any event, to exclude the time from 5 p.m. to midnight on the day before a Sunday or holiday, and from midnight to 7 a.m. on a Monday or day after a holiday, in computing the demurrage time. The appellants, on the other hand, contended that such exceptions had no application, except for the purpose of computing the loading or stiffening time, and in any event the appellants contend that the £64 9s. 2d. allowed by the respondents to be due for demurrage up to April 9, must be increased by £18 19s., being the demurrage payable for the 35 hours deducted by the respondents in respect of the periods from 5 p.m. to midnight, and midnight to 7 a.m. as aforesaid. On November 18, 1898, the Lord Chief Justice delivered his judgment in favour of the appellants on both heads of their claim, but disallowing part of the amount claimed in each case. The claim for loss of freight, £609 19s. 9d., was allowed at £594 14s. 3d. The claim for demurrage was allowed at £694 8s. 4d., instead of £785 8s. 4d., the learned Lord Chief Justice holding that the appellants were right in their mode of computation of the demurrage, payable except as to the time from 5 p.m. to midnight on the day before a Sunday or holiday, and the time from midnight to 7 a.m. on the day after a Sunday or holiday, upon which he upheld the respondents' contention, and, therefore, deducted such amount from the appellants' claim for demurrage. The time so deducted was 168 hours, or seven days, which at £13 per day amounted to £91. A diary agreed by the parties, showing how the amount of £694 8s. 4d. for demurrage was arrived at, on the basis of the Lord Chief Justice's judgment, is printed in the appendix. Both parties appealed to the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal, consisting of Sir Nathaniel Lindley, Master of the Rolls, and Lords Justices A. L. Smith and Romer, on July 7, 1899, ordered the judgment entered for the plaintiffs, the present appellants, to be varied by reducing the sum of £694 8s. 4d. awarded thereby to them on their claim for demurrage to the sum of £64 9s. 2d., the amount admitted by the respondents to be due. The appellants claimed that the orders of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice should be reversed in as far as the Lord Chief Justice disallowed £91, part of the appellants' claim for demurrage, and that judgment should be entered for the appellants, with costs in this House and below, for £594 14s. 3d. and £785 8s. 4d.

Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck were for the appellants; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. Carver, Q.C., and Mr. Bailhache for the respondents.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The controversy between the parties in this case is reduced to very narrow limits, and may, I think, be treated as simply the question of what is the contract between them. The contract is to be found in the charter-party and the colliery guarantee, which, by incorporation and reference, forms part of the contract, and the sole question in the case appears to me to turn upon one phrase—viz., the phrase "colliery working day." If the construction which the Lord Chief Justice placed on that phrase at the trial meant ordinary working days under ordinary normal circumstances, then the demurrage which the appellants claim is clearly due under the contract. If, on the contrary, the period during which a strike in the coal trade prevailed there was no colliery working day, then the demurrage claimed was not due, and it seems to me that, apart from some evidence giving a technical meaning to the phrase, it is impossible to deny that though workmen were on strike and did not work that these were, as the Chief Justice held, colliery working days. I agree with the Chief Justice that the real question in the case is, What is a "colliery working day"? Does it mean only a day upon which the colliery is in fact working, or does it mean what are ordinary working days in normal times and in normal circumstances? In the first place, I think on the ordinary construction of language one would understand the words as the Chief Justice has understood them. A working day is I think in ordinary parlance to be understood as distinguished from a holiday—including in that term a Sunday or some fixed and usual day for rest and not for work, as a Sunday, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and the like. But, besides what I have described as the ordinary and natural meaning of the words, there is the additional circumstance that, if the parties had intended what it is now contended they meant, I see no reason why they should not have said in plain terms that by "colliery working days" they meant days on which the colliery was actually working in fact. I am unable to follow the view of the Court of Appeal; they appear to recognize what I have described as the ordinary and natural meaning of the words, and I quite agree that the ordinary and natural meaning of words may be altered or modified by their use in a particular neighbourhood or in relation to a particular subject-matter. They adopt the Chief Justice's exposition of the words generally, but they add to that exposition. You must give the qualification as to how these words would be understood in the neighbourhood of the place where the parties were contracting. This would be quite intelligible if there were any evidence that the words were so understood like the custom of a port, or any other evidence which practically makes the use of particular words technical in the neighbourhood or in relation to the particular subject-matter. But the difficulty I have is that there is no evidence from which any such technical meaning can be gathered, and it certainly lies upon those who wish to give a technical meaning to plain language to establish that the words sought to be modified have acquired the meaning they insist upon. The truth is that the respondents are endeavouring to establish that a strike, which in this case prevented the loading of the vessel, prevents the days upon which the colliers would be working under ordinary normal circumstances being colliery working days. It is, to my mind, very clear that at the time this contract was signed between the parties no such ideas had occurred to them, for in relation to another matter—which, however, does not touch the liability now in question—they expressly mention strikes, and I cannot conceive that, if the construction now sought to be put upon this contract was in their minds, they should not in plain terms have expressed their meaning. I have spoken of the contract between the parties, and it is, of course, one contract, so far as the present question arises, although one contract is referred to and incorporated by reference instead of being a contract on one piece of paper. And, although some confusion arises from this circumstance, I am unable to see anything in the other parts of the contract which have relation to the question now in debate. If I am right in saying that the words in question ordinarily bear the meaning that I have attributed to them, I do not think it is possible in the state of the evidence before your Lordships to assume that there is anything in any other part of the contract which was intended to operate, or does, in fact, operate, to alter the construction which the words would generally bear. It follows from the facts proved that the delay in respect of which the demurrage is claimed was a delay during colliery working days, and the appellants are entitled to the amount they claim. For these reasons I move, your Lordships, that the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice be restored, and in that respect the judgment of the Court of Appeal reversed, with the usual consequences as to costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—This is a case of demurrage. The respondents chartered the ship Saxon from the appellants to carry a cargo of steam coal from the Port of Barry to Cape Town. The cargo was to be provided by the owners of the Ferndale Colliery, who were at the time under contract to supply the respondents with a large quantity of coal. In accordance with a well-known practice the colliery owners gave the charterers a guarantee as to the loading and despatch of the vessel, and the charter-party was made in view of this guarantee. The charter-party provided for "demurrage at loading port as per colliery guarantee." According to the guarantee demurrage was to be at a certain scale (about which there is no question) and was expressed to be "payable per colliery working day." The main question is, What is the meaning of the expression "colliery working day"? Does it mean a day on which under ordinary normal circumstances the colliery would be working, or does it mean a day on which the colliery is actually at work? There is a further question as to the exclusion from the period of demurrage of certain hours of grace in extension of non-working days, which for some purposes certainly were to be reckoned from 5 p.m. on the day preceding to 7 a.m. on the day following. The vessel was not loaded in accordance with the charter-party. The lay days in which the loading ought to have been completed expired at 2 p.m. on March 31, 1898, and thereupon the period of demurrage began. There is no dispute as to the liability of the charterers for demurrage during the period between the expiration of the lay days and April 9 following. Then came the great South Wales coal strike, and after a time the charter-party was abandoned. The question is as to liability for demurrage during the time while the colliery was idle owing to the strike. The Lord Chief Justice and the late Master of the Rolls, who gave the judgment of the Court of Appeal, were both agreed that prima facie the expression "colliery working day" means "ordinary working days under ordinary normal circumstance." But the Court of Appeal, differing from the Chief Justice, was of opinion that this prima facie meaning was displaced by the language of the particular contract under consideration. It was common ground that the liability of the charterers to the ship and the liability of the colliery to the charterers were meant to be co-extensive. Taking first the colliery guarantee, the Master of the Rolls came to the conclusion that the clause as to demurrage in that document excluded days on which the colliery was not at work owing to any cause whatever other than the fault of the owners. Then turning to the charter-party, his Lordship expressed the opinion that there was nothing to be found there repugnant to the construction which he had placed upon the demurrage clause in the colliery guarantee. The case is certainly not free from difficulty, but on the whole upon this point I prefer the conclusion at which the Lord Chief Justice arrived. The Master of the Rolls relies upon two clauses in the colliery guarantee, which for the sake of convenience of reference were numbered 6 and 7. He thinks that those clauses show that days on which the colliery was not actually worked were not to be treated as "colliery working days." I am not able to agree in this opinion. Clause 7, I think, has not much bearing upon the point. It provides for a very exceptional case when the vessel, "whether on demurrage or not," could complete loading by 5 p.m. on the day preceding "any Sunday, holiday, or other stoppage of work." The expression "working day" is not to be found in that clause at all. The preceding clause, numbered 6, is in these words:—"For the purpose of this guarantee all holidays and full day stoppages at the collieries shall be deemed to commence at 5 p.m. the working day preceding and to end at 7 a.m. the working day following such holiday or stoppage." The judgment of the Court of Appeal is, I think, really based on that clause alone. Now, in the first place, it seems to me, reading the whole instrument fairly, that in Clause 6 the parties had nothing in view beyond the period of lay days or loading time. In the next place, I cannot myself see anything to show that in Clause 6 the expression "working day" means a day on which work is actually done rather than a day which is an ordinary working day under ordinary normal circumstances. The clause is not very artistically drawn. But, whichever construction of the expression "working day" is adopted, the result is the same, and in either case there must be occasionally some overlapping of hours. I am rather disposed to think that the expression "working day" in that clause means an ordinary working day under normal circumstances, because I find in the very next clause, where a day on which work is actually done is evidently meant, the parties do not use the expression "working day." The language is changed. The expression used is "the day on which work is resumed." I may observe in passing that Clause 6 does not take account of Sundays. It only speaks of "holidays and full-day stoppages." Why are Sundays omitted? If you turn to Clause 4 you find that Sundays are already provided for by the exclusion of "time from 5 p.m. on Saturday until 7 a.m. on Monday." Now the application of Clause 4 is unquestionably confined to lay days or loading time. This circumstance, taken in connexion with the special reference to demurrage in Clause 7, seems to me to show that, apart from the special case provided for in Clause 7, the whole group of clauses in italics—that is, Clauses 4, 5, 6, and 7—are applicable only to lay days or loading time. There is a further indication tending to show that the charterers meant by the expression "working day" an ordinary working day under ordinary normal circumstances. It is to be found in the charter-party. That instrument provides that the cargo is to be loaded "in 12 clear working days, Sundays and holidays excepted." Now Sundays are not working days, nor are holidays. The provision therefore must, I think, be paraphrased thus—"the loading is to be done in 12 clear working days, but note that by working days we mean days exclusive of Sundays and holidays." I have criticized, perhaps too minutely, the language of these two documents—the charter-party and the colliery guarantee—following the line of argument adopted by the Master of the Rolls. I should, however, prefer to put my judgment on rather a broader ground. When once it is admitted, as it is on all sides, that the expression "colliery working day" prima facie means an ordinary working day under ordinary normal circumstances, it is, I think, for those who say that it means something else to make out their case satisfactorily, and I do not think that the respondents have done so. It seems to me to follow, from the view which I find myself compelled to take on the main question, that in calculating the period of demurrage no account is to be taken of the conventional extension of Sundays and holidays, whether public holidays or colliery holidays. The extension was, I think, introduced for the purpose of reckoning the period of lay days or loading time. It has, as it seems to me, no application to the period of demurrage. I am therefore of the opinion that the appellants are right on both points, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs and the order of the Lord Chief Justice varied accordingly. The noble Lord added that Lord Ashbourne and Lord Morris concurred in the motion.

LORD BRAMPTON read a judgment to the same effect.

Court of Appeal (Lord Alverstone, M.R.,) 1900.
Rigby and Collins, L.J.J.) July 31.

IN RE HARRISON AND INGRAM.*

Bankruptcy—Void settlements—Payment of premiums on life policies—Death of bankrupt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883, sec. 47.

Decision of Wright, J. (ante, p. 370), reversed.

This was an appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Wright (reported ante, p. 370), who decided that the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. Cartmell Harrison was entitled, by virtue of the payment of certain premiums by the bankrupt, to a share of the policy moneys payable upon the death of the bankrupt. The question turned upon the meaning of "settlement" in section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Subsection 1 of that section provides that "any settlement of property not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or encumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustee of such settlement on the execution thereof." Subsection 3 provides that "'settlement' shall for the purposes of this section include any conveyance or transfer of property." The material facts were as follows:—Prior to the year 1877 the bankrupt had insured his life by four policies of insurance for sums amounting in the aggregate to £9,000. In April, 1877, by a post-nuptial settlement he assigned the four policies to trustees upon trust to invest the proceeds, to pay the income to his wife for life and after her death to such of his children as he should appoint, or, failing appointment, in trust for his children who should attain 21 or marry in equal shares.

*Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The settlement contained the usual hotchpot clause, but did not contain any covenant on the part of the bankrupt to pay the premiums. The bankrupt had two children, and upon the marriage of one with Mr. Barker in the year 1895 the bankrupt, by a deed, dated in July, 1895, appointed three-fifths of the money assured by the said policies to his daughter. A receiving order was made against Mr. Cartmell Harrison on November 17, 1899, and on November 27 the bankrupt died. All the premiums up to his death were paid by the bankrupt except one, which was paid in the month of November, 1899, by the trustees of the settlement, and one other in respect of which the days of grace were still running at the date of the death of the bankrupt and which was deducted from the amount paid over by the insurance company. The total amount received in respect of the said policies was £10,919. The total amount of premiums paid was £4,686. Mr. Justice Wright decided that, having regard to the provisions of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, the trustee in bankruptcy was entitled to such proportion of the policy moneys as a sum represented by two-fifths of the premiums paid from the year 1889 to the year 1895 by the bankrupt, plus all the premiums paid by him subsequent to the year 1895, bore to the total amount of premiums paid, upon the ground that these payments must be regarded as voluntary settlements under the 47th section. The trustees of the settlement appealed.

Mr. Herbert Reed, Q.C., and Mr. Leigh Clare were for the trustees of the settlement; Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Muir Mackenzie were for the trustee in bankruptcy.

The appeal was heard on July 20.

The MASTER of the ROLLS delivered the judgment of the Court allowing the appeal. After stating the facts as above, he said:—The case is by no means free from difficulty. A case may easily arise in which the moneys paid to effect a policy within 10 years of the date of the bankruptcy, which policy has been taken out and settled within that period, might be held to be a settlement within the 47th section. On the other hand, we think it is clear from the decided cases that if money paid by the bankrupt was, in fact, only money advanced to enable the premiums to be paid it would not of necessity constitute a settlement, because the payment had been made within the ten years. The question in this case is within which category these payments fall. We are of opinion that no part of the payments can be regarded as being settlements within the 47th section. The policies were settled as far back as 1877, the policies having already been in existence for some years, and the payments made by the bankrupt were payments made to the insurance company to prevent the lapsing of the policies. The view taken by the learned Judge seems to have been that each payment of premium secured a certain part of the money assured by the policy. We cannot take this view. The whole of the premiums were paid for the continuance of the policy and no proportionate part of the moneys payable under the policies is represented by the payment of any particular premium. Nor do we think the actual amounts paid for premiums can be regarded as settlements within the meaning of the 47th section. The amounts so paid were not intended to be earmarked or kept separate, nor, as we have said, can they now be said to be represented by any specific amount. We think the amounts must be treated as paid by the bankrupt to keep up the policy as between himself and the insurance company or as moneys paid to enable the trustees to keep the policy alive. For this reason we are of opinion that the trustee of the bankrupt is not entitled to any part of the moneys paid by the insurance company, and that this appeal should be allowed.

WEIR V. VAN TROMP.*

Settlement—Voluntary settlement—Action for rectification dismissed.

This was an action for the rectification of a voluntary settlement made by the late Mr. Peter Stewart MacIver, at one time M.P. for Plymouth. The settlor had one child only, a son, who died many years ago, leaving an only son, Mr. Peter Stewart MacIver, the younger. The son's widow had married again. The settlement in question was made in 1891, and by it the settlor settled a large sum of money on his grandson and his issue, with an ultimate trust in default of issue for the person or persons who under the statutes for the distribution of the effects of intestates would have become entitled thereto at the death of the settlor if he had died possessed thereof intestate without leaving any widow. The settlor died shortly after the date of the settlement. His widow died in 1896. The grandson came of age in January, 1897, and died in August, 1898, a bachelor, and by his will made in June, 1898, gave, with the exception of a small legacy, the whole of his property to his mother, Mrs. Broadley, which included the whole of the funds comprised in the settlement, these in the events which had occurred having passed to his executors, he being the sole next-of-kin at the settlor's death. The plaintiff, who was a niece of the settlor, sought to have the settlement rectified by adding to the ultimate trust the words "or any child, grandchild, or other lineal issue," or otherwise, so that the settlor's collateral next-of-kin might take under the ultimate trust, and produced evidence and called witnesses to show that such an alteration would be in conformity with the intention and instructions of the settlor when the settlement was made.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., Mr. Rowden, Q.C., and Mr. Sheldon appeared for the plaintiff: Mr. Warming-ton, Q.C., and Mr. W. C. Druce and Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. Bovill for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BYRNE said that, although a voluntary settlement might be reformed at the instance of the settlor in a proper case, the Court would not interfere to reform a voluntary settlement as against the settlor. But it was laid down by Lord Romilly in "Lister v. Hodgson" (L.R., 6 Eq. 30, p. 34) that there was this distinction to be taken. If a man executed a voluntary deed in his lifetime declaring certain trusts and happened to die, and it was afterwards proved from the instructions or otherwise that beyond all doubt the deed was not prepared in the exact manner which he intended, "the deed might be reformed or those particular provisions necessary to carry his intention into effect might be introduced"; and in "Thompson v. Whitmore" (1 J. and H., 268) Vice-Chancellor Sir Page Wood at p. 273 clearly recognized the right of a volunteer to have the error rectified. He was therefore bound to examine the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, to see whether or not she had made out a case for rectification. Nor need she be a person named in the settlement, for she was a person claiming under the settlement, as in fact intended, if she proved her case. His Lordship then proceeded to examine the evidence at length, and said that, so far as the documentary evidence went, he did not find any sufficient evidence of an intention contrary to that actually expressed by the deed. When he came fairly to consider the oral evidence, he thought it was established that the settlor did not intend his son's wife or his own widow to take any benefit under the settlement, but he was not satisfied that the settlor wished to exclude any person from taking under the ultimate trust who by law would be entitled as his own next-of-kin under the statute, and he was not satisfied that even, if it had been pointed out to him that the result would be to make the trust fund part of his grandson's estate, so that if he attained 21 he could dispose of it by will, he would have been discontented with such a result. Although having regard to the decisions he had referred to he had not felt justified in declining to consider the evidence, yet he ought not to act upon any but the clearest and most certain demonstration of error and of actual intention, and it was not immaterial to observe that he had not been referred to any reported case where judgment had been given in favour of reforming a voluntary settlement at the instance of a volunteer. He thought that the action failed, and must be dismissed with costs.

IN RE WHITAKER—WHITAKER V. PALMER.*

His Lordship gave judgment in this matter reserved from the 18th inst. The case, it will be seen, is of some importance on the question of how far the rules of bankruptcy are imported by the Judicature Act, 1875, into the administration of insolvent estates in the High Court. The claimants were trustees of a voluntary settlement made by the testator in the action in favour of a lunatic son. The question was whether they were entitled to be paid pari passu with the creditors for value.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY said:—This summons raises the question whether in the administration of an estate which is insufficient for the payment in full of all debts voluntary debts ought to be postponed to debts for valuable consideration. It is beyond doubt that prior to the Judicature Act the rules applied by the Court of Chancery in administering an insolvent estate differed in many respects from those applied by the Court of Bankruptcy. In particular, secured creditors were entitled to a dividend on the full amount of their debts, and voluntary bonds were postponed to other debts, whereas in the Court of Bankruptcy secured creditors only proved for the balance after valuing their securities and all creditors, including judgment creditors, were paid rateably. Section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, altered the law to some extent. So far as material, it is as follows:—"In the administration by the Court of the assets of any person who may die after the commencement of this Act and whose estate may prove to be insufficient for the payment in full of his debts and liabilities and in the winding up of any company under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, whose assets may prove to be insufficient for the payment of its debts and liabilities and the costs of winding up, the same rules shall prevail and be observed as to the respective rights of secured and unsecured creditors and as to debts and liabilities provable and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively as may be in force for the time being under the law of bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt, and all persons who in any such case would be entitled to prove for and receive dividends out of the estate of any such deceased person or out of the assets of any such company may come in under the decree or order for the administration of such estate or under the winding up of such company and make such claim against the same as they may respectively be entitled to by virtue of this Act." This section has given rise to much discussion. It has, however, been finally decided that the section does not in all respects assimilate the administration in the Chancery Division to the administration in bankruptcy. It does not augment or enlarge the assets to be administered. For this purpose the rules of bankruptcy have no application. The precise extent to which the section alters the mode in which the assets are to be divided has to be considered. There are observations in some of the earlier cases to the effect that the object of the section was only to put an end to that which is known as the rule in "Mason v. Bogg," the rule by virtue of which secured creditors proved without valuing their securities. In "Re Maggi" (20 Ch.D., 545), Mr. Justice Fry had to consider whether a creditor, who had recovered judgment against the executors as such, was entitled to be paid in priority to other creditors, and he held that the section did not take away the priority of the judgment creditor. After reading one passage from the judgment in that case, his Lordship continued.—And after referring to the conflict of authorities, he says:—"I think the weight of authority is in favour of my conclusion, that section 32 is not introduced into the administration of the estates of deceased persons. I am confirmed in my conclusion by the decision of the Court of Appeal in 'Lee v. Nuttall' that an executor's right of retainer is not affected by section 10. If the effect of that section had been to introduce the rule that, with the exceptions mentioned in section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, all debts are to be paid pari passu, it is difficult to see how the priority given to an executor by means of his right of retainer could remain." If there had been no subsequent decision, I should, without hesitation, have accepted Mr. Justice Fry's view, but the true effect of section 10 has since been considered by the Court of Appeal and by Mr. Justice Stirling. In "Re Leng" ([1895] 1 Ch., 652), the question was whether the claim of a widow for money lent by her to her husband for the purposes of his trade was to be postponed to the claims of his other creditors. Section 3 of the Married Woman's Property Act, 1882, enacts that it shall be so postponed in case of the husband's bankruptcy, and the Court of Appeal held that it must be equally postponed in the administration of the husband's insolvent estate. The late Master of the Rolls, while recognising "Re Maggi," seems to treat it as an exception to the general rule. Lord Justice Smith seems to me to have expressed in no doubtful language his dissent from "Re Maggi." He says at page 661:—"As regards swelling the assets to be distributed, it appears to me that the cases have decided that the law of bankruptcy does not apply, but as regards the distributing of the assets—i.e., as regards the proofs to be allowed, I find no case binding me to hold that the rules of bankruptcy do not apply. It is true that in 1882 Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Fry, in the case of "In re Maggi," held that the bankruptcy rule that all debts shall be paid pari passu (section 32 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869) was not imported into the administration of insolvent estates, and that a judgment creditor took priority over creditors, and he placed what he termed the narrower construction upon section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, and he held that it was confined to cases in which the rights of a class of secured creditors were conflicting with a class of unsecured creditors and had no application to the rights inter se of the members of those classes. "This is not a decision upon the conjoint operation of the two statutes which we have now to consider, and I therefore do not inquire if the learned Judge's construction of section 10 is not too narrow, and, moreover, the case does not bind me." The result seems to be that, although in a Court of first instance the priority of judgment debts may still have to be acknowledged as an exception, the general principle is that the bankruptcy rules ought to apply in dividing the assets of an insolvent estate. In the subsequent case of "In re Heywood" ([1897] 2 Ch., 593), Mr. Justice Stirling held that the priority as to rates and wages conferred by the preferential payments in Bankruptcy Act, 1888, applies to the administration of insolvent estates in the Chancery Division. In this state of the authorities I think that I am bound to hold that voluntary debts must rank with other debts precisely as they would in bankruptcy, and that the old rule of the Court of Chancery by which such debts were postponed must be regarded as abrogated by section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875.

Mr. Vernon Smith, Q.C., and Mr. S. B. L. Druce were for the claimants; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Edward Ford for the creditors for value; and Mr. Capron for the personal representative of the testator.

BURBRIDGE.*

Poor Law—Maintenance—Person in delirium tremens—Neglect to maintain himself—Vagrants Act (5 Geo. IV., c. 83, sec. 3)—Construction.

This was a case stated by Mr. A. A. Hopkins, a metropolitan police magistrate, in the following circumstances:—On November 25, 1899, it came to the knowledge of the relieving officer of the St. Saviour's Union that one Frank David Burbridge was suffering from delirium tremens, and that he was then at his own residence in a state dangerous to himself and to those about him. This knowledge was conveyed to the relieving officer by the certificate of Burbridge's medical attendant. Upon the receipt of the certificate and on the same day the relieving officer attended at Burbridge's residence and removed him to the workhouse infirmary of the St. Saviour's Union, giving an order for his admission, in which he was described as a lunatic. After his admission to the infirmary Burbridge was seen by the medical officer of the workhouse, and was found to be suffering from delirium tremens, and, thereupon, an order was obtained from a justice of the peace for the County of London, acting under the Lunacy Acts, detaining Burbridge as a prisoner in the workhouse. Burbridge was so detained in the workhouse until November 29, upon which day, the attack of delirium tremens having passed off, he was discharged upon his own application and upon an order for his discharge being granted by the above-mentioned justice. The case found that under the above circumstances Burbridge became and was chargeable to the union for the period of five days. A summons was taken out by the guardians, which was heard by the learned police magistrate on January 21 last, under the Vagrants Act (5 Geo. IV., c. 83, section 3) charging Burbridge that, being able, wholly able, by work to maintain himself he wilfully neglected and refused so to do, by which neglect he became chargeable to the union. At the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted:—At the time of his admission to the infirmary and for the first three days of his detention therein Burbridge was quite unable to maintain himself, and at no time during his detention would he have been allowed to leave the workhouse, except upon an order for his discharge being given by the justice. Burbridge was a person generally well able to maintain himself and was, as a fact, well-to-do and in such a position that the guardians might reasonably apply to him for the cost of his maintenance or sue him in respect thereof. No application had been made by the guardians to Burbridge to pay the cost of his maintenance, and he had not refused to do so, and he protested before the learned magistrate that he would willingly have paid upon application. Upon these facts, the learned magistrate refused to convict Burbridge as an idle and disorderly person under the Act, and dismissed the summons. The contention of the guardians was that the magistrate had no discretion, but ought, on the facts proved, to have convicted Burbridge. The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the magistrate had such discretion.

Mr. J. A. JOHNSTON, who appeared for the St. Saviour's Union, said that in order to substantiate the offence with which the respondent was charged it was only necessary to show, first, that he was chargeable to the parish—this was found as a fact by the learned magistrate; and, secondly, that he became so chargeable by reason of his wilfully refusing or neglecting to maintain himself. In determining that question the magistrate must not look at the period while the respondent was chargeable, but at the time when by drinking he caused himself to become incapacitated. The learned magistrate, having found that the respondent was generally well able to maintain himself, was bound to convict. The fact that the respondent had not refused to pay for his maintenance was immaterial, as the "refusal" referred to in the Act was a refusal to maintain himself, not a refusal to pay for his maintenance.

The respondent was not represented, but Mr. H. Sutton appeared on behalf of the Home Office as amicus curiæ.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY.—We were told upon a former occasion that there was some difference of opinion among magistrates as to the treatment of these cases.

Mr. SUTTON said that he was not aware of any difference of opinion, but it was true that one of the magistrates, in the case of persons constantly suffering from delirium tremens, had dealt with them under the Vagrancy Act.

MR. JUSTICE KENNEDY said that the magistrate was quite right. In a case of this kind it was necessary to look at the facts. Burbridge, at the time when he was taken to the infirmary, was very ill, and was suffering from delirium tremens. He was described in the case as suffering from that disease while at his own residence to such an extent that he was a subject of danger to himself and to those about him, and he had to bear these facts in mind while looking at the section under which the magistrate was asked to convict him. That section provided that, "Every person being able wholly or in part to maintain himself or herself, or his or her family, by work or by other means, and wilfully refusing or neglecting so to do, by which refusal or neglect he or she, or any of his or her family whom he or she may be legally bound to maintain, shall have become . . . chargeable to any parish, township, or place . . . shall be deemed to be an idle and disorderly person. . . ." Burbridge was, in fact, not merely drunk, but he had become by his own voluntary act for a time diseased and incapable of maintaining himself. It was impossible to suppose that the Act intended to punish people who by a voluntary act had brought on a disease. The question for the magistrate was—Could this man be convicted of the offence of wilfully refusing or neglecting to maintain himself? The magistrate would have been quite wrong if he had convicted a man of that offence because he was suffering from a disease, however that disease might have been caused.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that it appeared that the respondent Burbridge was a man who by drinking had brought on delirium tremens and who at his own residence was dangerous to himself and to those about him, and that he was for that reason taken to an infirmary. The magistrate had to ascertain whether, under those circumstances, he became an idle and disorderly person. The section under which he was summoned began by saying, "being able to maintain himself." At the moment when the respondent was suffering from delirium tremens he was not able to maintain himself. Therefore he was not within the statute unless it could be said that he was within it if he brought on the delirium tremens by his own voluntary act. The statute could not have intended that. If it had it would have said so. It was no more unusual for people to get drunk at the time when that Act was passed than now. Delirium tremens was not a modern complaint. The statute could well have said that a person who made himself so drunk as to contract delirium tremens was an idle and disorderly person. Section 16 said that begging under a licence from a justice of the peace was not an offence, but that a person who begged without such a licence was an idle and disorderly person. It would have been so easy to provide for Burbridge and people of his kind in this section. If the argument urged on behalf of the appellants was right, if, that is to say, a person who wilfully took something which afterwards caused him to be incapable of maintaining himself was guilty of an offence under the Vagrants Act, then a person would be equally guilty who, knowing that smoking tobacco would ultimately bring on a complaint which would prevent him from maintaining himself, continued to smoke and became in consequence incapable of maintaining himself. The two cases were indistinguishable. Coupling the absurdity which that instance involved with the want of appropriate words in the Act, his Lordship was of opinion that the learned magistrate was right in the conclusion to which he came.

MORRIS AND MORRIS V. THE OCEANIC STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Ship—Bill of lading—Exceptions—Damage to goods—Unseaworthy ship.

The plaintiffs' claim in this action was in respect of damage caused by water to a consignment of cigars while in course of transit from New York to Liverpool in the Teutonic, a steamer of the White Star Line owned by the defendants. The cigars came from Havana, and were transhipped at New York and placed on the Teutonic to be forwarded to London. The White Star bill of lading under which the goods were shipped at New York contained the following clauses:—That the carrier should not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by any latent defect in hull, machinery, or appurtenances, or unseaworthiness of the ship, even existing at time of shipment, or sailing on the voyage, provided the owners had exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy; that the shipment was subject to all the terms and provisions of, and all the exemptions from liability contained in, the Harter Act; "it is also mutually agreed that the value of each package receipted for as above does not exceed the sum of $100, unless otherwise stated herein, on which basis the rate of freight is adjusted, and that the ship and carrier shall not be liable for articles specified in section 4,281 of the United States Revised Statutes, unless written notice of the true character and value thereof is given at the time of lading and entered in the bill of lading." The cigars in question were described in the bill of lading as of value unknown.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. A. L. Morris appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Horridge (Mr. Pickford, Q.C., with them), for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE MATHEW, in delivering judgment, having referred to the terms of the bill of lading, said that the cigars were loaded on the Teutonic in a compartment called No. 2. This compartment had originally been intended for steerage passengers, but had been converted into a hold for goods and provided with a hatchway. While the Teutonic was at New York there was a very severe frost, and the consequence was that two pipes, one for fresh water and the other for salt, connected with a lavatory and passing from the deck through compartment No. 2, became frozen. Any leakage from these pipes would necessarily damage the goods loaded in compartment No. 2. When the plaintiffs' cigars were shipped an inspection of the pipes was made by those in charge of the ship and no defect was discovered, but it would have been very easy to have found out whether or not the pipes had burst. The frost was likely to be followed by the usual consequences, and the leakage would not be discoverable till the thaw came, but there would have been no difficulty in cutting off the water from the pipes. The vessel sailed on February 23, the pipes still being frozen. On March 2 fresh water was discovered passing through the bulkhead of No. 2 compartment, indicating leakage, but the amount of water was small. On March 3, when the next sounding took place, 12ft. of water was discovered in the well, and it was manifest that the salt water pipe had burst. The consequence was that a large number of the plaintiffs' cigars were irretrievably damaged. It was argued for the plaintiffs that the defendants were not exonerated from the obligation to provide a ship fit for the purpose of carrying the cigars, and the case of "The Carib Prince" (170 U.S., 655) was relied on. Looking at the language of section 3 of the Harter Act, it seemed that if due diligence was used to make a vessel seaworthy the owner was exonerated from all perils in the course of the voyage; but the Supreme Court of New York held in "The Carib Prince" that section 3 was governed by sections 1 and 2, and that it was not enough for the owner to use due diligence, but that he was bound to provide a seaworthy ship. That decision was, of course, entitled to the utmost respect, but it was not necessary to deal with the present case on that footing, because here the bill of lading contained an express provision that the shipowner was to use due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy. The question, therefore, was one of fact—did the defendants use due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy? There was no question but that the ship was unseaworthy when she sailed, because the pipes were in such a condition that damage to the cargo was inevitable. His Lordship further came to the conclusion that due diligence had not been used to make the vessel seaworthy. From the effect of frost on the pipes it was manifest what would follow. It was equally clear, therefore, to a reasonable mind that proper precautions should have been taken to ascertain whether the pipes were in a condition consistent with the safety of the cargo. It was contended for the defendants that, assuming the ship was unseaworthy, what was dealt with by the bill of lading was negligent unseaworthiness, and that this was not such unseaworthiness, because it might have been remedied if due care had been taken on the voyage, the absence of due care on the voyage being within the exceptions; and that the causa proxima was the want of diligence during the voyage of those on board, and not the unseaworthiness. His Lordship was unable to adopt that view of the law. Reliance was placed on the well-known cases of "Steel v. State Line Company" (3 App. Cas., 72) and "Hedley v. Pinkney Steamship Company" ([1894] A.C., 222), and the analogy of an open port was pressed. There was, however, no such analogy. Although a port might be open, if it was possible to close it, the owner was entitled to rely upon the care of those in charge, and the ship was properly equipped and not unseaworthy; but if the port could not be closed after the cargo had been taken on board, then the ship would be unseaworthy. The latter case supplied the true analogy to the present case. The defendants also relied on Clause 1 of the bill of lading as limiting their liability to a part only of the damage. (His Lordship read the clause set out above.) It was argued for the plaintiffs that the meaning of the clause was that there must be a declaration of value of above $100 in order that the freight might be properly adjusted, and that the only consequence of not stating the value was that the rate of freight must be readjusted on the higher valuation. His Lordship did not think that that was the object or meaning of the clause, and he felt compelled to come to the conclusion that the clause was intended to limit the liability of the defendants in the event of a breach of their duty to use diligence to make the vessel seaworthy. There would be, therefore, judgment for the plaintiffs, but the amount recoverable would have to be ascertained according to the principle laid down by his Lordship.

GODMAN V. MOSES.*

Practice—Appeal—County Court—Judicature Act, 1894.

In appeals from County Courts where the Divisional Court refuses leave to appeal from its decision, leave may be granted by the Court of Appeal.

This was an appeal from the judgment of a Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Darling and Mr. Justice Channell, on an appeal from a County Court. The County Court Judge gave judgment for the plaintiff. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal brought by the defendant, and refused to grant him leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. The defendant applied ex parte to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal, and the Court of Appeal granted him leave. On the appeal now coming on to be heard the plaintiff took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay. It was contended on his behalf that by section 45 of the Judicature Act, 1873, no appeal lay from a decision of a Divisional Court on an appeal from a County Court except by leave of the Divisional Court; and that that enactment was not repealed by section 1, subsection 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894. Section 45 of the Judicature Act, 1873, enacts as follows:—"All appeals from petty or quarter sessions, from a County Court, or from any other inferior Court . . . may be heard and determined by Divisional Courts of the said High Court of Justice. . . . The determination of such appeals respectively by such Divisional Courts shall be final unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the Divisional Court by which any such appeal from an inferior Court shall have been heard." By section 1, subsection 5, of the Judicature Act, 1894, "In all cases where there is a right of appeal to the High Court from any Court or person, the appeal shall be heard and determined by a Divisional Court constituted as may be prescribed by rules of Court; and the determination thereof by the Divisional Court shall be final, unless leave to appeal is given by that Court or by the Court of Appeal." It was argued that the Act of 1894 was not intended to extend the right of appeal at all. On the part of the defendant reference was made to the case of Holland v. Girling, mentioned in the Solicitors' Journal, Vol. 43, p. 600, in which it appeared that the Court of Appeal had held that they could give leave to appeal from a judgment of a Divisional Court affirming a decision of a County Court Judge and refusing leave to appeal.

Mr. R. M. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. Hohler appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Gore-Browne for the defendant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said it appeared that this Court had already decided that they had jurisdiction to give leave to appeal in a case like the present. The preliminary objection must therefore be overruled.

The COURT proceeded to hear the appeal on its merits.

IN RE SUNLIGHT INCANDESCENT GAS LAMP COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Directors—Misfeasance summons—Discretion of the Court as to repayment of moneys—Companies (Winding-Up)
Act, 1890, sec. 10.

This was a summons taken out by the liquidator of the above company under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-Up) Act, 1890, for a declaration that Messrs. John Henry Hill Duncan and Oliver Wethered, two of the directors of the company, were jointly and severally liable and accountable for (1) a sum of £420 paid out of the assets of the company to Duncan as an underwriting premium upon a policy of insurance, dated May 28, 1896, to secure the company against the reversal of a judgment given in the Queen's Bench Division in an action of the "Sunlight Incandescent Gas Lamp Company (Limited)" v. the Incandescent Gas Light Company (Limited); and (2) a sum of £210 paid out of the assets of the company to Wethered as a like premium, Duncan and Wethered having been at the time of such payment directors of the company and as such said to be liable to account to the company for any profit made by them upon any transaction with the company, and that Duncan and Wethered might be ordered to repay the two sums of £420 and £210 with interest. The circumstances under which the policy of insurance was effected sufficiently appear from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright.

Mr. Theobald, Q.C., and Mr. A. C. Clauson were for the liquidator; and Mr. C. E. E. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. Coldridge for Mr. Duncan; Mr. Rowden, Q.C., and Mr. Carrington for Mr. Wethered; and Mr. P. M. Francke for shareholders opposing the application.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered judgment to the following effect:—In this case a syndicate was formed for the purpose of testing an invention in gas lighting, and, if the invention was found safe, of selling it at a large profit. Litigation took place between the syndicate and the Incandescent Company. The syndicate succeeded in the first stage of the litigation and an appeal was threatened by the other company. The syndicate had no money to carry on the appeal and it therefore appeared to some of the directors that they might secure the syndicate against the threatened appeal by insuring the result at Lloyd's. Mr. Duncan, one of the directors of the syndicate, was particularly active in the matter. He himself underwrote part of the risk, as did also Mr. Wethered, another director. Mr. Duncan's motives appear to have been mixed—first to promote the interests of the syndicate, and, secondly, to benefit himself. He thought the risk was small and that the premium was good. He never in a formal way disclosed to the syndicate as a whole what had been done. A short time afterwards the Incandescent Company, having discovered that the syndicate had obtained the sineuws of war, gave notice to the syndicate that it abandoned the appeal, and thereupon the underwriters became entitled to the premiums. The question is whether the syndicate is entitled to have the premiums handed back to it as profits made by the directors in their conduct of the affairs of the company. On the one hand there are several circumstances against the directors. No authority was given by the syndicate to the directors to enter into the transactions, nor was there any formal notice or resolution or assent of the syndicate to the directors taking the premiums. There was no full disclosure, formal or otherwise, and the shareholders were not told how much the directors stood to win. But everything was done in good faith and in the interests of the syndicate. Every director was aware of and fully concurred in what was done. The matter was disclosed generally, except the amount of the profits, to a general meeting. Upon the evidence I come to the conclusion that all knew of the insurance. Finally, all the shareholders have, with three exceptions, repudiated the present proceedings and have intimated that they do not desire to have the money repaid. The exceptions are Mr. Morris, his son, and another shareholder who has transferred his shares. Under these circumstances, if there had been any unsatisfied creditors and the present proceeding had been by action instead of summons, there might be no answer to the claim. But the question arises upon a summons taken out under section 10 of the Companies (Winding-Up) Act, 1890. That section is carefully worded. The words are:—"The Court may, on the application of the official receiver or of the liquidator of the company, or of any creditor or contributory of the company, examine into the conduct of such promoter, director, manager, liquidator, or other officer of the company, and compel him to repay any moneys or restore any property so misapplied or retained, or for which he has become liable or accountable, together with interest after such rate as the Court thinks just, or to contribute such sums of money to the assets of the company by way of compensation in respect of such misapplication, retainer, misfeasance, or breach of trust as the Court thinks just." It seems to me that that section gives a wide discretion to the Court, and I think that the discretion ought to be exercised in this case by not making an order for payment, having regard to the fact that most of the shareholders do not want the money and would return it, if paid to them, to these directors, and that the other shareholders knew of what had been done. I think, therefore, that there ought to be no order in the present case. I cannot, however, give these directors their costs, because they ought, in my judgment, to have made a more full and detailed disclosure. The liquidator will be entitled to take his costs out of the assets.

LYLE SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED) V. CORPORATION OF CARDIFF.*

Shipping—Charter-party—Demurrage—Construction of charter-party—Ship to be discharged “with all despatch as customary”—Insufficient supply of railway trucks.
Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 66), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham at the trial of the action without a jury (reported ante, p. 66 ; 5 Com. Cas., 87). The action was brought to recover damages for the detention of the plaintiffs' ship Cape Wrath during the discharge of a cargo of jarrah wood at Cardiff. The defendants were sued as the endorser of the bills of lading, who had taken delivery of the cargo. The defendants, by a contract dated May 30, 1899, had bought a large quantity of jarrah wood from Churchill and Sim (who were made third parties in the action, but as to whom no question arose in the Court of Appeal), of which quantity the Cape Wrath's cargo was an instalment. The charter-party, which was incorporated in the bills of lading, contained the following clause :—“The ship to be discharged with all despatch as customary, weather permitting.” There was, in fact, considerable delay in the discharge at Cardiff owing to an insufficient supply of railway wagons alongside the ship. The ship arrived at Cardiff on October 2, 1899. The discharge began in the East Bute Dock on October 3 and was not completed until November 23, occupying 45 working days. The plaintiffs claimed that the discharge should have been at the rate of 150 tons per working day, upon which basis it would have occupied 22 or 23 working days. The East Bute Dock was the property of the Cardiff Railway Company, which did the work of discharging. All railway companies had access for their wagons to the dock. It was impossible to discharge the cargo on to the quay or otherwise than into wagons. The defendants, in accordance with the usual practice, made an arrangement with the Great Western Railway Company for the supply of wagons to convey the cargo from the ship's side to the corporation depot. There was great pressure of work at Cardiff during that month, and in consequence there was great difficulty in procuring wagons. The delay in the discharge was due to the difficulty of procuring wagons, and was not due to the acts or default of the defendants personally. Mr. Justice Bigham held that the obligation upon the defendants was to do their best both to procure and to make use of the wagons, and that they had fulfilled that obligation. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed, contending that the defendants were not excused by the difficulty in obtaining wagons, that being a risk undertaken by the defendants.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. D. C. Leck appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Rufus Isaacs, Q.C., and Mr. Bailhache appeared for the defendants.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment :—“This is an action by shipowners against the receivers of cargo under a bill of lading for demurrage or damages for detention—it matters not which it is called—of the plaintiffs' ship at Cardiff, which was the port of discharge, the allegation being that the ship was detained by the defendants in unloading for 45 instead of 23 working days, and the plaintiffs claim for this the sum of £382. The real question is, What is the contract the plaintiffs have with the defendants as to the discharge by them of the plaintiffs' ship? By the terms of the charter-party, which were incorporated into the bills of lading, by which terms the defendants are bound, the cargo was “to be discharged with all despatch as customary.” It will be noticed that the plaintiffs have taken no contract from the defendants, as they might have done if they had desired to do so, that the cargo should be discharged in any fixed period of time, in which case beyond question the obligation to discharge undertaken by the cargo-owners would have been absolute, and no matter what unforeseen circumstances might have arisen or how diligent they might have been in their endeavours to discharge the ship within the contracted time, if they did not do so they would have broken their contract and must have paid damages to the shipowners for the breach. But this is not the contract which the plaintiffs have taken from the defendants, for the only contract, as before stated, is that the cargo should be “discharged with all despatch as customary.” I think it is important to state at the outset the findings of my brother Bigham, for, considering the arguments addressed to us on behalf of the appellant shipowners, the findings are very important in this case. The learned Judge finds that the rule or custom of the port of Cardiff, as applicable to the plaintiffs' ship, was that the cargo was to be delivered into wagons (railway wagons) and in no other way ; that the appliances customarily used at the port of Cardiff were the wagons of certain specified railway companies and no others ; that the defendants were not personally guilty of any negligence at all in taking discharge of the cargo, and that they did their best to get the appliances which were available at the port at the time, and which were customarily used for the purpose of discharging vessels ; that when the plaintiffs' ship arrived there was a great stress of work, and difficulties had to be contended with, and that it was a record month, and that the defendants did their best to deal with the difficulties, and took delivery of the cargo as quickly as it was practicable for them to do. The findings were really not contested before us, and there is evidence to support them. Now, these being the facts as found by the learned Judge, the question arises, Have the plaintiffs proved that the defendants have broken their contract with the plaintiffs that the cargo should be discharged with all despatch as customary? That the plaintiffs have no absolute contract with the defendants that the latter will discharge the plaintiffs' ship in any given time is clear, nor have they, in my judgment, an absolute contract that the defendants will have railway wagons down upon the quay ready to take delivery of the cargo at Cardiff, which is the only way delivery can there be taken, for, as Lord Blackburn says in the House of Lords in “Postlethwaite v. Freeland” (5 App. Cas., 599, at p. 620), “If the obtaining lighters or other customary appliances for the discharge of a ship on its arrival was, like the procuring a cargo for loading the ship, a matter which fell entirely on the merchant, so that he might choose his own mode of fulfilling it, I am not prepared to say that on the same principle he ought not to be held to undertake, without qualification, to provide those appliances. . . . But I do not think that the undertaking to supply lighters or other appliances to assist in discharging the ship does fall within the same principle as the undertaking to supply a cargo." This appears to me to meet the last suggestion made in the reply of Mr. Joseph Walton that there was an absolute duty on the goods-owner to prepare himself to take the cargo. In my judgment the duty is not absolute, but to do his best. Now, the contract which the plaintiffs have in this case with the defendants for the discharge of the cargo, as will be seen from the latest authority upon the subject in the House of Lords—no fixed time being stipulated for the discharge—is that the plaintiffs will discharge the cargo within a reasonable time under existing circumstances, or, in other words, with all due diligence having regard to all the existing circumstances, and in my opinion there is no limit as to what are existing circumstances, as argued by Mr. Joseph Walton—namely, the limit of the user of the port appliances. The case to which I allude is that of "Hick v. Raymond and Reid," in the House of Lords ([1893] A.C., 22), and when what is therein laid down is understood it will be seen that the defendants' contract is what I have said it is. In "Hick v. Raymond and Reid" the terms of the contract were that the cargo was to be delivered at the port of London, and that it was to be applied for within 24 hours of the ship's arrival, but no time was specified within which the discharge of the cargo was to be completed. It was held by the House of Lords in a considered judgment that when a bill of lading is silent as to the time within which the consignee is to discharge the cargo his obligation is to discharge it within a reasonable time and that he performs his obligation if he discharges the cargo within a time which is reasonable under the existing circumstances, assuming those circumstances, so far as they involve delay, are not caused or contributed to by him. Lord Herschell, then Lord Chancellor, in his judgment in that case, in clear and unambiguous language states the law applicable to a bill of lading which contains no fixed time for unloading. I am myself inclined to think that it matters not in this case whether the words "as customary" are in the contract or not, for if not they would be implied. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Herschell) said (at p. 28) that the bills of lading in that case contained no stipulation that the discharge should be effected in a particular number of days, "and therefore in accordance with ordinary and well-known principles the obligation of the respondents was that they should take discharge of the cargo within a reasonable time. The question is, Has the appellant (the shipowner) proved that this reasonable time has been exceeded? This depends upon what circumstances may be taken into consideration in determining whether more than a reasonable time was occupied." Lord Herschell then states the rival contentions of the shipowner and cargo-owner, the shipowner contending that the cargo-owner was liable if the discharge of the vessel was delayed beyond the time required to discharge her under ordinary circumstances, the cargo-owner, on the other hand, contending that he was not liable if he only occupied the necessary time under existing circumstances. Lord Herschell then continued—and here is the principle to be applied to the present case—"the only sound principle is that the 'reasonable time' should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. If the cargo has been taken with all reasonable despatch under those circumstances I think the obligation of the consignee has been fulfilled. When I say the circumstances which actually exist, I, of course, imply that those circumstances, in so far as they involve delay, have not been caused or contributed to by the consignee." It will be seen, Lord Herschell says, that reasonable time should depend on the circumstances which actually exist. What circumstances? Why, all the circumstances which have relation to the discharge of the cargo. The judgment of Lord Watson, though shorter, in no way differs from that of the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Ashbourne's judgment is valuable for bringing together prior decisions, especially that of Mr. Justice Blackburn in "Ford v. Cotesworth" (L.R., 4 Q.B., 127), in which that learned Judge held that reasonable time must be a reasonable time under the circumstances, and the judgment of Lord Selborne, when Lord Chancellor, in "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" (5 App. Cas., at p. 608), which was delivered some 12 years before Lord Herschell delivered his judgment in "Hick v. Raymond and Reid" above referred to. Lord Selborne said the same as Lord Herschell subsequently said, though in different language. He said, "There is no doubt that the duty of providing, and making proper use of, sufficient means for the discharge of cargo, when a ship which has been chartered arrives at its destination and is ready to discharge, lies (generally) upon the charterer. If, by the terms of the charter-party, he has agreed to discharge it within a fixed period of time, that is an absolute and unconditional engagement for the non-performance of which he is answerable, whatever may be the nature of the impediments which prevent him from performing it, and which cause the ship to be detained in his service beyond the time stipulated. If, on the other hand, there be no fixed time the law implies an agreement on his part to discharge the cargo within a reasonable time—that is, as was said by Mr. Justice Blackburn in 'Ford v. Cotesworth,' 'a reasonable time under the circumstances.' Difficult questions may sometimes arise as to the circumstances which ought to be taken into consideration in determining what time is reasonable. If (as in the present case) an obligation, indefinite as to time, is qualified or partially defined by express or implied reference to the custom or practice of a particular port, every impediment arising from or out of that custom or practice, which the charterer could not have overcome by the use of any reasonable diligence ought, I think, to be taken into consideration." These judgments of two Lord Chancellors in the House of Lords on the point I have now to consider, coupled with the facts found by the learned Judge in this case, to my mind are amply sufficient to show that the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham is correct, and cover all the points taken by Mr. Joseph Walton in argument. It appears to me simply waste of time to discuss in detail other authorities cited in argument, such as "Good and Co. v. Isaacs" ([1892] 2 Q.B., 555); "Castlegate Steamship Co. v. Dempsey" ([1892] 1 Q.B., 854); and "Wyllie v. Harrison" (18 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 92), which are all consistent with the judgments in "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" and in "Hick v. Raymond and Reid," and with the exception of "Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co." (4 Ex.D., 165), decided in 1879, before "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" in the House of Lords, there is not a single case in this country in the plaintiffs' favour. As regards the case of "Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co.," in my judgment it is not now law, dissented from and discussed as it has been on different occasions, and especially by Lord Blackburn in "Postlethwaite v. Freeland" (5 App. Cas., at pp. 616, 617), and inconsistent, as it is, with the two cases in the House of Lords. If, however, the case of "Wright v. New Zealand Shipping Co." is to be upheld upon the ground suggested by Lord Herschell in "Hick v. Raymond and Reid" ([1893] A.C., at p. 32)—viz., that it was not shown in that case that the cargo-owner could not by reasonable precautions or exertions have procured the necessary lighters elsewhere or earlier, and so have avoided the delay which took place—then, if that be the ground of the decision, the case is not hostile to the defendants, for the findings in this case are that they had taken all reasonable precautions and exertions and done their best as regards the discharge of the cargo, and the case has therefore no application to the present. In my opinion the present case upon the facts found is amply covered by the highest authority, and all Mr. Joseph Walton's points are equally covered. This appeal must be dismissed with costs.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

GIBBON V. THE VESTRY OF PADDINGTON.*

Metropolis—Streets—Widening streets—Compulsory purchase—Michael Angelo Taylor Act (57 Geo. III., c. xxix.).

A vestry can take part of a house under secs. 80, 82, of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act to widen a street but only if the part can be taken without destroying the identity of the house as a house.

The question in this case was whether the defendant vestry were entitled, under the powers of an Act of Parliament called Michael Angelo Taylor's Act, to take, for the purposes of street improvement, a portion of certain houses belonging to the plaintiff without taking the whole.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from proceeding, under a certain notice to treat served by them upon him, to take such parts of four houses in Moscow-road, in the parish of Paddington, as were therein mentioned. The notice to treat recited an adjudication by the defendants that the hereditaments in question obstructed and prevented the widening of Moscow-road, and that the possession, occupation, and purchase of such hereditaments and premises would be necessary for effecting the said improvement. It then stated that the defendants required to purchase and take the hereditaments, and were willing to treat with the plaintiff for the purchase of them and as to the sum to be paid or compensation to be made to the plaintiff for any injury or damage that might affect the plaintiff or be sustained by him by reason of the said improvement. The hereditaments referred to in the notice were the front portions of four houses, being Nos. 1 to 4, Moscow-road, and the effect of taking them would be to remove the front walls of the houses, together with a strip of the property about 4 ft. in width. The houses were small and of considerable age. They extended some distance back from the road, being about 14 ft. deep and having gardens or yards at the rear. The front portions of the houses consisted of shops, and there were parlours and other rooms at the back. It appeared that the premises were all unlet. Three of the houses were in such condition that they might at some slight expense be made fit to be let and occupied as shops; the fourth was not in such good condition, and a portion of this house had been thrown into No. 5, which also belonged to the plaintiff and had been rebuilt by him. There was evidence, however, that No. 4 was still capable of being put in repair and let. It also appeared that there had been some negotiation between the plaintiff and the vestry, and terms had been proposed by the plaintiff upon which he was willing to sell a portion of the property. Those terms were not accepted, and the negotiations having failed the plaintiff fell back upon his strict rights and brought this action to compel the vestry to take the whole of the property. He contended that the defendants were not entitled to take possession of the front portion of the houses only and pull down the same so as to leave him in the ownership of only the rear portions of the houses in a dismantled condition and wholly unfit for such occupation or use as they had heretofore enjoyed. He also urged that the premises in their present condition were barely large enough for business purposes, and if they were further diminished by cutting off the whole frontage as proposed the shops and houses would be practically unfit for business or any other purpose. The defendants on the other hand contended that the parts of the houses required by them could be taken down without seriously affecting the stability of the rest of the premises, and they denied that if necessary alterations were made the rear portion of the houses would be rendered entirely unfit for use and occupation. They relied upon the Act of Parliament as giving them power to proceed under the notice to treat. The case first came on upon motion for an injunction, but for the plaintiff it was argued that a local authority proceeding under this Act could only take a portion of a house where it did not involve structural alterations of too radical a character, such as would be necessary in this case.

Mr. Jenkins, Q.C., and Mr. F. H. Colt were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Butcher, Q.C., and Mr. C. E. Allan for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in giving judgment, said that the question was one of considerable difficulty and only partially covered by authority. It had been touched upon in many cases, but had only been really dealt with in one. The Act differed from the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, inasmuch as it contained no provision similar to that in the later Act whereby the promoters of an undertaking were bound to take the whole of a property if the owner were unwilling to sell a portion of it. It was provided by section 80 of Michael Angelo Taylor's Act (57 Geo. III., c. xxix.) that "It shall and may be lawful to and for the commissioners or trustees, or other persons having the control of the pavements of any parochial or other district, from time to time and at all times hereafter, to . . . widen any of the streets . . . within any parochial or other district; . . . and if any houses, walls, buildings, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or any part thereof, shall be adjudged by the said commissioners or trustees or other persons as aforesaid to project into, obstruct or prevent them from so . . . widening the said streets . . . and that the possession, occupation, and purchase of such houses, walls, buildings, lands, tenements, or hereditaments will be necessary for that purpose, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners, &c., and they shall have full power and authority to treat, contract, and agree . . . with the several owner or owners, occupier or occupiers, of all such houses, walls, buildings, lands, and hereditaments . . . for the purposes aforesaid, and to pay for the same such sum and sums of money as shall be agreed upon by the said commissioners, &c., and the owner or owners, occupier or occupiers thereof . . . and to pull down, use, sell, or dispose of such houses, walls, and buildings, and the materials thereof, and lay the sites thereof, and also all such other lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or so much thereof as they the said commissioners, &c., shall think proper into the said street."

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was to be observed, said his Lordship, that in the first portion of that section the Act spoke of "houses, &c., or any part thereof," but in the remainder of that section and in section 82, which dealt with the case of owners who refused to treat or agree, the words "or any part thereof" did not occur. That being so, the question arose as to whether a local authority could compulsorily take a part of a house. That question had been considered in "Gordon v. the Vestry of St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington" ([1894] 2 Q.B., 742). It was decided in that case that where the authority having control of the streets in a metropolitan district bona fide adjudged that part of a house or building obstructs or prevents the widening of a street, subsections 80 and 82 of 57 Geo. III., c. xxix., give such authority power, under some circumstances, to purchase and take compulsorily such part from the owner, and he cannot require them to take the whole house or building, though he be able and willing to sell and convey the whole to them. There the case came before the Court, as in the present instance, upon an interlocutory application for an injunction, and the Court decided that there was jurisdiction to take part of a house under certain circumstances. The reasons were given by both the learned Judges who heard that case, and a few words from the judgment would show the view which they took. Mr. Justice Collins said:—"The construction which has been put upon section 80 in several cases is this. In the first part of the section there are the words 'houses, walls, buildings, or any part thereof,' and the section contemplates that the adjudication made by the Commissioners, both as to the fact of obstruction and as to the necessity of purchase, may be limited to a part. That is arrived at by construing the subsequent words, 'such houses, walls, buildings, lands, &c.,' as embracing the 'houses, walls, buildings, lands, &c., or any part thereof,' previously mentioned. Following that out, section 81 deals simply with the case of persons incapacitated to treat, but the subject-matter is the same as in section 80. Section 82, which gives the compulsory powers, deals with the case of persons unable by absence or unwilling to treat; but the subject-matter is again simply referred to as 'such houses, buildings, lands, &c.,' thus carrying on through the three sections the initial definition of that which the Commissioners may consider and deal with—namely, 'houses, buildings, lands, &c., or any part thereof.' I think, therefore, that it cannot be successfully argued to-day that the construction which has been put upon section 80 does not apply to section 82, because section 80 has hitherto been considered apart from section 82. Section 80 seems to me to be the foundation of the whole code. The Courts have decided that the words 'or any part thereof' are by implication carried on into the words 'such houses, buildings, lands, &c.' in the other part of the section, and I am of opinion that they are so carried on in section 82."

The Court, having arrived at that conclusion, refused to grant an injunction; but they proceeded to express the view which they entertained of the state of the law in a way which his Lordship (Mr. Justice Stirling) was not at liberty to disregard. It was suggested that the logical result of that construction of the Act was that the local authority being at liberty to take part of a house was bound under section 82 to give proper compensation, including, first, the value of the part taken, secondly, the sums necessary to be expended by the owner in order to repair the damage done to the house; and, thirdly, the diminution in value of the portion left. That was not the view of the learned Judges because they expressed the limitation which they put upon the construction. Mr. Justice Cave said (at p. 749):—

"You may divide a piece of land, and make of it two pieces of land, and each is land for all purposes, but you cannot divide a house and make of it two houses; you get something which is not a house. If you take half of a building occupied as a tavern, you do not take a tavern and leave a tavern; you take part of a whole thing and leave the other part of that whole thing for the previous owner of the whole. So far as I can see the Act does not contemplate that that shall be done; it does not contemplate that part of a house may be taken in the sense that the owner shall be left with something which is not a house, which cannot be used for the purpose for which the house was used before, and which is essentially different in its character and condition from what the house was before. If that were the case made out here I should be clearly of opinion that the Act of Parliament did not enable a portion of the house in that sense to be taken, and that the whole house must be taken by the vestry."

So also Mr. Justice Collins said:—"It is not enough to oust the jurisdiction of the vestry to say simply that the structure sought to be removed cannot be taken and removed without altering the appearance of the premises and involving alterations thereto, and that the taking of the land will diminish the value of the Town-hall Tavern to the plaintiff. Those facts are not, in my opinion, sufficient to destroy the right of the vestry to give the notice. There must, however, I think, be the distinction in point of fact which has already been pointed out between land and a house. Land is by its nature capable of being divided; a house is prima facie a unit incapable of division; but there are cases in which it would be impossible to say that a portion of a house might not be cut off without destroying the identity of the house itself. If a particular part of a house can be pointed to which the vestry, bona fide, find is the only part which obstructs the improvement, and that part is separable from the house, so that it can be removed without destroying the house as a house, then I should say that there is nothing to prevent the vestry from compulsorily taking that part only. If, on the other hand, the thing, in respect of which they form their judgment that it obstructs and is necessary to be removed, is so indissolubly linked with the whole fabric of the house that, in the opinion of the jury, it cannot be removed without practically destroying the identity of the house as a house, then I think the vestry are not entitled to say that 'part thereof' only obstructs, or that 'part thereof' only is necessary to be removed for the purpose of the improvement. Under those circumstances I am of opinion that the vestry could not stop short of taking the whole." It was his duty, said Mr. Justice Stirling, to give effect to that expression of the law, and the result was that a limitation must be placed upon the word "part." If the local authority desired to take a part of a house, the portion taken must be something which could fairly be called a part. For instance, a perch, a conservatory, or a cellar might be taken; but if, on the other hand, it was desired to take a substantial portion so that the use of the house would be substantially interfered with and the house would no longer be occupied as the kind of building it was before, then the whole must be taken. Applying that to the present case, his Lordship thought that the plaintiff was entitled to insist upon the vestry taking the whole of the houses in question. But it was contended that the plaintiff had lost his right to do so by reason of what had passed between him and the vestry. No doubt there had been negotiations, and the plaintiff had, perhaps, contemplated pulling the houses down and rebuilding them, as it was said a prudent person would do. But upon the evidence it seemed to his Lordship that the plaintiff had been willing to sell a portion upon terms which were not acceded to, and he desired to fall back upon his legal rights. As to his intention to rebuild, no doubt he had contemplated it, but an owner was at liberty to deal with his property at whatever time he thought fit, and the vestry were not entitled to compel him to anticipate that time. The plaintiff was entitled in this case to compel the vestry to take the whole of the houses and there must be an injunction in the terms asked for. His Lordship's sympathy was with the vestry and the rate-payers, because the vestry were in a very difficult position having regard to the state of the law, but in the view which he took of the law the costs of the application must follow the event.

EX PARTE THE RECTOR AND CHURCHWARDENS AND CORPORATION OF BIDEFORD.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Faculty—Disused consecrated burial-ground—Public highway.

Held, that the Court had jurisdiction to grant a faculty to permit a portion of a disused consecrated burial-ground to be thrown into the adjoining public highway.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Chancellor Diddin in the Consistory Court of Exeter.

Mr. Grazebrook appeared for the appellants.

The arguments were heard by the Court on the 25th ult., when judgment was reserved.

THE DEAN OF ARCHES now said:—This is an appeal from the refusal by the Chancellor of the diocese of Exeter to issue a citation on the petition of the rector and churchwardens of the parish of Bideford, and of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the town for a faculty to permit a portion of a disused consecrated burial-ground to be thrown into the adjoining public highway. The learned Judge was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction to grant a faculty for the proposed purpose, and on that ground refused the citation. It appears from the petition the allegations in which for the purpose of this appeal must be assumed to be accurate that the corporation are desirous of effecting a much-needed improvement by widening a street in the town of Bideford, called Honeston-street, and with that object desire to add to the highway a portion of the old consecrated burial-ground, containing about 337 square feet. The plan annexed to the petition and an enlarged plan produced at the hearing show exactly what is proposed to be done. There can be no doubt that the street along the boundary of the burial-ground is at present inconveniently narrow—it is only 16ft. wide—and that it is quite inadequate for the traffic which passes along it. The street, it may be observed, is the main approach from the rectory, and from the whole of one side of the town to the market-place and church, and immediately opposite the burial-ground stands the national school. The alteration, if made, would therefore be not only for the general convenience and safety of the public, but particularly of the rector and many of his parishioners, as well as of all persons who use the school. The burial-ground was closed by Order in Council dated May 16, 1893, the last interment having taken place in it in August, 1884. In the piece of land in question there are five graves and two headstones, and the petitioners have obtained the assent of the representatives of those interred in three. The representatives of those interred in the remaining two cannot be found, but in all these cases the petitioners, should a faculty be granted, undertake decently and reverently to remove the remains to another portion of the ground, and in the case of the headstones to re-erect them in a suitable position to be approved by the rector and churchwardens. The corporation are prepared to pay for the accommodation asked for the sum of £42 to be applied by the rector and churchwardens in repairing the burial-ground walls and putting the ground itself in order and further to erect a new and sufficient boundary wall of the same height as the present wall. In the petition this sum of £42 is spoken of as "purchase-money" of the land itself, but what is really desired is not a faculty for an actual sale of the land, but a faculty for the use of the land as a part of the adjoining highway, the ownership of the soil remaining unaffected. The parish vestry has unanimously passed resolutions in support of this application. Under these circumstances the vestry, the rector and churchwardens, and the corporation being all assenting parties, and the alteration proposed being undoubtedly for the convenience of parishioners and the public, the case appeared to the learned Judge of the Court below to be one in which, if it were within the power of the Court, the faculty should be granted, or at all events a citation should be issued. But he was of opinion that he had no jurisdiction. "It has long been decided," he says, "by the Queen's Bench and by the Court of Arches that there is no jurisdiction in the Ecclesiastical Court to authorize consecrated ground to be applied to secular uses—'Reg. v. Twiss' (L.R., 4 Q.B., 407); 'Harper v. Forbes' (5 Jur., N.S., 275). I considered the question fully in a Rochester case a few years ago, 'In re Plumstead Burial Board' ([1895] P., 225). Nothing has happened since to change my view. There is, however, a later case, 'Re St. Nicholas, Leicester,' in the diocese of Peterborough, where the decision was the other way, and there are several cases in the diocese of London in which an opposite view to mine has been acted upon. Under these circumstances I cannot but feel great diffidence in re-stating my opinion, and were it not that the matter concerns my jurisdiction and seems to me to have been definitely decided by authorities which bind me, I should feel even more hesitation. It is time this very important point were carried to the Court of Arches, and I hope this will be done in the present case." There is unquestionably a great diversity of practice in the dioceses of this province as to the grant of faculties of this description; whilst on the one hand the learned Judge of the Court below has refused to grant them upon two occasions, the first in the diocese of Rochester and now in the diocese of Exeter, they have been granted in various forms and with various limitations by Dr. Tristram, the Chancellor of London and of Chichester, and by the Chancellors of Worcester, Lincoln, Llandaff, and Peterborough. In London, in particular, since 1872, they have been repeatedly granted, and a history of the origin of the practice will be found in the judgment of the Chancellor in the case of "St. Botolph, Aldgate" ([1892] P., 161). The same learned Judge, sitting as Chancellor of Chichester, in "In re St. Andrew's, Hove" ([1895] P., 228, h.), gives his reasons at length for holding that in the case of a churchyard closed for burials an ecclesiastical Court has a discretionary power to make an order of the kind now asked for; and in the Leicester case ([1899] P., 19) all the authorities for and against the exercise of such a power are very fully considered by the Chancellor of the diocese of Peterborough. I believe I am correct in stating that with the exception of the two cases to which the learned Judge of the Court below referred all the reported decisions on this subject are decisions of Consistorial

*Reported by W. J. SOULSBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Courts. But those two stand on a different footing, being decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench and the Arches Court respectively. The learned Judge founded his judgment upon them and if they do in fact decide the point now under consideration they no doubt bind him as indeed they would also bind this Court. It is necessary therefore to examine them carefully and I will proceed to do so, taking them in order of their date. "Harper v. Fortes" (5 Jur., N.S., 275) was decided in this Court by Dr. Lushington in 1859. It was then proved that the churchwardens of a parish at Reigate, with the approval of the vicar, rural dean, and Bishop, but without a faculty, had permitted a part of the parish churchyard to be taken into the public road, and a suit was instituted against them by a parishioner praying for their canonical correction and also asking for an order that the churchyard should be restored. At the hearing the churchwardens did not deny that there had been a violation of the law nor did they apply for a confirmatory faculty. The suit, therefore, was practically undefended, and the observations of the Judge at the outset of the hearing were certainly not necessary to the decision. Nothing, as the learned Judge in the Plumstead case ([1895] P., at p. 238) points out, can be more emphatic than Dr. Lushington's statement of the law, a statement which repeated in substance observations he had made when Chancellor of London in "Re St. John's, Walbrook" (2 Rob., 515); but so far as the decision is concerned it leaves me free to consider whether the general proposition laid down is applicable to the facts with which I now have to deal—whether in other words it can be applied without qualification to consecrated ground when the purpose for which the ground was originally consecrated can no longer be lawfully carried out. In 1869 "Reg. v. Twiss" (L.R., 4 Q.B., 407) came before the Court of Queen's Bench. In that case the guardians of the poor of a parish in the diocese of London applied to the Consistorial Court for a faculty—a confirmatory faculty—authorizing the erection on a consecrated burial-ground of a chapel for the inmates of a workhouse and of certain other workhouse buildings. Before sentence a stranger to the parish applied for a prohibition on the ground that the Ecclesiastical Court had no jurisdiction to grant such a faculty. The application was refused for two reasons, first because it was not clear that the faculty when granted would authorize more than the erection of the chapel, which would be a purely ecclesiastical purpose, and, secondly, because the applicant was a stranger to the parish; and the Chief Justice (Cockburn) in the course of his judgment, whilst expressing approval of the doctrine or proposition enunciated by Dr. Lushington, distinctly states that the application before the Court would be disposed of "on narrower grounds." There is nothing, therefore, in the decision itself binding on this Court, although the utmost respect is of course due to the dicta of the learned Judges as to the general law regulating the power of the Ecclesiastical Courts to make orders with reference to the use of consecrated ground. It may be observed that the language of Dr. Lushington and the Chief Justice would, if strictly construed, render it impossible lawfully to grant a faculty for secular even though combined with ecclesiastical uses. Yet such faculties have been repeatedly granted by the Ecclesiastical Courts without objection. It seems to me, therefore, that whilst the dicta in deference to which the learned Judge of the Court below acted no doubt accurately express, in general terms, the law of the subject, they must be read with some sort of qualification, and I say so with the less hesitation because my eminent predecessor does not appear to have himself acted upon them in their entirety. Thus I find that within two months of this decision in the Walbrook case ([1852] 2 Rob., 515) he granted, in "Campbell v. Paddington Parishioners" ([1852] 2 Rob., 558), a faculty for the erection of a vestry on ground which had been consecrated for a burial-ground, but which had never been used, and was not intended to be ever used, for interments. He points out, it is true, in explanation of his decision, that a vestry room is employed for ecclesiastical as well as secular uses, but he did not limit the grant of the faculty to the former. On the contrary, the application being for a faculty for a new and suitable building for vestry or other parochial purposes, he granted it for both. I may note in passing that the case of "St. George's, Hanover-square, v. Steuart" (Stra., 1,126), referred to in the Paddington case as illustrating the position that no faculty can be granted for the use of consecrated ground for any secular purpose whatever, does not appear to warrant quite so general a proposition. There the parish was cited to appear and show cause why a faculty should not be granted for a charity school on part of the churchyard, and eventually a prohibition was granted, but it is not clear upon what ground the Court proceeded. As far as can be gathered from the very brief report I think the Chancellor of Peterborough is probably correct in his view that there was some "special and accidental impediment" to the grant of a faculty, "such, perhaps, as interference with some common law right" ([1899] P., 27). There still remains one case to which reference should be made, because it is a decision of this Court. Sir W. Wynne is stated by Dr. Lushington to have refused a faculty to convert a part of the churchyard at Ewell into a public road. But no report exists of the circumstances of the case, and it is, at any rate, beyond question that at the time of the decision the churchyard must still have been available for the purposes for which it had been consecrated. Now, in the present case the faculty is asked for in respect of ground which can no longer be lawfully used for burials. It remains, nevertheless, under the jurisdiction of the ordinary, and now there are also many statutory restrictions upon the mode in which it may be used. For example, it can no longer be built upon, either temporarily or permanently (47 and 48 Vict., c. 72, section 3; 50 and 51 Vict., c. 32, section 4). The care of it is vested in the churchwardens where there is no burial board, and they are bound to maintain it in order and do the necessary repairs of the walls and fences (18 and 19 Vict., c. 125, section 18) and their expenses are to be repaid out of the poor-rate. It has become in fact simply an open space kept up by the parishioners but not available for use for its former ecclesiastical purpose. If it still remained open the ordinary would undoubtedly have power to grant a faculty for a footpath to be made within it for the public convenience ("Walter v. Mountague," 1 Curt., 253), and regarding the question as one of jurisdiction as opposed to discretion I can see no difference between a faculty for a path across a churchyard and for a path along one side of it. These paths so long as interments were lawful would also subserve the ecclesiastical purpose of burial, but I see no reason why the jurisdiction should not remain, although the ecclesiastical purpose can no longer be carried out. And in this case, as no question can arise as to the curtailment of the parishioners' rights of burial space for the future, I see no objection to authorizing the removal of the present boundary wall so as to allow the proposed path to be thrown into the public way. But if this be done means must be taken to preserve a record of the exact measurement of the piece of land thus added to the road, for it will still remain a part of the burial ground subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction and to the statutes as to the mode in which burial grounds may be lawfully used.

In the result, therefore I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. I think that the discretion which the learned Judge of the Court below was asked to exercise was within the limits of the Court's jurisdiction, and if it be matter of discretion there is no dispute that the faculty is one which ought to be granted. The proper course will, I think, be to follow the procedure adopted by Sir Robert Phillimore in "Re Bettison" (L.R., 4 A. and E., 294); to retain the cause and direct a faculty to issue to the rector and churchwardens authorizing the setting back of the present wall and the rebuilding it in the new position indicated on the plan annexed to the petition, upon the terms to which the petitioners have expressed their willingness to submit. The faculty must be subject to a proviso that the remains to be removed shall be re-interred in another portion of the ground to be selected by the rector and churchwardens.

IN RE TREASURE—WILD V. STANHAM.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Apportionment—Will—General power of appointment—Residuary estate—Finance Act, 1894, s. 9, subs. 1.

Where a married woman by her will exercised a general power of appointment over a fund, and also made a residuary bequest, the estate duty payable on her death in respect of the appointed fund must be borne by that fund.

Where, however, the testatrix bequeathed the residue to the residuary legatee "after paying my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts"; held, that the estate duty was a testamentary expense, and must be borne by the residue.

This was an originating summons taken out by the executors of the will of the late Mrs. Sarah Hatt Treasure to determine the question whether the estate duty payable on the death of the testatrix in respect of property appointed by her will under the power of appointment vested in her by the will of her father, Mr. James Wild, deceased, ought to be borne and paid by and out of the property so appointed, or whether the same ought to be borne and paid by and out of the residuary estate of the testatrix.

It appeared that Mrs. Treasure had a power of appointment under the will of her father over one-third of his property. By her will made February 26, 1894, Mrs. Treasure appointed the plaintiffs her executors and trustees, and directed and appointed with regard to all the property or share or shares of property to which any power of appointments, whether general or special, vested in her under the will of her father, the said James Wild, extended, and by virtue of the same power that the same property or share or shares of property should be held upon trust for the plaintiff, James Anstey Wild, and the defendant, Mrs. Elizabeth Phillips Stanham, as tenants in common in equal shares, and the testatrix gave the residue of her real and personal estate to her trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and to divide the proceeds, "after paying my funeral and testamentary expenses and debts" to other persons. Mrs. Treasure died on May 6, 1899, and the will was proved by the plaintiffs. The summons was heard on July 27 and 28.

*Reported by F. E. ADY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. John Dixon appeared for the trustees and executors.

Mr. P. O. LAWRENCE, Q.C., and Mr. W. M. CANN, for the appointees, said that the property appointed went to the executors as such, and therefore the estate duty was payable out of the residuary estate. In any case there was a direction in the will to pay the testamentary expenses out of the residue, and testamentary expenses included estate duty. The whole of the estate must be treated as personality.

Mr. Warrington, Q.C., and Mr. W. A. Peck appeared for the residuary legatees.

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, in a considered judgment, said:—The argument on behalf of those interested in the residuary estate, who desire to throw the burden of the estate duty on the appointed fund, was mainly directed to the construction of section 9, subsection 1, of the Finance Act, 1894, or, rather, to its application to the case in hand. In my opinion, the appointed fund did not pass to the executors as such. I have arrived at this opinion independently of the law as it stood before the date of the Finance Act, and to which I do not propose further to refer, but the arguments founded on that state of the law go to confirm it. The position of executors under a will exercising a general power of appointment must be treated as settled by "In re Hoskin's Trusts" (L.R., 6 Ch. Div., 281) and "In re Philbrick's Trusts" (34 L.J., Ch., 368), which was there referred to by Sir George Jessel, M.R., and, having regard to what was said by Lord Justice James in "In re Hoskin's Trusts," no distinction can be made between a power given to a married woman and one given to any other person. In "In re Philbrick's Trusts," Sir John Romilly explained that when a married woman made a will in exercise of a power and appointed executors, inasmuch as she could only make her will by virtue of the power, and could only have appointed the executors for the purpose of administering the appointed property, she must be considered to have appointed the property to the executors as trustees. Let me repeat that after what was said by Lord Justice James in "In re Hoskin's Trusts" this must be treated as applicable to a power exercised by any other person, and that notwithstanding that what was said by Sir John Romilly is in language and in substance not strictly applicable to such a case. It was argued that executors appointed by will exercising a general power could not be held responsible if they did not look after the administration of the fund, and it was unfortunately lost, because they are only bound to require payment of the fund to them if required for the purposes of the will. I do not wish to conclude the question of their responsibility, but there is certainly room for contending that this argument is not consistent with the doctrine laid down in the cases cited. Nevertheless it seems to me that the appointed fund does not pass to the executors as such, and "In re Culverhouse: Cook v. Culverhouse" ([1896] 2 Ch., 251) does not decide that it does. There the property in question was leasehold specifically bequeathed, and the judgment proceeded on the title of the executor as explained in the passage in Williams on Executors there cited. Where there is an appointed fund on the other hand the executors do not take it by virtue of their office, but because, to again quote Sir John Romilly's language, the donee of the power must be considered to have appointed the property to the executors as trustees. On this point therefore I am in favour of those who say that the estate duty must be charged on the appointed fund. On the other question, namely, whether the estate duty falls within the description of testamentary expenses, and must therefore be paid out of the residuary estate, I am in favour of those who say that it must be so paid. I must in this follow my own judgment in "In re Clemow; Yeo v. Cle- mow" ([1900] 2 Ch., 182). It was attempted to distinguish that case on the ground that there the direction was to pay the testamentary expenses of another person. That is true, and the distinction is of importance with reference to one of the points argued and decided in that case, but as regards the point with which I am dealing here my judgment was based entirely on the reasoning that as payment of estate duty was essential to obtaining a grant of probate, that duty must be considered as much a testamentary expense as any other payment necessarily or properly incurred by the executors for that purpose.

PELHAM CLINTON V. THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE.*

Will—Construction—Estate in special tail—Rule in Shelley's case.

A testator devised certain estates to a younger son, Charles, with a provision that his eldest son might purchase and redeem those estates for certain sums of money, and the will continued:—"The proceeds to go with the limitations of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and his issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over.

Held, that Charles took an estate in special tail, which he could disentail.

This was an action relating to the Shire Oaks Estate, the Workop Manor Estate, and the Nottingham Park Estate (otherwise the Nottingham Town Estate), dealt with by the fifth codicil to the will of Henry Pelham, fourth Duke of Newcastle, the question of law in dispute arising under the following circumstances:—The fourth duke, by his fifth codicil, dated August 14, 1846, to his will, dated January 31, 1814, willed and bequeathed to his son, Lord Charles Pelham Pelham Clinton, the estates referred to, and after providing that his eldest son, the Earl of Lincoln, might purchase and redeem those estates for certain sums of money the testator continued as follows:—"The proceeds to go with the limitations of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and his issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over. At the date of that codicil Lord Charles was unmarried. On August 10, 1848, he married Elizabeth Grant. On January 12, 1851, the testator died. On December 14, 1894, Lord Charles died. The plaintiff in the present action was the eldest son of the marriage of Lord Charles with Elizabeth Grant. The action came before Mr. Justice Buckley under an order dated June 18, 1900, made upon the application of the defendant, Henry Pelham Archibald Douglas, Duke of Newcastle, and upon an admission by him of the marriage, and that Elizabeth Grant was a fit and worthy gentlewoman, and that the plaintiff was the eldest son of the marriage, and that Lord Charles died as above stated, for the determination of the point of law whether upon the true construction of the fifth codicil the same codicil conferred on Lord Charles a mere life estate or an estate in tail male, or in tail, or an estate in fee simple. The point was of great importance inasmuch as the estates were of great value, and in 1851 Lord Charles had executed what purported to be a disentailing assurance of all except the copyhold and customary estates, and under this and certain conveyances and other instruments of title the properties, or the unsold portion thereof, had become, according to the defendant, vested in himself.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Peterson were for the plaintiff; and Mr. Haldane, Q.C., Mr. Vaughan Hawkins, Mr. Ingle Joyce, and Mr. J. E. H. Benn for the defendant.

At the conclusion of the arguments his Lordship took time to consider his judgment.

MR. JUSTICE BUCKLEY, in delivering judgment, after stating the facts, said:—The plaintiff says that the fifth codicil conferred a mere life estate on Lord Charles. The defendant disputes that. First, as to some things which, I think, are plain. The form of the gift is in the first place to Charles in such terms as would, if there were nothing more, give him the fee simple, but the words which direct that the proceeds, if the Earl of Lincoln purchases, are "to go with the limitations of this will" make it plain that whether the estates are purchased or not the estates or their proceeds are to go on the limitations which are expressed with regard to the proceeds. Secondly, as regards these limitations, I think it is clear that the words are to be read as if a comma or the word "and" were inserted next after the word "Charles" so that the limitations will be "to my son Charles, and if he marries," &c., to such issue male. Thirdly, I think that the words "and has issue male" mean "and has issue male by a fit and worthy gentlewoman." And, fourthly, I think that the words "if he marries," &c., are not words of condition, but words limiting or defining the issue male whom the testator calls "such issue male." To express these last three points concisely, I think the meaning of the words is the same as if the testator had said, "to my son Charles, and such issue male as he may have by marriage with a fit and worthy gentlewoman, and their male descendants, in failure of which" then over. The contention which the plaintiff put forward was that the rule in Shelley's case has no application to these limitations, for that upon authorities to which he referred the rule is that if to the words of limitation of the inheritance there are super-added words of limitation which alter the course of descent the rule in Shelley's case does not apply, and that in such case the heirs take, not by descent, but as purchasers ("Hamilton v. West," 10 Ir. Eq.Rep., 75; "Dodds v. Dodds," 11 Ir. Ch.Rep., 374, and other cases of that kind). It was argued that in this case Charles cannot take an estate tail, for that the limitation is such as that not all but only a selected class of his issue male are to take. Thus, for instance, if Charles married a fit and worthy gentlewoman and had issue male, and then married a lady who did not satisfy those words, and again had issue male, the latter class of issue are not to take by virtue of the gift. The argument that this exception exists to the application of the rule in Shelley's case is, I think, well-founded, and, in fact, it was not disputed by the defendant. But the first answer given was that the rule in Shelley's case has nothing to do with this case; that the effect of these limitations is to give to Charles an estate in special tail. For that proposition reliance was placed upon "Page v. Hayward," which is reported in 2 Salkeld, 570, and more fully in Piggott on Recoveries, 176. (His Lordship referred at some length to that case, and proceeded.) This, therefore, appears to me to be a direct authority that a good estate in special tail may be created by words of limitation to the issue male of a marriage with a person of a certain name. In Challis on the Law of Real Property, 2nd ed., p. 268, "Page v. Hayward" is referred to as an authority for the proposition that "on a gift to a single donee in special tail the wife (or husband) assigned to the donee is not necessarily a specified individual, but may be one of a special class; for example, may be any person bearing a specified name." In Preston on Estates, vol. 2 of 1827, at p. 412 it is stated:—"An estate tail special in this particular ascertains the person by whom, or on whose body, the heirs inheritable to the entail shall be begotten; thus . . . 4thly, on the body of any person who is not his wife, and although she be the wife of another man, and whether the donee be a single or a married man; or on the body of a person of particular rank, as a person of the degree of peerage; or on the body of a person being a Protestant, &c., or a person who shall have a given portion, as £10,000." It seems to me that, without any recourse to the rule in Shelley's case, there is here created (subject to something which I must say upon the word "issue") a valid estate in special tail. As regards the word "issue," it has been said that a devise to A and his issue is the aptest way of describing an estate according to the statute (see per Lord Thurlow in "Hockley v. Mawbey," 1 Ves. jun., 142, 149). Prima facie, I think issue is a word of limitation equivalent to heirs of the body, and not a word of purchase. (His Lordship referred at some length to "Roe dem. Dodson v. Grew," 2 Wils., 322, and Wilmot, 272; "Roddy v. Fitzgerald," 6 H.L.C., 823; and "Bernal v. Bernal," 3 My. and Cr., 559, 581, and continued.) For these reasons it seems to me that, apart altogether from the rule in Shelley's case, Charles took an estate in special tail male. But, further, if the rule in Shelley's case has application, I first observe that there is here no gift in express terms to Charles of a life estate. The first gift in the will to him would, without more, give him the fee simple. The limitations stated with regard to the proceeds do not express his estate to be a life estate, and I apprehend that what I have to look at is to see whether the testator did not intend to make the estate travel through the defined class of issue male generally. If he did, then I can only give effect to that intention by giving to the ancestor an estate in tail; otherwise, as Lord Cairns said in "Bowen v. Lewis" (9 App. Cas., at p. 907), "the consequence is that the only other resource which you have is to give to the first taker in the series of issue an estate by purchase, in which case it will not go through the issue generally, but only through the descendants of that particular head of the issue." So here, if I were to hold that there is not an estate in special tail male in Charles, but that the first taker in the series of issue took by purchase, it would follow that only the descendants of that particular head of the issue would take, and the words "in failure of which" would not be satisfied. Upon the principle, therefore, of "Jesson v. Wright" (2 Bli., 1) and "Van Grutten v. Foxwell" ([1897] A.C., 658), I ought to say that the rule in Shelley's case is to be applied so as to give effect to the general intention of the testator that the whole class of issue male by a fit and worthy gentlewoman shall be exhausted before the gift over shall take effect. For these reasons I hold that, on the true construction of the fifth codicil, Lord Charles took not a mere life estate, but an estate in special tail male.

*Reported by F. EVANS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The action was dismissed.

KING AND ANOTHER V. CHEYNE.*

Privy Council Appeals—New South Wales—Local government—Public roads other than main roads—Special areas—Vermin-proof gates—Obstruction.

Notwithstanding section 428 of the Local Government Act, 1890 (New South Wales) owners of lands, whether adjoining owners or single owners, whether such lands are in special areas or not, may, with the consent of the shire council, place vermin-proof swing gates across roads other than main roads, under the provisions of the Vermin Destruction Act, 1890 (New South Wales).

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria of May 29, 1899, allowing an appeal from part of a judgment of Mr. Justice Hood.

Mr. Haldane, Q.C., and Mr. C. H. Sargent were counsel for the appellants.

The arguments were recently heard before a board composed of Lord Hobhouse, Lord Macnaghten, Lord Lindley, Sir Richard Couch, and Sir Henry Strong, when judgment was reserved.

LORD LINDLEY, in giving their Lordships' judgment, said the question raised in the appeal was whether the appellants were entitled to maintain unlocked swing rabbit-proof gates across a public road. The facts were as follows:—The appellants are owners of the Serpentine Estate in the shire of East London, Victoria. In 1896 they enclosed their lands with rabbit-proof wire fencing at their own expense. They obtained the permission in writing of the shire council to erect wire netting swing gates across some public roads which intersected the enclosed land and they put up such gates accordingly. All that was done under the authority of section 58 of the Vermin Destruction Act, 1890. None of the roads so interfered with are main roads; nor is the land enclosed part of any special area as defined by the Vermin Destruction Act, 1890. In 1898 the respondent and other inhabitants of the district in which the enclosed land lay applied for and obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus commanding the shire council to remove these gates on the ground that they were obstructions and illegal by virtue of section 428 of the Local Government Act, 1890. The order nisi was discharged by the Judge of First Instance (Mr. Justice Hood), but on appeal to the Full Court his decision was reversed and the order was made absolute. From that decision the appellants had obtained special leave to appeal to this board. The shire council took no part in this appeal. The respondent had not lodged any case nor had he appeared by counsel at their Lordships' bar to oppose the appeal. The only materials therefore before their Lordships were those furnished by the appellants and the colonial statutes. The judgments of Mr. Justice Hood and of the Court of Appeal were however before their Lordships. The case really turned on three colonial Acts of Parliament all passed on the same day. They were:—1. The Local Government Act, 1890; 2. The Vermin Destruction Act, 1890; 3. The Fences Act, 1890. They were all substantially re-enactments of previous Acts with amendments. By the Local Government Act, 1890 (No. 1,112), section 428, it was the duty of the council of every municipality, except as hereinafter or by any other Act of Parliament now or hereinafter to be in force provided, to open and keep open for public use and free from obstruction every surveyed and reserved road, street, or public highway required for public traffic and proclaimed by this or any other Act within the municipal district. Penalties were imposed on persons infringing that enactment. But there was a provision to the effect that unlocked swing gates not being injurious to the public might be put up across any road by the adjoining owner with the licence of the Governor in Council on the application of the municipal council. That was the enactment on which the respondents relied and succeeded in their appeal in the colony. That section 428 no doubt threw upon the appellants the burden of showing that the swing gates which were in question had been lawfully erected and might be kept across public roads. But the exception at the beginning of the section was very material, especially having regard to the fact that the Legislature when they were passing the Local Government Act were actually passing another Act specially relating to the erection of rabbit-proof gates across roads. Before noticing that Act it would be convenient to refer shortly to the Fences Act, 1890. By that Act (No. 1,092) the occupiers of adjoining lands were required to separate them by a fence at their joint expense (section 5) and to keep the same in repair (section 16). Special provision was made for lands bounded by streams (section 6), for lands bounded by other lands not occupied (sections 10, 13), and for the erection, if desired, of live fences (i.e., hedges) next roads (section 14). There was no other express provision relating to fences by the sides of roads, nor was there anything in this Act which authorizes the erection of any obstruction across a road. The Fences Act, 1890, was only important for the better understanding of the Vermin Destruction Act, 1890. That Act (1,153) was divided into two parts. The first part imposed the duty of destroying vermin, including rabbits (section 3), on the occupiers and owners of land (section 7), and that duty extended to half of all roads bounding their lands (section 14). The first part of the Act also contained elaborate provisions for enforcing the performance of that duty (see Part I., sections 3-44). Then came Part II., which contained a series of enactments to facilitate the erection of vermin-proof fencing (see sections 45-71). On a petition signed by the owner or owners of land desiring assistance shire councils might obtain loans for enclosing lands with such fencing (sections 45 et seq.). Such lands formed special areas (section 46). If advantageous the lands of two adjoining owners might be enclosed with one vermin-proof fence instead of being separated by a dividing fence (see section 49 (6) and section 57). The provisions specially applicable to the erection of gates across roads were sections 57, 58, and 59. These were as follows:—

“Section 57. Any two or more owners of adjoining properties, with the sanction of the shire council if within a special area, instead of having dividing fences between such lands may enclose the whole of such adjoining lands with a continuous wire netting or other rabbit-proof or vermin-proof fence, having, when enclosing any road, swing gates covered with wire netting. 58. Any owner of land intersected with roads, with the sanction of the shire council, instead of having dividing fences between such land may enclose at his own expense the whole of such land with a continuous wire netting or other rabbit-proof or vermin-proof fence, having, when enclosing any road, swing gates covered with wire netting. Nothing in this or the preceding or following section shall authorize the enclosing as therein provided of any main road. 59. In enclosing any two or more adjoining properties with one continuous fence under this part of this Act it shall be lawful, with the approval in writing of the shire council, to erect such fence across any public road if in the opinion of such council such is not required for public use, and if a swing gate with wire netting be erected wherever the fence crosses such road. If any person wilfully damages or destroys any such fence or swing gate erected across any such road or elsewhere, or leaves any such swing gate open, or breaks or injures any wire netting or other rabbit-proof or vermin-proof fence or portion thereof, he shall, on conviction, be liable to be imprisoned for any period not exceeding six months and to pay a penalty not exceeding £50.” The whole question before their Lordships really turned on the true construction of section 58. Mr. Justice Hood thought that it plainly covered this case. But the Court of Appeal regarded section 58 as confined to lands within special areas. That conclusion was arrived at by considering the position of section 58 between sections 57 and 59, which the Court read as confined to lands in special areas. The Court also thought that the words “instead of having dividing fences between such land,” which occurred in section 58, could have no meaning unless there was some duty to have such fences and that duty could only be found imposed on the owners of lands in special areas. The Court referred to section 49 as imposing such duty on them. Their Lordships were unable to follow that reasoning. The sections were not skilfully drawn. It did not appear to their Lordships that section 57 was confined to adjoining lands in “special areas,” although if they were in such areas the sanction of the shire council must be obtained, not only because section 57 said so, but also because of section 59. The necessity for saying so in section 57 might perhaps be accounted for by the fact that section 57 related not only to the crossing of roads but to the dispensation from the duty of having dividing fences as required by the Fences Act, 1890. Section 59 had no reference to that duty, but was confined to putting gates across roads. The two sections were not co-extensive in their operation, but both might be read as applying to the owners of adjoining properties, whether within special areas or not. The words in section 58, “instead of having dividing fences between such land,” were very obscure. Between such land and what? The section did not say. If roads were meant then section 49 imposed no duty to have any vermin-proof dividing fences in special areas only. The dividing fences there spoken of were dividing fences between adjoining properties. Roads were not mentioned, although, perhaps, they might be included. Dividing fences were required, and were only required, by the Fences Act, 1890; but that Act applied to all lands and not only to lands in special areas. If dividing vermin-proof fences were required in special areas it must be because the shire council found them necessary as a rule and required them accordingly. That they could do whenever their consent was necessary, whether special areas were concerned or not. Having carefully considered the various statutes and sections bearing on that question their Lordships had come to the conclusion that the construction put by the full Court on sections 57, 58, and 59 of the Vermin Destruction Act, 1890, was narrower than was required either by the language of those sections or by the objects sought to be attained by them. It appeared to their Lordships that, notwithstanding section 428 of the Local Government Act, 1890, vermin-proof swing gates could be lawfully put across roads other than main roads under the provisions of the Vermin Destruction Act, 1890, by owners of lands whether adjoining owners or single owners with the consent of the shire council whether such lands were in special areas or not. Their Lordships thought it as well to add that in their opinion the Act did not impliedly or otherwise authorize adjoining owners of lands out of special areas to put vermin-proof swing gates across roads without the consent of the shire council. Their Lordships would therefore humbly advise her Majesty to allow the appeal and to reverse the order appealed from. As regarded the costs of the proceedings in the colony, the appellants were not parties to them. The respondent must pay the costs of this appeal.

REG. V. MAYOR, &C., OF EASTBOURNE.*

Local Government—Public Health Act, 1875—Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888
—Mandamus—Discretion of local authority.

The Court will not order a mandamus to issue to compel a local authority to approve plans which, in the honest opinion of the local authority, contravene an Act of Parliament.

"Smith v. Chorley Rural Council" (13 The Times L.R., 327; [1897] 1 Q.B., 678), followed.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Ridley and Mr. Justice Darling) discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus (reported in The Times of May 14). The rule nisi was obtained by John Arthur Wright, calling upon the corporation of Eastbourne, as the urban sanitary authority, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue, directed to them, commanding them to approve and signify in writing their approval of the building line as shown on the plans sent by John Arthur Wright to the corporation for the construction by him of a block of buildings for the purpose of residential flats upon certain land adjoining the house called Mixbury-house, situated at Hartington-place, in the borough. The corporation passed a resolution that the plans for the erection of the flats should be approved as complying with the by-laws, but disapproved as regards the building line shown on the plans, on the ground that the flats were shown on the plans as intended to be erected or brought forward beyond the front main wall of Mixbury-house, being a house on one side of and in the same street as the proposed flats. This was, in fact, a disapproval of the plans on the ground that the proposed buildings would contravene section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 52), which provides that "it shall not be lawful in any urban district, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street, or any part of such house or building, beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street. . . ." The section provides a penalty for every day during which the offence is continued. The Divisional Court discharged the rule for a mandamus, holding that, according to the decision in "Smith v. Chorley Rural Council" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 678), the matter was within the discretion of the corporation, and the Court could not interfere by mandamus with the exercise of that discretion. The applicant for the mandamus appealed.

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C., and Mr. B. A. HALL, for the appellant, said that by a by-law made under section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, plans of new buildings were required to be deposited with the local authority, and section 158 gave power to the local authority to approve or disapprove of the plans. The local authority could only disapprove of deposited plans upon the ground that they infringed a by-law. The remedy for an infringement of the statute was by proceedings for penalties under the statute before a magistrate. They referred upon this point to "Robinson v. Barton-Eccles Local Board" (8 App. Cas., 798, at p. 802); "Reg. v. Tynemouth Rural Council" ([1896] 2 Q.B., 451). Secondly, if the local authority had power to consider whether the plans infringed the statute, this Court could, by means of a prerogative writ of mandamus, consider whether the local authority were right in saying that the proposed new building was in a street, and that it was being brought forward beyond the front main wall of the building on either side. It would be most inconvenient that a builder's only course should be, first to erect the building, and then to have it determined by a magistrate whether the building infringed the statute. They referred to "Smith v. Chorley Rural Council" ([1897] 1 Q.B., 678).

Mr. C. A. Russell, Q.C., and Mr. Boxall, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that it was admitted that no by-law of the corporation had been infringed. When the plans were deposited, the corporation, in good faith, came to the conclusion that the proposed buildings would contravene section 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act, 1888. In his Lordship's opinion, a mandamus ought not to issue to command the local authority to approve plans which the latter honestly considered were in contravention of the statute. How could the Court call upon a local authority to approve plans which, at all events in the opinion of the local authority, were in the teeth of the Act of Parliament? The case came within what Lord Justice Chitty said in "Smith v. Chorley Rural Council," "They (the district council) had jurisdiction in the matter, which they honestly exercised, and it was part of the question before them whether the building of the new houses amounted to laying out a new street. It is apparent that the object of the action is that the High Court may review the decision arrived at by the district council and overrule it. In my opinion, such an action will not lie." For these reasons the appeal must be dismissed.

Settled Land Act, 1882—Tenant for life—Settlement—Waste—Open mine.

A tenant for life may work open mines although power so to do is not conferred by the settlement.

The question in this case was whether a tenant for life (who by the terms of the settlement was not made impeachable for waste) was to be so treated for the purposes of section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, with respect to open mines which he was entitled to work for his own benefit. The question arose upon an originating summons taken out by Sir William Chaytor, who was tenant for life under the will of Mr. Henry Chaytor, deceased, dated June 16, 1897, of certain estates in the county of Durham which contained minerals. The summons first asked for a declaration that certain mines forming part of the settled estates agreed to be leased by Sir William Chaytor under an agreement dated March 30, 1899, were opened mines. This was a question of evidence, and his Lordship came to the conclusion that two of the mines, called the Busty and Brockwell seams, had been worked by the testator and were opened mines, while as to another, the Victoria seam, it was admitted that it had never been worked, and it could not therefore be treated as open. The next question was whether one-fourth part only of the rent to be reserved under the lease to be granted under the above-mentioned agreement ought to be from time to time set aside as capital money arising under the Settled Land Acts. That question arose under section 11 of the Settled Land Act of 1882, which provides as follows:—"Under a mining lease, whether the mines or minerals leased are already opened or in work or not, unless a contrary intention is expressed in the settlement, there shall be from time to time set aside as capital money arising under this Act, part of the rent as follows—viz., where the tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of minerals, three-fourth parts of the rent, and otherwise one-fourth part thereof, and in every such case the residue of the rent shall go as rents and profits." The question was whether as regards open mines the tenant for life was impeachable for waste within the Act.

*Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

*Reported by G. A. STREETEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Fisher Williams appeared for the tenant for life; and Mr. N. Pearson for the trustees.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in delivering his considered judgment, said:—A tenant for life under a settlement may have a title to work mines for his own benefit by virtue of a power conferred on him by the settlement. A tenant for life may work open mines although power so to do is not conferred by the settlement; the title to do so is, however, derived from the intention of the settlor, inferred from the use made of the property previously to the settlement. This is well explained by Lord Justice Lindley in "In re Ridge—Hellard v. Moody" (31 Ch.D., at p. 508), where he said:—"As between a tenant for life and remainderman, money paid by a lessee as the price of land won, or carried away and sold by the lessee in the shape of minerals, stones, or bricks, is always treated as capital, and not as income, unless the settlor has expressed an intention to the contrary by making the tenant for life unimpeachable for waste, or by some other expression; or unless at the time of the settlement the mines and minerals let were open, in which case an intention to the contrary is inferred unless such inference is inconsistent with the language of the settlement." And in "Dashwood v. Magniac" ([1891] 3 Ch., at p. 360) Lord Justice Bowen said:—"Cases in which the usufructuary is allowed to treat minerals as annual fruits or produce of the soil are common to ancient and modern jurisprudence. The open mine is an instance, beginning in the Roman, but familiar already to the English law as far back as the reign of Edward III. It is important, however, to observe that the open mine does not constitute an arbitrary exception to real property law. It is merely an instance of the application of a well-known principle of construction in virtue of which grants of mineral land are given such force and effect as is reasonably necessary to carry out the obvious intentions of the grantor. The grantor was absolute master of his property, and could carve the lands which were the subject of his grant into such estates and interests as he pleased. It is, therefore, from his presumed will and intention that the result in the case of the open mine follows." A tenant for life, entitled to work mines, may, in my judgment, be properly described as not impeachable for waste in respect of the minerals got from such mines, whether the power arise from the terms of the settlement or from the circumstance that the mines are open. Now section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, prescribes that when the tenant for life is impeachable for waste in respect of minerals three-fourth parts of the rent, and otherwise one-fourth part, shall be set aside as capital money under the Act. It is contended that in order that the tenant for life may not fall under the description of "impeachable for waste in respect of minerals" he must be expressly declared by the settlement to be unimpeachable for waste. That is not the language of the Act; but it is said to be the proper construction of it by reason of the generality of the language "in respect of minerals," not "such minerals" or "the minerals." The word "minerals" cannot, however, mean any minerals whatsoever; some limitation must be put upon it; and the choice seems to be between minerals comprised in the settlement and minerals the subject of such a lease as is contemplated by section 11. The latter seems to me the more natural interpretation. It is said, however, that this construction gives no effect to the words in the early part of the section—"whether the minerals leased are already opened or in work or not." It is a sufficient answer, in my judgment, that those words serve to remove any doubt which in their absence might arise as to whether the section was meant to apply to opened mines. I think that, at all events, the language of the section admits of the two interpretations which I have mentioned. In considering which ought to be adopted regard may be paid to the consequences of adopting one or other of them. If the tenant for life must be made expressly unimpeachable for waste in order to obtain the benefit of section 11 then a distinction is drawn between an express authority and an implied authority to commit waste, for which I have been unable to discover any solid foundation. Moreover, under the provisions of the Settled Estates Act, 1877 (an Act which is still in force and to which tenants for life may have recourse) mining leases may be granted (though for a shorter term than under the Settled Land Act) upon the condition that only one-fourth of the rent is set aside as capital; and I am again unable to discover why such a difference should exist according as one Act is resorted to or the other. On the whole, I think that the preferable view is that the tenant for life in this case is under an obligation to set apart one-fourth and not three-quarters of the rent as capital money.

IN RE LORD DE CLIFFORD'S ESTATE—LORD DE CLIFFORD V. QUILTER.*

Judicial Trustees Act, 1896—Executors—Personal liability—Honest and reasonable conduct.

This was a summons which raised an important question concerning the liability of executors as affected by section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896.

The summons was taken out on behalf of the Right Hon. Jack Southwell, Baron de Clifford, against Algernon Charles Fountaine and Arthur Francis Thomas Cooper, the executors of the late Lord de Clifford, for the payment into Court by them of a sum of £1,545 ls. 11d. found due from them by the Master's certificate dated March 23, 1900, and made in an action to administer their testator's estate. The late Lord de Clifford died on April 6, 1894, and his will was proved on May 15, 1894, by the above-named executors, power being reserved to Edward Frederick Quilter, but he subsequently renounced probate. An action for the administration of the testator's estate was commenced on April 14, 1894, and the ordinary administration decree was made on January 21, 1895. From the time of the commencement of their executorship—viz., since 1894, the executors of the will employed Messrs. Ingram, Harrison, and Ingram as their solicitors until November, 1899, when a receiving order was made against the firm. The administration of the testator's estate was much delayed on account of arrears of Irish rents which could not be got in, and the estate itself was also subject to considerable liabilities, including (inter alia) £2,500 for debts, £1,100 for payment of an annuity, and £600 for death duties. Messrs. Ingram, Harrison, and Ingram from time to time received moneys and made disbursements on behalf of the executors, and it was necessary for the firm to retain moneys in hand for the purposes of such disbursements. The executors had their own banking account, but all moneys received by the firm on behalf of the executors and which were not paid into the executors' account were received by them or paid by the executors to them on the express statement by Mr. Harrison, a member of the firm, that the money was required for payment of the debts and other liabilities. The payments so made by the executors to the firm included a sum of £208 11s. 9d. on October 28, 1895, and a sum of £367 1s. 7d. on February 10, 1896. The executors' first account, which included the last-mentioned items, was not brought in until January, 1898; other accounts were subsequently brought in, and by the order on further consideration of June 24, 1899, the executors were ordered to pay into Court the sum of £789 1s. 3d. At an interview in August, 1899, Mr. Harrison referred to various accounts, and informed the executors that all the moneys received by the firm on their behalf had been expended, and that in order that the £789 1s. 3d. might be paid into court it would be necessary for the executors to draw a cheque on their own account for the amount. The executors, relying on this statement, drew the cheque, and the amount was paid into Court. Up to the time of their bankruptcy Messrs. Ingram, Harrison, and Ingram had received in all the sum of £6,117 17s. 1d. on account of the executors, and had thereout paid or applied the sum of £5,685 10s. Of the sum of £1,545 1s. 11d. found due on the Master's certificate as above-mentioned, the executors had only £1,015 6s. 6d. in their names at their bank, leaving a balance of £529 15s. 5d. to be accounted for by them. It was doubtful whether anything but a very small dividend would be recovered from the estate of Messrs. Ingram, Harrison, and Ingram.

Mr. INGLE JOYCE appeared on behalf of the plaintiff, and submitted that as this was not a breach of trust, but simply a matter of common account, the executors could not claim the benefit of section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896.

Mr. VAUGHAN-HAWKINS, on behalf of the executors, contended that as the estate was being wound up under the supervision of the Court the executors, who were merely laymen not versed in legal proceedings, were justified in leaving themselves in their solicitors' hands. He submitted that they were entitled to the full benefit of the Act, and he further relied on "Bacon v. Bacon" (5 Ves., 331); "In re Kay; Mosley v. Kay" ([1897] 2 Ch., 518), and "In re Speight; Speight v. Gaunt" (22 Ch.D., 727) in support of his contention.

MR. JUSTICE FARWELL.—The question raised is one of great difficulty. The Legislature has given to the Court a dispensing power under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, in cases where a breach of trust has been established—that is to say, that when once a breach of trust has been committed the Court has power if it thinks that the trustee "has acted honestly and reasonably, and ought fairly to be excused for the breach of trust," to relieve the trustee either wholly or partly from personal liability for the same. Now, relief against the stringency of the rules of the common law was an old head of equity with which the Courts of Chancery were familiar. Courts of equity have long been accustomed to relieve against forfeiture at common law. They regarded forfeiture as intended to be the means by which some particular Act was to be enforced, but they did not relieve against forfeiture unless they could give the person entitled to the forfeiture the full benefit of the contract. In such cases the relief was based on some intelligible principle, but no such principle underlies the present case. It is a novel expedient to call in the Courts of equity to relieve, not against the stringency of the common law, but against their own principles. Equity has its rules against honest trustees, but the Legislature by this Act enables Courts of equity to relieve against their own rules. No such principles as were applied to relief against the common law rules are applicable to the present case, and there is no other principle to serve me as a guide. I have to find as a fact whether or not the trustees "acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused," and I have to bear in mind that if I grant the trustees the relief which they ask I shall be doing so at the expense of the cestui que trust. The real difficulty is that, without any rule to guide me, I have to say what is fair and right as between beneficiaries who trust their money to trustees and trustees who act gratuitously. [His Lordship then reviewed the facts of the case as above set out, and continued as follows.] The executors employed Messrs. Ingram, Harrison, and Ingram as their solicitors. At that time this firm stood high in repute and one of the partners was a personal friend of Mr. Cooper's. From time to time large sums of money were received by the firm and applied in payment of duties, debts, and other disbursements payable in respect of the testator's estate. There are two questions which I have to determine. In the first place, were the payments by the executors to their solicitors in October, 1895, and February, 1896, of the balances of their Irish banking account amounting to £208 11s. 9d. and £367 1s. 7d. justified? The other question arises out of the following circumstances:—In August, 1899, the executors had an interview with Mr. Harrison, and after referring in their presence to his account books, he told them that the whole of the money with which his firm had been entrusted had been expended on behalf of the estate and nothing was left, and that they must draw a cheque on the other account, which they had in their own names, in order that the £789 1s. 3d. might be paid into Court. In the circumstances, were the executors justified in relying upon the statement of their solicitors? Now, with regard to the first question, there is no doubt that the executors did entrust to their solicitors very large sums of money, but the solicitors had down to that date properly discharged themselves in respect of all the sums previously received by them. In his affidavit Mr. Cooper says as follows:—"During the course of these proceedings we were compelled to rely on the advice and information given us by Mr. Harrison, a member of the said firm, and in reference to each of the items mentioned" in the executors' first account "we were in each case from time to time expressly informed by Mr. Harrison that the amounts so received by his firm on our behalf and retained by them were required and necessary to be so retained to be applied under the direction of the Court in satisfaction of the debts which were, and which we knew to be of considerable amount, owing by the late Lord de Clifford, and for disbursements, such as estate duties, and the payment of an annuity, for costs, and for the proper management of the Irish estates belonging to him. We believed the said firm to be of high standing and quite solvent and relied upon the statements to us by Mr. Harrison that the amount in each case retained in their hands was required to be expended and was being expended as aforesaid." Now, it has been found as a fact by the Master's certificate, that a balance of £1,545 1s. 11d. is due from the executors on their final account and they have been charged with the balance so found due. In my opinion, I cannot say that the executors acted unreasonably in relying upon the statement of their solicitors that the first sum of £208 11s. 9d. was required by the firm for the purposes of discharging the liabilities of the testator's estate, and I should be acting with harshness if I did not apply the same principle to the other sum of £367 1s. 7d. which was paid by them in reliance upon a similar statement by their solicitors. They were truly told by their solicitors that these sums were wanted, and the sums were in fact applied for the payment of large sums for estate duties. Moreover, there was at the time an untaxed bill of costs due from the executors to the solicitors who had debited their clients with payments amounting to £614 6s. 7d. in respect of this bill, which has subsequently been taxed at £537 15s. 6d. In the circumstances, I do not see that the executors were guilty of unreasonable foolishness in handing over to their solicitors this total sum of £575 13s. 4d. when they were told that it was wanted for the purposes of the administration of the estate and when in fact some of it was employed for those purposes. I pass on now to consider the other question which I have to determine, and with regard to that I think Mr. Vaughan-Hawkins was right in relying upon "Bacon v. Bacon." These two executors went to their solicitors who told them that the whole of the money received by the firm had been worked off. Now, was that statement so unreasonable that the executors should have asked then and there for a full account from their solicitors? I think not. Mr. Harrison was not asking them to pay this money to him or his firm, but to pay it into Court. The executors could not on that occasion very well have said, "We will employ some one to look into your accounts and see whether they were satisfactory." That would not, in my opinion, have been reasonable. Taking into consideration the fact that the firm had been acting for the executors for the last five years, I do not think that the latter could have reasonably refused to do as they were asked. In "Bacon v. Bacon" it was held that an executor was not liable for sums remitted by him to his co-executor, who had been employed by the testator as his solicitor, upon the statement by the latter that he had exhausted all the funds in his hands in payment of the testator's debts. Where there are favourable circumstances, as in "Bacon v. Bacon," and where a man has acted with reasonable diligence, the Court does not hold him liable for loss incurred. For instance, a mortgagee, who parts with the title deeds upon a statement that the mortgagor wants them for a reasonable purpose, and who tries to get them back with reasonable celerity, does not lose his priority. In the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that the executors have acted honestly and reasonably and ought fairly to be excused from personal liability. The objection raised by Mr. Ingle-Joyce that this was not a breach of trust, but a mere matter of common account and therefore did not fall within the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, is, in my opinion, effectually disposed of by the case of "In re Kay," and by subsection 2 of section 1 of the Act, which says "The administration of the property of a deceased person, whether a testator or intestate, shall be a trust, and the executor or administrator a trustee, within the meaning of this Act." I think each side must pay its own costs.

WARREN AND OTHERS V. BROWN.*

Prescription—Ancient lights—Ordinary limits.
The right to ancient lights acquired by statutory prescription is ordinarily limited to a sufficient quantity of light for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendant from darkening, injuring, or obstructing the lights of premises owned by the plaintiffs in Bakehouse-lane, Leicester, and for an order that the defendant should pull down a wall now in course of erection, and for further relief. The case was tried at Leicester Assizes, when judgment was reserved. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Mr. Hugo Young, Q.C., and Mr. W. H. Stevenson appeared for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Stanger, Q.C., and Mr. Neilson for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT.—This case raises a question of general importance in relation to ancient lights—namely, whether the right which is acquired by statutory prescription is a right to the continuance of substantially the whole quantity of light which has come to the windows during the 20 years, or is ordinarily limited to a sufficient quantity of light for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business. It seems strange that such a question should be still open for discussion, but there is a considerable body of authority in favour of either proposition. The facts are these. The plaintiffs, as the owners and the tenant of a building in the town of Leicester, claim damages and an injunction in respect of the obstruction of the access of light to windows more than 20 years old. At the trial the claim was limited to two rooms, one on the ground floor and the other above the former, both facing to the south. For a length of about 17ft. in front of these rooms the defendant has raised his own building from a height of about 20½ft. to about 26ft., but has set it back about 2ft. or 3ft., so that the width of the street between the two buildings, which was about 17ft., is now about 19ft. Four out of five windows in each of the two rooms are opposite to that part of the defendant's building which I have mentioned. These windows are large and high. Those of them which are on the ground floor are, and for years have been, glazed with fluted glass for about half their height from the bottom. In addition to the front light both rooms receive much side light, especially from the east and east-south-east, from a wide street running north and south at a distance of about 50ft. to 70ft. Light is not in any direction cut off by very high buildings. To the south-east the defendant has taken down a high chimney stack, which to some extent used to intercept the light from that quarter. I find that the defendant has not obstructed or diminished to any material extent, if at all, the light coming to the upper of the two rooms in question. As regards the four windows on the ground floor, I find that the defendant has materially diminished the light which the plaintiffs enjoyed for those windows for 20 years past, but that abundant light remains for all ordinary purposes of inhabitancy or business. The room in its present state is better lighted than the ground floor rooms in many of the principal streets. The plaintiff Baum (the lessee of the premises), has during some years, but much less than 20 years, carried on in the premises, and particularly in the ground floor room in question, a manufacture of hosiery by means of machinery which requires a very exceptional quantity and quality of light for the continued and accurate adjustment of filaments to fine needles moving at speed in bundles of some hundreds. Before this manufacture was established at these premises a different industry (manufacture of boots and shoes) requiring good, but not special or extraordinary, light was carried on there. I find that the defendant has by the acts complained of diminished the light so that it is now materially insufficient during some part of the day for the special requirements of the plaintiff Baum's industry. I find that the plaintiffs' premises have throughout the 20 years before action been suitable for such a manufacture as that now carried on by Baum, and that the kind of manufacture is and has long been common in the district, and has for 20 years past required more light than most other industries, but not until the last few years in so high a degree as at present, the older machines having been less delicate and complicated. I think that the light as it now exists would have been sufficient for any but the most recent kinds of machines. In my judgment no sufficient case for a mandatory injunction is made out in any view of the plaintiffs' rights. The inconvenience to which Baum was subjected can be, and to a great extent it has been, obviated by the removal of machines to the upper room, and in any case it can be remedied by some increased expenditure for gas. The question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to damages. If they are, I assess the amount at £100 for the tenant and £200 for the reversioners. There are scarcely any authorities bearing on the question until 1865. It appears from Aldred's case (9 Rep., 57b) that the nature of the cause of action in the case for infringement of rights to light was not clearly settled. It is classed with actions for nuisance, and the pleading closes with "quod messagium horrida tenebratate obscuratum fuit"; but a prescription is alleged. In Luttrell's case (4 Rep., 86a) it is laid down that (as was afterwards established by "Yates v. Jack" (L.R., 1 Ch., 295), and other cases), "if a man has an old window to his hall and afterwards he converts the hall into a parlour or any other use, yet it is not lawful for his neighbour to stop it, for he shall prescribe to have the light in such part of his house." In 1752, in "Fishmongers' Company v. East India Company" (1 Dickens, 163), Lord Hardwicke said:—"It is not sufficient to say it will alter the plaintiff's lights, for then no vacant piece of ground could be built on in the city; and here will be 17 ft. distance, and the law says it must be so near as to be a nuisance. It is true the value of the plaintiff's house may be reduced by rendering the prospect less pleasant, but that is no reason to hinder a man from building on his own ground." In "Martin v. Goble" (1 Camp., 320) a malt-house with ancient windows was occupied for seven years as a poor-house. McDonald, C.B., directed the jury that "the house was entitled to the degree of light necessary for a malt-house, not for a dwelling-house. The converting it from one into the other could not affect the rights of the owners of the adjoining ground. No man could by any acts of his suddenly impose a new restriction upon his neighbours." In "Attorney-General v. Nichol" ([1809] 16 Ves., 338), Lord Eldon (Lord Chancellor) says:—"There are many obvious cases of new buildings darkening those opposite to them, but not in such a degree that an injunction could be maintained, or an action upon the case; which, however, might be maintained in many cases which would not support an injunction." In "Beck v. Stacey" ([1826] 2 C. and P., 465) Chief Justice Best directed the jury that in order to ground an action there must be a substantial privation of light sufficient to render the occupation of the house uncomfortable and to prevent the plaintiff from carrying on his accustomed business (that of a grocer) as beneficially as he had formerly done. In the 40 years after "Beck v. Stacey," there seem to have been few or no decisions bearing on the question; but in 1865 in "Clarke v. Clark" (L.R., 1 Ch., 16) the question was distinctly raised for the first time. Then Lord Cranworth refused an injunction in a case in which exceptionally good light had been materially diminished, saying that the plaintiff must show such an obstruction "as to interfere with the ordinary occupations of life." He proceeded to draw a distinction between town and country, which has not been fully adopted in later cases. In "Durrell v. Pritchard" ([1865] L.R., 1 Ch., 244) and "Robson v. Whittingham" (L.R., 1 Ch., 442), Lords Justices Knight, Bruce, and Turner adopted the language of Lord Cranworth. In "Yates v. Jack" ([1866] L.R. 1 Ch., 295) Lord Cranworth established the rule which has ever since that case been recognized as settled, so far, at any rate, as ordinary purposes of inhabitation or business are concerned, that the owner of ancient lights is entitled to have them protected without reference to the particular purpose for which they were enjoyed during the 20 years; and he does not apparently draw any distinction between ordinary and extraordinary purposes. In the same year in "Dent v. Auction Mart Company" (L.R., 2 Eq., 238) Vice-Chancellor Wood established another rule that an injunction would not be granted in equity unless the case is a proper one for substantial damages at law. Having referred to "Martin v. Headon" (L.R., 2 Eq., 425) and "Calcraft v. Thompson" (15 W.R., 387) his Lordship proceeded:—"In 'Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie' (L.R., 4 Eq., 421) it was held by Vice-Chancellor Malins that where ancient windows had received an extraordinary amount of light during the 20 years and the plaintiff had used it for a purpose requiring extraordinary light (examination of silks) for only a portion of that period, he had no right to an injunction on the ground of an obstruction which left him enough light for all ordinary purposes, though not enough for extraordinary purposes. He thought, however, that if the plaintiff had been 'in the enjoyment of an extraordinary user for 20 years, that would establish the right against all persons who had reasonable knowledge of it.'" In 1871, in "Kelk v. Pearson" (L.R., 6 Ch., 809), Lord Justice James said:—"On the part of the plaintiff it was argued before us that this was an absolute right, that now, under the statute 2 and 3 William IV., c. 71, he had an absolute and indefeasible right by way of property to the whole amount of light and air which came through the windows into his house; and that he could maintain an action at law or a suit in equity upon that absolute legal right; and the only question as to the effect or extent of his right would be with regard to the discretion of this Court in considering whether it was a case for damages, or to be interfered with by way of injunction. Now, I am of opinion that the statute has in no degree whatever altered the pre-existing law as to the nature and extent of this right. The nature and extent of the right before that statute was to have that amount of light through the windows of the house which was sufficient, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, for the comfortable use and enjoyment of that house as a dwelling-house, if it were a dwelling-house, or for the beneficial use and occupation of the house, if it were a warehouse, a shop, or other place of business. That was the extent of the easement—a right to prevent your neighbour from building upon his land so as to obstruct the access of sufficient light and air to such an extent as to render the house substantially less comfortable and enjoyable." Lord Justice Mellish concurred, but dissented from that part of Lord Cranworth's judgment in "Clarke v. Clark" which suggested a possible difference between town and country. In 1873, in "Dickinson v. Harbottle" (28 L.T., 186), Vice-Chancellor Malins followed his own decision in "Lanfranchi v. Mackenzie." The question was again raised in the Court of Appeal in "City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant" (L.R., 9 Ch., 212) before Lord Selborne (Lord Chancellor) and Lords Justices James and Mellish. Lord Justice James said:—"In the case of 'Kelk v. Pearson' the Lord Justice and myself endeavoured to express what we thought to be the rule applicable to these cases, and I believe the Lord Chancellor entirely agrees with the mode in which it is there expressed. We only repeated in different words what is to be found in many previous cases—that the extent of the right of an owner of ancient lights is to prevent his neighbour from building so as to obstruct the access of sufficient light and to such an extent as to render the house substantially less comfortable and enjoyable.” Lord Selborne (Lord Chancellor) said, “I agree with the judgment which Lord Justice James has delivered,” expressly adhering to the language in “Kelk v. Pearson,” and adding that the supposed rule as to 45deg. is no rule of law, but that if 45deg. of light is left that is some prima-facie evidence of the light not being obstructed to such an extent as to call for the interference of the Court. In “Leech v. Schweder” ([1874], L.R., 9 Ch., 463) Lords Justices James and Mellish held that there was no difference in extent and nature between the right acquired under the statute and a right acquired by “the disposition of the owner of two tenements,” and that “practically there is no difference with respect to light in the amount of damage which would entitle a person to maintain an action at law and that which would entitle him to file a bill in equity.” In “Aynsley v. Glover” ([1874] L.R., 18 Eq., 544; L.R., 10 Ch., 283), per Sir G. Jessel (Master of the Rolls), it was finally settled that the right to light for a room is not limited by the fact that before the obstruction the room was used for purposes requiring little of the light which came to it, and “Back v. Stacey,” as amended by Vice-Chancellor Wood, is approved; but the case does not seem to contain anything affecting the present question; nor are there any criticisms on “Kelk v. Pearson” or “City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant.” There are no subsequent reported decisions of the Court of Appeal which are in point, and the last-mentioned decision of that Court would, as I understand it, be decisive of the matter, subject only to review in the Court of Final Appeal. This view, however, seems not to have been universally adopted, a different view having been apparently taken by the Court of Appeal in Ireland, by the whole or a majority of a Divisional Court in England, and in two or three cases by my brother Kekewich. His Lordship then referred to “Moore v. Hall” ([1878] 3 Q.B.D., 178), in which Mr. Justice Mellor and Mr. Justice Manisty appear to have held that the plaintiff’s right is to have the light flow in the same quantity as through the period of prescription; to “Mackay v. Scottish Widows’ Society” ([1877] 11 Ir. R., Eq., 341), in which Lord Justice Christian laid it down that “the right is to an average maximum of the light which nature has been shedding on the window for 20 years before the defendant interrupted it”; and to “Lazarus v. Artistic Photographic Company” ([1897] 2 Ch., 214), in which Mr. Justice Kekewich held that the plaintiff was entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of extraordinary light for photographic purposes, although he had not been using it for those or other purposes requiring extraordinary light for the full period of 20 years. His Lordship proceeded:—In this state of the authorities I think I must take it that the law is laid down in “City of London Brewery Company v. Tennant,” agreeing as that case does with the criterion expressed by Lord Cranworth in “Clarke v. Clark,” and that the plaintiffs, having an abundance of light left for all ordinary purposes of inhabitation or business, are not entitled to relief on the ground that their extraordinary use has been interfered with. Unless, indeed, there is some such limitation of the right to light for ancient windows it is difficult, as Lord Hardwicke observed in effect in “Fishmongers’ Company v. East India Company,” to see how the ordinary extensions and improvements of towns could be carried on. If every house which has existed for 20 years is entitled to have all, or substantially all, the same light come to its windows as during the 20 years, no new houses could be built opposite to old ones unless at a distance which would impose on servient tenements an unreasonable burden, and might involve grave public inconveniences. Nor, if that were law, could there well be any presumption that so long as 45deg. of light, or some approximate angle, is left there is no actionable wrong. It is not necessary in the present case to consider the question raised in “Laufanchi v. Mackenzie,” whether a right to an extraordinary quantity of light for extraordinary purposes can be acquired by prescription.

*Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendant with costs.

WALTER V. LANE.*

Copyright — Newspaper — Reports of public speeches — “Author” — Copyright Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45), secs. 2, 3, 18.

The copyright of verbatim shorthand reports of speeches can exist in the reporter as the “author” thereof and by assignment in the proprietor of the newspaper in which such reports appear.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 27) reversed.

Their Lordships gave judgment in this copyright appeal, in which the question was whether or not copyright can, under the Act of 1842, exist in respect of verbatim reports of speeches in the reporter and by assignment in the proprietor of the newspaper in which such reports appear. It will be seen that four of the noble and learned Lords have upheld the claim to copyright in such cases, Lord Robertson being the only dissentient. Thus the judgment of the Court of Appeal, reported ante, p. 27: L.R. [1899], 2 Ch., 749; 68 L.J., Ch., 760, has been reversed, and that of Mr. Justice North restored. Mr. Justice North granted an interim injunction restraining the defendant—respondent in the House of Lords—from infringing the appellants’ copyright. Before the Court of Appeal it was agreed that the motion should be treated as the trial of the action, and their Lordships have accordingly made the injunction perpetual. The arguments on the present appeal were reported in The Times of July 21 and 24, and on their conclusion judgment was reserved.

Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., Mr. Henry Terrell, Q.C., and Mr. MacSwiney were counsel for the appellants; Mr. Birrell, Q.C., and Mr. Scrutton for the respondent.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, I should very much regret if I were compelled to come to the conclusion that the state of the law permitted one man to make profit out of and to appropriate to himself the labour, skill, and capital of another. And it is not denied that in this case the defendant seeks to appropriate to himself what has been produced by the skill, labour, and capital of others. In the view I take of this case, I think the law is strong enough to restrain what, to my mind, would be a grievous injustice. The law which I think restrains it is to be found in the Copyright Act; and that Act confers what it calls “copyright,” which means the right to multiply copies, on the authors of the books first published in this country. That the publication in question—namely, reports of Lord Rosebery’s speeches—are simply copies of what was first printed in The Times newspaper is not denied. And, further, it has not been, and cannot be, denied that they were originally as in The Times a sheet or sheets of letterpress, and came within the definition of the Act as a book. The speeches, therefore, and the sheets of letterpress in which they were contained were books first published in this country, and I confess, upon looking at the definition and the right conferred, I am wholly unable to discover why they are not protected by the statute from being pirated by unauthorized persons. The sole ground, as I understand the judgment of the Court of Appeal, is that in their judgment the producer of a written speech, unless he is the original speaker, cannot be an author within the meaning of the Act. My Lords, it seems to me that this argument is based upon too narrow and misleading an interpretation of the word "author." In my view, the statute has not meant so to confine it, and I do not understand the explanation the Court of Appeal gives of the application of the word "author" to such publications as directories, Red-books, maps, &c. I observe the Court of Appeal uses the word "analogy" as applicable to such questions. To my mind, it is no analogy at all. If the maker of a directory, Red-book, or a map is an author, one has to analyse what in such cases is the distinction between the author as thus referred to and the author of a spoken speech. The language of the Court of Appeal is:—"Each man who himself makes a directory, &c., and publishes it is the author of what he publishes. The reporter of a speech is not." With great respect to the Court of Appeal, this is allegation, not argument. The judgment goes on to say that "the distinction is all-important," but it does not explain what the distinction is. For my own part, I am unable to discover it. A man goes along a street, collects the names, addresses, and occupations of each dweller therein. What is the original composition of which, according to the Court of Appeal, he is the author? The name of the street? The numbers of the street? The names of the dwellers in the several houses? What is the distinction which the Court of Appeal makes in giving copyright to the result of this labour and reducing it into writing? What is it that makes it an original composition? But further—Where do the words "original composition" come from? If the producer of such a book can be an author within the meaning of the Act, I am unable to understand why the labour of reproducing spoken words into writing or print, and first publishing it as a book, does not make the person who has so acted as much an author as the person who writes down the names and addresses of the persons who live in a particular street. I observe that the Court of Appeal introduces the words "original composition" as if those were the words of the statute; and, at another part of the judgment, it is said that—"The report and the speech reported are, no doubt, different things, but the printer or publisher of the report is not the 'author' of the speech reported, which is the only thing which gives any value or interest to the report." The sentence is a little difficult to construe, but, as I understand it, it means to convey that the thing to which the statute gives protection must be of some value or interest. Again, I am compelled to point out that such words are not to be found in the statute. The producer of this written composition is, to my mind, the person who is the author of the book within the meaning of the statute; and, as I have pointed out, the words "original composer" are not to be found in the statute; and, as I understand, the judgment of the Court of Appeal is entirely based on the thing protected being an original composition in the sense that the person who claims the protection of the statute must not have obtained his words or ideas from somebody else but must be himself an original author in the sense in which that word is generally used in respect of literary composition. I have been anxious to confine my views at present simply to the words of the statute, because it appears to me that once this thing, in respect of which the controversy has arisen, comes within the language of the statute, it lies on those who deny the existence of the right to show why the protection of the statute does not apply. As I have pointed out, the judgment of the Court of Appeal rests solely on the use of the word "author," and I cannot help thinking that some confusion has been created between two very different things: one the proprietary right of every man in his own literary composition and the other the copyright—that is to say, the exclusive privilege of making copies created by the statute. If the question here were whether there was the right to publish at all a speech made by some one who did not himself publish it, questions like those determined in this House in "Caird v. Sims" (12 App. Cas., 326) might arise. Whether the speech was delivered so as to give it to all the world and to prevent the original author of it from restraining its publication, is a question with which your Lordships have here no concern. Lord Rosebery is not here complaining of the publication of it, nor claiming any proprietary right in the speeches as delivered. The question here is solely whether this book (to use the language of the statute), printed and published and existing as a book for the first time, can be copied by some one else than the producers of it (I avoid the use of the word "author"), by those who have neither produced it themselves, but have simply copied that which others have laboured to create by their own skill and expenditure. My Lords, I cannot help thinking that underlying the argument which has been addressed to us there is something of the contention which was boldly made nearly half a century ago in the case of "McLean v. Moody" in the Court of Session where—relying on the preamble—the advocate argued that the object of the statute of Victoria was to encourage literary merit; that the intellectual labour constituting authorship was alone thereby protected, and that there could be no authorship without an author. Lord Deas refused to accept such an argument, and expressed the opinion that the Act did not confine the privilege to cases in which there was a known author. But it appears to me that, although it may be true that a preamble may be a guide to the general objects of the statute, it undoubtedly can neither restrict nor limit express enactment. And though I think in these compositions there is literary merit and intellectual labour, yet the statute seems to me to require neither—nor originality in thought. It is admitted apparently by the Court of Appeal (and indeed insisted on as part of the reasons for their judgment) that the owner of an unpublished manuscript, although not the author of it, acquires copyright in it by first publishing it. And I observe that it is said Lord Rosebery had no copyright in his speech, and, although he could have acquired copyright in it by putting it into writing and printing and publishing it, he did not do so. Here again the implied proposition is that the only person who could gain copyright in his speech is the person who spoke it, and that the word "original" must, by construction, be read into the statute—that the true analogy is the "true and first inventor" of the Patent Laws. I think the analogy is a false one. I do not find the word "original" in the statute, or any word which imports it as a condition precedent or makes originality of thought or idea necessary to the right. But if the analogy were strictly pursued, I think it would not be favourable to the defendant. An importer of a foreign invention is, for the purpose of the Patent Laws, an inventor, and, as Lord Brougham said in "In re Berry's Patent" (7 Moore's P.C. Reports, 187), there were "two species of public benefactors—the one those who benefit the public by their ingenuity, industry, and science and invention and personal capability; the other those who benefit the public without any ingenuity or invention of their own by the appropriation of the results of foreign inventions. Now, the latter is a benefit to the public incontestably, and therefore they render themselves entitled to be put upon somewhat if not entirely the same footing as inventors." (An interesting discussion of this question will be found on page 98 of Wallace and Williamson's Patent Law Cases, just published.) I might paraphrase Lord Brougham's language by asking whether those who preserve the memory of spoken words which are assumed to be of value to the public are not entitled to the analogous merit which Lord Brougham attributes to the importer of foreign inventions. My Lords, if I have not insisted upon the skill and accuracy of those who produce in writing or print spoken words, it is not because I think the less of those qualities, but because, as I have endeavoured to point out, neither the one nor the other is a condition precedent to the right created by the statute. That right, in my view, is given by the statute to the first producer of a book, whether that book be wise or foolish, accurate or inaccurate, of literary merit or of no merit whatever. I must notice one supposed difficulty in this view, very persistently urged at the bar. It is said that in the view I have suggested there would be as many copyrights as reporters. I do not see the difficulty. Each reporter is entitled to report, and each undoubtedly would have a copyright in his own published report. But where is the difficulty? Suppose a favourite view; a dozen artists take each independently his own representation of it; is there any reason why each should not have his own copyright?—or even a photograph, where each photograph is taken from the same point and, in the same state of the light, would be identical in all respects. There is, of course, no copyright in the view itself; but in the supposed picture or photograph there is. And in truth there is a confusion of thought between the difficulty of proof of the piracy and the existence of piracy. Here, as I have said before, no such difficulty arises, since it is admitted that the report of these speeches is not the result of independent labour but is taken from The Times. My Lords, I think the judgment of Mr. Justice North was right, and that the only answer sought to be given to it by the Court of Appeal was the restricted use of the word "author," with which I have endeavoured to deal. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the Court of Appeal be reversed, with costs, and the judgment of Mr. Justice North restored.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords, the question on this appeal is whether the proprietors of The Times, by assignment from their reporter, are entitled to copyright in the reports published in their newspaper of certain speeches delivered by Lord Rosebery on public occasions. Copyright is the right of multiplying copies of a published writing. There is no copyright in a speech although delivered on a public occasion, and, on the other hand, there is no copyright under the statute in a piece of writing until it has been published. There may, indeed, be a common law proprietary right in a speech or lecture. In "Caird v. Sime" (12 App. Cas., p. 326) Lord Watson said,—"The author of a lecture on moral philosophy or of any original composition retains a right of property in his work which entitles him to prevent its publication by others until it has with his consent been communicated to the public." It is not disputed in the present case that the thoughts and words of Lord Rosebery's speeches were communicated by him to the public, and no question is raised as to the existence of any right in the orator. This case raises only a question of statutory copyright in The Times report, and must be decided on the provisions of the Copyright Act, 5 and 6 Vict., c. 45. Now what has the respondent done? He has admittedly copied and republished for his own profit certain sheets of letterpress forming parts of The Times newspaper. A sheet of letterpress is a book within the meaning of the Act; and, notwithstanding the decision of Vice-Chancellor Malins in "Cox v. Land and Water Journal Company" (L.R., 9 Eq., 324) I have no doubt that a newspaper is within the Act. In "Walter v. Howe" (17 Ch.D., 708) Sir George Jessel differed from the Vice-Chancellor, and his decision has since been followed. Prima facie, therefore, the respondent has infringed the appellants' copyright in their newspaper. His defence is that the appellants have no copyright in this portion of their published work because it was compiled from, or consisted only, of matters which were publici juris. They say that Lord Rosebery was the author of his speech and gave it to the world for any to reproduce who would, and that nobody, therefore, can claim to be the "author," within the meaning of the Act, of a report of his speech. The reporter, they say (with a pardonable jingle), is the reproducer and not the producer of the speech. That is true in a sense; and, if The Times were claiming a property in the speech itself and seeking to prevent anybody else from publishing any other report of it, the argument would be cogent. But the appellants' claim is of a more modest description. They seek only to prevent the respondent from multiplying copies of their own report of the speech and availing himself for his own profit of the skill, labour, and expense by means of which that report was produced and published. But for the fact that the Court of Appeal thought differently and one of your Lordships agrees with the learned Judges, I should say that there is no answer to this claim. In my opinion the reporter is the author of his own report. He it was who brought into existence in the form of a writing the piece of letterpress which the respondent has copied. I think also that he, and he alone, composed his report. The materials for his composition were his notes which were his own property aided to some extent by his memory and trained judgment. Owing to the perfection which the art of shorthand writing has attained in recent years, memory and judgment bear a less important part in the composition of a report of a speech than was formerly the case. But the question whether the composer has copyright in his report does not seem to me to depend on, or to vary inversely with, his skill in stenography. Nor, as it appears to me, does the fact that the subject-matter of the report had been made public property, or that no originality or literary skill was demanded for the composition of the report, have anything to do with the matter. Again, it is said that the lucidity of diction and perfection of expression which characterize the eminent person named made an exact reproduction of his words a comparatively easy and almost mechanical task. But is it argued that the reporter of the hesitating, half-completed utterances of an inferior speaker might have copyright though the reporter of Lord Rosebery may not? Or does the question of copyright in the report depend on the clearness of thought and speech of the orator? In my opinion, the question must be decided on general considerations, and not on any grounds which are personal either to the orator or to the reporter. Copyright has nothing to do with the originality or literary merits of the author or composer. It may exist in the information given by a street directory, "Kelly v. Morris" (L.R., 1 Eq., 697), or by a list of deeds of arrangement, "Cate v. Devon and Exeter Constitutional Newspaper Company" (40 Ch.D., 500), or in a list of advertisements, "Lamb v. Evans" ([1893] 1 Ch., 218). I think those cases right and the principle on which they proceed directly applicable to the present case. It was of course open to any other reporter to compose his own report of Lord Rosebery's speech, and to any other newspaper or book to publish that report, but it is a sound principle that a man shall not avail himself of another's skill, labour, and expense by copying the written product thereof. To quote the language of Mr. Justice North in another case, "For the purposes of their own profit they desire to reap where they have not sown, and to take advantage of the labour and expenditure of the plaintiffs in procuring news, for the purpose of saving labour and expense to themselves." For these reasons I agree with my noble and learned friend in thinking that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and that of Mr. Justice North restored.

LORD JAMES of HERFORD.—My Lords, in this case the appellants as plaintiffs in the suit allege that they are entitled to the copyright in reports which appeared in The Times newspaper of certain speeches made by Lord Rosebery, and they seek to restrain the respondent, the defendant in the suit, from republishing such reports. The facts upon which the suit is founded are not in dispute. Lord Rosebery's speeches being of great interest to the public, reporters representing different journals attended meetings to be addressed by him, and took down the words uttered by him. It may be taken that all of the reporters did their best to report Lord Rosebery's words accurately. The reports of these speeches appearing in The Times newspaper seem to represent a high degree of such accuracy. The respondent has copied these reports verbatim and reproduced them. For the purposes of this case it is admitted that the interests of the proprietors of The Times newspaper and of the reporter may be regarded as one. The question therefore to be decided is whether there is any copyright in the reports of speeches made in public with the object that they should be published? The determination of this question depends upon the construction to be placed upon the provisions of the Copyright Act of 1842. It may be taken that the matter published in the columns of a newspaper is a book within section 2 of that Act, but the plaintiffs in the suit have to establish that the proprietors of The Times or the reporter are the authors of such book within the meaning of section 3. It is not alleged, and it cannot be said, that there is any authorship in the speech itself; that speech was created by the thought of Lord Rosebery, and published by him to the world when he spoke it. The plaintiffs do not claim copyright in the speech itself; but, as stated by Lord Lindley in the Court of Appeal, the report of the speech is something different from and beyond the speech; and the question to be solved is whether this difference represents a something of which any one can be regarded as "the author" within the meaning of the Copyright Act. Whilst the Act supplies no definition of the word "author," and whilst it may be difficult for any judicial authority to give a positive definition of that word, certain considerations controlling the meaning of it seem to be established. A mere copyist of written matter is not an author within the Act, but a translator from one language to another would be so. A person to whom words are dictated for the purpose of being written down is not an author. He is the mere agent or clerk of the person dictating, and requires to possess no art beyond that of knowing how to write. The person dictating takes a share in seeing that the person writing follows the dictation, and makes it his care to give time for the writing to be made. But an "author" may come into existence without producing any original matter of his own. Many instances of the claim to authorship without the production of original matter have been given at the Bar. The compilation of a street directory, the reports of proceedings in Courts of law, and the tables of the times of running of certain railway trains have been held to bring the producers within the word "author," and yet in one sense no original matter can be found in such publications. Still there was a something apart from originality on the one hand and mere mechanical transcribing on the other, which entitled those who gave these works to the world to be regarded as their authors. Now what is it that a reporter does? Is he a mere scribe, does he produce original matter, or does he produce the something I have mentioned which entitles him to be regarded as an author within the Act? I think that from a general point of view a reporter's art represents more than mere transcribing or writing from dictation. To follow so as to take down the words of an ordinary, and certainly of a rapid, speaker is an art requiring considerable training, and does not come within the knowledge of ordinary persons. Even amongst professional reporters many different degrees of skill exist. Some reporters can take down the words of a speaker however rapidly he speaks, others less practised or proficient cannot, as the term is, "keep up with" the rapid speaker. Apart from the dealing with the rapidity of speech, there are some reporters whose ears and thoughts and hands never fail them, and who therefore produce reports of complete accuracy. On the other hand, reporters less skilled may be so deficient in this quality of accuracy as to produce reports which certainly tend to perturb the speakers whom they have endeavoured to report. Thus there seems to be a degree of skill in one class of reporters over the other. Again, one reporter may possess knowledge apart from stenography which may confer upon him the power of producing a report not within the capability of another of the same calling. Supposing a speech were delivered in a language little used, such as Persian or Turkish, only a reporter acquainted with such a language would be able to report it. Does the work resulting from such special knowledge mean nothing? The proprietor of a journal may have paid highly for obtaining a special report of this almost unreportable speech. May he not make a claim for protection against a rival journalist who seeks to make equal use of the report thus obtained? It may also be that the report has been obtained under circumstances of peculiar difficulty on the one hand, or of advantageous conditions on the other. Thus if a reporter attended a meeting of Anarchists intended to be secret and made public their speeches, or if in former times a man had secreted himself in one of the Houses of Parliament and took down the words of different speakers, may it not be contended that the reporters were doing something more than merely transcribing? After taking such matters as these into consideration, I have after some doubt come to the conclusion that a reporter of a speech under the conditions existing in this case is the meritorious producer of the something necessary to constitute him an author within the meaning of the Copyright Act of 1842, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed.

LORD BRAMPTON.—My Lords, the only substantial question in this case is whether the reporters who furnished to The Times the manuscripts containing the reports of Lord Rosebery's five speeches as they were published in that journal were the "authors" of those manuscripts within the meaning of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45). If they were, they were the authors of books within the interpretation clause, section 2, and as such they would have been entitled to the copyrights thereof under section 3, but for the fact that such copyrights have by assignments become vested in the appellants, the proprietors of The Times. The material facts which have led me to the opinion I am about to express are admitted, and may be very briefly stated. On the several occasions when the speeches were delivered reporters for The Times and other newspapers attended by invitation to enable them to compose and write for publication in their respective journals descriptive articles of the occurrences, containing full and accurate reports of the speeches as they were delivered from the lips of the speakers. The reporters who represented The Times, with whom alone I have now to deal, were undoubtedly gentlemen of education, great ability, and long and varied experience in the duties of their vocation. They wrote the descriptive parts of their reports from personal observation. The speeches they took down in shorthand, word for word, transcribed them verbatim in longhand, carefully corrected and revised, and punctuated them, so that when they appeared in the columns of The Times they might, as perfectly as printed words could do, convey to the readers all that was to be seen or heard upon those occasions. From these reports all that appeared in The Times was first published to the world. It is obvious that the preparation of them involved considerable intellectual skill and brain labour, beyond the mere mechanical operation of writing. That the reports so published were "books" within the meaning of the Copyright Act is undisputed; the great contention throughout the case has been whether the reporters were the "authors" of them; for unless they were they could not acquire any copyright in them, the third section of the Act conferring property in the copyright of a book only upon its author and his assigns. Mr. Justice North, before whom the case was first heard, held that although the reporter had no property in the speeches he was entitled to copyright in his report of them. The Court of Appeal reversed his ruling, and in a considered judgment emphatically stated that mere reporters were clearly not authors of what they report, that the Act was passed to protect "authors" not reporters, that a mere publisher of another man's verbal utterances could not acquire a copyright as the author of such publication; and they held "that in order that the first publisher of any composition may acquire the copyright in it he must be the author of what he publishes, or he must derive his right to publish from the author by being the owner of his manuscript, or in some other way." I can find nothing in the Act which compels me to assent to this view. A speech and the report of it are two different things, and the author of the one and the author of the other are presumably two different persons. The author of a speech is the author of language orally uttered by himself. The author of a report of a speech is the author of a writing containing the substance, or the words, of that speech. The speech must precede the report of it. The oral speech is not a "book"; the written report is. The book is the subject of copyright under section 3 and the property in such copyright in a book is in its author. I am not concerned to-day in considering how and by what means the author of a speech can acquire the copyright and may preserve for himself the sole right to publish in print, or in writing, a report of it; for at no time has Lord Rosebery either by word or action indicated any desire or intention to do so. In making the speeches in question he published them freely and without placing any restraint upon those who heard him from making whatever use they could lawfully make of his words as they came from his mouth. Of course, if no reporters had been present, or if, though present, none had taken down his lordship's utterances, those utterances must have remained unrecorded and no question of copyright could have arisen, for there would have been no subject of copyright in existence; but let me suppose that, though unrecorded at the time, one of the hearers with a peculiarly retentive and accurate memory had some time afterwards from that unaided memory written a correct and verbatim report of the speeches, would he not have been the author of that report, and might he not have claimed the copyright of it, the product of his own mental effort of memory? Or suppose the speaker had before delivering his speech composed and written out what he intended to say, and in speaking, refreshing his memory as to his intentions by that which he had written, had given oral utterance to every word of it, and then presented his manuscript to a friend, as a gift, with permission to publish it as he thought fit, could not that friend claim the copyright of such publication? What real difference is there between a manuscript so obtained and a book made by writing down on the spot the words then freely uttered and given by the speaker to any reporter present who chose to record them expressly for the purpose of publication in the journal he represented? Of course, a person who merely writes an article from the dictation and as the servant of another can claim no property in what he so writes, for that writing belongs to his employer; but that is not this case. I do not agree that the question of the authorship of a book depends upon the literary quality of it. If a person chooses (and many do) to compose and write a volume devoid of the faintest spark of literary or other merit I see no legal reason why he should not, if he desires, become the first publisher of it, and register his copyright, worthless and insignificant as it would be. The statute has prescribed no standard of merit in a book as a condition to entitle its author to become the proprietor of copyright in it; and, even if such standard were prescribed, I should think the merits of the book ought to be determined having regard to the contents of the book itself, without inquiring as to whether any of the component parts of it emanated from the brain of some person other than the author of the book. Of course, if an author of a book is unscrupulous enough to pirate and include in it the protected composition of another, no registration could give him property in that which he had stolen, or protect him against an action for his piracy. In this case the reporter, without encroaching upon the right of any one, has become the first publisher of "books" containing descriptive reports of the occurrences on the several occasions when Lord Rosebery's speeches were made. Nobody can say that such reports could be complete unless the speeches themselves were incorporated in them in some form or other; and if they were rightfully so incorporated it cannot, I think, be denied that in such report the speech, added to the descriptive passages, formed one book and one book only. True it is that the reporter was not the author of the speech, but he was the composer and author of the book. Without his brain and handiwork the book would never have had existence, and the words of Lord Rosebery would have remained unrecorded save in the memories of the comparatively few who were present on those occasions. In the descriptive passages of his report the language is his own; and although, as regards the speeches, he has given great value to his work by introducing verbatim the language of Lord Rosebery, he was strictly within his rights in so doing, and was clearly acting with the full sanction of his lordship, in order that, by its publication in The Times, the thousands of the readers of that journal might be truthfully and accurately informed of those intellectual and interesting utterances of Lord Rosebery which they had not been privileged to hear. I think, for the reasons I have given, that the proprietors of The Times have copyright in the articles and reports in question. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed, and the decision of Mr. Justice North restored, with costs.

LORD ROBERTSON.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion as the Court of Appeal. The book published by the respondents, against which injunction is sought, consists of verbatim reports of certain speeches of Lord Rosebery's. Prefixed to each speech there is a short note, explaining the occasion of the speech; but those notes are not taken from The Times. All that is taken from The Times consists of the words spoken by Lord Rosebery, without addition or subtraction. Now, it is important to observe that the Court of Appeal have not decided, as an abstract proposition, that no report can be copyright of the reporter. There are reports and reports. Your Lordships remember how, in his reports of the Parliamentary debates, Dr. Johnson, according to his own avowal, "took care that the Whig dogs should not have the best of it," and so largely do they bear the impress of the so-called reporter that in some editions those Parliamentary debates are included in Johnson's works. Take another kind of report, not extinct in our own times. Some extempore speakers do not speak in sentences, but in fragments of sentences, and yet next morning there appears, constructed out of those disiecta membra, a coherent and grammatical discussion of the subject. I can conceive cases where in truth the intellectual and literary contribution of the reporter may be as substantial as that of the speaker. But I mention such cases in order to say that we have here nothing of the sort. The case before your Lordships is a case of shorthand reporting, pure and simple. It so happens that Lord Rosebery's speeches are so conceived and expressed as to require on the part of the reporter nothing but literal accuracy in order to their presentation to the public as literary compositions. In so saying I am in no way disparaging the gifts of the shorthand writer, and, as the nature of his work is really of the essence of the present controversy, I dwell on it for a moment. The reporters of The Times are educated gentlemen, as are many other practitioners of the art of stenography, while there are reporters less highly equipped in knowledge of literature and history. What is the difference between the educated and the less educated in reporting, let us say, Lord Rosebery? An allusion or a quotation is made by the speaker, more recondite or less hackneyed than those which do daily duty on the platform—the educated reporter recognizes the allusion or the quotation and simply takes it faithfully down; the other reporter misses the point and tries to supply it himself and the passage is blundered. Or a phrase or nuance occurs, finer or more exquisite than the parlance of paragraphs; by the one man it is appreciated and exactly taken down, by the other it is rejected as incredible and is supplanted by some banality, foreign to the diction of the speaker, but congenial to that of his reporter. Now the inference I draw from all this is that the contribution which education enables the good reporter to make to the speech is of a purely negative kind—he does not interfere, but faithfully acts as conduit. In fact the merit of the reports now before your Lordships is that they present the speaker's thoughts untinged by the slightest trace or colour of the reporter's mind. These observations apply to the stage of taking down in shorthand what the speaker says. The next stage, copying out the notes, is purely clerical work. Now, I recognize the skill of the stenographer, I find that, for the reasons which I have mentioned, an educated man is the better qualified to be a faithful reporter. But I fail entirely to see how, in the widest sense of the term "author," we are in the region of authorship. A very striking illustration of the subject is obtained by remembering who, or rather what, is the rival of a good stenographer—it is the phonograph. In reporting the kind of speech of which I am speaking—the speech of allusion and of phrase—the phonograph, which has no literary taste, good or bad, and no intellect, great or small, will record Lord Rosebery's speeches better than the best of reporters. The appellants think that if the owner of a phonograph publishes the speech as taken down by the phonograph he is the author of the report and entitled to copyright. I should have thought (and think) this a reductio ad absurdum of the whole argument of the appellants. When it is remembered that there is no manner of composition, as the term is generally used, even in the sense of arrangement, by a shorthand reporter, I find it difficult to understand what attribute of an author belongs to him. Some of the judicial decisions have indeed applied the words of the Act to very pedestrian efforts of the mind. But, although time-tables and furniture catalogues are not great things, there has been structure and arrangement on the part of the maker. I think that the recording by stenography the words of another is in a different region from the making up a time-table. I do not say it is lower or higher, but in a different plane, because there is no construction. Upon this clear principle I reconcile those decisions with the judgment which I am now supporting. Nor do I consider it legitimate to justify a novel application of the Copyright Act by treating its most extreme applications as if they represented its normal scope. I do not think that a sound method of dealing with any statute. I prefer the tone and the words of my noble and learned friend Lord Davey in 1894, when, in Hollinrake's case, he thought that the preamble of the Act might be usefully referred to for the purpose of ascertaining the class of works it was intended to protect. The word "author," occurring as it does, not in the preamble, but in the enacting section, seems to me to present a criterion consistent with the widest application of the Act to all who can claim, as embodying their own thought whether humble or lofty, the letterpress of which they assert the authorship. The fact that the man who speaks in public is not a competitor with the reporter for copyright has not the slightest effect in altering the intellectual relation of the reporter to the words of the speech, nor does it render less inappropriate the result of holding the statute to confer on the stenographer a reward which has no relation whatever to his art. For these reasons I am unable to concur in the judgment proposed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Before putting the question from the woolsack, I must mention to counsel something that is involved in the proposition that Mr. Justice North's judgment is to be restored. If I understand rightly, it was an interim injunction, but there was an agreement between the parties that it should be treated as if it was the hearing of the cause.

MR. BIRRELL.—When we came into the Appeal Court.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—Not till then?

MR. BIRRELL.—No.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—The result will be simply this—that the judgment the Court will pronounce will be that there shall be a perpetual injunction. That is all.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS V. PINNEY.*

Vendor and purchaser—Glebe lands—Sale by Vicar—Purchase by trustee of settled estates—Purchase not authorized by the trust—Non-payment of principal moneys—Vendor's lien.
Decision of Byrne, J. ([1899] 2 Ch., 729), affirmed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne which was reported in The Times of

*Reported by W. L. CABELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

August 14 last year. By a contract made in 1873 between the then incumbent of the vicarage of Coleshill, Warwickshire, G. Digby Wingfield Digby (the patron of the living), the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and R. B. Wingfield Baker, described as the surviving trustee of the will and codicils of Edward, Earl Digby, the incumbent, in pursuance of the powers conferred by the Ecclesiastical Leasing Acts, 1842 and 1858, with the consent of G. Digby Wingfield Digby as patron, and with the approval of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, agreed to sell, and R. B. Wingfield Baker, with the consent of G. Digby Wingfield Digby as tenant for life of the estates settled by the will of Earl Digby, agreed to purchase, the glebe lands of the vicarage for £24,963. It was agreed that R. B. Wingfield Baker should pay the purchase-money into the Bank of England on or before September 29, 1874, at which time the purchase should be completed and a conveyance executed; but if, from any cause except the wilful default of the vendor, the purchase should not be then completed, the purchaser should pay interest at 4 per cent. until completion, but that condition was to be without prejudice to the vendor's right to enforce completion or to any of his rights under the contract and to rescind the contract. Under the will of Earl Digby the settled estates were limited to G. D. Wingfield Digby for life, with remainder to his sons successively in tail male, with remainder to J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 1) for life, with remainder to J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2) for life, with remainder to the sons of J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2) successively in tail male, with remainders over. By the will residuary personalty was given on similar limitations and upon trusts for investment in the purchase of land with the approbation of the tenant for life. On the death of the testator in 1856 without issue, G. D. Wingfield Digby entered into possession of the settled estates, and on the marriage of J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2) he covenanted to exercise a power of creating portions under the testator's will in favour of younger children to the extent of £20,000. J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 1) died in 1878, and R. B. Wingfield Digby in 1880. In 1881 a disentailing deed was executed, to which G. D. Wingfield Digby, J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2), and J. K. Digby, the eldest son of J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2), were parties. By the recitals of this deed it appeared that the trustees had invested the greater part of the residuary personalty, and that a considerable part of the remainder had been advanced for the purposes of a fund known as the "Digby Estate Improvement Fund" and expended generally on the improvement of the estates. Repayment of part of that sum, amounting to £158,000, was secured by policies of assurance on the life of the tenant for life. The disentailing deed operated on all the estates, including the hereditaments settled by the will, and therefore also the glebe lands comprised in the contract of 1873, and assured them, subject and without prejudice to the uses and estates limited by the will preceding the estate in tail male or the estates tail of J. K. Digby and the powers annexed or exercisable during the continuance thereof, to such uses as G. D. Wingfield Digby, J. D. Wingfield Digby (No. 2), and J. K. Digby should jointly appoint. The £158,000 secured by the policies and any other money subject to be laid out in the purchase of land secured thereby were also disentailed and assured so as to be subject to a similar power of joint appointment as the land. By a re-settlement made in 1882 the joint power was executed and all the settled lands were settled to uses whereunder J. D. Wingfield Digby and J. K. Digby were created successively tenants for life, with remainders in strict settlement. By deeds of assignment and re-settlement of even date the policies for £158,000 and all moneys payable thereunder were, subject to a mortgage for £30,000 created in 1872, vested in the defendants, Adderley and Madan, in trust for the younger children of J. D. Wingfield Digby, with a proviso that the sums appointed should be taken in satisfaction of the £20,000 covenanted to be appointed by J. D. Wingfield Digby's marriage settlement, and with a proviso that the receipts of the children should operate to discharge the settled estates from their proportions of the £20,000. The whole of the £158,000 secured by the policies had been distributed by the trustees, Adderley and Madan. No part of the purchase money of £24,963 was ever paid, nor had the conveyance been executed, but the successive tenants for life, while in possession, had paid to the vicar of Coleshill interest at 4 per cent. per annum, but recently 3½ per cent. only, upon the purchase money. The value of the lands comprised in the contract had considerably decreased. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1896 brought the present action, claiming specific performance of the agreement of 1873, or in the alternative that they were entitled to their vendors' lien on the land and for its enforcement by sale. The defendants were the incumbent Pinney; J. K. D. Wingfield Digby, tenant for life of the settled real estate; the legal personal representatives of R. B. Wingfield Baker, the purchasing trustee; and Adderley and Madan, the trustees of the settlement of 1882. It was admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to their vendors' lien. After the judgment of Mr. Justice Byrne the tenant in tail was added as a defendant. Mr. Justice Byrne held that the plaintiffs were entitled to enforce their vendors' lien for unpaid purchase money upon the land sold, but that they were not entitled to any other remedy against the defendants. As, however, the land is now worth much less than the purchase money fixed by the contract, the lien would not extend to the full amount of the plaintiffs' claim. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Levett, Q.C., and Mr. Pochin were for the plaintiffs; Mr. Neville, Q.C., and Mr. Norton, Q.C., were for the present tenant for life and the tenant in tail of the settled estates; Mr. T. H. Carson was for the vicar; Mr. Sargent was for the trustees of the re-settlement of the estates; Mr. Brinton was for the personal representative of the surviving trustee of Earl Digby's will.

The COURT affirmed the decision.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the Court had been asked to assume for the purposes of the case that the contract for the purchase of the land was made by the trustee in pursuance of the power to invest in land contained in the will of Earl Digby, and that the trustee intended to enter into the contract in exercise of that power and to apply part of Earl Digby's personal estate in payment of the purchase money. In fact, a large part of the personal estate had been already advanced on the security of some policies of assurance on the life of the tenant for life. His Lordship was by no means satisfied that the contract was entered into by the trustee in the exercise of the power and in the discharge of his duty under that power. The foundation of the plaintiffs' claim was that the trustee could have been compelled to pay the money out of the personal estate, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to enforce the rights of unpaid vendors against the defendants who were entitled to the settled estates. In his Lordship's opinion, this contract was not one in which the vendors were entitled to say that, because the land had become part of the settled estates, they had a right, not only to enforce a lien on the land for unpaid purchase money, but also to have the purchase money made good out of the whole settled property. His Lordship came to the conclusion that the decision of Mr. Justice Byrne was right.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY said that the real question was who was to bear the loss resulting from the very serious depreciation in the value of this land. The first question was whether there was a valid purchase of this land for the settled estates. In his Lordship's opinion there was not, and, if so, the right of the trustee to be indemnified never arose. It did not appear that when the contract was entered into the trustee had a farthing of the personal estate under his control for the purpose of being invested. The personal estate had been advanced by way of loan, and was to be repaid out of the proceeds of some policies of insurance which would not fall in until the death of the tenant for life. There were no means of getting the money until that time. Till then the money would not be available for the purchase of land or any other purpose. If, in entering into the contract, the trustee committed a breach of trust, he did not act from any improper motive. He was, no doubt, endeavouring to do his best for the persons interested. But he could not possibly tell what the value of the land would be at the time when he would have the money to pay for it, and such a speculative purchase was not authorized by the trust. Consequently the trustee had no right to an indemnity against the settled estates, and the plaintiffs could have no right of subrogation, and they had no right against the defendants. His Lordship based his judgment on this—that there never was a contract for purchase which was valid as against the settled estates.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS concurred.

BARNETT V. HOWARD—UNION BANK OF LONDON, GARNISHEES.*

Married Woman—Separate estate—Restraint against anticipation—Contract—Married Women's Property Act, 1893.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Bucknill's at chambers, discharging a garnishee order made by the Master. The facts as stated, so far as material, were as follows:—The defendant was a lady who was married in 1894, and on October 8, 1896, while still a married woman, she incurred a contractual liability in respect of which the judgment hereinafter set out was obtained against her. On January 22, 1900, a decree for dissolution of the marriage was made absolute. In April, 1900, the writ in the present action was issued. On June 12, 1900, judgment under Order 14 was obtained against her for £261 9s. 2d. The judgment was in the following form:—"The defendant, G. A. Howard, having appeared to the writ of summons herein, and the plaintiff having by order of Master Pollock, dated June 11, 1900, obtained leave to sign judgment under the rules of the Supreme Court, Order 14, r. 1, for the amount endorsed on the writ with interest, if any, and costs to be taxed, and such order directing that as regards the said G. A. Howard execution be limited to such property as during her coverture was the defendant's separate estate not subject to any restraint against anticipation, unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1892, the property shall be liable to such execution notwithstanding such restriction, and to any property which she may after October 8, 1896 (being the date when she entered into the contracts sued on), while discoverable be possessed of or entitled to, provided that nothing in that order contained should render available to satisfy the said sum and costs, or any part thereof, any separate property which at the said time of entering into the said contracts or thereafter she was or may be restrained from anticipating; it is this day adjudged that the plaintiff recover against the defendant £261 9s. 2d. and costs to be taxed, such sum and costs to be payable out of her separate property as hereinafter mentioned, and not otherwise; and it is ordered that execution hereon against the said G. A. Howard be limited to such property as during her coverture was the defendant's separate estate not subject to any restraint against anticipation, unless by reason of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1892, the property shall be liable to such execution notwithstanding such restriction, and to any property which she may after October 8, 1896 (being the date when she entered into the contracts sued on), while discoverable be possessed of or entitled to, provided that nothing in this judgment contained shall render available to satisfy the said sum and costs, or any part thereof, any separate property which at the said time of entering into the said contracts or thereafter she was or may be restrained from anticipating." In May, 1900, two sums amounting together to the sum of £375 were paid into the defendant's account at the Union Bank of London by her trustees. This sum represented income from property which had become vested before October, 1896, in trustees upon trust for the defendant for her life, subject to a restraint against anticipation. It was admitted that part of the above sum represented income which had accrued due before the decree absolute for dissolution of marriage, and part since the decree absolute. On June 30, 1900, the plaintiff obtained a garnishee order nisi, attaching the balance of this sum—namely, £88 0s. 2d., in the bank, and of Mr. Justice Bucknill, overruling the order of the Master, discharged the order nisi. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Buckmaster appeared for the plaintiff: Mr. Danckwerts, Q.C., and Mr. Rayner Goddard appeared for the defendant and the garnishees.

The COURT dismissed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH said that the question turned upon the true construction of section 1 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893. The judgment against this lady was drawn up as regards the first part in the form given in "Scott v. Morley" (20 Q.B.D., 130), and as regards the last part in order to carry out section 1 of the Act of 1893. At the date of the contracts sued upon the defendant was entitled to separate property upon which there was a fetter against anticipation. In construing the section, his Lordship protested against going beyond the ordinary meaning of the language used. Section 1 of the Act of 1893 might be described as passed partly for the benefit of creditors and partly not. The section enacted that "every contract hereafter entered into by a married woman, otherwise than as agent, (a) shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property whether she is or is not in fact possessed of or entitled to any separate property at the time when she enters into such contract." That clause was clearly in favour of creditors. Then came clause (b):—"Shall bind all separate property which she may at that time or thereafter be possessed of or entitled to." That clause was also in favour of creditors. Up to the present not a word was said about separate property which a married woman was restrained from anticipating. The words "at that time" clearly referred to the time when she entered into the contract. Then came clause (c):—"Shall also be enforceable by process of law against all property which she may thereafter while discoverable be possessed of or entitled to." That clause was also in favour of creditors. If the section had stopped there there would have been no difficulty in the way of the plaintiff. But a proviso followed. He (the Lord Justice) could not construe the proviso as the learned counsel for the plaintiff had asked the Court to do. It ran as follows:—"Provided that nothing in this section contained shall render available to satisfy any liability or obligation arising out of such contract any separate property which at that time or thereafter she is restrained from anticipating." It was said that the "separate property" ceased to be such when the defendant ceased to be a married woman. The words "at that time" were the material words. They meant at the time when she entered into the contract—namely, October 8, 1896. At that time she was restrained from anticipating this property. The case fell within the clear words of the proviso. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS said that he did not differ from the judgment just pronounced, but he was far from saying that the words of the section were clear. He would first say that he did not agree with the contention for the plaintiff as to the meaning of the words "separate property" in the section. The Court could only adopt that contention if they said that the Legislature intended that after the coverture had come to an end the judgment should be in the same form as against a single woman. With regard to the construction of the section, he wished to notice one or two things. The proviso at the end was not limited to clause (c), but was a proviso upon the whole section. That being so, two expressions were used throughout the section—namely, "separate property" and "property." The proviso spoke of "any separate property." One looked back into the section to see what had been dealt with as separate property, and one found that expression used in clauses (a) and (b). In clause (c) the words "separate property" did not occur. He had no doubt that the words in the proviso, "at that time or thereafter," had the same meaning as in clause (b). If one looked at clause (b), it seemed to him to be plain that these clauses were not meant to have any reference to separate property, which, by reason of its receipt by the married woman, had been freed from the restraint against anticipation. A serious doubt was raised in his mind whether they ought to give such a meaning to the proviso as to affect separate property fettered by a restraint against anticipation when the property had been actually received by the married woman.

BRIGHT V. KILLEY.*

Practice—Staying proceedings—O. 19, r. 27.

On an application to stay proceedings as frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court, the Judge has no jurisdiction to impose conditions on his assent to or refusal of the application.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Bucknill's at Chambers. The action was brought to set aside a judgment for £5,000. Upon the application of the defendant the learned Judge ordered the statement of claim to be struck out and the action stayed with costs, unless the plaintiff paid the sum of £5,000 into Court or gave security for the same to the satisfaction of the Master within one month. The case is only reported on account of the form of the order.

Mr. Cooper Willis, Q.C., and Mr. Ward Coldridge appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Buckmaster appeared for the defendant.

"Wyatt v. Palmer" ([1899] 2 Q.B., 106) was referred to.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH, after saying that the issue in dispute in the action had not been tried before, and that the Court should not, in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, stay the action as being frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court, said that the learned Judge had allowed the plaintiff to continue the action if he paid £5,000 into Court or gave security for that amount. In other words, the Judge thought that the action should be stayed, but he said that he would not stay it if the plaintiff complied with the above condition. "Wyatt v. Palmer" was not an authority for saying that such a condition could be imposed upon an application to the Court either to exercise its inherent jurisdiction to stay the action or to act under Order 19, r. 27. The Judge at Chambers had only jurisdiction to say whether or not the action was frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court. If it was, the action should be stayed, and if it was not, the action should go on. The appeal must be allowed with costs in any event.

LORD JUSTICE VAUGHAN WILLIAMS concurred.

IN RE DASH, DECEASED—THE SOLICITOR TO THE TREASURY V. LEWIS.*

Donatio mortis causa—Deposit note—Validity of gift.

Held, in the circumstances of the case, that there was no valid donatio mortis causa.

The plaintiff in this action was the legal personal representative of Mrs. Eliza Dash, widow, who died intestate at Bristol on January 31, 1899. The object of the action was to recover from the defendant Edwin Thomas Lewis property of the deceased of very considerable amount, to which he claimed to be entitled by virtue of a donatio mortis causa made to him by the intestate shortly before her death. The other defendants were the representatives of certain charitable institutions who claimed to be beneficially interested in the property so given to Mr. Lewis. The question to be determined was whether the alleged donatio mortis causa was valid in law. The circumstances in which the alleged gift took place will be found stated in his Lordship's judgment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir E. Carson) and Mr. Ingle Joyce appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Christopher James for the defendant Lewis; and Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Buckmaster for three of the charities interested, who had been made parties to the action.

MR. JUSTICE STIRLING, in delivering his reserved judgment, after stating the nature of the question, said:—Mrs. Dash, the intestate, was born about 1812. She was twice married, and became a widow for the second time about 20 years ago. She derived from her second husband, Mr. John Dash, a considerable fortune. The defendant, Mr. Lewis, whose integrity and straightforwardness are beyond question, realised her husband's property, and afterwards managed her affairs for her. He was in the habit of seeing her once a week, generally on Thursday evenings. He stated that he had on many occasions urged her to make a will, but she always refused; one reason being that she objected to the payment of duty and another that she did not wish any one to know her means. Some months before her death she said to Mr. Lewis that she had been thinking over how she would like her property disposed of, and asked him to "jot it down." He proceeded to do so, but after a time she said she would go no further, and Mr. Lewis went away and left the paper with her. Thus matters stood on Thursday, January 26, when Mr. Lewis called on her and found her very ill. What took place was thus stated by him in a written statement, of which a copy was furnished to the plaintiff:—"I went there on the Thursday evening and found her very unwell. She then said 'I think you had better go on with what we were talking about the other night.' She produced the bit of notepaper, on which I had previously made a memo. of amounts which she wished to give. She then said, 'You will please to write down what I tell you,' I said, 'It will be of no use Mrs. Dash.' She said, 'Don't tell me that. If I give you everything you can certainly do what I tell you with it.' I said, 'How am I to begin?' She said, 'You know what to say. I give you everything subject to your settling my affairs, seeing to my burial, and paying the amounts to the charities and persons I name.' Before writing out the paper I said, 'I don't know what to say. You ought to have a solicitor here.' 'No,' she said, 'I am going to give you everything if you promise me (and I am sure if you promise me you will fulfil) that you will do what I tell you.' After this I wrote out on a bit of paper the heading in my own words and copied the amounts and names from the memos. previously made by me. She made her cross, and I wrote her name on the paper after she had made the cross." The paper there referred to was in these terms:—"40, Horsfield-road, Bristol, Jan. 26, 1899.—I, Eliza Dash, residing at the above address, do give the whole of my property, whatever it may consist of at the time of my decease, to Edwin Thomas Lewis, of Upton-lodge, Cotham-park, Bristol, upon the distinct promise that he will settle up my affairs and see to my burial, and will also give the following sums to the charities and persons named." Then followed a list of charities and individuals, with sums of money set opposite their names, including Muller's Orphan Asylum, £10,000; Hook's Mill Orphan Asylum, £5,000; Dr. Barnardo's Homes, Stepney, London, £3,000; and many others. Mr. Lewis's statement then proceeded:—"She told me where to find her securities. She said, 'Go upstairs into the back room and in a basket near the bedside you will find the deposit note and Usher's shares.' There were two keys on the table. She gave me one. I took it and went upstairs. I found the door locked, and unlocked it. I lifted up some clothes from the top of the basket and found a banker's deposit note for £30,000 and a certificate for 200 £5 preference shares in Usher's Brewery Company. There were two or three small parcels done up in paper. I have since found they were gold. She had particularly mentioned the deposit note and Usher's shares. I brought down the deposit note and the share certificate and gave them to her. She had them in her hands. She handed them back to me and said, 'You take charge of them. If I get better of course you will bring them back.' " Mr. Lewis saw her again on January 30, when he called between 5 and 6. He went again on the following day. (His Lordship then again referred to the defendant's statement, in which he gave a further account of other property of the deceased's which had come to his hands, including a sum of £300 in notes and some gold and silver.) She died (continued his Lordship) on the same evening about 10 45. It was decided in "Hills v. Hills" (8 M. and W., 401) that a gift may be good as a donatio mortis causa although it is coupled with a trust or condition that the donee shall provide the funeral of the donor, but, as is pointed out by Parke, B., such a circumstance affords "a strong argument that the deceased did not intend to make a donatio mortis causa, but, as it were, to make the defendant her executor under a nuncupative will." That is one mode of formulating the question which arises in such cases. It was put to the jury in another way by the learned Judge who tried the case of "Hills v. Hills" (Lord Cranworth)—viz., "whether it was intended as an absolute gift to the defendant after the death of the intestate or whether she intended to retain a control over the property during her life." I understand that to refer to what is established law—viz., that in order to constitute a good donatio mortis causa the donor must not merely part with the possession of, but also with the dominion over, the thing given; see "Hawkins v. Blewett" (2 Rep. N.C.C., 663); "Riddell v. Dobree" (10 Sim., 241). In determining such a question all the circumstances must be taken into consideration. The case for the defendant is strongest with reference to the deposit note, and that I proceed to consider. According to the written statement of Mr. Lewis, Mrs. Dash more than once stated her intention to give him everything. She directed him to write down what she told him; he said it would be of no use. She then said, "Do not tell me that; if I give you everything you can certainly do what I tell you with it." He agreed to write, and asked her how he was to begin. She said, "You know what to say. I give you everything if you promise me, and I am sure if you promise me you will fulfil, that you will do what I tell you." Her intention therefore being to give everything, she could not mean to divest herself of everything at the moment when she called on him to record her wishes. That is made perfectly clear in the written document, which I regard as of the greatest importance, as being a formal contemporary record of what was intended to be done. It begins:—"I . . . do give the whole of my property, whatever it may consist of at the time of my death." Over all that property therefore she intended during her life to retain a power of disposition. Further the document seems to me to be distinctly of a testamentary character. In substance it contains directions for payment of debts and funeral expenses and legacies. After the paper was written and signed by a cross she directed Mr. Lewis to a place where he would find the deposit note. Upon his return she took it from him and handed it back to him, saying, "You take charge of it; if I get better of course you will bring it back"; to which is added, "If I do not you will know what to do with the money." That language might be used so as to create a donatio mortis causa; but it must, as I conceive, be interpreted in connexion with what had previously taken place. In my judgment Mrs. Dash meant that Mr. Lewis was to take charge of the note and deal with it simply as part of that which she meant to dispose of as from her death, and over which she showed her intention to reserve dominion during her life. The reference to the note being brought back if she recovered does not seem to me to exclude such dominion; it only shows that she did not at the time consider that she was likely to exercise it. This is I think shown by the additional statement made by the deceased to Mr. Lewis—viz., "If I do not get better you will know what to do with the money," referring, as Mr. Lewis admitted, to the document of January 26. In my opinion, therefore, there was no valid donatio mortis causa of the deposit note; and, as the gift fails as to that, it a fortiori fails as to the other subjects of disposition.

BROWNE V. PETO.*

Lease of mansion-house and right of shooting over land—Occupation lease—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 41), ss. 2, 18.

A mortgagor in possession of a furnished mansion-house and of lands let to tenants granted a lease of the mansion-house, together with the furniture therein, and the right of shooting over the lands.

Held, that the lease was valid as an "occupation lease" under s. 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Decision of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 131; [1900] 1 Q.B., 346), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, reported ante, p. 131; ([1900] 1 Q.B., 346). The plaintiff, Alexander Browne, claimed possession of Knowlton Court and 45 acres of land, parcel of the Knowlton estate, near Dover, in the county of Kent, held by the defendant under a lease granted on November 26, 1890. Notice to quit expiring on March 25, 1899, had been given on February 21, 1898. The defendant contended that under his lease he was entitled to remain in possession until the year 1904.

The questions in the case were—first, whether this lease was binding on the plaintiff; secondly, whether the plaintiff had so conducted himself as to become bound by its terms; and, thirdly, whether, if not, the notice to quit was given by the person legally entitled to give such notice. The material facts were shortly as follows:—In the year 1887 Captain L. N. H. D'Aeth mortgaged Knowlton Court and the Knowlton estate to three persons, trustees of the estate of Henry Forman, deceased, to secure a sum of £30,000 and further advances. Captain D'Aeth, being mortgagor in possession, granted to the defendant a lease of Knowlton Court mansion-house, 45 acres of the Knowlton estate, eight acres of meadow land, and the right of shooting and sporting over the Knowlton estate, for a term of 14 years from March 25, 1890, at the yearly rents of £315 10s. for the mansion-house, furniture, and sporting rights, £55 for the 45 acres, and £13 for the meadow land. There was a covenant by the tenant to spend £746 18s. 6d. on the property in internal repairs, which sum he was to be allowed to deduct from the rent at the rate of £50 each quarter. The tenant also covenanted to keep the interior and also the furniture in good repair, and it was provided that the tenant should not be entitled to require the lessor to do any internal repairs unless the same should be rendered necessary by the neglect of the lessor to keep the outside in repair. The lessor covenanted to do the outside repairs. There were provisions for the termination of the lease in certain events, and also for re-entry in case of breach of the lessee's covenants. The furniture in the mansion, and let therewith, was stated to be of the value of £1,100. The defendant was in possession under this lease when the notice to quit was served upon him. In April, 1891, after the mortgagees had notice of the lease they made a further advance of £2,500. In January, 1893, the estate of Henry Forman, deceased, was resettled and conveyed to trustees to the use of A. H. Browne, father of the plaintiff, for life, after his death to the use of the trustees for a term of 1,000 years to secure a jointure to the widow of A. H. Browne, and subject thereto to the use of the plaintiff for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail. In 1894 the interest under the mortgage was falling into arrear, and on September 23, 1896, the interest being still in arrear, proceedings for foreclosure were commenced, which resulted in a foreclosure decree made on November 11, 1896. In December, 1896, the trustees repudiated the lease, but the defendant insisted on his rights under it. He regularly paid rent to and got receipts from the trustees of the resettlement and not the tenant for life, and correspondence passed between the defendant and the solicitors to the trustees referring to the repairs to be done under the lease. On June 1, 1897, a summons was taken out in the Chancery Division before Mr. Justice Stirling, who made an order that the mortgagees should convey Knowlton Court and the Knowlton estate to the trustees of the resettlement of January 18, 1893, to the uses and upon the trusts declared concerning the freehold hereditaments therein comprised. In pursuance of this order the mortgagees conveyed Knowlton Court and the Knowlton estate to one Gray to the use of A. H. Browne for life, then to the use of the trustees of the resettlement for a term of 1,000 years, and subject thereto to the use of the plaintiff for life. On February 21, 1898, a notice to quit was served on the defendant in the following terms:—"To William Herbert Peto, of Knowlton Court, near Dover, in the county of Kent, Esquire,—I, the undersigned Charles Dorman, of 23, Essex-street, Strand, in the county of London, as the agent for and on behalf of your landlord, A. H. Browne, hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up possession of Knowlton Court and the premises above mentioned, including the right of shooting, on the 25th day of March, 1899, or at the expiration of the year of your tenancy, which will expire at or next after the end of one half-year from the time of your being served with this notice.—CHARLES DORMAN." On April 11, 1898, Mr. A. H. Browne died. The plaintiff became tenant in tail in possession, and the notice to quit expiring, he issued the writ in this action for possession. Mr. Justice Bigham held that the lease was valid as against the mortgagees under section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and that, therefore, the defendant was not a mere yearly tenant. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. T. R. Warrington, Q.C. (Mr. Morton Smith with them) appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. R. M. Bray, Q.C., and Mr. J. R. Atkin appeared for the defendant.

The COURT, having taken time to consider, delivered judgment dismissing the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE A. L. SMITH read the following judgment:—Upon August 3, 1887, Mr. Lewis Narborough Hughes D'Aeth, who was the owner of the Knowlton-park estate, in the county of Kent, mortgaged it in fee to secure an advance of £30,000. The estate consisted of a furnished mansion-house, stables, and gardens, of some demesne lands, and of agricultural lands of about 1,900 acres in extent. At the time of this mortgage the 1,900 acres were leased to agricultural tenants, the shooting thereon being reserved, as is very commonly the case, to the landlord, Mr. D'Aeth. These shootings were thus severed from the occupation of the agricultural lands and were reserved to the landlord. After this mortgage Mr. D'Aeth was left in possession and enjoyment of the estate by the mortgagees. Upon November 26, 1890—that is, about three years after the mortgage—Mr. D'Aeth, by lease under seal, demised the whole estate, excepting the 1,900 acres (which were then, as before stated, in lease to agricultural tenants), together with the shootings over the 1,900 acres, to the defendant, Mr. Peto, for a term of 14 years from March 25, 1890, at the rental of £383 per annum. The parcels of this lease are as follows. They become, in my opinion, material when considering, as I must do, whether the lease is an occupation lease, so as to come within the meaning of section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The parcels are, first, the mansion-house, with stables, outbuildings, gardens, and pleasure grounds, containing 11 acres or thereabouts, together with the furniture and fixtures and other effects in the mansion-house; secondly, part of the park opposite the house, containing 45 acres or thereabouts; thirdly, a parcel of meadow land known as Dog-Kennel pasture, containing 8a. 0r. 5p. or thereabouts; fourthly, the right of shooting and sporting over the whole of the lessor's Knowlton estate, containing about 1,900 acres. In my judgment this is a lease of a very common description where a landlord is letting his mansion-house, grounds, and shootings reserved over lands leased to agricultural tenants, and was a well-known lease both before and since the Act of 1881. It is sought by the mortgagees in the present action to eject Mr. Peto some four years before the lease has expired upon the ground that it is not authorized by the Conveyancing Act of 1881. Many points have been taken and argued, but the above point goes to the whole root of the case, and if Mr. Justice Bigham was right in holding as he did that the lease was a valid lease and within the Act, no other points arise. That section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, was passed to enable mortgagors to grant leases as well as mortgagees is plain, and that the section also enacts in express terms what kind of leases mortgagors and mortgagees may grant is equally clear. Now what is it that section 18 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, enacts? To ascertain this I must read section 18 and section 2, the interpretation section, together. It enacts that a mortgagor of land—that is, of tenements and hereditaments whether corporeal or incorporeal—while in possession shall as against every encumbrancer have by virtue of the Act power to make from time to time any such lease of the mortgaged tenements and hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, or any part thereof, as in the section is described and authorized—that is to say, an agricultural or occupation lease for any term not exceeding 21 years, or a building lease for any term not exceeding 99 years. This section also enacts that every such lease shall reserve the best rent that can reasonably be obtained, and shall contain a covenant by the lessee for payment of rent and a condition of re-entry on non-payment thereof. This being the section, the question arises whether the lease of November 26, 1890, is “any such lease of the mortgaged premises,” or, in other words, whether the lease comes within either of the three classes of leases which section 18 of the Act of 1881 expressly authorizes a mortgagor in possession to make—viz., an agricultural lease, an occupation lease, or a building lease. I agree that it is not an agricultural lease, nor is it a building lease; but why is it not an occupation lease? It is a lease by which the mansion-house and the stables and gardens, part of the park, and the incorporeal hereditament, that is the right of shooting, severed as it was when the lease was made from the 1,900 acres, are leased to the defendant for him to occupy. Why is this not an occupation lease? It is a lease, as I have before said, of a very common description, and for myself, if not fettered by authority, I should have had no doubt but that it was an occupation lease. It was argued that a lease of the shooting per se would not be an occupation lease, for that no rent could be reserved, and that no right of re-entry could be reserved; but why could not both of these be reserved by contract? However, I do not decide this point, for what I have to deal with is not a lease of shooting per se, but a lease of a house, stables, and lands, and coupled therewith, and as incident to the occupation thereof, is the right of shooting over the lands already let to other lessees. It is argued on behalf of the mortgagees that the case of “Dayrell v. Hoare” (12 A. and E. 356) shows that the lease of November 26, 1890, is an invalid lease, because, as the lease in that case was held not to be in accordance with the power granted in that case, so the present lease is not in accordance with the power given by section 18 of the Act of 1881. But in my opinion this argument is fallacious, for the two powers are not the same. “Dayrell v. Hoare” was decided in the year 1840, and had of course nothing to do with the Conveyancing Act of 1881 or the express statutory power given thereby to mortgagors to grant leases. The question which was raised in “Dayrell v. Hoare” upon demurrer was whether a lease which demised part of the premises, with the right of shooting over the whole, was a good execution of a power authorizing a lease of “the said several estates, hereditaments, and premises so given and limited”; and it was held that it was not, because that power did not authorize a lease of part of the land with liberty to sport over the rest, Mr. Justice Littledale holding the lease bad on the ground that the entirety in the particular part was not demised, for the demise must be of the whole which covers the part demised, and Mr. Justice Patteson saying that the power does not contemplate the separation of the incident from the land. It is quite true that “Dayrell v. Hoare” was approved of by Sir Nathaniel Lindley in the case of “In re Gladstone” ([1900] 2 Ch., at page 105), where that learned Judge says, “The decision in ‘Dayrell v. Hoare’ was plainly right, both under the old law and the new law—namely, that a power for a tenant for life to lease settled estates or any part or parts thereof did not authorize a lease of part of the land with liberty to sport over the rest. It is clear that a power to lease land cannot enable the donee of the power to impose a burden on the land.” I do not doubt the accuracy of “Dayrell v. Hoare” or of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in “In re Gladstone”; but in the present case the Conveyancing Act expressly enacts that the donee of the power may grant occupation leases for not exceeding 21 years, and that such leases may consist of both corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments. In the present case the right of shooting was severed before the lease in question was granted, and was an incorporeal hereditament the leasing of which the Act of 1881 expressly authorizes. Take the case of a lease by a mortgagor in possession of a mansion-house and grounds together with a right of way over lands leased to agricultural tenants, why would not such a lease be a good occupation lease within the Act? It seems to me that it would, and if so, the lease of the mansion-house and grounds in the present case together with the right of shooting over lands leased to agricultural tenants would equally be within the Act. The case of “Dayrell v. Hoare” is no authority as to the true construction of section 18 of the Act of 1881, and the learned Judges who decided that case and Sir Nathaniel Lindley in “In re Gladstone” were not dealing with what was the meaning of an express power to grant occupation leases of both corporeal and incorporeal hereditaments, which I have to deal with in this case. I can find nothing in the Act of 1881 to show "a contrary intention" so as to exclude the interpretation of the word "land" in section 2 (ii.), as including tenements and hereditaments corporeal and incorporeal, as was sought to be made out by the learned counsel for the mortgagees. In my judgment the lease in the present case is an occupation lease, and falls within section 18 of the Act of 1881, and is a lease which the Act contemplated either a mortgagor or mortgagee should be empowered to grant. For the reasons above I think Mr. Justice Bigham's judgment as to the validity of the lease of November 26, 1890, should be upheld and this appeal dismissed.

*Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COWLEY V. COWLEY.*

Husband and Wife—Dissolution of marriage—Title—Wife continuing to take husband's title.

The Countess Cowley, having been divorced from her husband on her own petition, married again, and continued to use the title of Countess Cowley.

Held, that the Court could not restrain her.

Decision of Gorell Barnes, J. (ante, p. 186; [1900] P., 118). reversed.

This was an appeal against the decision of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, reported ante, p. 186. The question was whether the lady, who was formerly the wife of Earl Cowley, but has been divorced from him on her own petition, and has since married again, is entitled still to describe herself as Countess Cowley, or can be restrained by injunction from so doing. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes granted an injunction restraining her from making use of the title. She appealed against that decision.

Mr. Lawson Walton, Q.C., and Mr. Mark Romer were for the appellant; Mr. Bargrave Deane, Q.C., and Mr. Willock were for Earl Cowley.

The appeal was heard on July 23 and 24 last, when the judgment of the Court was reserved.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

LORD JUSTICE COLLINS read the judgment of the Court as follows:—We have come to the conclusion that the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes in this case cannot be supported. We agree entirely with the learned Judge in his statement of the legal status of the two parties to this litigation. There can be no doubt whatever that Earl Cowley possesses in his title an incorporeal hereditament and that the petitioner has no legal right to the designation Countess Cowley. The authorities which the learned Judge cites fully establish both propositions. See also "In re Sir J. Rivett-Carnac's Will" (30 Ch. D., 136). But it is here, as the learned Judge himself felt, that the real difficulty begins. The application, as is pointed out in the judgment, was made by the respondent, Earl Cowley, in a divorce suit in which his marriage with the petitioner had been dissolved at her instance, and was originally placed on the ground of molestation, upon which it was impossible to support it, and it is admitted that there is no element of malice in the case. The learned Judge, however, dealt with it as though it were a proceeding instituted in the High Court invoking its general jurisdiction to restrain the commission of a legal wrong, and the question is, whether the earl has established such a legal wrong committed against him by the lady who was his wife as to entitle him to the relief which he seeks against her. It is a remarkable thing that, if such a right exists, no precedent can be produced of such relief ever having been sought or obtained, though there must have been many instances in which it was desired. The case is not even one of another person calling himself Earl Cowley, as to which possibly different considerations might arise, and the right claimed by the earl, which stands entirely outside the marital relation, must be put high enough to entitle him to enjoin any one from using without his consent any mere courtesy title derivable under his own—for instance, to restrain his mother, if she married a commoner, from continuing to call herself countess, or his daughter from calling herself lady. These, having no legal justification in either case, would, on the argument, be equally invasions of his right, which, put broadly, is to insist on all such persons being remitted to their strict legal position if without his consent they purport to hold titles as members of his family. In this view, and counsel did not shrink from it, it would be immaterial whether the title was unusually accorded by the courtesy of society or not. Indeed, pushed home to its logical consequences, it would seem to cover a claim to interfere with and restrain the use of a name expressly sanctioned by the Crown, as mentioned in the judgment of Mr. Justice Barnes, and the affidavit of Sir A. W. Woods there referred to. It is strange that no such right has ever been enforced. We have been unable to find, and counsel were unable to point out, any analogous cause of action. The owners of franchises can maintain actions if such franchisees are invaded; for instance, the owner of a market may complain of another being opened, but it must be shown to be near enough, and held on such days, as to interfere with, and be "a nuisance" to, his own. (See Comyn's Digest, Market, C. 2; Action on the case for Nuisance, A). The owner of a freehold office, whose case seems to present the nearest analogy, might have maintained an assize for disseizin, or an action on the case for disturbance. (See Comyn's Digest, Assize B. 2. Action on the case for disturbance, A. 5). But it must have been an office of profit, and there must have been "disseizin" or "disturbance." The acts of the lady in this case fall far short of either the one or the other. Even if trespass could be maintained in respect of such a tenement, we do not think that the acts of the petitioner could by any latitude of expression be described as a "trespass." They at most amount to an assertion, which is true in fact, that she was at one time the wife of Lord Cowley. Section 57 of the Divorce Act, 20 and 21 Vict., c. 85, provides that the parties shall be at liberty to marry again, as though the prior marriage had been dissolved by death. Here the earl's enjoyment of his hereditament is unaffected. He has suffered, so far as we can see, no injuria or damnum cognisable by law. The learned Judge was of opinion that the fact that there was property in the title carried with it the right claimed, thus distinguishing it from the case of names in which there is no property. But, even if the property in the title could found a claim to enjoin any one else from assuming it without proof of other facts, as to which we give no opinion, the title assumed here is not identical, and Earl Cowley's remedy, if any, would seem to be by some form of action on the case, for which we can find no foundation in the facts here proved. But we think the case does not rest merely on the negative evidence of absence of precedent. The existence of the cause of action for jactitation of marriage, and the conditions upon which alone it was maintainable, furnish an argument against the earl. Though a person has in English law no property in his name, his status, whether married or single, is recognized by law, and carries with it certain rights and obligations; yet he could not complain if a woman who was not his wife claimed to be his wife, or enjoin her from so doing, unless she did it maliciously. We are not, of course, dealing with a common law action of defamation, which might conceivably be supported by such facts. Peers were, no doubt, plaintiffs in suits for jactitation as often as other persons, yet, if the right here claimed existed, they had a much simpler remedy. Indeed the case of "Hawke v. Corri" (2 Hag. Con., 280) is a good illustration of this. There, in a suit brought by Lord Hawke for jactitation of marriage, the oppugnant called herself Lady Hawke; she set up a case of marriage which she, however, abandoned, and rested her defence on the fact that Lord Hawke had at one time consented to her bearing the title. This was held by Sir W. Scott to negative malice on her part, and the suit failed. The experienced counsel, arguing for Lord Hawke before Sir W. Scott, are reported to have said, in excusing their client for proceeding after his former conduct to the lady (p. 284):—"A suit for jactitation is the only remedy by which the party could protect himself and his family from such an assumption of a false relation to himself and to them." This is more than negative evidence. The suit for jactitation has itself fallen into disuse, and it seems late in the day to find a substitute for it in the case of titled persons. In the present case the lady has married again, but the right claimed by the earl would, if allowed, be equally effective to restrain her, whether she had married again or not. It is not necessary to consider how far, if at all, social usage would support the lady in continuing to use the style Lady Cowley. The existence of such usage might be material in any proceeding where malice was part of the cause of action, but it seems irrelevant on the present inquiry. We are of opinion that the appeal must be allowed.

Leave was given to appeal to the House of Lords.

THE SACCHARIN CORPORATION V. THE CHEMICAL AND DRUGS COMPANY.*

Patent—Practice—Discovery—Infringement of patent—Accounts of profits—Disclosing names of customers.

In an action the defendants were held to have infringed the plaintiffs' patent, and an account was directed to be taken of all profits made by the defendants by means of articles which infringed the patent. The defendants, upon producing their books for the purpose of taking the accounts, covered up the names of their customers.

Held, that the defendants were bound to disclose the names.

"Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Company" (14 Rep. Pat. Cas., 1) followed.

This was an appeal against a decision of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy's. The action was brought to restrain the infringement by the defendants of the plaintiffs' patent (Monnet's, No. 25,273 of 1894). Mr. Justice North at the trial of the action held that the patent was valid, and that the defendants had infringed it, and he directed an account to be taken of all profits made by the defendants by means of articles which infringed the patent. The question on the present occasion was, whether the defendants, who had produced their books, but had covered up the names of their customers, were bound to disclose those names. Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy was of opinion that it would be oppressive to compel the defendants to disclose the names, especially as this would enable the plaintiffs to take proceedings against the customers. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Moulton, Q.C., and Mr. J. C. Graham were for the plaintiffs; Mr. A. J. Walter and Mr. J. A. Bucknill were for the defendants.

The COURT allowed the appeal, holding that the discovery asked for was relevant, and that it ought not to be refused merely because of the consequences which might possibly result from it. It had been held that discovery of this kind ought to be given in cases in which a plaintiff had elected to take an inquiry as to damages and not an account of profits. In their Lordships' opinion the same principle applied in both cases, and, indeed, the point was covered by the decision of this Court in "Powell v. The Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Company" (14 Rep. Pat. Cas., 1).

IN RE OLYMPIA (LIMITED).*

Company—Winding up—Reconstruction—Sale of assets to new company—Reservation of right to take misfeasance proceedings.

Upon a reconstruction scheme under which the assets of the old company were transferred to a new company and the shareholders of the old company were entitled to take shares, partly paid-up, in the new company, the order sanctioning the scheme reserved the right of the liquidator of the old company to take misfeasance proceedings under sec. 10 of the Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890, against the officers of the old company and others, and the proceeds of any such proceedings were to be held by the liquidator for the benefit of the shareholders of the old company. Misfeasance proceedings were taken and a large sum was recovered.

Held, that this sum belonged to the shareholders of the old company, whether they came in under the scheme or not.

This was a summons to obtain a decision of the Court as to the persons entitled to a portion of the assets of the old company of this name. The old company was incorporated in 1893, and a compulsory winding-up order was made against it in July, 1895. On September 24, 1895, an order was made under the Joint Stock Companies Arrangement Act, 1870, sanctioning a scheme of arrangement under which the assets of the old company were to be transferred to a new company of the same name, the shareholders of the old company being entitled to take shares, partly paid up, in the new company. The order sanctioning the scheme was intitled "in the matter of" the old company, and ordered that "upon the assignment of the undertaking and property of the above-named company to the new company . . . the rights of the official receiver and liquidator to take any proceedings . . . under section 10 of the Companies (Winding Up) Act, 1890, against the officers of the above-named company and others shall be reserved, and the proceeds of any such proceedings shall be held by the official receiver and liquidator for the benefit of the shareholders of the above-named company." Some of the shareholders only of the old company came in under the scheme and took shares in the new company; others did not. Misfeasance proceedings were taken and resulted in the decision in the House of Lords of the case of "Gluckstein v. Barnes" ([1900] A.C., 240), in which the liability of the appellant was finally decided, and under these proceedings a sum of about £8,000 was recovered. In other proceedings or under compromises a further sum of about £14,000 was recovered by the official receiver, and as these sums, together about £21,000, were excepted by the order from the assets passing to the new company and were claimed both by the old shareholders who had not come in under the scheme, and by those who had come in under it on behalf of all the old shareholders, the question which claim was right was now brought before the Court by the official receiver.

Mr. Gore Browne was for the official receiver: Mr. Hammond-Chambers, Q.C., and Mr. F. Cooper Willis were for the shareholders who had not come in under the scheme; and Mr. Donaldson Rawlins, Q.C., and Mr. Kirby for the shareholders who had come in under the scheme.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in delivering judgment, said the order of the Court sanctioning the scheme expressly excepted from the assets transferred the misfeasance assets, and said what their destination was to be—namely, that they were to be held for the benefit of the shareholders of the old company. If it had been meant that the only shareholders who were to take were those who had not come in under the scheme, the order would have said so. There might have been words in the scheme sufficient to control the meaning of the order, but no such words had been pointed out or could be found in it. The scheme contained no language to show that the shares of the old company were to be exchanged or extinguished or cancelled; and it was unnecessary to say whether if any such language had been inserted it would have had any effect. It must be declared that the misfeasance assets belonged to the shareholders of the old company whether coming in under the scheme or not.

THE QUEEN V. BARRY DISTRICT COUNCIL (EX PARTE JONES).*

Local Government—Hackney carriage—Licence——Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), ss. 37, 46.

Mandamus directed to issue to the district council to hear and determine applications for licences for hackney carriages, the Court coming to the conclusion that the district council had in refusing certain licences exercised no discretion in the matter, but had acted in accordance with the terms of an agreement, then cancelled, only to grant licences to two hackney carriage proprietors and their drivers.

In this case cause was shown on behalf of the Barry District Council against a rule nisi for a mandamus, granted on July 20 last, on the relation of John Jones and John Robert Chamings, cab and omnibus proprietors, commanding the Barry District Council to hear and determine the applications of the relators for licences for hackney carriages and omnibuses, and for licences as drivers of hackney carriages and omnibuses. These licences are granted by the council under and by virtue of the Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), section 37 of which provides that the commissioners, now the district council, may from time to time license to ply for hire within the prescribed limits "such number of hackney coaches or carriages of any kind or description adapted to the carriage of persons as they think fit." Section 46 provides that no person shall act as driver of any hackney coach or carriage licensed in pursuance of that Act or the special Act to ply for hire within the prescribed limits without first obtaining a licence from the commissioners, now the district council, for which a fee of 1s. shall be paid. The ground on which the rule nisi was obtained was that the district council on August 14, 1899, entered into an agreement with two proprietors, Paulett and Grimshire, to license no omnibuses, brakes, carriages, or drivers except those belonging to or in the employ of those proprietors, and that, though that agreement had since been cancelled, the council continued in fact to grant licences exclusively to the two favoured proprietors.

Mr. MACMORRAN, Q.C. (with whom was Mr. John Sankey), showed cause. He read affidavits filed on behalf of the council. In these the agreement of August 14, 1899, was admitted, but it was said that it was cancelled as soon as the council discovered that it was ultra vires. The council heard and determined the applications of the relators and refused them on the ground that there were already a sufficient number of licences in existence, having regard to the population and wants of the district and the nature of the traffic in the streets. Before 1897 the persons to whom licences were granted used to run their brakes and omnibuses during the summer months, but neglected and refused to run any brakes or omnibuses during the rest of the year. At the annual licensing meeting held in 1898 the council interviewed the persons who applied for licences, all of whom, including the relators, agreed to run their brakes and omnibuses throughout the year in accordance with a time-table. With the exception, however, of Paulett and Grimshire all the licensees neglected and refused to run their brakes after September. In 1899 the licences of the proprietor other than Paulett and Grimshire were refused. The relators, notwithstanding such refusal, continued to ply for hire, and were summoned for plying for hire without a licence. The summonses were afterwards withdrawn. In 1900 the relators again applied for licences, which were again refused, and licences were granted to Paulett and Grimshire and to one other firm. The relators were again summoned for plying for hire without licences and were convicted. The applications were made on May 16 to the licensing committee, to whom the council had delegated their authority to grant or refuse the licences.

Mr. S. G. LUSHINGTON, in support of the rule, contended that, assuming that the council were entitled to refuse licences for omnibuses and hackney carriages on the ground that a sufficient number of such licences already existed, they had no power to refuse drivers' licences on that ground. He also contended that the council had no power to prescribe the times at which the brakes and omnibuses should run or to compel an applicant for a licence to ply his trade at times when he did not choose to do so.

MR. JUSTICE DARLING said that the rule must be made absolute. The Barry District Council entered into an agreement that they would license no one except Paulett and Grimshire to ply for hire within their district, and those two persons, on the other hand, agreed to be bound by certain rules and to do certain things which were pleasing to the council. If that agreement had remained in force the council could not have properly exercised their discretion in granting and refusing licences. It, however, occurred to them that the agreement was ultra vires, and it was therefore cancelled. Nevertheless, the committee, to whom the power of the council with reference to these licences was delegated, acted absolutely in accordance with the terms of the agreement. It was beyond a case of mere suspicion. They exercised no discretion, but merely licensed Paulett and Grimshire, and with regard to the drivers they would license those who were authorized to apply by Paulett and Grimshire, and would refuse the applications of those who were not so authorized. It was clearly an attempt to give effect to the illegal agreement. The committee professed to exercise a free judgment, but, as a matter of fact, they did not do so. The mandamus must therefore go.

MR. JUSTICE DAY concurred.

The rule was accordingly made absolute.

Ship—Policy of insurance—Construction of policy—"Whole currency of policy."

The currency of a policy of insurance on a ship ends when the vessel is lost, and does not endure for the whole period for which the ship is insured.

Judgment was delivered in this case, the question being whether, in the circumstances of the case, the plaintiffs were entitled to a return of premium under the terms of a policy of marine insurance underwritten by the defendant.

MR. RUFUS ISAACS, Q.C., and Mr. Montague Lush appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., and Mr. H. W. Loechnis for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—This was an action to recover back part of the premium paid to the defendant for the insurance of the plaintiffs' ship. On April 1, 1899, the plaintiffs insured their ship, the Gorsedd, with the defendant for 12 months at a premium of eight guineas per cent. The policy contained the following provision:—"Returning one guinea per cent. should the vessel be employed in the Eastern trade during the whole currency of this policy." The vessel was lost some time before the 12 months expired, and from April 1, 1899, to the date of her loss she was employed only in the Eastern trade. The plaintiffs claim the return premium, alleging that the vessel was employed during the whole currency of the policy in the Eastern trade, and that, therefore, the condition has happened which entitles them to the return they claim. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the vessel was not so employed "during the whole currency of the policy," and that, therefore, no return premium is payable. The question is as to the meaning to be put upon the expression "the whole currency of the policy." The plaintiffs say the currency of the policy ends when the ship is lost; the defendant says the expression means the 12 months for which the vessel was insured. I think the plaintiffs' contention is the right one. The risk no longer exists after the ship is lost; the amount insured is immediately payable, and, being paid, the policy, and all obligations created by it, are at an end; the policy is no longer in any sense current. It was current while the risk was alive, and no longer, and as, during the whole of that time, the vessel was employed in the Eastern trade, the plaintiffs are entitled to the return premium. The defendant says this interpretation is unreasonable, because it would make them responsible for the return premium though the ship were lost one day after the policy was effected. But if the defendant's contention is right, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to recover though the ship were not lost until the day before the policy expired. If the provision was intended to bear the construction contended for by the defendant, it would have been simple to have used the words "during the whole 12 months." The words "during the whole currency of the policy" were, in my opinion, used because it was contemplated that the policy might cease to be current before the 12 months ran out. The defendant made another point. There is a clause in the policy—"to return 13s. 4d. per cent. for each uncommenced month, if this policy be cancelled." This clause enables the assured to cancel at any time, and to ask for a return of 13s. 4d. for each uncommenced month; and it was said on behalf of the defendant that, if the plaintiffs' contention were right, the plaintiffs could terminate the risk in the first month, and claim, not only a return of 13s. 4d. in respect of the 11 uncommenced months, but also the guinea per cent. under the provision now in question, which it was said was absurd. And it would be absurd if it were true; but the answer is that if the assured chooses to cancel, the amount that he is to get back is fixed by the very clause under which he cancels; he gets back the 13s. 4d. for each uncommenced month, and no more.

Judgment for the plaintiffs, with costs.

IN RE LEYLAND AND TAYLOR'S CONTRACT.*

Vendor and Purchaser—Conditions of sale—Error, misstatement, or omission—Liability to pave, flag, and sewer street.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster. It raised a question of conveyancing law of importance to vendors and purchasers of property in towns—viz., whether a vendor of house property, who shortly before the contract of sale has been served by the local authority with notices calling upon him to pave, flag, and sewer the street opposite the houses agreed to be sold, and has not complied with the requirements of the notices at the date of the contract, is bound to disclose to the purchaser the fact that he has been served with the notices. There was a further question as to the effect of the conditions of sale in this particular case upon the vendor's liability.

The facts, as appeared by the statement agreed on by the parties, were as follows:—On May 8, 1899, some cottages in Radcliffe were put up for sale by auction by Mr. Henry Leyland under conditions of sale of which the following are material. Condition 4 provided that, if before the completion of the purchase the vendor should have expended any money in complying with any requirement enforceable against him and made after the sale by the local authority in respect of paving, flagging, or sewerage of the streets, the purchaser should on completion of the purchase repay to the vendor the amount so expended by him, and in case any such requirements should not have been complied with before the completion of the purchase, the purchaser should indemnify the vendor in respect thereof. Condition 13 provided that, if any error, misstatement, or omission in the particulars should be discovered, the same should not annul the sale, but, if the same was pointed out by either vendor or purchaser before the completion of the purchase, compensation should be allowed, to be settled by two referees as therein mentioned. At the sale Mr. James Taylor became the purchaser of the property in question for the sum of £300, and by a memorandum of agreement endorsed upon the particulars and conditions of sale the date for completion was to be June 8, 1899. It appeared on the investigation of the title that on April 13, 1899, the local authority had given notices to the vendor to pave, flag, and sewer the street opposite these cottages, and that the work was to be done in accordance with plans and sections then lying for inspection by the vendor at the offices of the local authority, and that these plans and sections showed that the level of the street opposite the said cottages would be several inches above the ground floors. The purchaser objected that the particulars of sale contained no mention of these notices, and that if he had been aware of the notices having been given he would not have bid for the property, or at any rate would not have bid so much as he did in fact bid. This was admitted in the agreed statement of facts. On the other hand, the vendor contended that, at the date of the sale, there was no charge upon the property, and that the purchaser was bound to complete with the liability created by these notices hanging over it. Ultimately, on June 19, 1899, the purchase was completed and the purchase money was paid, but without prejudice to the question whether the purchaser was entitled to compensation in respect of these notices. It was conceded that the omission to disclose the fact that these notices had been given was not due to any fraud on the part of the vendor. When the fact was discovered by the purchaser no steps had been taken either by the vendor or by the local authority to execute the works mentioned in the notices, but subsequently, in January, 1900, the works were completed by the local authority. By agreement between the parties a summons was taken out by the vendor for a declaration that the purchaser was not entitled to compensation under condition 13. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion, first, that the particulars of sale were not full and fair as between vendor and purchaser, inasmuch as they omitted to state a fact of great importance in determining the value of the property, and secondly, that condition 4 was so framed as to lead to the inference that no notices had been given to the vendor prior to the date of the contract, and that consequently it was calculated to mislead. In these circumstances the Vice-Chancellor thought that the purchaser was clearly entitled to compensation under condition 13. The vendor appealed. The appeal was heard on July 6 last, when the Court reserved their judgment.

Mr. Daniel Jones and Mr. W. Ambrose Jones were for the vendor; Mr. Upjohn, Q.C., and Mr. Tweedale were for the purchaser.

The COURT allowed the appeal.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said,—"I have had very great difficulty in arriving at a conclusion in this case. After stating the facts and the decision of the Vice-Chancellor his Lordship continued:—"In the face of the agreed statement of facts I do not think it is possible to hold that the non-disclosure of the notice was immaterial. The purchaser, however, elected to complete the contract, and to rely upon his rights under condition 13. I have felt very considerable difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the neglect of the vendor to disclose the notice was "an error, misstatement, or omission of particulars" within the meaning of condition 13. But, upon the whole, I am not prepared to say that, if the omission to disclose the notice could affect the value of the property, no claim for compensation could have been made. The ground upon which I come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor cannot be supported is, that I do not see how the mere omission to disclose such a notice can possibly have affected the value of the property sold. The time when and the circumstances under which such a notice may be served, and the character of the work to be executed rest with the local authority, and, buying such property, the purchaser must be taken to have known that such a notice might be served at any time, and to have bought subject to such a contingency. And, in my opinion, the fact that the notice was served at one time or the other could not possibly have affected the value of the property sold for the purpose of the contract. For these reasons, I think, the appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE RIGBY and LORD JUSTICE COLLINS delivered judgments to the same effect.

Ship—Collision—Damage—Delay caused by repairing ship—Extra expense of coal.

Two steamships, N. and O., having collided in the Mersey, the N. agreed to pay 75 per cent. of the damage to the O. The O. carried mails and passengers from Liverpool for South America, and after leaving Liverpool her practice was to call at Cardiff to coal and then proceed to Havre, where the bulk of her passengers embarked. Upon the occasion in question she was delayed at Liverpool repairing the damage caused by the collision, and in order to save time and to get to Havre as soon as possible, she filled up with coal at Liverpool and did not call at Cardiff. The extra expense thereby caused was £309.

Held, that this sum could not be recovered as part of the damages.

This case came before the Court by way of objection to a report of the Liverpool District Registrar. The matter arose out of a collision which occurred in the river Mersey on December 7, 1899, between the plaintiffs' steamship Obidense and the defendants' steamship Normandy, by which the Obidense sustained considerable damage. Actions were instituted on behalf of both vessels, but were subsequently settled, the owners of the Normandy agreeing to pay 75 per cent. of the damage to the Obidense, and it was referred to the Liverpool District Registrar, assisted by merchants, to assess the amount of this damage. The plaintiffs put forward a claim asserting that the total amount of the damage to the Obidense was £2,744 0s. 2d. The Registrar by his report, which was dated June 18, 1900, allowed the sum of £2,232 15s. 1d. The amounts disallowed by the Registrar with respect to four items were objected to by the plaintiffs, who appealed to the Court. With regard to three of these items no question of public interest arose. The fourth item raised a point of some novelty. It appeared that the Obidense was one of the "Red Cross" Line of steamers, carrying mails and passengers to South America, and was advertised to leave Liverpool on December 19. In the ordinary course she would have proceeded thence to Cardiff to coal, the owners having a contract with a firm there which enabled them to coal at considerably less cost than filling their bunkers at Liverpool would entail. From Cardiff it was intended that the Obidense should proceed to Havre, whence she was advertised to sail on December 25. Owing to the repairs in consequence of the collision she was not ready to leave Liverpool until December 22. It was stated in evidence before the Registrar that, inasmuch as the bulk of the passengers usually embark at Havre, it was the practice of the owners of the Red Cross Line when any of their vessels were delayed in starting to coal at Liverpool, thereby saving two days at Cardiff on the voyage from Liverpool to Havre. This course was adopted in the present case, and the extra expense caused by coaling at Liverpool was £309 5s. 0d. By adopting this course the Obidense was only one day late at Havre. At first the plaintiffs put forward a claim for £120 for demurrage, being for three days at £40 a day, but they subsequently withdrew this claim, and substituted a claim for £309 5s. 0d., the extra cost entailed by coaling at Liverpool. The Registrar held that there was no doubt that, having regard to their own interests, the owners of the Obidense acted wisely in adopting the practice referred to, but in this case the only result of coaling at Cardiff in the ordinary way would have been that the Obidense would have been three days late at Havre instead of one, and he only allowed the sum of £120 originally claimed. On the hearing of the appeal,

Mr. ASPINALL, Q.C. (Mr. Glynn with him), for the appellants, contended on this point that the plaintiffs were justified in claiming £309 5s. 0d. The practice of coaling at Liverpool had been adopted to preserve as far as possible the reputation of the line for punctuality in their sailings, and this was a head of damage which naturally arose from the collision.

Mr. CARVER, Q.C., and Mr. BATESON, for the respondents, argued that the only heads of damage which were recoverable in a collision action were the cost of the actual repairs and demurrage, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to aggravate the demurrage from a desire to preserve the reputation of their line.

The COURT dismissed the appeal on this as well as on the other three items objected to.

MR. JUSTICE GORELL BARNES, in giving judgment, said that it did not seem to him that it would be right to increase the amount allowed by the Registrar for this head of damage. It could not be said that the extra cost of the coal could fairly be taken to be a consequence of the collision, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MILMAN V. LANE.*

Will—Construction—Devise for a term to persons and to the "heirs and assigns of the survivor."

A testator devised certain land, after successive chattel interests to five persons, to the "heirs and assigns of the survivor."

Held, upon the construction of the whole of the will, that the word "assigns" had no conveyancing meaning, and that the heiress of the survivor took the land as a persona designata.

This was an action by Miss Amelia Milman against Mr. William Lane, the younger, to recover possession of a farm called Ranscombe, in the parish of Sandford, Devonshire. The action was tried at Exeter Assizes.

Mr. M. W. McKellar and Mr. Alfred Loosemore were for the plaintiff; Mr. Alderson Foote, Q.C., Mr. Duke, Q.C., and Mr. W. Howland Roberts for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE LAWRENCE read a written judgment to the following effect:—The testator, John Vicary, of Sandford, by his will after a devise of an estate tail, which has determined and never was barred, devised the premises, the subject of this action, after successive chattel interests to five persons, to the heirs and assigns of the survivor of those five persons—i.e., in the events which happened, to the heirs and assigns of Richard Milman. Now, the preceding devises being of chattel interests, no question upon the rule in Shelley's case arises here. It is to all intents and purposes as if the testator had devised the premises to the heirs and assigns of Richard Milman, and the only question is whether the plaintiff, as heiress of Richard Milman, or the defendant, as purchaser from him, has the better right; in other words, the question is, What is the effect of a devise to the heirs and assigns of a named person, to whom no particular freehold estate has been limited? The authorities are by no means unanimous. [His Lordship then referred to "Tapner v. Merlott" (Willes, 177); "Quested v. Michell," (24 L.J., Ch. 722); "Brookman v. Smith," (L.R., 6 Ex., 291)]. The last cited case is at any rate an authority for the proposition that the will itself is to be looked at in order to discover the meaning of the words "heirs and assigns." Upon the general aspect of the question it is to be observed that "the words 'to assigns for ever' have at the present day no conveyancing virtue at all, but are merely declaratory of that power of alienation which the purchaser would have without them" (see Williams's Real Property, 18th edition, p. 145). The matter being therefore, so far as the authorities are concerned, practically at large, I am entitled to look at the express terms of the will to see if the testator himself has given any indication of what he intends by the phrase "heirs and assigns." On page 3 of the will I find a rent-charge vested in two trustees, their heirs, and assigns to secure payment of an annuity. In this case it is clear that the word "assigns" has, in the words of the learned Mr. Joshua Williams, "no conveyancing virtue." On page 5 the receipt of the annuitant is to be a good discharge to the trustees, their heirs, and assigns; powers of distress are also given to the trustees, their heirs and assigns. On page 9 an estate in fee simple in hereditaments in the parish of Sandford is limited to the trustees, their heirs and assigns, upon the trusts mentioned. Here again the word "assigns" adds nothing to what is already conveyed in the word "heirs." On page 10, however, an interest for 99 years, if he shall so long live, is conferred upon William Milman and his assigns without any mention of his heirs. Here the heirs are properly not mentioned, while "assigns" again expresses nothing more than would have been expressed without that word. Similar interests, in similar words, are conferred on John Milman, Edward Milman, William Milman, and Richard Milman (see page 10.) On page 11 occurs a limitation, similar to the one in question in this action, to the "heirs and assigns" of the survivor. Then with regard to the Ranscombe property and the residue of the real estate at Sandford there is an interest for 99 years, if he shall so long live, conferred upon Edward Milman and his assigns, the word "assigns" having here again no conveyancing value. After this life estate there is given an elaborate power of appointment by deed or will among the children of Edward Milman, and, in default of appointment among the children, an estate in tail male is limited to the heirs male of the body of Edward Milman. Upon this part of the case two observations are to be made—first, that the testator knows well how to confer a power of appointment; second, that in this part of the will, at all events, the interest for 99 years, if he shall so long live, conferred upon Edward Milman and his assigns does not give him a general power of appointment. Then follow interests exactly similar to those already mentioned in favour of William, John, Edward, William the younger, Richard, and their respective assigns for 99 years, if they shall respectively so long live, the word "assigns" conveying nothing. There follow on page 17 two gifts—one a residuary gift to Edward Milman, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, of all property of whatsoever kind not as yet disposed of; and, secondly, a devise of all trust estates in similar terms, the word "assigns" having a similar—that is, no—effect. Upon the construction of this will, therefore, seeing that "assigns," as used by the testator, has no conveyancing effect, and that in one instance at all events it clearly does not confer a power of appointment, I arrive at the conclusion that the "heirs and assigns" of the survivor means no more than the "heirs" of the survivor, and the plaintiff as heiress at law took as a persona designata and is entitled to recover. It follows, in the view I take of this case, that section 1 subsection 3 and section 3 of the Land Transfer Act, 1897, have no application. With regard to the authorities cited, it is clear that the plaintiff took by an executory devise. "Harris v. Barnes" (1 W. Bl., 643), cited with approval in Fearne on Contingent Remainders, 4th edition, p. 64; "In re Walton's Estate" (25 L.J., Ch., 569), which decided that a gift of personalty to A or his heirs or assigns confers on A an absolute interest; and "Doe d. Calkin v. Tomkinson" (2 M. and S., 165), which decided that a devise to the testator's two sisters or the survivor, and to be disposed of by the survivor as she should by will devise, did not create a tenancy in common between the two sisters, do not appear to me to assist the discussion. The same may be said of "Attorney-General v. Brackenbury," (32 L.J., Ex., 108). Having dealt with the legal question, his Lordship added that he regretted having to come to this conclusion, because Richard Milman left the whole of his property to the present plaintiff, so that she had the estate in one hand and the money in the other.

*Reported by J. F. WALKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

A stay of execution was granted with a view to an appeal.

IN RE THE BARROW HEMATITE STEEL COMPANY (LIMITED).*

Company—Reduction of capital—Confirmation by Court—Principles applicable.

The Court refused to sanction a reduction of capital, the evidence not satisfying it that the value of the Company's assets had decreased as alleged. In ascertaining what are the assets of the Company for this purpose, the reserve fund, the amount standing to profit and loss account, and the goodwill must be taken into account.

This was a petition for reduction of the capital of the company. The arguments were heard on the 8th inst., when his Lordship reserved judgment. This morning judgment was delivered.

MR. JUSTICE COZENS-HARDY said,—This petition for reduction of capital raises several points of importance and difficulty. The company was incorporated in 1864. Its capital was from time to time increased, and in 1886 it was £2,037,700, divided into 150,000 ordinary shares of £10 each, 377 £8 per cent. preference shares of £100 each, and 50,000 £6 per cent. preference shares of £10 each. The preference shares have no priority as regards capital, but are cumulative as to dividend, and the holders of these shares have no right of voting at meetings of the company. In 1888 the company resolved to reduce its capital rateably to the extent of 25 per cent. The petition seeking the confirmation by the Court came before Mr. Justice North. It is reported in 39 Ch.D., 582, 4 The Times L.R., 775. It was there decided that the preference shareholders could not insist upon the reduction being confined to the ordinary share capital, and the Court confirmed the proposed reduction. The principle of this decision is binding upon me, and I think it is not open to me to regard some of the arguments I have heard on the present occasion. The company now desire further to reduce their reduced capital by writing off 50 per cent. all round, and they have passed a special resolution for this purpose which they ask the Court to confirm. The petition is stoutly opposed by a very large body of preference shareholders. The precise number is not very important, but I take it that, putting aside shareholders who hold both ordinary and preference shares and who may, therefore, be indifferent to the change, the petition is opposed by a very large majority of the preference shareholders. It is alleged by the company, and it is necessary for the company to establish, that the 50 per cent. which they propose to cancel is "lost or unrepresented by available assets." Unless this is made out there is no jurisdiction to make the order. Assuming that the company can establish this and that I have power to sanction the reduction I am guided in considering how my discretion ought to be exercised by the observations of Lord Herschell in "British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper" ([1894] A.C., 399, 10 The Times L.R., 415). It is not the duty of this Court to confirm unless it is satisfied that the reduction will not work unjustly or inequitably. Lord Herschell ([1894] A.C., at p. 406) lays down this proposition:—"No such scheme ought to be confirmed unless the Court be satisfied that it will not work unjustly or inequitably." In other words, the change ought not to be sanctioned in a doubtful case. It remains to consider these two points. The case on the part of the company may be shortly stated as follows. They say that the iron ore mines stand in the balance-sheet at twice their value, and they propose to reduce it by roughly £177,000. They say their works, which stand at upwards of £2,000,000, are over-estimated by £486,000, and that their freehold land and house property, which stands at £200,000, is over-estimated by £100,000. These three items make up the £764,000 which they propose to write off. They support their contention by a mass of evidence. As to the first item, their expert evidence goes to show the extreme probability that the iron ore which has been hitherto worked in a part of a large tract of land near their works is approaching exhaustion and that there is no reasonable probability of further mines or veins being discovered. With reference to the second item, the works, the company say that although they are in a high state of efficiency and have been kept up in this state out of revenue, yet their value is really dependent upon the value of the adjacent mines, and that if ere has to be purchased and brought from a distance they will not be able to employ the works at so great an advantage. With reference to the third item, they say that by reason of subsidences and excessive prices paid to avoid claims for compensation and other causes the present value of land and house property is only 50 per cent. of the amount at which it stands in the balance-sheet. On the part of the opponents there is also a great mass of evidence. In some respects it is not so direct or so weighty as that of the company. But the evidence as a whole leaves, in my mind, the impression that the value of the mines and of the works is really a pure matter of speculation, upon which no satisfactory or conclusive judgment can be formed. I think I might dispose of this petition on the short ground that the company have not satisfied me that items 1 and 2 are proved. Capital ought not to be reduced in an opposed case on the mere balance of speculative expert evidence. There are circumstances under which the Court is obliged to rely upon such evidence but this is not such a case. The opponents, in addition to challenging the figures in these three items, raise several further points. First, they say that among the assets of the company there is a sum of £40,000 to the credit of reserve account which ought to be but has not been reckoned. They say that according to the articles of association of the company this sum is made applicable towards depreciation of this nature. Secondly, they say that there is a further sum of, roughly, £90,000 to the credit of profit and loss, which is an available asset. Thirdly, they say that the goodwill of a company of this nature is an asset to which some value, and probably a considerable value, ought to be attributed. See "In re Abstainers and General Insurance Company" ([1891] 2 Ch., 124). Fourthly, they further say that a colliery which is only valued at £175,000 ought to be appreciated. On this point there is a mass of evidence on both sides. Most of the observations which I have made as to speculative expert evidence apply to this point. I am certainly not satisfied that the colliery is not worth much more than £175,000 having regard to the present prices of coal, but I do not intend to base my judgment upon any such consideration. Dealing then with the first three points made by the opponents, I can see no answer to the argument that the £40,000 ought to have been treated as an available asset. So far as I am aware, this is the first instance in which a company possessing a large reserve fund has sought to reduce capital without taking account of the reserve fund. As to the £90,000 to the credit of profit and loss, the directors have not yet recommended any dividend and it rests with them to consider whether all or any part of this sum ought to be placed to reserve account. Upon the whole I think that similar observations apply to it. As to goodwill, it is no doubt true that the company never has entered goodwill as an asset. For the purposes of the company as a going concern there was no necessity for doing this, but, nevertheless, any goodwill must be regarded as an available asset for the purpose of a reduction petition. The decision of Mr. Justice North above referred to is clear upon the point. I think, upon the balance of the evidence, that a company of this magnitude, whose goods are known almost all over the world by their particular brand, must have a goodwill of considerable value. For all these reasons I think that the company have not proved that £764,000 is capital lost or unrepresented by available assets and it follows that I cannot confirm the reduction. I am unwilling to part with the case without stating that even if the fact of the loss of £764,000 had been established, I should not have thought it right to confirm the reduction. What is the necessity for the reduction? The company is making large and increasing profits from its trading. In round figures, 1897, £55,000; 1898, £65,000; 1899, £89,000; probably more in the current year, having regard to the price of coal. It has paid, and having regard to decisions which are binding upon every Court short of the House of Lords it has properly paid, dividends out of such profits notwithstanding the loss of capital. Why should any change be made? The earning capacity of the company will not be in any way increased by the reduction of the capital, and I do not think that in dealing with two classes of shareholders I ought to make an unnecessary reduction for the avowed purpose of relieving the ordinary shareholders from the burden of preferential interest. At the present moment there are arrears of the cumulative preferential dividend, the whole or a greater part of which may be speedily paid off out of profits. The annual preferential charge is in round figures £24,000, subject to which all the profits go to the ordinary shareholders. The proposal is that the ordinary shareholders should in future take all the profits subject to a preferential charge of £12,000 only. In substance it is a proposal by the ordinary shareholders to deprive the preferential shareholders of £12,000 a year for the benefit of the ordinary shareholders, without any necessity for so doing and without any advantage to the company as a whole. This does not strike me as fair and equitable. It seems to have been assumed in 1888 that some reduction of capital was necessary, and the fight raged over the mode in which this reduction should be effected. None of the decisions to which I have referred had then been given, and probably all parties, including counsel and the Judge, may have been under the impression that no dividend could legally be paid unless and until lost capital had been replaced. This view was widely held until the Court of Appeal in "Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Company" in 1889 (41 Ch.D., 1; 5 The Times L.R., 260) and "Verner v. General, &c., Trust" in 1894 (2 Ch., 239; 10 The Times L.R., 341 and 393) laid down that a trading profit may be applied in payment of dividends notwithstanding a depreciation in the fixed capital of the company. This is an important matter for consideration in all cases where there are several classes of shareholders who may be unequally affected by reduction. Where all shareholders rank alike, both as to dividends and as to capital, it is of less importance, for nobody can be hurt by reduction. I have not forgotten the argument that directors ought to keep true and honest accounts. Of course they ought. I see no reason to suppose that they have not done this in the past or that they will not do it in the future. They have not stated that the items in question represent the actual value. On the contrary, the balance-sheets which they have published state that the figures as to the three items in question are given, "as per the last balance-sheet," with a note by the auditor that no depreciation has been written off. If the directors are minded to change this system and to reduce the figures and to add a fresh balancing item under the head of depreciation they can do so. Nothing that I have said will prevent them from taking this course. But the decisions to which I have referred necessarily imply that directors may honestly and properly prepare a balance-sheet showing or implying a loss of capital, and at the same time may honestly and properly prepare a profit and loss account showing a balance available for dividend. The result is that I must dismiss the petition and the company must pay the costs of the opponents.

Mr. Swinfen Eady, Q.C., and Mr. Cassel were for the company in support of the petition; Mr. Eve, Q.C., and Mr. Kirby for preference shareholders; and Mr. E. C. Macnaghten, Q.C., and Mr. Simey for various shareholders.

MARTEN.*

Insurance, Marine—General average—Policy on ship valued at £33,000—Ship of the value of £40,000—Contribution.

A ship was insured for and valued at £33,000. During the currency of the policy she incurred general average expenses, and had to pay a salvage award. In the salvage action the value of the ship was proved by her owners to be £40,000, and that figure was taken by the average adjusters as the contributory value of the ship for the purpose also of the general average. The ship-owners sought to recover from the underwriters the whole of the ship's proportion of the salvage and of the general average contribution.

Held, that the plaintiffs could only recover 33-40ths of the amount.

This was an action to recover a loss under a policy on the plaintiffs' ship Balmoral subscribed by the defendant and others, underwriters at Lloyd's. By the policy the ship was insured for, and valued at, £33,000. During the currency of the policy the Balmoral received certain salvage services, in respect of which a salvage award was made in the Admiralty Court against ship, freight, and cargo; certain general average expenses were also incurred. In the salvage action the value of the Balmoral was proved by affidavit of her owners to be £40,000, and that figure was taken by the average adjusters as the contributory value of the ship for the purpose also of the general average. The plaintiffs sought to recover from the underwriters on the ship the whole of the ship's proportion of the salvage and of the general average contribution. The underwriters contended that, as the ship was valued in the policy at £33,000, the plaintiffs could only recover under the policy 33-40ths of the amount due, and that 7-40ths must be borne by the plaintiffs themselves. Although the actual amount in dispute in this particular case was but small, the principle involved was one of very great importance to shipowners and underwriters. Mr. F. C. Danson, an average adjuster of many years' experience, gave evidence on behalf of the defendants. He said that there was a well-known practice in the English underwriting world extending over a long time that where a vessel was insured for a sum less than the contributory value upon which general average was adjusted, or less than the amount at which the vessel was valued in a salvage action, the underwriters were only liable to pay in the proportion of the insured value to the contributory or salvage values. The plaintiffs called no witnesses, contending that evidence as to the practice of average adjusters was inadmissible, and that the practice deposed to was wrong in law, and ought not to govern the decision of this case.

Mr. D. C. Leck (Mr. Joseph Walton, Q.C., with him), appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Pickford, Q.C., Mr. T. E. Scrutton, and Mr. F. D. Mackinnon for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM, having taken time to consider, read the following judgment:—In this case the defendants underwrote a policy of marine insurance on the plaintiffs' ship for £33,000, the ship being valued in the policy at the same sum. While the policy was current a general average loss was sustained and a salvage claim had to be paid, and thereupon an average statement was made up. The real value of the ship at the time of the average statement was £40,000, and the rights of the different parties interested—namely, owners of ship, freight, and cargo respectively—were regulated inter se on that footing. The question is whether the defendants must indemnify the plaintiffs against the whole of the average loss payable by them, or only against 33-40ths thereof. The first question divides itself into two parts—viz., that relating to the general average loss, and that relating to the salvage claim. As to the general average loss, the evidence satisfies me that the practice in this country is for the underwriter on a valued policy to pay only the proportion which the value in the policy bears to the actual value on which the statement has been made up. Applying the rule of practice to the present case, the defendants will only be liable to make good to the plaintiffs 33-40ths of the general average loss. The plaintiffs say that this rule is inconsistent with the contract contained in the policy, because, as between themselves and the defendants, the ship is a fully insured ship. She is, they say, by agreement valued at £33,000, and she is insured for that same sum; and being fully insured they are entitled to a full indemnity against the general average claim. But I think it is the plaintiffs' contention, rather than the defendants', which is inconsistent with the terms of the policy; for the defendants have promised to be bound on the basis of the ship being worth £33,000, whereas the plaintiffs are asking them to pay on the footing of the ship being worth £40,000. The plaintiffs have not satisfied me that their contention is right. The rule of practice to which I have referred has been in force for nearly a century. I am asked to disregard it. If I did so, I should unsettle the basis on which existing policies for many millions of money have been made. I am not disposed to do this unless I see clear reasons for it. I see reasons rather the other way, and, therefore, on this part of the question I find for the defendants. As to the claim for salvage loss, the practice has been for more than a century to treat such claims precisely as claims for general average are treated. I think, therefore, the defendants succeed on this part of the case also.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

EPSOM URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Highway—Extraordinary Traffic—"Person by or in consequence of whose order" the traffic has been conducted—Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 77), s. 23—Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict., c. 29), s. 12.

ing buildings. The work involved the carriage of exceptionally heavy traffic along some of the roads in the plaintiffs' district.

Held, that the traffic had been conducted along the roads in consequence of the defendants' orders within s. 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898, and that the defendants were liable for the expense of the repairs to the roads caused thereby. The fact that the contracts were made before the coming into operation of the Locomotives Act, 1898, is immaterial, provided the damage to the roads is done after. "Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard" ([1897] A.C., 633) distinguished.

Judgment was delivered in this case. The action was brought to recover the extra cost of the repairs to certain roads in the plaintiffs' district alleged to be due to extraordinary traffic in connexion with the erection by the London County Council of a lunatic asylum at Horton in the plaintiffs' district. The case was one of some importance, being the first case in which the Court has had to construe the provisions of the Locomotives Act, 1898.

Mr. Macmorran, Q.C., Mr. R. C. Glen, and Mr. Swinburne Hanham appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Dickens, Q.C., and Mr. Daldy for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE BIGHAM read the following judgment:—The question in this case is whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the cost of repairing the damage done to some roads in their district by certain exceptionally heavy traffic thereon. They contend that the traffic came on to the roads by or in consequence of the order of the defendants, and that, therefore, the defendants are liable under section 23 of the Highways Act, 1878, as amended by section 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898. The facts are these:—The defendants in the year 1898 entered into agreements with two firms of contractors for the erection of a temporary hospital and for the alteration of certain existing buildings so as to adapt them for use as a permanent hospital. The site of both buildings was in the plaintiffs' district, and the works involved the carriage of exceptionally heavy traffic along certain roads in the district. The work under one of these contracts (Kirk and Randall's) was completed by April 15, 1899. On July 12, 1899, the plaintiffs' surveyor granted a certificate in the following form for the purpose of complying with the requirements of section 23 of the Act of 1878:—"Extraordinary Traffic.—I hereby certify that, having regard to the average expenses of repairing highways along the line of traffic to the Horton Asylum temporary buildings, extraordinary expenses to the amount of £484 15s. 11d. have been incurred by you in repairing such highways by reason of the damage caused by excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon. In calculating the above amount I have ascertained the cost of repairs of these roads for the past five years, and have deducted the average annual cost from the total expended. (Signed) EDWARD R. CAPON." The writ was issued on December 22, 1899. The first question is whether the defendants are persons "by or in consequence of whose order" the traffic was conducted within the meaning of the two Acts of Parliament. Under the earlier Act the persons made liable were those persons "by whose order" the traffic was conducted. By the later Act the words "by or in consequence of whose order" are substituted for the words "by whose order." In the case of "Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard" ([1897] A.C., 633) the question arose as to the meaning of the expression "by whose order" which occurs in the earlier Act. In that case Lord Gerard had contracted with several persons for the delivery at his residence of certain material. Extraordinary expenses within the meaning of the statute were incurred by the road authority in repairing the roads over which the materials were brought to the house, and the plaintiffs sought to recover the amount from Lord Gerard. The House of Lords held that inasmuch as Lord Gerard had bought the material "delivered," he had nothing to do with the conduct of the traffic along the roads; that the traffic was conducted by the order of the persons who had sold the goods "delivered," and that, therefore, Lord Gerard was not liable. In the Court of Appeal Lord Justice Lopes had read the words "by whose order" as equivalent to the words "in consequence of whose order," and had come to the conclusion (differing from the other members of the Court) that Lord Gerard was liable. The Lords did not think that this view was right, but they do seem to me to have expressed an opinion (which, of course, was obiter) that, if it had been possible to give to the words of the statute the meaning which Lord Justice Lopes gave to them, then Lord Gerard would have been liable. The amendment in the Act of 1898 was introduced in consequence of the decision in Lord Gerard's case. The words "by whose order" were discarded and the words "by or in consequence of whose order" were substituted. There can be no doubt that the object of the Legislature was to alter the earlier Act in such a way as to bring a case like Lord Gerard's within its scope. Whether the Legislature has succeeded may be open to doubt, but I am of opinion that it has succeeded, and that if Lord Gerard's case had been decided under the later Act Lord Gerard would have been held to be liable. Then is there any distinction in principle between Lord Gerard's case and the present case? In the former, the building owner contracted for the delivery of the building materials on his land; in the latter, the building owners, the London County Council, contracted for the erection of the buildings on their land. In each case the same consequence follows from the contract—namely, that the materials are conducted along the road. The only difference is that in the one case the materials belong to the building owner as soon as they are delivered, whereas in the other the materials do not belong to the building owner until they are worked into the structure by the contractor. In both cases orders were given—that is to say, contracts were made—and in both cases the consequence of the orders or contracts was that the traffic was conducted along the roads. I think that the plaintiffs are entitled on this, the main question in the case, to succeed. But then it was said that, inasmuch as the two building contracts were made before the later Act came into force—namely, before January 1, 1899—no orders within the meaning of that Act can be said to have been given at all. But I think it is not the giving of the order which creates the liability; it is the doing of the damage, and, therefore, though the contracts were made before the new Act, yet, if, and to the extent that, damage was done afterwards, I think the defendants are liable. Another point was taken on behalf of the defendants. It was said that in respect of the damage done in the execution of Kirk and Randall's work the proceedings to recover the amount were begun too late. I think that is so. The damage done by Kirk and Randall was, in my opinion, the consequence of their particular building contract, and, therefore, Clause 6 of subsection 1 of section 12 of the Act of 1898 applies. That provision is that "proceedings for the recovery of any expenses where the damage is the consequence of any particular building contract shall be commenced not later than six months after the completion of the contract." Kirk and Randall's contract was completed on April 15, 1899, and the writ was not issued until December 22, 1899. Finally, it was said that the form of the surveyors' certificate was not sufficient because it does not appear on its face that in making it regard has been had to "the average expenses of repairing highways in the neighbourhood" within the meaning of the 23rd section of the Act of 1878. I think nothing of this point. I am quite satisfied that the certificate did make it appear to the plaintiffs that extraordinary expenses within the meaning of the section had been incurred; and, if it did that, it was a certificate which complied with the requirements of the law. His Lordship added that the question of the amount recoverable must be ascertained according to the principle laid down in the judgment, and he hoped that neither party would spend any more of the ratepayers' money in litigating this question. If any difficulty arose in settling the amount, the question could be referred to his Lordship. There would be no costs of the action.

To ascertain whether a statement is, or is not, untrue within the meaning of that section it is important to consider—not the meaning of those who issued the prospectus, but the meaning it conveys to those who read it. A waiver clause in a prospectus must give such notice as brings home to the mind of a reasonably intelligent and careful reader such knowledge as fairly and in a business sense amounts to notice of the contract. Therefore a waiver clause—which said that "there may be other agreements as to the formation of the company, the subscription to the capital, or otherwise, to none of which the

The work involved the carriage of exceptionally heavy traffic along some of the roads in the plaintiffs' district. Held, that the traffic had been conducted along the roads in consequence of the defendants' orders within s. 12 of the Locomotives Act, 1898, and that the defendants were liable for the expense of the repairs to the roads caused thereby. The fact that the contracts were made before the coming into operation of the Locomotives Act, 1898, is immaterial, provided the damage to the roads is done after. "Kent County Council v. BELL AND ANOTHER V. BRENTFORD JUSTICES [Div. Ct.]	439	Hackney carriage—Licence—Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), ss. 37, 46].— Mandamus directed to issue to the district council to hear and deter- mine applications for licences for hackney car- riages, the Court coming to the conclusion that the district council had in refusing certain licences exercised no discretion in the matter, but had acted in accordance with the terms of an agreement, then cancelled, only to grant licences to two hackney carriage proprietors and their drivers.—THE QUEEN V. BARRY DISTRICT COUNCIL (EX PARTE JONES) [Div. Ct.]	565
LICENSING ACTS—Licence—Refusal to renew— Appeal to quarter sessions—No evidence offered— Jurisdiction to refuse renewal—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV., c. 61), s. 27—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 42].—At the general annual licens- ing meeting the justices, upon an objection raised, refused to grant the renewal of a licence. Upon appeal to quarter sessions the appellant proved the service of the notice of appeal, but no evidence was given on the merits. The appellant thereupon contended that he was entitled to have the licence re- newed. The quarter sessions refused the re- newal and dismissed the appeal. Held, that, as no evidence was given at quarter sessions in support of the objection to the renewal, the quarter sessions had no power to refuse to re- new the licence. Decision of the Divisional Court (ante , p. 190) reversed.—EVANS V. By another clause in the charter-party the captain, although appointed by the owners, was to be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other similar arrangements; bills of lading to be signed at any rate of freight the charterers or their agents might direct without prejudice to the charter; the charterers indemnifying the owners from all consequences or liabilities that might arise from the captain doing so. Corn was shipped under a bill of lading by which the shipowners were not exempted from the same liabilities as under the charter-party. The corn was damaged on the voyage, and the endorsees of the bill of lading sued the shipowners, alleging that the damage was caused by negligent loading. The shipowners served a third-party notice on the charterers claiming indemnity from them under the above clause in the charter-party. Collision—Damage—Delay caused by repairing ship—Extra expense of coal].—Two steamships, N. and O., having collided in the Mersey, the N. agreed to pay 75 per cent. of the damage to the O. The O. carried mails and passengers from Liverpool for South America, and after leaving Liverpool her practice was to call at Cardiff to coal and then proceed to Havre, where the bulk of her passengers embarked. Upon the occasion in question, she was delayed at Liverpool repairing the damage caused by the collision, and in order to save time and to get to Havre as soon as possible she filled up with coal at Liverpool and did not call at Cardiff. The extra expense thereby caused was £309. Held, that this sum could not be recovered as part of the damages.—THE NORMANDY [Gorell Barnes, J.]	567
